Despite complaints from some charter boat captains, environmental groups and city leaders around the Great Lakes, the Coast Guard defended the need to mount M-240B machine guns on its boats and to test fire them two or three times a year in "safety zones," about 70 square miles each.

"The Coast Guard has looked at an increased terrorist threat since 2001," Rear Adm. John E. Crowley Jr., commander of the Coast Guard district that oversees the Great Lakes, said in a telephone interview. "I don't know when or if something might happen on the Great Lakes, but I don't want to learn the hard way."

Some members of the Coast Guard assigned to law enforcement duties always carried weapons, but most of those were personal semiautomatic pistols. Since the arrival of the boat-mounted machine guns, the Coast Guard has conducted 24 training sessions on the lakes this year, although it has halted the exercises temporarily after news of the program seeped out last month and, with it, a barrage of objection.

DOJ_NMG_0080627

"When I heard, I thought it was something from The Onion newspaper or an Internet hoax," said Mike Bradley, the mayor of Sarnia, Ontario, which sits beside Lake Huron, where 6 of the 34 live fire zones are planned. "This whole thing was done way below the radar."

The Coast Guard's plans for permanent training zones were published in the Federal Register on Aug. 1, along with the promise of a month for public comment, but city leaders and ordinary boaters said that most of them never came across the document and that the authorities failed to provide them with any other notice of live fire plans — a fact that left some saying they felt as though the Coast Guard, now part of the Department of Homeland Security, was trying quietly to slip the whole weapons program past them.

Herb Bergson, the mayor of Duluth, got a telephone call in September from a resident who said she was listening to her marine scanner, heard talk of shooting on Lake Superior and wanted the mayor to explain what was going on.

"I didn't know what to tell her," Mr. Bergson said. "I was caught just flat-footed. No one told me, and they should have."

Coast Guard leaders — who have since announced nine public meetings in Great Lakes cities, starting Monday, and have extended until Nov. 13 the period for people to weigh in on the idea — acknowledge that they initially failed to publicize the weapons training program. "I've got no good answer for that," said Lt. j.g. Ryan Barone, a spokesman.

But the plans themselves, which ultimately would mean machine guns mounted on the vessels of more than 50 Coast Guard units throughout the Great Lakes, were carefully conceived, Lieutenant Barone said. Information about the proposal and scheduled public meetings is at uscgd9safetyzones.com.

All of the proposed firing zones sit at least five nautical miles from shores and from Canadian waters, as well as far from commercial shipping lanes and sensitive marine areas, Lieutenant Barone said. During the training days, when Coast Guard gunners will shoot at floating foam buoys, other boaters will be notified on marine radio frequencies, he said, and every test will include a designated safety observer.

Admiral Crowley said, "I don't feel there's a risk to anyone out there."

Around the Great Lakes, some people said they were supportive of the presence of machine guns and the planned tests. The risks of terrorism, they said, cannot be underestimated — even in small towns, even in the Upper Midwest. And as with extra airport safety measures, they said, the live fire tests may be inconvenient but they are needed.

Several ferry operators in Michigan, who carry cars and passengers across Lake Michigan, said they were satisfied that their customers would be safe. Ken Alvey, president of the Lake Erie Marine Trades Association, which represents some 80 marine businesses, said he was comfortable knowing that the Coast Guard members would practice on their new weapons.

"To say we don't have to worry about our open border with Canada would be foolish," Mr. Alvey said. "You never know what avenue terrorists will take."

But others, especially recreational boaters and professional fishing guides, said they were worried. Though most emphasized their support and gratitude to the Coast Guard, they said they did not even listen to their radios much anymore (unless a storm is rolling in) and could miss warnings altogether.

Ron Mihevc, who takes customers fishing out of the harbor at Waukegan, Ill., said he feared that the planned firing zone near Waukegan sits "right in the middle" of a prime fishing spot that draws scores of fishermen. Kelly J. Campise, another Waukegan boat captain, said fishermen already were carrying their clients many miles into Lake Michigan in search of salmon and trout at great fuel expense; going still further away to avoid the firing zones would cost still more, he said.

An 89-page environmental study, commissioned by federal authorities, concluded that rounds left in the lakes from the Coast Guard exercises would cause no harm, but Hugh McDiarmid Jr., a spokesman for the Michigan Environmental Council, said a "fuller environmental risk assessment," given the lead content of the rounds in particular, was needed.

For years, Coast Guard boats have been armed, and training has been conducted off of the coasts of this country, said Brad J. Kieserman, chief of the operations law group at Coast Guard headquarters.

On the Great Lakes, weapons training by military branches like the Navy has also occurred in years gone by, dating back to World War I and World War II. But in keeping with a treaty known as Rush-Bagot from 1817, Coast Guard vessels on the Great Lakes have historically not included naval armaments.

DOJ_NMG_0080628

But in 2003, federal authorities sought an understanding with their Canadian counterparts about Rush-Bagot in preparation for mounting machine guns on cutters so that the Coast Guard could "prevent terrorists or others engaged in criminal activities from crossing the United States-Canadian boundary by water," according to documents from the exchange between the two countries.

In recent days, though, some Canadian mayors, who said they had not heard of the plans until this fall, have objected vehemently. David Miller, the mayor of Toronto, said he worried about practical, safety aspects of the weapons plan and about the environment, but also about the precedent set for the lakes' more than 94,000 square miles of water.

"Our treaty had always said that the Great Lakes will not be militarized," Mr. Miller said. "And in effect, this remilitarizes them in the name of a threat from 9/11."

Changing Of The Guard (WSJ/WW)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal/WashWire, October 15, 2006

One of the last remaining senior-level political officials left from Tom Ridge's day at the helm of the Department of Homeland Security has stepped down.

Ambassador Cresencio "Cris" Arcos played a key role in helping the fledgling DHS forge partnerships with Canada, Mexico and other nations, negotiating expanded roles for U.S. customs agents based in foreign ports to help inspect U.S.-bound cargo overseas, among other early post 9/11 security measures. His last job before leaving was to help pave the way for stationing DHS intelligence analysts overseas.

His departure comes at a critical time for DHS which is coming under growing criticism for plans to build 700 miles of fencing along the U.S./Mexico border as a way to crack down on illegal immigration. Amb. Arcos is going into semiretirement and will work part time as a consultant.

WAR NEWS:

'Stay The Course' In Iraq? No Way, U.S. Panel Says (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — A commission backed by President Bush that is exploring U.S. options in Iraq intends to propose significant changes in the administration's strategy by early next year, members say.

Two options under consideration would represent reversals of U.S. policy: withdrawing American troops in phases, and bringing neighboring Iran and Syria into a joint effort to stop the fighting.

While it weighs alternatives, the 10-member commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III has agreed on one principle.

"It's not going to be 'stay the course,' " one participant said. "The bottom line is, [current U.S. policy] isn't working.... There's got to be another way."

If the panel recommends overhauling Bush's approach to Iraq, it could give a boost not only to critics of current policy but also to officials in the administration who have argued for broad changes.

"There'll probably be some things in our report that the administration might not like," Baker said in a television interview last week.

It's unclear how willing Bush is to change his strategy, which focuses on improving security in Baghdad, training Iraqi security forces and pressing the Iraqi government to forge a political agreement among warring factions.

Progress on all those fronts has been slow, and Bush last week said he was open to ideas.

"My attitude is: Don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change," Bush said at a news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0080629

When the panel was formed in March, some administration officials hoped it would produce a bipartisan endorsement of existing policy. But as sectarian violence in Iraq has worsened, more Republicans in Congress — and privately some administration officials — have become receptive to alternatives.

The Baker panel, called the Iraq Study Group, was formed in response to a proposal by members of Congress. Nevertheless, Baker sought — and won — Bush's endorsement. Other members include former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), who also served as co-chairman of the commission investigating the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks; retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor; former Rep. Leon E. Panetta, a California Democrat who was President Clinton's chief of staff; and former CIA Director Robert M. Gates.

In its most recent closed-door meetings, the commission focused on two options drafted by experts outside the government.

One, titled "Stability First," calls for continuing to try to stabilize Baghdad, boosting efforts to entice insurgents into politics, and bringing Iran and Syria into plans to end the fighting.

The other, called "Redeploy and Contain," goes further. It calls for a gradual, phased withdrawal of American troops to bases outside Iraq where they would be available for strikes against terrorist organizations anywhere in the region.

The experts also prepared an option called "Stay the Course, Redefine the Mission," and an alternative urging a quick U.S. withdrawal, but the panel appeared less interested in those plans, participants said.

The options were first reported last week by the New York Sun.

Baker and other commission members refused to confirm the substance of the options and emphasized that the panel had made no decisions. But Baker signaled the thrust of the panel's deliberations in several television interviews last week.

"Our commission believes that there are alternatives between the stated alternatives, the ones that are out there in the political debate of 'stay the course' and 'cut and run,' " Baker said.

The former secretary of State, who was a longtime aide to former President George H.W. Bush, also said he favored reaching out to Iran and Syria.

"I personally believe in talking to your enemies," he said. "Neither the Syrians nor the Iranians want a chaotic Iraq ... so maybe there is some potential for getting something other than opposition from those countries."

Bringing Iran and Syria into negotiations would require significant changes in U.S. policy.

"To bring them in, we need to stop emphasizing things like democracy and start emphasizing things like stability and territorial integrity," said James Dobbins of the Rand Corp., a former U.S. envoy to Afghanistan. "We need to stop talking about regime change. It's unreasonable to think you can stabilize Iraq and destabilize Iran and Syria at the same time."

The Iraq Study Group said Dobbins was one of its advisors. Dobbins refused to talk about the panel's work, and said he was giving a personal opinion. Other participants described the commission's discussions on condition they not be identified because Baker had asked them to keep the work confidential.

Baker, promoting a new volume of his memoirs in a recent flurry of television interviews, including an appearance on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart," offered his views on issues under consideration by the panel. He also appeared on ABC's "This Week With George Stephanopoulos," PBS' "The NewsHour With Jim Lehrer" and PBS' "The Charlie Rose Show."

After the publicity blitz drew quiet grumbles from other panel participants, Baker canceled a scheduled breakfast with newspaper reporters and declined a request from The Times for an interview.

In his interviews, Baker said he did not support calls for an early withdrawal of U.S. troops. "I think that if we picked up and left right now that you would see the biggest civil war you've ever seen," he said.

He also said he did not agree with proposals to divide Iraq into three states for Sunni Arabs, Shiites and Kurds. "Most all the experts we've talked with think that might ... trigger a civil war," he said.

And instead of trying to bring democracy to all nations in the Middle East, he said, the United States should define success as achieving "representative government, not necessarily democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0080630

Another participant, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the panel was considering whether the United States should warn the Iraqi government to get its "act together or else," a threat to withdraw troops unless the government's performance improved.

An administration official was skeptical that the panel would uncover new policy options, but said the White House would welcome ideas.

"If an independent group like the Baker panel can come up with some good ideas, we're all for it," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity because his comment had not been approved.

Participants in the Iraq Study Group said an additional goal was to identify options that Republicans and Democrats could endorse.

The commission is scheduled to meet again in mid-November. It hopes to deliver a report to Bush, Congress and the public by early 2007.

Some members of Congress, including Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), asked Baker to provide a report after next month's congressional elections, but Baker reportedly concluded that he would need more time to build a bipartisan consensus on significant recommendations.

Baker and Hamilton noted that the panel had consulted more than 150 experts, including representatives of Iran and Syria, and that its members spent four days in Iraq this year.

Administration officials also have briefed the panel.

"You can't come out of those briefings and not have a sense that things are in real bad shape," one participant said. "The bottom line is, it's not working. They know that. And they know that time is not on their side."

doyle.mcmanus@latimes.com

Times staff writers Paul Richter and Peter Spiegel contributed to this report.

2 GOP Senators Urge New Iraq Strategy (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, October 16, 2006

Two leading Republican senators called Sunday for a new strategy in Iraq, saying the situation in getting worse and leaving the United States with few options.

Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and John Warner of Virginia are part of the growing list of Republicans who are speaking out against President Bush's current plan for Iraq as U.S. casualties rise.

"The American people are not going to continue to support, sustain a policy that puts American troops in the middle of a civil war," Hagel said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Hagel said he agreed with Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who said after a recent visit to Iraq that Iraq was "drifting sideways." Warner has urged consideration of a change of course if the Iraq government fails to restore order over the next two months or three months.

Warner said Sunday he stands by that assessment, and even in the week since his trip to Iraq, there has been an "exponential increase in the killings and the savagery that's going on over there."

"You can see some movement forward, but a lot of movement back," Warner said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "We have to rethink all the options, except any option which says we precipitously pull out, which would let that country fall into a certain civil war at that time, and all of the neighboring countries would be destabilized."

Bush told reporters last week that he invites a change in strategy if the plan isn't working. But he also said the U.S. will not leave until the job is done.

Hagel said it is time to change course, but "our options are limited."

"We need to find a new strategy, a way out of Iraq, because the entire Middle East is more combustible than it's been probably since 1948, and more dangerous," Hagel said. "And we're in the middle of it."

DOJ_NMG_0080631

Democrats long have urged a change in Iraq policy. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the leading Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said there is "no military solution to this conflict" and the United States must pressure Iraqis to take over their country.

"If they're going to have a civil war, they're going to have to do it without us," Levin said on CNN. "This is long overdue. We've got to focus Iraqi leadership attention on this by telling them we need to begin a phased redeployment of American troops from Iraq within the next few months."

Also Sunday, Rep. John Murtha, a decorated Marine veteran who favors withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, criticized Republicans for referring to him and other war opponents as "Defeatocrats."

In an opinion piece for The Washington, Murtha said Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and others in the White House have called Iraq war opponents appeasers and pessimists and labeled Democrats the "cut and run" party.

"It's all baseless name-calling, and it's all wrong," wrote Murtha, D-Pa. "Unless, of course, being a Defeatocrat means taking a good hard look at the administration's Iraq policy and determining that it's a failure.

"In that case, count me in. Because Democrats recognize that we're headed for a far greater disaster in Iraq if we don't change course — and soon. This is not defeatism. This is realism."

Murtha, a military hawk and close confidant of top military officials, surprised Washington last year when he called for pulling all troops out of Iraq within months.

Looking ahead to the Nov. 7 elections, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, Ken Mehlman, said "the American people aren't going to say in the face of war we need to be weaker, and in the face of economic challenge we need higher taxes and more regulations and more lawsuits. The Democrats have promised both."

Tennessee Democrat Ford Questions `Sanity' Of U.S. Iraq Policy (BLOOM)

By Nadine Elsibai

Bloomberg, October 16, 2006

Oct. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Democratic Representative Harold Ford, engaged in a close battle for an open Senate seat in Tennessee, questioned the ``sanity'' of the Bush administration's policy on Iraq.

Asked on ABC's ``This Week'' program about his vote in 2002 to authorize President George W. Bush to use military force, the five-term representative said he wouldn't have backed the war if he knew that Iraq didn't have weapons of mass destruction.

``After hearing Vice President Cheney and others over the last few weeks indicate that they would have gone forward with the war in Iraq even knowing what they know now, it raises serious questions about not only judgment but sanity,'' he said.

Danny Diaz, spokesman for the Republican National Committee called Ford's comments ``outrageous'' and show ``he is an extreme and partisan liberal that does not represent Tennessee values.''

Ford, 36, is running against Republican Bob Corker, the former mayor of Chattanooga, Tennessee, for the seat opened up by the retirement of Senator Bill Frist. Recent polls in the state show the race is a dead heat with a little more than three weeks before the congressional election.

Democrats are attempting to frame the elections, which will decide which party controls Congress, as a referendum on Bush and the war in Iraq.

War Debate

``Why would you go forward with an effort in Iraq knowing that they didn't have weapons of mass destruction, knowing that our focus should have remained on bin Laden?'' Ford said when questioned about his statement.

Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney have called Iraq a central front in the war against terrorism and argued that the world is safer with Saddam Hussein out of power.

``It was the right thing to do, and if we had to do it over again, we'd do exactly the same thing,'' Cheney said Sept. 10 on NBC's ``Meet the Press'' program.

DOJ_NMG_0080632

Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride said the vice president's stance reflects the realities of the war against terrorism. ``You have to look at what the terrorists themselves have said," she said. ``Bin Laden calls it the third world war. We believe that taking the fight to the enemy, going on the offensive against the terrorists, is the way to defeat them."

Corker, 53, interviewed separately on the ABC program, declined to say whether going to war in Iraq was the right decision.

``I'm going to focus on where we are going forward," he said. ``I don't think it does us any good to focus on that."

Troop Levels

Corker said the U.S. shouldn't withdraw until the Iraqis are able to secure the country, and that he would back putting more U.S. troops there ``if that's necessary" for stability.

``We need to do whatever's necessary for the country to be able to secure itself," Corker said. ``And when that happens, I do hope that our men and women come quickly home."

Democrats need a net gain of six seats to get control of the 100-member Senate. With 33 Senate seats being contested on Nov. 7, the Tennessee race is one of those targeted by both parties. Another is the Minnesota seat being vacated by Democratic Senator Mark Dayton, who is retiring.

Republican Representative Mark Kennedy said on NBC's ``Meet the Press" program that he stands by his vote to authorize the invasion of Iraq, arguing that the U.S. can start withdrawing soldiers only ``after we're sure the terrorists can't win."

War Opponent

Amy Klobuchar, Kennedy's opponent and the Democratic-Farm Labor Party candidate, said on the same show that she has opposed the war from the beginning and that the conflict can't be resolved by the military.

Klobuchar, the Hennepin Count attorney, is leading in the race, according to a poll conducted for the Minneapolis Star-Tribune and released today. She had 55 percent support among likely voters to 34 percent for Kennedy, a three term member of the House from suburban Minneapolis-St. Paul.

Klobuchar, 46, said the U.S. needs ``to change course" in Iraq and the nation's top military commanders should be brought before Congress to discuss the next steps to take in the conflict. Some U.S. troops should be redeployed from Iraq to Afghanistan and Kuwait, she said.

Kennedy, 49, said that progress has been made in Iraq, and the U.S. can't let the country ``become a sanctuary for terrorists." Solving the issue of federalism in Iraq as well as letting citizens share in the wealth from oil revenue are among the political solutions that would help quell sectarian violence, he said.

On economics, Kennedy said Klobuchar's proposal to roll back the tax cuts Bush pushed through Congress for those making more than $200,000 a year would put the economy ``on its back." He said Bush and Congress could do more to cut spending.

Klobuchar said restoring the income tax rates on high- income individuals to those in place during the Clinton administration would help trim the federal debt and secure Social Security's future.

5 Americans Killed In Iraq, Bringing Month's Toll To 53 (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 15 — Two marines were killed by insurgents in Anbar Province on Sunday, the American military command said, and three American soldiers died a day earlier in a bombing in southern Baghdad, bringing the total of American troop deaths in Iraq this month to at least 53, an extraordinarily high midmonth tally.

At the current rate of American troop deaths, almost four a day, October is on track to be the third-deadliest month of the entire conflict for the military, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent Web site that tracks war-related casualties. The two most deadly months coincided with major American offensives against entrenched guerrilla fighters.

The rise now, in spite of improvements in body and vehicle armor, followed a decision by commanders to increase the number of American troops patrolling Baghdad in an effort to quell the sectarian violence that has engulfed the city.

Attacks continued against government and civilian targets as well on Sunday. A series of seven bombings within a few hours struck in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing at least 17 people and wounding at least 73, according to police officials.

DOJ_NMG_0080633

Just last year, commanders began cutting back on American patrols in Baghdad in an effort to give Iraqi forces more responsibility. But the escalating violence forced them to reverse the strategy in late July, and thousands of American troops were shifted to Baghdad. Plans for a major troop withdrawal from the country by the end of the year were canceled.

A cornerstone of the new approach has been house-to-house sweeps of the capital's most troubled areas, intended to ferret out militia networks, fighters and armaments. To date, the Americans, with Iraqi assistance, have swept eight districts.

Simultaneously, the American and Iraqi militaries have more aggressively pursued Shiite death squads, including elements of the Mahdi Army, the militia that loosely answers to the cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Since the neighborhood sweeps started at the beginning of August, guerrilla attacks — against military and civilian targets alike — have risen about 23 percent across the capital, according to American military statistics.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, a senior military spokesman here, directly attributed the rise in American deaths to the new security strategy.

"We are out more aggressively engaged in the city at this point than we were just a month ago," he said at a news conference last Thursday. "Coalition forces are being much more active in going out and looking for these folks, these death squads and elements that are associated with the sectarian violence."

According to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, which collates statistics distributed in Pentagon news releases, the number of American deaths in Baghdad has sharply increased since the American-led crackdown began in early August.

That month, 20 American forces died in or near the capital, up from 12 in July and 15 in June. The number rose again last month, to 29.

The number of troops wounded in action, a figure that usually parallels the number of fatalities, has also increased drastically. From Sept. 28 to Oct. 11, 427 American troops were wounded, one of the worst two-week stretches of the war, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count. In all of September, 776 troops were wounded, the fourth-highest monthly total since the American invasion, according to the Web site.

As fighting has risen to new levels in Baghdad, the capital, it has also continued unabated in Anbar Province, the stronghold of the Sunni Arab insurgency. At least 21 Americans have died there this month, and 60 over the past two months. At the same time, forces in the region have been stretched as more troops have been sent to Baghdad.

The deadliest months for American troops since the beginning of the war have been associated with major offensives.

Some 137 American troops died in November 2004, the same month as the second siege of Falluja, where the Americans battled Sunni Arab rebels. In April 2004, a bloody month with the first siege of Falluja and pitched battles between the Americans and Mr. Sadr's militia in Najaf, 135 American troops died.

In contrast, the military has not conducted any major operations this month. The military has not initiated a new urban cordon-and-search operation for more than two weeks and has instead focused on patrolling the areas already swept, officials say.

In the multiple car bombings in Kirkuk, a city bitterly contested by several ethnic and religious groups, three suicide car bombers, including one driving a van packed with chickens and explosives, detonated their payloads throughout the city, killing 13 people and wounding at least 34, according to Maj. Gen. Turhan Yusuf, chief of the Kirkuk Police Department. One blew himself up near a girls' academy, killing two students.

Four other bombs, including two unattended car bombs, killed four civilians and wounded at least 19 others, police officials said. Most of the bombs were apparently directed at Iraqi security forces.

In Baghdad on Sunday, the authorities recovered at least 30 bodies dumped around the city, an Interior Ministry official said.

Two bombs exploded near the convoy of the chief of financial affairs for the Interior Ministry, killing seven people, though the administrator escaped unscathed, the ministry official said. Another bomb exploded in the Amel neighborhood in Baghdad, killing one civilian and wounding two others, the official said.

In Tal Afar, near Mosul, a suicide bomber wrapped in explosives walked into a local market and detonated himself near a police checkpoint, killing a child and wounding five other people, including two police officers, hospital and police officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0080634

In Mosul, five members of a family were killed when gunmen burst into their home and opened fire, officials said, and gunmen assassinated Raad al-Haiali, a provincial official and a member of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni Arab group.

The tribunal trying Saddam Hussein and his associates said Sunday that it was postponing the date for verdicts from Monday, as originally planned, to Nov. 5, according to a senior court official who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the issue.

Other court officials have said in recent days that a major reason for the delay is that after nine months of hearings, the five judges in the case have failed to reach agreement on a sentence for Mr. Hussein and appeared to be undecided between a death sentence for him or a penalty of life imprisonment.

Mr. Hussein, 68, faces a possible sentence of death by hanging for his role in the execution of 148 men and boys from the mostly Shiite town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him in 1982.

Iraq Delays National Talks Amid Killings (AP-Y)

By Christopher Bodeen

AP, October 16, 2006

Iraq's government indefinitely postponed a much-anticipated national reconciliation conference Sunday as a two-day spree of sectarian revenge killings and insurgent bombings left at least 86 Iraqis dead.

Meanwhile, a militant network that includes al-Qaida in Iraq announced in a video that it had established an Islamic state in six provinces, a propaganda push in its drive to force the withdrawal of U.S. forces and topple the American-backed Iraqi government.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council — an umbrella organization of insurgent groups in Iraq — said the new state was made up of six provinces including Baghdad that have large Sunni populations, along with parts of two other central provinces that are predominantly Shiite.

Responding to the statement, the speaker of the Iraqi parliament, Mahmud al-Meshhedani, derided the group's leaders as "vulgar with no religion, who only kill others under the pretext of jihad (holy war)."

"Those who believe in this council are ignorant and those who follow it are foolish," al-Meshhedani said. "This council caused the sectarian conflict as well the displacement of both Shiites and Sunnis."

The militants' announcement appeared mainly symbolic, since no Iraqi insurgent group has the strength or authority to act as a rival government and none controls territory.

It underscored, however, the weakness of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government and its inability to bring Iraq's deeply divided politicians together.

In announcing postponement of the reconciliation conference, the Ministry of State for National Dialogue said only that the gathering, which was planned for Saturday, had been put off for "emergency reasons out of the control of the ministry." The move reflected the upheaval worsening violence has wrought on efforts to stabilize the government and curb bloodshed.

The postponement could deeply damage the al-Maliki administration, which took office just over four months ago vowing to implement a 24-point National Reconciliation plan to heal the nation's severe political wounds.

Al-Maliki did not comment on the postponement, but issued a message to the Iraqi people Sunday praising them for approving the country's first post-Saddam Hussein constitution exactly one year ago, while acknowledging the document's adoption had intensified the insurgency.

"It is your vote on the constitution that forced the terrorists ... to commit horrific massacres against innocent civilians and violate the sanctity of holy places, destroy infrastructure, obstruct reconstruction and services," he said.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, reported that three Marines and four soldiers were killed in the period from Friday through Sunday.

Weekend revenge killings among Shiites and Sunnis left at least 63 people dead in Balad, a city north of Baghdad, while 11 people died Sunday in a series of apparently coordinated bombings of a girls school and other targets in the northern city of Kirkuk, where Kurds and Arabs are in a tense struggle for control of the oil-rich city.

DOJ_NMG_0080635

Extra police flooded into Balad to enforce a curfew and additional security measures were taken in other villages in the region around Kirkuk, 180 miles north of Baghdad, Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf said.

In Baghdad, Interior Ministry undersecretary Hala Shakir Salim survived a roadside bomb attack that killed seven others, police Capt. Mohammed Abdul-Ghani said. The Interior Ministry runs Iraqi police forces.

Three people were killed in a mortar attack on the capital's troubled Dora district, while gunmen killed four members of a family in Mosul, Iraq's third largest city 225 miles northwest of Baghdad.

South of Baghdad, three women and four men were killed in drive-by shootings in the predominantly Shiite village of Wahda on Saturday afternoon, police reported.

Also Saturday, two Egyptians, both small businessmen married to Iraqi women, were slain near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, according to police in surrounding Diyala province. The identities of the gunmen and their motives were not known.

Even by Iraq's bleak standards, October has been an especially bloody month. Hundreds of Iraqis have died in attacks and more than 50 U.S. military personnel have been killed in the first two weeks alone.

Also Sunday, the U.S. military announced Iraq's Central Criminal Court had sentenced an al-Qaida member to death and convicted 64 others on charges of belonging to armed groups and other crimes, the U.S. military command said Sunday.

The military's statement did not name the man condemned to death, but said he was a "known member of the al-Qaida organization." Others sentenced to life in prison included a Saudi Arabian man that the court said had admitted coming to Iraq to fight U.S. and government forces.

Government Fissures Widening (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

Relations between the main Sunni and Shiite political blocs worsen as Iraq takes a step toward federalism and sectarian violence persists.

BAGHDAD — Months of bloodshed have threatened to loosen the bonds holding together Iraq's fractious government, with tensions between political blocs spilling out in recent days in fiery rhetoric as well as fighting that left more than 130 people dead nationwide.

Disagreements over several contentious issues burst into the open with a highly divisive vote on the issue of parceling Iraq into federal districts, finger-pointing over the assassination of a top politician's brother and a series of massacres between rival Shiite Muslims and Sunni Arabs north of the capital.

There, among the lush palm groves and towns along the Tigris River, at least 73 people were killed in sectarian violence over the weekend. Shiite gunmen, seeking revenge for the beheadings of 26 farmers whose bodies were found in Sunni villages, marauded through the farming hub of Balad, about 50 miles north of the capital, officials said.

The assailants randomly killed Sunni men in the market, hospitals and a used-car lot, the officials said, and 12 victims reportedly burned to death. An Iraqi army source said a total of 47 people were killed.

Sunni tribesmen in farms outside Balad lobbed mortar rounds into the Shiite-dominated town and armed themselves for further fighting, said residents of the Sunni village of Duluiya. U.S. forces imposed a curfew on the area.

Meanwhile, authorities awaited news of the fate of several groups of Shiite men kidnapped from minibuses over the weekend on their way out of the nearby Shiite village of Dujayl.

Also Sunday, six car bomb explosions killed about 10 people and injured dozens around the northern city of Kirkuk, which is claimed by Arabs as well as ethnic Kurds who inhabit a semiautonomous section of northern Iraq.

In the capital, at least 52 Iraqis, including two children, were reported killed in shootings, rocket attacks, bombings and clandestine sectarian slayings.

DOJ_NMG_0080636

Three U.S. solders were killed Saturday when their vehicle was caught in the blast of a homemade bomb south of Baghdad, the military said, disclosing no further details. At least 52 U.S. military personnel died in Iraq during the first two weeks of the month, putting October on pace to be the deadliest for U.S. troops in the country since January 2005.

Iraq's Sunni insurgents are fighting a guerrilla war against American forces and the U.S.-backed Shiite- and Kurdish-dominated government. Shiite gunmen, with possible ties to powerful political parties, fight back by killing suspected insurgents and ordinary Sunnis alike. Many Iraqis call the waves of violence a civil war tempered only by the ongoing political process.

But relations between the main Sunni and Shiite political blocs also have worsened over the last week. On Sunday, the government indefinitely postponed a highly publicized conference to discuss reconciliation among Iraq's disparate groups. According to a news release, the conference, scheduled to begin Saturday, was canceled for unspecified "emergency reasons."

Acrimony among the country's major ethnic and religious groups swelled after the Shiite- and Kurdish-dominated parliament passed a law Wednesday allowing for the eventual division of Iraq into federal regions. The vote came despite the strenuous objections of Sunnis, who view the plan as a recipe for carving up Iraq.

Sunni Arabs suspect that Shiites have agreed to cede the northern oil hub of Kirkuk to autonomy-minded Kurds in exchange for support of an oil-rich Shiite southern region. About 500 mostly Sunni Arab tribal leaders attending a summit in northern Iraq on Sunday vowed to fight any federal partitioning of the country, which they fear might further impoverish Sunnis in the resource-poor central and western regions.

"We are demanding that the government and the parliament not force this matter on Iraq and its people," said Sheik Abdul-Rahman Asi. "There are many political forces that reject this matter."

Relations between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite political blocs seem to have reached a nadir.

Earlier in the day, the Iraqi Islamic Party, a major Sunni group, issued a statement all but accusing the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry in the Oct. 9 slaying of Amer Hashimi. He was the brother of Tariq Hashimi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents and the Sunni bloc's leader.

"The cars that broke through the [Iraqi army] checkpoints were new military cars and there were people inside wearing military uniforms," the statement said. "This is available only to the militias that are cooperating with the security apparatuses."

Shiite officials have accused Sunni insurgents in Hashimi's killing, noting that he lived in an area under the control of the Sunni-dominated Defense Ministry. In a televised speech Sunday evening, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, while acknowledging the need to disband unruly militias that support him, blamed Iraq's problems on Sunni "terrorists."

U.S. and Iraqi officials had hoped the ongoing political process in the wake of elections last December would lower tensions and help ease the violence, but some now worry that the political and religious leaders have exacerbated problems.

"There's a sectarian conflict going on now between the Sunnis and Shiites," said Isam Rawi of the Sunni Muslim Scholars Assn., a clerical group. "But the religious and political discourse has a great effect in elevating these fights. It's not easy to target or kill or displace somebody unless somebody tells you those people are infidels or collaborators."

Times special correspondents in Baghdad, Kirkuk, Samarra and Taji contributed to this report.

Iraq Will Wait To Disarm Militias (USAT)

By Rick Jervis, Usa Today

USA Today, October 16, 2006

PM: U.S. taking 'wrong approach'

BAGHDAD — Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said in an interview with USA TODAY that his government will not force militias to disarm until later this year or early next year, despite escalating violence in Baghdad fueled by death squads and religious warfare.

Al-Maliki's remarks point to a growing gap between the U.S. and Iraqi governments over how to handle growing sectarian violence.

U.S. officials have urged the Iraqi government to take immediate action to reduce the violence. On a visit to Baghdad earlier this month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the "security situation is not one that can be tolerated and it's not one helped by political inaction."

DOJ_NMG_0080637

Al-Maliki also predicted a significant U.S. troop withdrawal starting early next year, despite the growing violence. If Iraq's security forces continue to build in strength, U.S. troops could start withdrawing in “a matter of months,” he said. There are currently 141,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

The prime minister criticized the U.S.-led military coalition for an overreliance on force, which he called the “wrong approach.”

“Terrorism and militias — especially militias — cannot be dealt with only by using tanks, guns and aircraft,” he said.

Al-Maliki's Shiite-dominated government depends on some militia leaders for political support.

Al-Maliki said he has rejected U.S. plans to launch large-scale operations into Sadr City, a Baghdad slum and a stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a powerful militia loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Sadr's political organization controls several Cabinet positions and 30 seats in the parliament.

“We have told the Americans that we don't mind targeting a Mahdi Army cell inside Sadr City,” al-Maliki said. “But the way the multinational forces are thinking of confronting this issue will destroy an entire neighborhood. Of course it was rejected.”

There “seems like a disconnect” between U.S. and Iraqi strategies, said Steven Cook, a Middle East analyst at the Council on Foreign Relations.

The prime minister, speaking softly through an interpreter, shared his views during a rare 50-minute interview Friday in his expansive, marble-and-gold-trimmed residence, a former palace of deposed leader Saddam Hussein located inside the tightly guarded Green Zone.

The U.S.-led military command in Iraq declined to address al-Maliki's remarks directly but said the coalition is working with the Iraqi government to disarm militias. “The U.S. and Iraq are working together to find solutions that will demobilize and reintegrate their members into Iraqi society,” Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said.

“The next six months will be critical in terms of reining in the danger of civil war,” Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, said in a June interview with a German magazine.

Al-Maliki said he needs time. “The problem that we face in disbanding militias — and the militias have to be disbanded — is that there are procedures, steps that need to taken, which take time,” he said.

Militants Declare Creation Of State (WT/AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

The Washington Times/AP, October 16, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A militant network that includes al Qaeda in Iraq declared in a video yesterday that it had established an Islamic state in six provinces where Sunni Muslims are dominant.

The government, meanwhile, postponed a much-anticipated national-reconciliation conference yesterday as a two-day spree of sectarian revenge killings and insurgent bombings left at least 86 Iraqis dead.

The video announcement by the Mujahedeen Shura Council -- an umbrella organization of insurgent groups in Iraq -- was seen as a propaganda push in its drive to force the withdrawal of U.S. forces and topple the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

But it follows parliamentary approval last week of a federalism bill -- opposed by most Sunnis -- that would permit the eventual creation of a semiautonomous Shi'ite region in the oil-rich south, much like the Kurdish region in the north.

The video said the new state was made up of six provinces including Baghdad that have large Sunni populations, along with parts of two other central provinces that are predominantly Shi'ite.

Responding to the statement, the speaker of the Iraqi parliament, Mahmud al-Mashhedani, derided the group's leaders as "vulgar with no religion, who only kill others under the pretext of jihad [holy war]."

"Those who believe in this council are ignorant, and those who follow it are foolish," Mr. al-Mashhedani said. "This council caused the sectarian conflict as well the displacement of both Shi'ites and Sunnis."

The militants' announcement appeared mainly symbolic, since no Iraqi insurgent group has the strength or authority to act as a rival government and none controls territory.

It underscored, however, the weakness of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government and its inability to bring Iraq's deeply divided politicians together.

DOJ_NMG_0080638

In announcing a postponement of the reconciliation conference, the Ministry of State for National Dialogue said only that the gathering, which had been planned for Saturday, had been put off for "emergency reasons out of the control of the ministry."

The al-Maliki administration took office just over four months ago, vowing to implement a 24-point national-reconciliation plan to heal the nation's severe political wounds.

Mr. al-Maliki did not comment on the postponement, but issued a message to the Iraqi people yesterday praising them for approving the country's first post-Saddam Hussein constitution exactly one year ago, while acknowledging the document's adoption had intensified the insurgency.

"It is your vote on the constitution that forced the terrorists ... to commit horrific massacres against innocent civilians and violate the sanctity of holy places, destroy infrastructure, obstruct reconstruction and services," he said.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, reported that one Marine and four soldiers were killed Friday and Saturday.

Weekend revenge killings among Shi'ites and Sunnis left at least 63 persons dead in Balad, a city north of Baghdad, while 11 persons died yesterday in a series of apparently coordinated bombings of a school for girls and other targets in the northern city of Kirkuk.

In Baghdad, Interior Ministry Undersecretary Hala Shakir Salim survived a roadside bomb attack that killed seven others, police Capt. Mohammed Abdul-Ghani said. The Interior Ministry runs Iraqi police forces.

Call For Sunni State In Iraq (FT)

By Stephen Negus

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

A video posted on the internet on Sunday in the name of one of Iraq's largest insurgent groups called for the creation of a separate Sunni Islamic state in the country.

If authentic, it could indicate a shift in strategy for parts of the Sunni Arab insurgency. "Your brothers in the Mutayibeen Coalition herald the establishment of the Islamic State of Iraq," said a spokesman, whose face was blotted out.

He said it should encompass the governates of Baghdad, Anbar, Diyala, Kirkuk, Salahedddin, Nineveh and parts of Babel and Wasit – a swathe of central and western Iraq where most Sunni Arabs live.

The Mutayibeen coalition was purportedly set up last week by the Mujahideen Shura Council, an al-Qaeda-dominated umbrella organisation, along with smaller groups and tribal leaders.

It is rarely clear whether internet statements represent a coherent stance by insurgents or a splinter group, or indeed if they are authentic at all.

But if a separate state is really now a goal of radical Sunni Islamist guerillas, it would put them at odds with mainstream Sunni politicians and many other insurgent groups. They tend to look askance at partition, which they claim would deprive their oil-poor central Iraqi heartland of resources.

Sectarian violence flared over the weekend, with police announcing yesterday that suspected Shia militiamen had killed 42 Sunnis in the Balad region, 80 kilometers north of the capital.

The killings were in apparent retaliation for the deaths of 17 Shia, whose bodies were found on the town's outskirts on Friday.

U.S. Helps Rebuild Iraqi Air Force (WT)

By David Axe

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

BASRA AIR STATION -- A team of U.S. Air Force personnel at this sprawling British base in southern Iraq is working to rebuild an air force that the U.S. military spent more than a decade destroying.

Former test pilot Lt. Col. Kelly Latimer and her team of five pilots and maintainers are partnered with 70 Squadron of the reborn Iraqi air force, which three years ago had been grounded by 12 years of attacks and sanctions.

The squadron's 15 Iraqi pilots and 39 other personnel operate four light aircraft donated by coalition countries -- two bulbous Seekers powered by a single pusher propeller and painted bright yellow, as well as two single-prop CH-2000s sporting a more conventional engine-in-front layout and gray paint.

DOJ_NMG_0080639

Both types carry infrared and daylight cameras for monitoring power and oil infrastructure and for spotting targets for other branches of the Iraqi military.

This year, the squadron has spent 900 hours in the air, usually flying about five sorties a day. An American pilot rides along on all flights.

The squadron's equipment and missions are basic stuff. The Seeker makes 80 knots and, from the ground, sounds like a motor scooter. "With a bit of a headwind, we get passed by cars on the road," Col. Latimer said.

Many of the unit's Iraqi aviators are former fighter pilots, some having flown the Mach-3 MiG-25.

"I thought coming in that these guys would be disgruntled," Col. Latimer said, "but they're happy to be flying and to have a job."

When the squadron was formed two years ago, most flights were dedicated to training. But now that almost all the Iraqi fliers are checked out on both the Seeker and the CH-2000, the unit can dedicate more efforts to patrolling vital oil and power facilities and supporting the Basra-based Iraqi army's 10th Division and the tiny Iraqi navy based at nearby Umm Qasr.

On one recent anti-smuggling exercise, 70 Squadron pilots spotted suspect boats with its cameras and used radios to direct Iraqi patrol craft to an intercept.

"We need more exercises," Col. Latimer said, especially to improve the ground and sea forces' procedures for talking to the air force.

Col. Latimer anticipates that the squadron will swap its single-engine aircraft for bigger twin-engine planes that are faster and can carry more equipment, perhaps including advanced sensors that can transmit imagery directly to ground forces.

In the meantime, there are logistical problems to sort out. The CH-2000s need a new support contract, and aviation fuel has been in short supply. And Col. Latimer is hoping to find Iraqis with training experience so the squadron can train pilots on its own.

But there are no plans for the Americans to leave. The next rotation of U.S. advisers will stay a full year, compared with four months for the current team.

Gen. Peter Pace (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, October 16, 2006

With his ramrod-straight Marine bearing, close-cropped hair, and warm smile, Gen. Peter Pace steps out of his armored black SUV looking like he belongs on a recruiting poster.

In the 39 years since he graduated from the US Naval Academy, General Pace has seen it all: from Vietnam, to Korea, to Somalia, to duty now as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

At a Monitor-sponsored lunch with reporters Thursday, Pace offered a passionate argument for the US military's mission in Iraq, stressed the nation's capacity to handle a threat from North Korea, and defended his performance as America's top military officer.

Pace's polished performance was in contrast to the controversy surrounding remarks by Britain's army chief, Gen. Richard Dannatt, who said Thursday that British troops should be withdrawn from Iraq "soon." After triggering a storm of controversy in Britain, Dannatt gave interviews Friday saying that he meant a phased withdrawal over two or three years.

When Pace was asked why Americans should not be dismayed at the results on the ground in Iraq, he said the enemy has "a 100 year plan according to the map they published about a year and half ago. So anybody looking for a quick win in the war on terrorism probably hasn't read the enemy's published intent."

He argued that "if we were not in Iraq right now and if we were in Afghanistan ... the center of gravity would be in Afghanistan. And that is where the fight would be taking place. And I do believe that if we left both Iraq and Afghanistan that the fight would be taking place here in the United States because that is what they have said is their objective.... I believe the American people get the fact that this is fundamentally a threat to the survival of our nation and that we are going to do what we need to do to protect our children and our grandchildren. That does not mean we should not be learning from what we are doing on the battlefield."

DOJ_NMG_0080640

The military alone cannot solve the problem of sectarian violence in Iraq, Pace said. "What has been less satisfactory is the difficulty in stopping the sectarian violence. Because fundamentally, you cannot have enough individuals under arms 24/7 on every street corner in Iraq to stop the hatred killings if someone wants to go out and do a hatred killing. And that is where the government's part comes in and where the political dialogue comes in and where the agreements and the guarantees come in amongst the various factions. So there is a lot you can do on the military side. You cannot lose this militarily, but it is not going to be 'won' militarily, either."

While Iraq is placing significant demands on the US military, Pace said that the nation has sufficient resources to fight a war with North Korea in the unlikely event that were to occur. Earlier this week, North Korea exploded what it said was a nuclear device. "We currently have just over 200,000 of our 2.4 million service members engaged in operations in the Gulf," Pace said, "which means just under 2 million are available to handle whatever other problem might come our way. That should not be lost on anybody. ... We have enormous capacity remaining, especially in our air and naval forces, to handle any potential problem."

But the general noted that dealing with North Korea while the US was still fighting in Iraq would not "be as clean as we would like." Various intelligence-collection systems are now devoted to Iraq. "So you wouldn't have the precision in combat going to a second theater of war.... You will end up dropping more bombs, potentially, to get the job done and it will be more brute force in a second [engagement]. But you can certainly get the job done anywhere on the planet with the forces we have available to us right now."

The threat of nuclear proliferation is a key worry, Pace said. "The real concern right now with North Korea is whether or not they would end up providing any weapons they may or may not have to terrorists."

Pace offered a spirited defense to charges in Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," that top generals had not been blunt enough in presenting their concerns about the war in Iraq to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"You are asking a judge if he runs a fair court when you ask me if I have been blunt enough," Pace said. "My answer is: Yes, I have been very upfront, very straightforward. I have multiple opportunities every day. I am with the secretary of Defense a minimum of 30 minutes a day, more likely three to four hours a day, [and] with the president several times a week."

"I have ample opportunity provided to me by the secretary of Defense and the president to express my views. And, in fact, they have listened to my views and, in fact, have asked me - and invite me - to speak about things that are not just purely military if they in any way impact on the military."

The public climate toward the military now stands in contrast to what Pace and other Vietnam veterans faced. It is "strikingly different, now than 39 years ago," he said. "I think the American people have made a distinction between their support for their military and what they believe personally about any particular fight that is going on. Even those who may be in opposition to things we are doing in the war on terror right now have been extremely warm and welcoming to the troops who are coming home. And that is well understood by the troops."

Loyal To Country Or Conscience? (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

The old veterans gather nearly every morning in Little Tokyo, where an American flag and black granite sculpture rise in honor of 16,000 Japanese Americans who served during World War II.

The idea of anyone tarnishing their war record doesn't sit well, and that's exactly what some think young soldier Ehren Watada is doing.

"He's a bakatare," said George Ishihara, an 85-year-old Santa Monica resident, calling Watada the Japanese word for fool. "He ought to be ashamed of himself."

Across town, another Japanese American World War II veteran sees the young soldier as a hero. "He's following a higher law, and that's your conscience and the Constitution," said Paul Tsuneishi, an 83-year-old Sunland resident.

Watada, 28, is an Army first lieutenant who earlier this year became the first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq, calling the war illegal and immoral. Although other soldiers have refused deployment, his status as an officer sets his case apart. The Honolulu native of Japanese and Chinese descent faces a general court martial and seven years in prison for charges involving his refusal to deploy, criticism of President Bush and "conduct unbecoming an officer."

DOJ_NMG_0080641

The soldier, stationed at the U.S. Army's Ft. Lewis base near Seattle, was not available to comment because of ongoing negotiations over his case. But his father, Bob, 66, and stepmother, Rosa Sakanishi, who live in Hawaii, have pressed his case this month in appearances throughout Southern California.

The elder Watada said his son joined the Army to help protect the country after 9/11. But when his superiors told him to study up on the Iraq war, Watada concluded that U.S. officials launched it in violation of U.S. and international laws.

The turning point, the elder Watada said, was in January when Ehren heard the father of an injured soldier lament on a radio show: "Why can't anyone stand up and stop all of this?"

"He thought the guy was talking to him," Watada said of his son. "He thought he was the person who had to stand up."

Watada's case has stirred national debate over the legality of the Iraq war and a soldier's duty versus conscience. But in the Japanese American community, the case has struck a particular nerve, echoing conflicts of another war six decades ago.

"The Watada case has provoked so much emotion because it raises the question of loyalty, and that question severely tested Japanese Americans during World War II," said Lane Hirabayashi of UCLA, the first professor in the nation to hold an academic chair dedicated to the study of the Japanese internment. "It raises a lot of controversies that I don't think have ever been fully resolved."

Debate lingers over how Japanese Americans responded after Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941. Even as the attack prompted the internment of more than 110,000 Japanese Americans and their immigrant parents in remote camps, thousands of young men and women enlisted in the U.S. military, determined to prove their loyalty.

Their service record has made them community icons of mythological proportions. The 442nd Regimental Combat Team and the 100th Battalion, composed mainly of Japanese Americans, became one of the most highly decorated units in U.S. military history.

But a small minority refused to enlist and were harshly ostracized, Hirabayashi said.

They included draft resisters, who refused to serve unless their civil and constitutional rights were restored. They also included those known as "no-no boys," for negatively answering a government loyalty questionnaire asking if they would serve in the U.S. military and renounce allegiance to the emperor of Japan.

Bitterness between the two sides persists today. Hirabayashi and others, for instance, tell tales of brothers who never spoke again after one resisted and the other served. Ellen Endo, editor of Rafu Shimpo, the Los Angeles Japanese newspaper, calls the Watada debate the most emotional community divide she's seen in four decades.

Nine veterans groups have come out against Watada, while the Asian American Vietnam Veterans Organization backs him. The Japanese American community newspapers are filled with passionate debate over the case.

The community's leading civil rights organization, the Japanese American Citizen's League, is in the hot seat. In July, the league expressed concerns about Watada's free speech rights but said the military issues in the case went beyond its mission as a civil rights group. The statement drew some praise but was also criticized as spineless.

The league's Berkeley chapter and others are urging it to take a stronger stand of support for Watada at its national meeting next month.

"I know a lot of my members will hate my guts for saying this, but I do think he's a hero," the league's executive director, John Tateishi, said of Watada. "There's a point where people have to stand by their personal beliefs."

The elder Watada said he is unfazed by the critics.

"I can only ask them to do a little research," he said during a recent interview. "If they think it's OK to invade another country and kill innocent people, that's up to them, but we strongly disagree."

Watada said his son has always been a straight arrow. The Eagle Scout and near straight-A student, who studied business and graduated from Hawaii Pacific University in 2003, once reluctantly reported high school classmates who were stealing cafeteria funds even though he knew that would label him a snitch, his father said.

After Watada graduated and began seriously considering military service, his father tried to dissuade him. The elder Watada had lost a brother in the Korean War and told his son he didn't want to lose him too.

DOJ_NMG_0080642

As terrorist threats dominated the news, however, Ehren told his father he felt he had to serve his country. He received his officer's commission in 2003, served a year in South Korea and was scheduled to deploy to Iraq in June with his Stryker brigade combat team until he began researching the war and developing doubts.

Watada said his son offered to resign or deploy to Afghanistan but was rebuffed.

University of Illinois professor Francis Boyle, an international law expert who testified on behalf of Watada at an Army hearing this year, argued that the soldier was correct to believe the United States illegally launched the Iraq war because it failed to obtain authorization for it from the United Nations Security Council, as required under international law.

Boyle has also argued that the second required authorization — a congressional war resolution — was obtained under false pretenses because the Bush administration erroneously asserted that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and was linked to Al Qaeda. The Nuremberg principles adopted after World War II require soldiers to disobey illegal orders, Boyle said.

But Army spokesman Col. Dan Baggio said political questions over a war's legitimacy were "not the kind of decisions lieutenants and captains make." He said soldiers had a moral obligation to refuse illegal orders in the field — to shoot prisoners of war or innocent civilians, for instance — but they could not pick and choose where to deploy.

"If your nation has made a decision, as a member of the military forces you have an obligation to go," Baggio said. "To me, that's black and white. I would be ashamed if I didn't fulfill the obligation and duty to those troops I serve and the oath I took."

As Ehren's doubts about the war grew, his father who once tried to dissuade him from enlisting was now trying to talk him into deploying. Just go, he told him. Keep your head low.

Watada said he couldn't bear to think of his son locked up for years in the military brig, his once promising career in tatters. But Ehren was adamant about his stand. "How can I lead my men in harm's way for no good reason?" he asked. "Didn't you always tell me to do the right thing?"

Watada had to say yes.

Today, he is his son's biggest booster, tirelessly giving speeches in the hopes that broad public support will help minimize Ehren's sentence. Lt. Gen. James M. Dubik, the Ft. Lewis commander, is expected to decide this month how to proceed in Watada's case.

teresa.watanabe@latimes.com

A Soldier Comes Home To Alaska, Too Early And Yet Too Late (NYT)

By Charlie Leduff

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

BARROW, Alaska — When the soldiers from the frozen tundra shipped out for the burning sands of Iraq, Staff Sgt. Billy Brown promised the women that he'd bring their men back alive.

But when Sergeant Brown returned just two weeks later, he didn't bring his men at all. He came with a funeral detail. He came cargo, in a silver coffin with wood handles cloaked in an American flag. He is believed to be the first Eskimo killed because of this war. He was 54.

Sergeant Brown, an Alaska national guardsman, never got to a battlefield. He was killed when a tractor-trailer slammed into the back of his Humvee late in July while he was on training maneuvers at Camp Shelby in Mississippi.

His death rattled this town of 4,200, mostly Inupiaq Eskimos, located 500 roadless miles from anywhere and 350 miles north of the Arctic Circle.

Finally, tangibly, the war has reached one of the most isolated corners of the country.

"Until now the war was more like a television show," said Edward S. Itta, mayor of the North Slope Borough, in which Barrow lies, and a friend of Sergeant Brown's. "You don't question the war until it touches you. Only then, when a man like Billy, an important man to us, comes home dead, does the question become clear. We fight. But to what end? What's in it for my grandchildren?"

During the cold war, the battle line was drawn right here on the North Slope, with the Soviets skulking just across the Bering Strait. Most Alaska Guard members stayed in the state, protecting the home front.

DOJ_NMG_0080643

But the world has changed. For this war, 670 Guard members have been called up from rural Alaska, its largest foreign deployment ever. The Alaska Guard estimates that one-third of its members are Eskimo, so most likely a third of those deployed are indigenous men, officials say, though the military does not keep official racial records of this type.

Among the most skilled was Staff Sergeant Brown, a 29-year veteran of the Guard and an Arctic survival specialist.

"He could have retired years ago," said his niece Audrey Saganna. But he volunteered for the mission so other soldiers who had served multiple tours in Iraq could get a rest, she said.

The funeral of William Franklin Brown lasted many hours, Eskimo tradition holding that anyone who wanted to speak could do so. It took 20 men an entire day to dig his grave through the permafrost. Tribal leaders decided he should be buried in the Elders Cemetery, a great honor here. His grave is marked like the others, with a simple wooden cross. He is buried next to his father.

Born in the mining town of Lost River on the Seward Peninsula in western Alaska, Sergeant Brown grew up in Barrow, one of 18 brothers and sisters. Whaling is the centerpiece of the culture and Sergeant Brown worked as an oarsman on one crew and was a walrus and polar bear hunter. He worked for a spell at the post office, was elected to the City Council and eventually settled in as the shipping and receiving manager at the local hospital.

By virtue of his hospital job, Sergeant Brown was in attendance when nearly every Barrow child was born. He did not do this out of obligation, his people said, but because he was proud to be Inupiaq.

He never married and fathered no children of his own, but Sergeant Brown was an uncle and a counselor to dozens of struggling young men, and by native tradition, under which age is respected and revered, he was an uncle to hundreds more.

The call-up has affected Eskimo villages all across the state, some of the most remote and rugged corners of this country. The men come from places like Kongiganak, Emmonak and Scammon Bay, where winter survival depends on the summer harvest of otter, moose, geese, fish and whale. With the men gone, the long, brutal winter is expected to be even more bitter for those they've left behind.

Barrow is different from the Eskimo villages. Oil revenues from Prudhoe Bay have made it something of a city. There are flush toilets and smokestacks and a Japanese restaurant. City ways have brought city problems. Methamphetamines and alcohol are afflictions. The native language is spoken less and less. Satellite television is the entertainment of choice, and fewer young people hunt nowadays. Residents increasingly rely on the grocery store freezer rather than the winter larder.

Still, the place is poor. Broken windows are stuffed with newspapers. Houses are weather-beaten affairs of wood on stilts with metal roofs, perpetually heated with natural gas from a field off in the muskeg. Billy Brown's was spare and unpainted, well kept with few adornments. He lived next to his father.

The sun in Barrow disappears from Nov. 18 until Jan. 24, and the temperature can reach 99 below. The roads are gravel, because concrete disintegrates in the cold. The government, financed by oil revenues, is the main industry and because of plentiful natural gas, heating bills are only $200 a month in the dead of winter. Milk is $10 a gallon. Gasoline is $4. "Never Forget" placards are displayed in house windows and on car bumpers, a reference to the 9/11 terrorist attacks. And now, just as much, a reference to Billy Brown.

Sergeant Brown's hometown is not a hissing coal-bed of antiwar activism, yet with his death the doubts began to surface.

"Is it going so badly in the Middle East that the military has to scrape up a few hundred Eskimos and send them to the desert?" asked David Leavitt, a friend, who had butchered caribou hanging from his porch balustrade, drying in the Arctic sun. "I mean he wanted to go, but what's the purpose? We lost Billy for what purpose?"

The soldiers' wives talk as soldiers' wives do. They talk of pride. They talk about unflinching support for their men. But now that Billy Brown, the leader of their men, has come home in a box, they talk with a slight edge about fear and doubt.

"He signed up for it and it is his duty to go, but I don't like this war at all," said Mia Sanchez, a mother of five whose husband, Jay, enlisted three years ago. "I don't understand it. I thought he'd be protecting Alaska, not Iraq."

Melba Nowpakahok, whose husband, Owen, had Billy Brown for his best man, said that as a military wife it would be counterproductive to question any of it.

"We're just going to go with whatever the higher-ups say," she said. "Whatever the president says. Whatever Rumsfeld says. We're just going to have to go with it."

DOJ_NMG_0080644

The eight remaining men from Barrow are to arrive in the Iraqi theater sometime in October, and one company of Arctic soldiers will carry its flag with Billy Brown's name tag sewn to it.

And when the fall whale hunt begins, a new man will be holding the oar that Billy Brown once held.

British General's Remarks Spur Iraq Debate (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley And Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, October 16, 2006

LONDON AND WASHINGTON

A vigorous debate about how quickly Britain can pull out of Iraq has erupted following an unprecedented intervention from the head of the British armed forces, who said troops should leave soon because their presence was doing more harm than good.

In remarks that made leaders on both sides of the Atlantic sit up and take notice, Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt told a newspaper that Britain should get its 7,200 soldiers out of the south of the country "sometime soon" because "our presence exacerbates the security problems."

Though General Dannatt subsequently denied any rift between himself and Prime Minister Tony Blair, his original comments flatly contradicted his political masters, who have stressed they will stay the course in Iraq and insist they are shoring up rather than undermining security there.

Military experts say the general, appointed only in August, was voicing the fears and frustrations of soldiers and officers alike who face an increasingly fraught mission with no end in sight.

"We are in danger of failing in the long term because we don't have enough troops," says former army major Charles Heyman. "There's no doubt that Dannatt is right - he's reflecting what he's being told throughout the Army: that there aren't enough of us there. The British army is fully extended, and there are no more troops to send anywhere."

Although Dannatt rushed to qualify his remarks in a succession of interviews, the impression remained of a general deeply concerned about troop morale, an overstretched army, and the possibility of failure in Iraq.

Tellingly, he added in one radio interview that although he was determined to see the Iraq mission through, he didn't want it to "break" his army. "I want an army in five years time and 10 years time. Don't let's break it on this one. Let's keep an eye on time."

Dannatt's remarks may not have been popular with political leaders, but blogs and Internet postings have found British soldiers overwhelming applauded their commander. One on-line poll found 76 percent thought he had been "absolutely right" to speak out.

"He's looking after concerns of his soldiers," says Amyas Godfrey, a former army captain who served in Iraq in 2003 and 2004.

"In the broad context, the British presence may be fueling the [security] situation," says Godfrey, an associate fellow at the Royal United Services Institute in London, "but a lot of good is being done too." Soldiers are taking on the roles of policemen, civil engineers, construction workers, community officers, and diplomats, he notes.

But while top British and US military officials have - at least in private - voiced concern about the situation in Iraq, Dannatt is the first active-duty general on either side of the Atlantic to go so far publicly.

Privately, senior US military officials admit that the window is closing on the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to rein in paramilitary death squads and sectarian violence. Political leaders have taken up the mantra - notably senior Republicans among them - who say US Iraq policy can no longer be to "stay the course."

Sen. John Warner (R) of Virginia, chairman of the armed services committee, said this month after a trip to Baghdad that "a change of course" would be on the agenda if the rising violence is not quelled soon. Sen. Olympia Snowe (R) of Maine seconded Mr. Warner's concerns, saying that "staying the course is neither an option nor a plan."

On Friday, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi issued a statement jumping on Dannatt's comments, saying his conclusions mirror those of "many American generals and the partially declassified National Intelligence Estimate on Terrorism." Ms. Pelosi appeared to be referring to a number of retired generals who recently backed the estimate's findings that the Iraq war is hurting the broader war on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0080645

An accelerated British withdrawal from Iraq would deprive America of its most steadfast ally on the most perilous frontline in the "war on terror."

But an early pullout remains unlikely, for all Dannatt's misgivings: Tony Blair has pledged to withdraw only when Iraqi forces can handle the wretched security situation, as has Gordon Brown, the man most likely to succeed him when he steps down in the middle of next year.

The official line is that the troops are there under a UN mandate and at the behest of a democratically elected government. Iraqi leaders say the troops are essential to preserve security, and many analysts are skeptical that rapid withdrawal would remove the catalyst for violence.

Michael O'Hanlon, an expert in military affairs at the Brookings Institution in Washington, said that Dannatt's remarks are "at least a small blow to the [Bush] administration's policy," but adds: "I also think there are holes in this argument that if we left, things would get better."

Yet some military experts believe Dannatt's view may ultimately prove too hard to ignore if things go from bad to worse in Iraq.

"If his assessment is right and we are doing more harm than good, then shouldn't we change the policy?" asks Lord Tim Garden, a former assistant chief of the defense staff, adding that the general was giving "a totally accurate reflection of the situation as he sees it."

"Certainly the defense ministry might be relatively relaxed that this will move on the debate about an earlier exit for British troops, because they [ministry officials] are feeling the strain and worried about failure," he adds.

Dannatt's big fear is that the formidable demands on the British army in both Iraq and Afghanistan are stretching the force to its limits. Some military chiefs understood - incorrectly as it turns out - that agreeing to spearhead the fight against the Taliban in Afghanistan, as Britain has done this year, might enable Britain to relinquish some of its duties in Iraq back to the Americans.

Dannatt has been decorated for bravery during a long military career, but even by his standards, his bluntness was courageous. Generals meddling in politics are normally frowned on in mature, sedate democracies.

"I wouldn't be surprised if the prime minister sacks him," says Heyman.

No End In Sight (WT)

By Paul Moorcraft

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

The United Kingdom (U.K.) is facing its biggest crisis in civil-military relations since the Second World War. Six weeks into his new job, the head of the British Army, Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, has broken constitutional protocol by appearing to contradict government policy on Iraq.

On Friday morning a dramatic wide-ranging interview with Gen. Dannatt was published in the London Daily Mail. He warned that the presence of U.K. troops was exacerbating security problems in Iraq and should withdraw "sometime soon." He also said that the planning for post-war occupation was "poor, probably based more on optimism than sound planning."

The original ambition was to install liberal democracy: "Whether that was a sensible or naive hope, history will judge. I don't think we are going to do that...We should aim for a lower ambition." The general also talked of his Christian values, and the moral vacuum that allows radical Islam to flourish in Britain.

This ignited a media frenzy about the general wanting to quit Iraq soon, thus contradicting Prime Minister Tony Blair's statement that it would be "craven surrender" to leave Iraq while it was still in turmoil.

This in turn generated shock waves in the prime minister's office, and allegedly furious phone calls from Washington.

Opposition politicians viewed the general's remarks as "blindingly obvious," but said that saying them publicly was "unprecedented."

Some military commentators were astounded at the "breach of propriety" and wondered if the general had been misquoted and, if not, whether he would be sacked.

No doubt under orders to recant, the general immediately did a round of media interviews to "clarify" his remarks -- despite the fact that the original Daily Mail interview had been authorized.

DOJ_NMG_0080646

This "clarification" perhaps made matters worse when the general implied that the army could be "broken" if it is kept too long in Iraq. The prime minister's office rushed to say that Tony Blair "agreed with every word." The Ministry of Defence also issued a further statement that the general was on the record as standing "shoulder to shoulder with the Americans" and that he was planning "force packages in Iraq through 2007 to 2008."

But the genie was out of the bottle. The British Army is running out of soldiers, equipment and patience, though not fighting spirit. The British military establishment fears it is reinforcing failure in Iraq. The plan to engage in Afghanistan, and so be allowed to leave Iraq, has backfired.

It had been assumed in London that Washington's exit strategy was to be asked to leave by Baghdad. Instead, the beleaguered Iraqi government will cling on to its coalition security blanket as long as possible. Britain's premature departure, however, may prompt U.S. withdrawal.

A prime minister would normally sack a general who publicly undermined the central plank of his premiership, especially as it also threatens the fundamentals of U.S. foreign policy.

The senior professional politicians in the Labor government, unlike some in the Conservative opposition, have no firsthand military experience. And Tony Blair is a lame-duck prime minister. He may be too weak to sack his forthright general.

A behind-the-scenes forced resignation, especially if it were seen to be a result of U.S. pressure, would trigger more unrest in the armed forces, perhaps even a joint demarche by other commanders. Recently retired chiefs of the defense staff have publicly declared their concerns.

The security establishment has long been calling for a service chief to stand up to what it sees as political bungling in the direction of the wars.

Defense chiefs know that Iraq could descend into a maelstrom of total chaos, and they do not want to desert an ally or leave the job unfinished. But no end is in sight, and the British army can only just about cope now, let alone in the future.

The general must have felt that the views of the senior military had too long been ignored. Some top brass had become political ciphers or had been effectively gagged.

But Gen. Dannatt's frankness may be dangerous. Civilian control of the military is a cornerstone of Western democracy. Gen. Douglas MacArthur threatened to use nuclear weapons against the Chinese army in Korea, but he was relieved of his command by President Truman.

Gen. Dannatt's comments might also undermine his own troops fighting in the Middle East -- why should they risk death for a policy which their own top commander has said, in effect, is inflaming the war on terror? But even the Ministry of Defence will privately admit that troops in the field are "cheering him to the rooftops"; nearly all the unofficial army blogs confirm this. British forces can now imagine withdrawal, regardless of the U.S. timetable.

Some British officers say that it is about time senior U.S. generals spoke their mind, rather than wait for retirement before they complain that American forces are also overstretched, and perhaps the U.S. army could not field more than two brigades to operate outside Afghanistan or Iraq. In this context, General Dannatt may have done his American ally a service.

Officers will risk their lives but never their careers. General Dannatt's bravery is beyond doubt: he won the coveted Military Cross when he was 22. Now he is risking the top job for the army he loves.

Paul Moorcraft, the director of the Centre for Foreign Policy Analysis, is a former senior instructor at the Royal Military Academy, Sandhurst and the U.K. Joint Services Command and Staff College.

The Latest Chapters On The War (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

In an age of blogging, podcasting, BlackBerrying and instant messaging, when any thought can be expressed within nanoseconds, an old-fashioned form of technology is making a comeback.

It's called the book, a collection of pages, bound between hard covers, that generally takes at least two years to report, write, edit and publish, using the kind of presses that date to the 15th century.

DOJ_NMG_0080647

With striking swiftness, a series of books about the Iraq war has exposed deep flaws in its planning and execution, made the Bush administration appear dysfunctional at times and generated enormous news coverage.

All are by journalists with access to daily or weekly outlets. The bestsellers include "Fiasco" by The Washington Post's Thomas Ricks; "Cobra II" by Michael Gordon of the New York Times and former Timesman Bernard Trainor; "Hubris" by Newsweek's Michael Isikoff and the Nation's David Corn; and now "State of Denial" by The Post's Bob Woodward.

Even President Bush observed last week that "somebody ought to add up the number of pages that have been written about my administration."

The Iraq mess is a large and tempting target. And despite a huge volume of coverage over the last several years, a considerable amount of material remained beneath the surface, awaiting excavation by authors.

Some critics grumble that the journalists should have gone public with their information sooner, rather than saving it for books. But it takes time to build a case and to coax information from people who may have little interest in joining the daily political sniping.

Isikoff says some sources are more willing to talk candidly for the historical record. Former House majority leader Dick Armey, for example, disclosed how he had expressed doubts about the Iraq venture but was pressed by President Bush and Vice President Cheney to keep quiet.

"A lot of stuff was concealed from the public, especially in the run-up to war," Isikoff says. "It's aggressively reporting events of a couple of years ago instead of what happened yesterday. It's the second draft of history."

The Gordon-Trainor book reveals that Gen. Tommy Franks expected to draw down American forces in Iraq to 30,000 within months. Ricks argues that U.S. military and diplomatic missteps in 2003 inflamed the Iraqi opposition. "There are a lot of people who've served in Iraq who were really upset about it -- guys who commanded divisions, brigades, companies," Ricks says. "They had a lot to say and they wanted to say it." He says his biggest ally was time -- both the year off to work on the book and the passage of time that gave sources a greater comfort level.

One former Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) official in Iraq provided Ricks with every e-mail he had sent to the unit's boss, Paul Bremer. A commander gave Ricks a CD-ROM with every PowerPoint briefing he had received. Sources even gave him the classified plan for invading Iraq. In 2003, he says, "they would have deemed it too sensitive. Two years later, who cares?"

Woodward, who builds narratives by granting many sources anonymity, specializes in going back to his subjects again and again. For "State of Denial," he has said that he interviewed former White House chief of staff Andrew Card for seven hours over five sittings, producing 207 pages of transcripts -- and news that Card had tried to get Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld fired.

In "The One Percent Doctrine," former Wall Street Journal reporter Ron Suskind revealed al-Qaeda planning for a cyanide attack in New York's subways, and reported that some CIA officials regarded Bush as little more than Cheney's puppet.

Suskind says book projects can break through an administration's "message discipline."

"What you can do in a book that gets around the daily battle over news cycles is you can say to subjects that they will be rendered in context," he says. "Sources often say, 'This is a complex situation.' I can say back to them, 'I've got plenty of time.' " In a newspaper, he adds, "you're probably not going to have space to write thousands of words on some philosophical debate or longstanding internecine conflict."

A striking number of these efforts have come from journalists at The Post, which has a lenient policy toward allowing staffers time off to write books. The Post's Rajiv Chandrasekaran, in his best-selling "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," reported that the Coalition Provisional Authority had hired a number of people who had conservative credentials but lacked vital skills and experience. Former secretary of state Colin Powell gave six lengthy interviews to The Post's Karen DeYoung for her biography "Soldier."

Books can also act as a catalyst. New York Times reporter James Risen planned to disclose the administration's domestic eavesdropping program in his book "State of War" after the paper held for a year the article he co-wrote on the subject. As the book neared publication, the Times ran the story after all. Times Executive Editor Bill Keller told New York magazine that the imminent release of the book was a "factor" in the discussions but not the principal reason for his decision.

DOJ_NMG_0080648

Once books become fodder for the media machine, the carefully constructed 300-page arguments get boiled down to a handful of scooplets and anecdotes. But it is their accumulated detail and intellectual heft that embosses the books with credibility.

In the 1990s and early 2000s, starting with a slew of anti-Clinton books (against both Bill and Hillary), many of the publishing success stories seemed to be on the right. Ann Coulter's "Slander," Bernard Goldberg's "Bias" and volumes by Bill O'Reilly, Sean Hannity, Rush Limbaugh and Michael Savage often topped the charts.

But now, with Bush struggling in Iraq and mired in low poll numbers, the books packing the greatest political punch seem to be those charging the administration with incompetence. And while they are mostly written by working reporters and editors, not commentators, liberal readers are surely fueling the surge in sales.

In one sign of the times, no fewer than three books ripping Coulter -- "Soulless" by Susan Estrich; "Brainless" by Joe Maguire; and "I Hate Ann Coulter" by "Unanimous" -- are all heading to bookshelves.Tainted Series?

Kentucky's Lexington Herald-Leader yesterday launched an investigative series on Sen. Mitch McConnell pushing legislation for his affluent donors -- an effort originally paid for by a foundation that has financed several liberal groups that oppose the Republican lawmaker.

The paper's parent firm, McClatchy Co., decided last week to repay the $35,000 grant, which underwrote six months of salary and expenses for a Herald-Leader reporter on leave. The grant came from the respected Center for Investigative Reporting, which was passing on money provided by the St. Louis-based Deer Creek Foundation.

Deer Creek has funded a variety of liberal groups, including New York University law school's Brennan Center for Justice, which represented opponents of McConnell in a campaign-finance lawsuit that reached the Supreme Court.

"It's like the NRA funding a report about Sarah Brady," the gun-control advocate, says McConnell spokesman Don Stewart. "You've got to be somewhat leery about the objectivity."

McClatchy Vice President Howard Weaver says his company, which inherited the situation after buying the Herald-Leader, does not believe in such grants. "As a matter of practice, if we want some journalism done in our newsrooms, we pay for it," Weaver says. "But I've heard enough politicians explain why they gave back a campaign contribution to know it's not a perfect remedy."

Dan Noyes, acting director of the reporting center, says he paid for the series because the money went to the reporter, not the newspaper. Noyes sees no conflict because his group has an "arm's length relationship" with Deer Creek, and he says its $300,000 grant will fund campaign finance probes of both Democrats and Republicans.One Really Long Article

Esquire is taking the strange step of making endorsements -- in all 504 congressional and gubernatorial races.

For the just-released issue, the magazine says it weighed such factors as effectiveness and hypocrisy, not Iraq or taxes, in an idiosyncratic process that wound up backing a majority of Democrats for the House and Senate.

"We didn't come at it from any ideological standpoint," says Executive Editor Mark Warren. "We endorsed Ted Kennedy and Trent Lott, because of a combination of how they serve their state and how they function in the Senate."

Afghan Attack Brings Total Of Canadians Killed To 42 (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 15 — Two Canadian soldiers in the NATO force were killed and three were wounded in an ambush in southern Afghanistan on Saturday afternoon, and an Afghan provincial council member was assassinated Sunday on his way to work, officials said.

In other violence, an Italian photojournalist was reported to have been kidnapped by gunmen in southern Afghanistan. Two policemen were killed in a raid on Afghanistan's eastern border with Pakistan, and two civilians died in a roadside bomb explosion that was apparently intended for a Westerner's vehicle that was passing by, news agencies reported.

The Canadians were killed when their convoy came under fire by rocket-propelled grenades and gunfire in Kandahar Province, forcing their unit to call in airstrikes, according to a NATO news release. Forty-two Canadian soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan this year.

DOJ_NMG_0080649

Muhammad Younus Hussaini, the Kandahar provincial council member, was shot dead by two men on a motorbike as he was setting off in his car for his office, said the chief of security of police, Abdul Hakim Hangar. Mr. Hussaini's driver was wounded in the attack, he said.

Mr. Hussaini was the second local official to be killed in Kandahar city in three weeks. The head of the women's affairs department was fatally shot as she left her home on foot for work on Sept. 25, in what the police said was part of a campaign by Taliban insurgents to intimidate the population. The police chief in Kandahar, Gen. Esmatullah Alizai, said however that it was too early to say if Mr. Hussaini had been killed by the Taliban or someone else, perhaps because of some personal enmity.

The abducted Italian photojournalist, Gabriele Torsello, and his Afghan interpreter were taken by five armed men on Saturday as they drove from Lashkar Gah, the capital of Helmand Province, to the neighboring province of Kandahar, news agencies reported. The area, where British troops were battling thousands of militants through much of the summer, is prone to ambush and impromptu checkpoints by the Taliban and criminals.

The kidnapping occurred just a week after two German journalists were killed by unknown gunmen in central Afghanistan.

Italian Journalist, Afghan Translator Abducted In Southern Province (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal/AP, October 16, 2006

KANADAHAR, Afghanistan -- An Italian freelance photographer and his assistant were abducted in southern Afghanistan, an official said Sunday.

Gabriele Torsello and his Afghan translator were abducted by armed men on Saturday as they were driving from Lashkar Gah, the capital of the southern Helmand province, toward neighboring Kandahar, an Afghan official in Helmand said.

The two were in their car when they were abducted, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to speak to the media. Mr. Torsello earlier spent time in Musa Qala, another restive area in Helmand province, the official said.

Maj. Luke Knittig, a North Atlantic Treaty Organization spokesman in Kabul, said the organization was informed by another reporter that Mr. Torsello hasn't been in contact for the last three days and that it was trying to locate him. The missing reporter wasn't registered with the NATO media office and wasn't on an alliance sponsored trip, Mr. Knittig said.

Maso Notarianni, the director of Italian online magazine Peace Reporter, told Italian state TV that Torsello had called a hospital in Lashkar Gah, apparently to let authorities know he was kidnapped. "Until Thursday he was in the deep south of Afghanistan, in Taliban-controlled territory," Mr. Notarianni said.

The southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar have been the scene of the most intense fighting between Taliban and NATO troops this year, the worst upsurge in violence in the country since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 that ousted the Taliban regime from power.

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Health Insurer's Chief Is Ousted In Options Inquiry (NYT)

By Eric Dash And Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Dr. William W. McGuire, a medical entrepreneur who built the UnitedHealth Group into a colossus in its field, was forced to resign from the company yesterday and to give up a portion of the $1.1 billion he holds in harshly criticized stock options.

UnitedHealth, one of the nation's two largest health insurers, also dismissed its general counsel and a member of its board in what amounted to a sweeping overhaul of its governance practices and leadership ranks. The options that Dr. McGuire had been granted over the years have led to criminal and civil investigations and public disapproval.

In a sweeping report released yesterday that was highly critical of management, a law firm hired by UnitedHealth to investigate the timing of stock options concluded that the company was riddled with poor controls and conflicts of interest. The report, which the company posted on its Web site, found that UnitedHealth had backdated options to maximize employees' compensation.

The company said yesterday that the disputed options would be repriced from the lowest share price for the years in question to the highest prices, scaling back the earnings of Dr. McGuire and others. The company did not say precisely how much its executives would give up.

The developments are the most dramatic to date since federal regulators started looking into the widespread practice of backdating stock options. More than 100 companies have come under scrutiny over the unlikely coincidence of stock options being granted again and again to senior executives on dates when the company's share price was low, a tactic that guaranteed the maximum profit when the options were turned into cash.

Executives at several companies have already been forced to resign, and at UnitedHealth Group, it was announced that five other directors would be forced out over the next three years.

At UnitedHealth, there was significant evidence that options were backdated for employees at all levels of the company between 1994 and 2002. But among the most substantial and egregious, according to the law firm's report, were those awarded to Dr. McGuire, the company's longtime chairman and chief executive. Of the 12 options grants issued to Dr. McGuire, three just happened to be priced at the stock's lowest price that year.

The Justice Department, the Minnesota Attorney General's office, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service are all investigating UnitedHealth's options practices.

Most of the companies implicated in backdating controversies so far are Silicon Valley start-ups or firms with technology roots, where options with favorable dates were considered a recruitment tool in the dot-com boom. UnitedHealth, which has a market capitalization of $66 billion, is one of the few large blue-chip companies to stumble over the issue, and its problems underscore how prevalent the practice has been. Scrutiny over backdating also comes at a time of increasingly loud criticism of excesses of executive pay.

At UnitedHealth, even the man named to replace Dr. McGuire as chief executive has been a beneficiary of backdated options: Stephen J. Hemsley, who has been Dr. McGuire's top lieutenant, will lose a sizable portion of his options, the company said.

"Mr. Hemsley has voluntarily agreed to reprice all options awarded through 2002 to the annual high share price for each year, and to take any other appropriate action to eliminate any possible financial benefit from options-related issues," UnitedHealth said. Other senior UnitedHealth executives, including Dr. McGuire and the resigning general counsel, David J. Lubben, will take similar actions, the company said.

In a lengthy and somewhat contrite statement after a board meeting yesterday, UnitedHealth announced that it would take a series of steps recommended by an outside law firm, Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, which had been hired by a special committee of UnitedHealth directors. The seven-month investigation led to a showdown that ended late yesterday after Dr. McGuire and the UnitedHealth board was presented with the findings.

In their report, investigators from Wilmer Cutler found that "most of the 29 stock grants" that accounted for nearly 450 million stock options that the company awarded between 1994 and 2002 "were likely backdated."

The report also found that a grant of one million stock options to Dr. McGuire and 500,000 options awarded to Mr. Hemsley in connection with their 1999 employment contract were probably backdated. But the company's outside investigators appeared to clear Mr. Hemsley, finding that he "had little or no role in the negotiation of, or the process leading up to, the option award" related to the contract.

Investigators, moreover, painted a picture of "inadequate" internal controls and a senior management team that failed to set an appropriate tone at the top. But the report attempted to clear the directors on the compensation committee of any legal wrongdoing. "The directors were entitled to presume that matters brought before them for action were procedurally proper and consistent with applicable legal and accounting standards," the report concludes.

The report also said that the financial relationships between Dr. McGuire and the board member who resigned yesterday, William G. Spears, who headed the board's compensation committee when Dr. McGuire's employment agreement was negotiated in 1999, "created a conflict of interest." Mr. Spears served as a trustee for two trusts for Dr. McGuire's children and managed as much as $55 million of Dr. McGuire's money. He also managed millions of dollars managed for Mr. Hemsley.

DOJ_NMG_0080651

Acting on the law firm's recommendations, the board said it would replace, within three years, all of the directors on its compensation committee who had approved the improper options. The company also said it would create new senior executive posts to oversee ethics and compensation.

Dr. McGuire, an internist and lung specialist, will not leave empty-handed: he will still take home hundreds of millions of dollars from stock options. Over his 18 years at UnitedHealth, he banked more than a half billion dollars. UnitedHealth said last night that it was still negotiating whether he would receive a $5.1 million a year pension, which is called for in his employment contract.

Dr. McGuire is by far the best known, most powerful and most richly compensated business leader to be toppled by challenges to pay packages that were inflated by stock options based on favorable, low purchase dates. Options are typically granted at the current market price of the stock, to avoid adverse tax and accounting consequences.

Options-dating issues led to the resignation from the Apple Computer board two weeks ago of Fred D. Anderson of a former chief financial officer of Apple, but the company said that Steven P. Jobs, chief executive of Apple, had not benefited from improper equity awards.

The United Health board faced formidable challenges at its meeting yesterday. Dr. McGuire is a superstar executive with one of the best track records in American business, and losing him could undermine the confidence of Wall Street investors. The statement released by UnitedHealth, which is based in Minneapolis, pointed out that under Dr. McGuire's leadership, the company's stock price had risen by almost 8,500 percent.

But not acting posed considerable legal and financial risks for the company and the directors themselves. For some compensation committee members who remain on the board, ousting Dr. McGuire over stock option improprieties might mean implicating themselves.

Wall Street analysts said investors, who have driven down United's stock price by more than 20 percent this year, are likely to be jolted by the departure of the widely admired Dr. McGuire but may be reassured by the promotion of Mr. Hemsley, "the guy who makes things happen" at the company, said Sheryl Skolnick, a health care analyst at the CRT Capital Group.

The uproar over backdating erupted at a time when dozens of companies were forced to restate earnings to reflect option awards, under new accounting rules. UnitedHealth said in May that restating could cut as much as $286 million from profits for 2003, 2004 and last year.

The Justice Department has brought charges against officers at two companies — Brocade Communications and Comverse Technology — over options backdating, and with dozens of cases under review, more charges could be on the way. Boards, meanwhile, have forced out more than two-dozen executives, including five in the past week. And scores of companies are rushing to restate their results in time for this quarter's earnings, so they do not face legal and financial exposure for additional delays.

In an apparent effort to get ahead of the official investigators, in March, a special committee of UnitedHealth's independent directors began examining the 45,000 separate stock option grants made to company employees. The following month, the committee hired William R. McLucas, a former S.E.C. enforcement director, and his team of investigators, Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, to lead the review.

There are also questions about the an unusual clause woven into Dr. McGuire's 1999 employment contract that allowed him to choose the grant date of his stock options by providing "oral notification" to the human resources or compensation committee chair. While there is nothing illegal about such a provision, compensation specialists say the practice could lead to abuse. The clause was eliminated last year.

Most analysts have continued to recommend the stock during its slide, but Matthew Borsch, who follows UnitedHealth at Goldman Sachs, predicted that United's share price "will fall further now with the certainty of Dr. McGuire's departure."

Ms. Skolnick or CRT Capital Group had other concerns. She said the changes announced yesterday were "good" but added that "the scary thing" was the possibility that past stock-dating practices may still lead to costly penalties. "I worry that something bad must have happened," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0080652

Health-Care Firm's Chief To Depart Over Stock Options (WP/AP)

By Joshua Freed

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

UnitedHealth Group Inc., one of the largest managed health-care companies, said yesterday that chairman and chief executive William W. McGuire will step down, after months of questions about the timing behind his stock option grants.

The Minnesota-based company said McGuire will step down immediately as chairman and as a director. It said that McGuire would continue as chief executive until Dec. 1 at the latest and that he would "assist in an orderly transition to new leadership."

The company named Stephen Hemsley, currently president and chief operating officer, to be the new chief executive. It also installed Richard Burke, the founding chief executive of UnitedHealth's predecessor company, as chairman.

UnitedHealth also said that board member William G. Spears was resigning and that General Counsel David J. Lubben would retire.

The overhaul comes after directors received an outside report they commissioned to look at UnitedHealth's options-granting practices. McGuire had been under pressure since the Wall Street Journal reported in March that he received stock options on the days the company's stock price hit yearly lows in 1997, 1999 and 2000. The timing of those options is unlikely to have worked out that way unless the grants were backdated.

Because an option's price is set according to the stock price on the day of the grant, a low stock price makes an option more valuable.

Backdating stock options isn't always illegal, but failing to disclose it can trigger tax and regulatory problems. Indeed, in May, UnitedHealth acknowledged a "significant deficiency" in its handling of stock options and said it may have to restate as much as $286 million in earnings for 2003, 2004 and 2005.

UnitedHealth has disclosed that the Internal Revenue Service asked it for documents dating to 2003 concerning stock options and other compensation for some executives. It has also been subpoenaed by federal prosecutors.

On Sunday, the company released a report by an outside law firm that examined 29 options grants made between 1994 and 2006. The report found that most of those options grants didn't show a written grant date or price until weeks or, in one case, nearly a month after the grant date. The report concluded that "many of the options grants were likely backdated."

The report found eight cases where options were granted on the lowest price of the quarter, all of them before Aug. 29, 2002, when the Sarbanes-Oxley law began requiring quicker disclosures of stock options grants. After that, the number of such well-timed options grants dropped to zero.

McGuire had $1.6 billion in exercisable options at the end of 2005.

UnitedHealth In Shake-Up Over Options (LAT)

By Lisa Girion

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

The chief executive of one of the nation's largest health insurance companies retired under pressure Sunday, the latest executive to fall in an options-based pay scandal that is unfolding at scores of companies nationwide.

UnitedHealth Group Inc. announced that William McGuire, 59, was leaving — along with a director who oversaw executive compensation and the firm's top lawyer.

The announcement came in the wake of a board-commissioned investigation that found that stock option grants were "likely backdated" to allow insiders to maximize financial gains.

President and Chief Operating Officer Stephen Helmsley was tapped to replace McGuire. He said little about the stock options controversy in a statement released Sunday.

"In light of the recently completed investigation, I have determined that it is in the best interests of the company that I assist Steve Helmsley in an orderly transition to succeed me as CEO," McGuire said.

UnitedHealth doubled its presence in California last year when it bought Cypress-based PacifiCare Health Systems Inc. for $9.2 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0080653

During McGuire's 15-year tenure, UnitedHealth's share price increased fiftyfold and he amassed a potential fortune in unexercised stock options. Now, U.S. and state regulators are probing the dating of the stock options.

An investigation by a law firm hired by UnitedHealth's board concluded that 1.5 million options — most of which were granted to McGuire as a part of his 1999 compensation package — were "likely backdated."

The results of that investigation — given to board members last week and made public Sunday — were viewed as creating pressure on McGuire to leave.

Yet, because the investigation had been underway for more than six months, there was a sense among investors until only recently that McGuire would survive the scandal, said Sheryl Skolnick, an analyst at CRT Capital in Stanford, Conn.

"I don't think anybody expected Bill to be forced to retire," she said.

McGuire's departure was announced only days after the leaders of two technology companies stepped down, all signs of the growing scope of a scandal over once-hidden stock option practices designed to pad insiders' compensation packages.

Various government investigators have drawn more than 100 companies into their crosshairs, and analysts said the shake-ups in the executive suites suggested corporate boards were rushing to clean house before potential crackdowns by federal regulators or prosecutors.

"If there's a problem, and it's traced to the CEO, then boards have to take the appropriate action," Skolnick said.

McGuire, who also served as chairman of the Minnetonka, Minn.-based company, relinquished that post as well Sunday. The company said he would remain CEO as late as Dec. 1 to assist in the transition.

The terms of McGuire's parting, "including other options issues and financial benefits," were still under discussion, the company said.

McGuire also agreed to reprice all stock options awarded to him from 1994 through 2002 to the annual high share price for each year to eliminate any financial benefit from backdating.

Before the repricing, McGuire's options were reported to be worth more than $1.6 billion.

Helmsley, who the investigation's report said received 500,000 of the questionably timed options, also agreed to reprice his options.

The scandal was touched off by a Wall Street Journal report in March. It questioned whether UnitedHealth and other companies had dated executives' options, after they were granted, to when the shares dipped particularly low in order to maximize the recipients' gains.

The newspaper reported that McGuire received options on the days UnitedHealth's share price hit annual lows in 1997, 1999 and 2000 — timing that was all but impossible by chance.

The legal and tax problems surrounding backdating involve inadequate disclosure. UnitedHealth said in May that because of a "significant deficiency" in its handling of options, it may have to restate as much as $286 million in earnings for 2003, 2004 and 2005.

In its report, the law firm that investigated the options granting at UnitedHealth found that the board's compensation committee was kept in the dark about details such as the dating of options.

Another problem, it said, was that the board was not informed of the full extent of financial relationships between McGuire and William Spears, who was chairman of the compensation committee at the time the CEO's 1999 compensation package was put together.

"An appropriate tone at the top, adequate controls and discipline over the option granting process, and management transparency with the board and its committees on executive compensation matters are basic and critical to the integrity of option grants," the report said. "There were various failings in these areas."

General counsel David J. Lubben and Spears also are leaving, the company said.

Analysts said investors still had to worry about lawsuits and whether the government probes would find criminal wrongdoing by individuals or the company.

McGuire, a trained physician from Texas who towers over most colleagues, ascended to the helm of what was then a regional healthcare company in 1989.

DOJ_NMG_0080654

Through a series of acquisitions, he turned UnitedHealth into an managed-care leader with nearly 30 million enrollees across the country.

In a note to employees, McGuire took pride in his role in UnitedHealth's transformation.

"We have made significant advances in improving access to care, fostering greater affordability and enhancing the quality of healthcare for all individuals," he said. "At the same time, we have built a vital and sustaining company serving a diverse group of customers, healthcare providers, and certainly shareholders."

One of UnitedHealth's latest acquisitions was last year's purchase of PacifiCare. But the ownership change may have gone largely unnoticed by patients because the company kept the PacifiCare name in the state.

With the acquisition of PacifiCare's Secure Horizons HMOs, UnitedHealth vastly expanded its slice of the rapidly growing Medicare market.

But that government business could be at issue if prosecutors seek criminal charges against the company. In the event of a conviction, the government could move to have UnitedHealth excluded as a Medicare and Medicaid contractor, analysts said.

The board announced a series of operating and governance changes Sunday and installed UnitedHealth founding CEO Richard Burke as chairman.

Options scandals are roiling across the corporate landscape. More than two dozen executives have quit or been fired amid probes over the backdating of stock option grants to enrich corporate insiders.

*

lisa.girion@latimes.com

Embattled CEO To Step Down At UnitedHealth (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

The scandal over backdated stock options claimed one of corporate America's most successful chief executives, William McGuire of UnitedHealth Group Inc., who agreed to leave the giant health insurer after an internal probe concluded that the stock-option grants that have brought him a huge fortune were likely manipulated.

The probe's findings, released yesterday, provided a detailed picture of how stock-option backdating worked at the company, offering glimpses of cronyism and a culture in which vast sums of compensation were handed out with few controls or written records. Among the troublesome option grants detailed in the report was a massive 1999 award to Dr. McGuire that ranks among the most lucrative ever. UnitedHealth said Dr. McGuire would immediately relinquish the chairman's post and step down as CEO by Dec. 1. Also leaving is William G. Spears, a member of the board's compensation committee who had deep financial entanglements with Dr. McGuire, which were undisclosed to investors, and David Lubben, the company's general counsel.

With the UnitedHealth departures, more than 30 top corporate officials will have lost their posts in the wake of the options-manipulation investigations that have engulfed more than 100 U.S. companies over the past several months. Dr. McGuire is the fifth CEO in the past week to depart in the still-burgeoning scandal.

Dr. McGuire will be replaced as chief executive by his longtime lieutenant, Stephen Hemsley. The probe, conducted by the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, found that Mr. Hemsley received backdated grants, but largely cleared him of a major role in their creation. Richard T. Burke, a director and former UnitedHealth CEO, was named nonexecutive chairman.

At the end of last year, Dr. McGuire's cache of unexercised options was valued at $1.78 billion, a sum far greater than any other U.S. corporate chieftain. Yesterday, UnitedHealth said he agreed to have all of the options issued to him from 1994 through 2002 repriced, likely cutting tens of millions in dollars from their value. But the company left open other financial arrangements with Dr. McGuire, and the exact terms of his departure are likely to be the subject of intense negotiations.

UnitedHealth, which is based in Minnetonka, Minn., and has a market capitalization of $66 billion, also is being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission, by federal prosecutors in New York, and by the Minnesota attorney general. The probe by WilmerHale was headed by William McLucas, a former director of the enforcement division of the SEC. It examined 29 of the largest options grants at UnitedHealth over a 12-year period, and concluded that most likely were backdated to benefit insiders.

Options are designed to give recipients the opportunity to profit if the company's share price rises in the future. Grants typically are structured so that the recipient can buy shares later at the stock's market price on the day the option was granted, or the exercise price. Backdating involves pretending that the grant was awarded on an earlier day, when the share price was particularly low, giving the recipient a chance at extra profit.

Although couched in careful language, the 14-page WilmerHale report suggests that Dr. McGuire misled lawyers conducting the probe of the options grants at issue. To the end, Dr. McGuire insisted that year after year he actually did call or otherwise contact a compensation-committee member to set an options grant in motion on what, in hindsight, turned out to be a wildly favorable day.

"Certain facts run contrary to this assertion," the WilmerHale report says, citing memoranda Dr. McGuire wrote on or after the purported grant dates referring to possible grants in the future tense. The report also takes a skeptical view of the circumstantial evidence presented by Dr. McGuire to document that the compensation-committee notifications did in fact take place.

Dr. McGuire's lawyer, David M. Brodsky, declined to comment on the WilmerHale report. A spokesman for Mr. Spears also declined to address it, saying only that Mr. Spears was proud of his 15-year service on the UnitedHealth board. Mr. Lubben couldn't be reached for comment.

The lawyers conducting the probe also noted that of the 27 grants between 1994 and August 2002 under review, eight were given at the lowest price of the quarter in which they were dated, and another eight were either at the second-lowest or third-lowest price of the quarter. It was the improbability that such fortunate dates were chosen by chance -- the essence of Dr. McGuire's contention -- that helped persuade the board that he needed to leave the company, according to a person close to the situation.

The 29 grants examined in depth in the report covered 85% of all the options granted in the 12-year period. Of those 29, WilmerHale's Mr. McLucas said there were "relatively few instances in which there is either direct or circumstantial evidence to establish that a grant date was selected on that particular day." The first written evidence of a grant in the company's files often appeared weeks after the grant date, and in at least one case, a month later.

The WilmerHale report prominently cites a March 18 article in The Wall Street Journal that focused on options-grant patterns at UnitedHealth and other companies and suggested that the unusual patterns were indicative of possible backdating. The report says the Journal article prompted an SEC inquiry, and also the hiring of WilmerHale to do the probe. The Journal's analysis found that the odds were infinitesimal -- about 200 million to one -- that Dr. McGuire's grant pattern at UnitedHealth occurred by chance.

In the mid-1980s, Dr. McGuire quit clinical practice as a pulmonologist, or lung specialist, to hitch himself to the health-insurance boom. He presided over stratospheric growth at UnitedHealth -- the company's stock rose some 50-fold during his tenure. He is credited with savvy investments in technology, smart deal making and a visionary strategy that turned the company into a powerful force in American medicine.

Along the way, he appears to have paid close attention to stock options.

Year after year while at the helm of UnitedHealth, Dr. McGuire received giant option grants. In many of those years, the purported dates were suspiciously fortunate. Between 1994 and 2002, he received 12 grants, each dated just before a sharp rise in the company's share price. Three grants -- in 1997, 1999 and 2000 -- were dated on the day of the stock's lowest closing price of the year.

The WilmerHale report, which is far more detailed than disclosures made by other companies embroiled in the stock-option scandal, concludes that Dr. McGuire selected the dates for options awarded to employees below the rank of top executive by signing "CEO certificates." They were "typically executed subsequent to the date on the certificate," the report says.

For grants to top executives, he was "central to the options process," the report says.

The troubles with the 1999 grant, which is dated Oct. 13, the very day of the stock's lowest closing price that year, appear to have been central to Dr. McGuire's ouster. The grant, which was composed of three slices, covered some 1.825 million options; that's the equivalent of 14.6 million options today, taking into account subsequent stock splits. Excluding the small piece he has already cashed out, it is valued at some $600 million at today's prices.

DOJ_NMG_0080656

The report says that the grant was likely backdated. A one-million-share slice was issued supposedly in connection with Dr. McGuire's 1999 employment agreement, which the report says wasn't signed until December. Another chunk of the option was referred to by Dr. McGuire in the future tense in a memorandum dated as late as Oct. 22.

The anticipated repricing of the 1999 award from the year's low point to the year's high point -- some 60% higher -- will cost Dr. McGuire about $50 million.

The probe found that the director heading up the negotiations over the 1999 grant, Mr. Spears, had financial entanglements with Dr. McGuire. Starting in 1992, Mr. Spears served as a trustee for two of Dr. McGuire's children's trusts, according to the report. For more than a decade, Mr. Spears also acted as an investment manager for Dr. McGuire and his family, with the amount of McGuire family money under the firm's management hitting $55 million in 2006, the report found. In addition, in June of 1999, Dr. McGuire invested $500,000 in Mr. Spears's money-management firm, it said.

Mr. Spears and Dr. McGuire say they thought the board was aware of the money-management relationship, according to the report. An email uncovered during the investigation that appears to have been sent from the general counsel, Mr. Lubben, to an outside lawyer, outlined the relationship and stated that there had been a disclosure to the full board of the "conflict."

But there is no documentation to confirm that the disclosure took place then, the report says. No director recalled being told about the money-management relationship or the investment in Mr. Spears's firm before the 1999 contract negotiations. And the directors told the WilmerHale lawyers that they first learned of Dr. McGuire's investment in Mr. Spears's firm after they were told of it by investigators.

As for Mr. Lubben, the report blames the legal department, headed by him, for shoddy record keeping. The report states that most of the compensation committee minutes are either "entirely silent" on the matter of stock-option discussions or make vague, incomplete or misleading references to what happened.

The lack of records may pose a challenge to federal investigators who may seek to rebut Dr. McGuire's claims that actual meetings or conversations occurred when he said they did.

Mr. Hemsley, Dr. McGuire's successor, has also amassed a sizable options-related fortune. Dr. McGuire is far and away No. 1 on a list of executives ranked by outstanding options value, according to the ExecuComp database of more than 1,500 companies; Mr. Hemsley is No. 2, comfortably ahead of the next-ranked executive.

A looming question is what will happen to the valuable grants that Dr. McGuire hasn't yet cashed out. The total is less than $1.78 billion today, in part because of a recent decline in UnitedHealth's share price, and in part because Dr. McGuire cashed out a small fraction of his options in February, reaping $124 million in profit.

The news release issued yesterday by UnitedHealth characterized Dr. McGuire's departure as stepping down. Exactly what that means will be key to determining what he will reap. His employment contract allows him in some cases to maintain at least a portion of his option grants for years after he leaves, depending on how the departure is characterized.

In a statement, Dr. McGuire said he "decided to retire" after 15 years at the insurer's helm. "In light of the recently completed investigation, I have determined that it is in the best interests of the company that I assist Steve Hemsley in an orderly transition to succeed me as CEO," he said.

UnitedHealth said it was "engaged in discussions with Dr. McGuire concerning the terms of his departure from the company, including other options issues and financial benefits." If those discussions aren't amicably concluded, that could set the stage for acrimonious litigation. If Dr. McGuire were allowed to exercise all his outstanding options, UnitedHealth would issue him shares covering about 2% of the company -- a move sure to rankle shareholders. The company faces a litany of litigation already from shareholders.

UnitedHealth's Next Challenge Is Uncertainty (WSJ)

By Vanessa Fuhrmans

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

Sting of Backdating Scandal May Continue to Weigh On Shares; What Does CEO's Exit Mean?

With William McGuire forced out from the helm of UnitedHealth, investors will start sorting out whether the company's management team can get it back on track without the man who built it.

DOJ_NMG_0080657

Despite the obvious challenges ahead, some investors and analysts say it can.

Since Dr. McGuire was named chief executive in 1991 and set about transforming the also-ran regional health management organization into a national health-insurance heavyweight, UnitedHealth's stock has soared 50-fold, even after the lumps it has taken lately.

The performance has made heaps of money for many investors, and also for Dr. McGuire. It is now clear Dr. McGuire and other insiders also gained enormously from stock options with grant dates that had been backdated to days with low share prices, potentially increasing their value. The timing of the options led to his troubles with regulators and the company's board , whose meeting yesterday prompted his retirement.

The options scandal also has led to the possible restatement of several hundred million dollars in earnings, potentially hefty tax penalties, shareholder lawsuits and a criminal probe.

The Minnetonka, Minn.-based company is expected to generate 2006 revenue of $72 billion -- compared to just $847 million in 1991 -- largely from selling health-insurance products to employers, individuals and administering private Medicaid and Medicare plans. It has also branched out to other health-services businesses.

UnitedHealth has one critical factor working in its favor: It is known for its deep bench of management talent. It also has a management factor working against it: The man named to replace Dr. McGuire, the company's president and chief operating officer, Stephen Hemsley, has stock-options issues of his own, though UnitedHealth's board generally cleared him of close involvement in the options-granting process.

Against that backdrop, investors need to decide whether to sell the stock because the company could struggle without Dr. McGuire's leadership, or to buy it because the uncertainty about the stock-options scandal is closer to being resolved.

It is the difference between giving UnitedHealth the Fiorina treatment and giving it the Greenberg treatment.

In 2005, the week Maurice "Hank" Greenberg stepped aside as chief executive at AIG, the insurance titan he helped build, its share price fell more than 7%. Though the move helped the company take a step toward resolving an accounting scandal with regulators, Mr. Greenberg was the driving force in AIG's culture.

On the other hand, Hewlett-Packard shares soared after Carly Fiorina was ousted, also last year, as its CEO, rising 7% the day the news became public, in part because investors had doubts about the merger she helped engineer with Compaq Computer.

Hewlett-Packard's shares have continued to rise since; AIG's shares have barely recovered.

The prospect of Dr. McGuire's departure has already played a role in driving a 23% decline in UnitedHealth's stock since the issue was exposed in The Wall Street Journal in the spring. The decline also reflects expectations of a hit to earnings, as well as the possibility of payouts for shareholder lawsuits.

Matthew Borsch, an analyst at Goldman Sachs who has a sell rating on the stock and says the company still faces tough headwinds despite the resolution of Dr. McGuire's fate, says the restatement itself shouldn't dent the company's enormous earnings power. It registered net income of $3.3 billion last year, and the company said in May it might restate up to $286 million in earnings, though it has suggested since that that figure could be revised.

Some will argue that Dr. McGuire leaves a company that relies far less on his strategic thinking than it did 10 or even five years ago. "It's been remarkable what he's done," says Joseph France, an analyst at Banc of America Securities who rates UnitedHealth shares as "neutral." But "maybe a different skill set is called for now."

A pulmonologist by training, Dr. McGuire resurrected UnitedHealth from a small, financially troubled HMO into a health-care empire valued at more than $60 billion today. He drove UnitedHealth's expansion into businesses beyond commercial health insurance, jumping into growth areas such as elder-care services, private Medicaid plans and banking services around the new field of health savings accounts. He also led the industry in dropping restrictive and much-hated managed-care practices, such as requiring doctors to ask for permission when ordering tests.

In the second quarter, UnitedHealth's earnings climbed 26% to $974 million on a 57% jump in revenue to $17.9 billion. Analysts expect continued growth, with the consensus calling for a 19% increase to $2.95 per share this year and a 16% jump in 2007 to $3.41 per share.

DOJ_NMG_0080658

UnitedHealth shares are trading at nearly 18 times estimated 2006 earnings. That makes the company just a little bit more expensive than rivals WellPoint Inc. and Aetna Inc. But UnitedHealth is one of the biggest generators of free-cash flow -- $3.8 billion in 2005 -- and its earnings also are climbing faster than the industry average.

That puts the company in solid shape to deal with the health-insurance industry's shifting landscape today -- and less dependent on a visionary like Dr. McGuire, analysts say. Though it is the second-largest U.S. health insurer in terms of overall health plan members behind WellPoint, UnitedHealth is the leader where the market is growing most: In Medicare and senior-related health-care services, and the burgeoning area of high-deductible and savings account-linked health plans.

It has also acquired technology companies that write software needed by its rivals to measure hospitals and doctors on performance as employers increasingly demand more cost and quality information from them.

Many of the company's biggest operational decisions are made by the chiefs of its four divisions, whose businesses include employer health plans; Medicare and Medicaid products; specialized services such as dental plans; and technology.

The company's raft of acquisitions, including PacifiCare Health Systems, Oxford Health Plans and Definity Health, in recent years also has deepened UnitedHealth's management bench.

The most challenging situation for many investors now may not be Dr. McGuire's status. It might be sizing up Mr. Hemsley, a former chief financial officer at Arthur Anderson recruited by Dr. McGuire in 1997. He has been the key executor of Dr. McGuire's strategy, appreciated by investors for his operational skills and widely seen over the years as his eventual successor. Many will see his appointment to CEO as a continuum of UnitedHealth's current strategy.

"It might be seen as better than the worst-case scenario. If Hemsley had left too, many investors would have seen this as a complete leadership disruption," says Mr. Borsch.

But Mr. Hemsley, who also has amassed a considerable fortune in company stock-options grants, is included as a defendant in several of the options-related shareholder lawsuits against the company, partly because he also received grants on favorable dates. Should those grants produce legal problems for Mr. Hemsley, the problem for UnitedHealth might not go away, analysts say. But the board's decision to elevate him could be seen as a vote of confidence about his own legal questions, and his leadership.

Dr. McGuire and Mr. Hemsley both agreed to have all of their options through 2002 repriced.

The company has other leaders in its ranks to complement Mr. Hemsley, including former Northwest Airlines CEO Richard Anderson, who joined UnitedHealth in November 2004 as an executive vice president.

While Mr. Hemsley gets much of the credit for making UnitedHealth more efficient and for integrating acquisitions into its systems, Mr. Anderson is seen as being more experienced at operating in the public eye. Some analysts say this is exactly what UnitedHealth needs as the health-insurance market gets more competitive, creating tougher demands from hospitals and employers.

Write to Vanessa Fuhrmans at vanessa.fuhrmans@wsj.com9

Accounting Firms Ally To Take On The Big 4 (WP)

By Kim Hart

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

For more than a decade, many smaller Washington-based accounting and consulting firms have aligned themselves with one of four larger networks that represent mid-size regional firms. Now one of those networks has gone a step further: banding its member firms together to act as one company.

The network, called Baker Tilly USA, opens for business today, combining 22 mid-size accounting firms from around the country, including Beers & Cutler PLLC locally. The alliance plans to offer tax, audit and consulting services to capture more of the accounting market, a strategy other accounting networks plan to adopt over the next year.

"We're coming at a time when the business market is crying out for alternatives to the Big Four, and we believe our structure can fill that void," said Geoff Barnes, chief executive and president of Baker Tilly International, a worldwide consortium of 125 firms.

DOJ_NMG_0080659

The dissolution of accounting giant Arthur Andersen in the Enron scandal, and the more stringent internal accounting controls required by the Sarbanes-Oxley law, created more demand for the Big Four -- Deloitte & Touche LLP, Ernst & Young LLP, KPMG LLP and PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP -- particularly from the nation's largest public companies.

Second- and third-tier accounting firms often found it difficult to move up the accounting ranks because larger clients typically require industry-specific skills and global reach, which many regional firms do not have.

"Companies have been gun-shy about leaving the womb of the big firms," said Allan D. Koltin of PDI Global Inc., a marketing consultant for accounting firms. "The idea of the one-firm concept is to bring a unique and distinct brand that CEOs and CFOs can feel more comfortable about because they have the resources of their affiliate firms behind them."

Decreased competition in the accounting industry has sparked concern by industry experts and government agencies. In a 2003 study, the General Accounting Office found that smaller accounting firms faced significant barriers to entry into the large public company audit market.

"There is a name-brand effect in the industry," said James Peters, chairman of the accounting department at the University of Maryland at College Park. "It's still going to be very difficult to capture companies out of the Big Four's key market."

Firms in alliances such as Baker Tilly USA "have a better chance of competing with the second-tier firms," which include RSM McGladrey Inc., Grant Thornton LLP and BDO Seidman LLP, he said.

Beers & Cutler, with a staff of 270, specializes in the government contracting, real estate, law firm and automotive sectors. The firm will share that expertise with other Baker Tilly members, said R. Edwin Offterdinger, managing partner.

Sharing institutional knowledge with other firms under a larger umbrella organization could threaten the identity of individual firms. "But it's a dual branding strategy that, if executed properly, will only enhance the brand," Offterdinger said.

Three other networks of accounting firms are preparing to introduce their alternatives. Moores Rowland North America, the Leading Edge Alliance and Moore Stephens North America also include firms based in the Washington area: Aronson & Co., Argy Wiltse & Robinson PC, and Goodman & Co., respectively.

Those groups, with Baker Tilly, represent about two-thirds of the nation's top 100 accounting firms, Koltin said.

Baker Tilly's total workforce of about 8,000 is far smaller than the staffs of the largest firms. Ernst & Young, for example, has 26,000 U.S. employees, and PriceWaterhouseCoopers has about 30,000. They each have around 140 affiliate offices around the world; Baker Tilly has 93.

But networks like Baker Tilly stand to benefit from the large number of smaller, non-global businesses "left behind" by the Big Four in recent years, Koltin said. According to CCH Inc.'s Public Accountant Report, revenue rose 21.9 percent for firms outside the Big Four in 2005, while the top firms' revenue rose 14.7 percent.

The new alliances "will become four very significant pillars that realize that, if they create depth and resources, they can have tremendous competitive advantage against all other firms in the marketplace," Koltin said.

SEC To Ease Margin Rules In Cost-cut Move (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

The US is set to relax margin rules in force since after the Wall Street crash of 1929 with the approval of a system that will cut securities trading costs and pave the way for “multi-asset” trading across equities, options and futures.

The move removes a key barrier to the competitiveness of the US capital markets as similar margin rules already exist in Europe, attracting increasing numbers of hedge funds to London.

It comes as many US exchanges are trying to expand the mix of their businesses towards a combination of equities, options and futures.

This is in response to demand from hedge funds and other traders who increasingly prefer to trade such assets simultaneously.

The Securities and Exchange Commission’s staff has approved an application by the New York Stock Exchange for a new type of “portfolio margining” account that calculates margin based on the types of assets held in the account and the interplay between them.

DOJ_NMG_0080660

It will provide an alternative to the "Reg T" margining system, under which the Federal Reserve and NYSE set margins for stock trading at up to 50 per cent.

Hedge funds complain that this needlessly ties up funds in margin, limiting the funds' leverage.

They also say it arbitrarily sets margin levels regardless of the types of assets and trading strategies being used, as electronic, algorithmic trading makes such trading more complex.

Grace Vogel, executive vice-president of member firm regulation at the NYSE, said the new account would use a margining system developed by the Options Clearing Corporation, a clearing house for the six US options exchanges. It would take into account when an investor's exposure to one asset, such as an IBM stock, was already being offset by a position in another, such as an option on IBM stock.

"The current rule does not recognise enough hedging strategies between options and stocks," Ms Vogel said. "[Reg T] has served us well over the years but I think we're ready to take a step in the direction of having more risk-based margining."

She said that in some cases margin could be reduced to 15 per cent. Bob Colby, deputy director of the SEC's division of market regulation, said the staff's recommendation would be put to the agency's five commissioners "in weeks".

"It's a big change, and that's why we'd like the commission to consider it," he told the Financial Times. The move is expected to be approved by a majority of commissioners.

Gary de Waal, general counsel at broker Fimat, said: "If portfolio margining is approved for the US it is as significant an event as when prime brokerage first became available. It is a major milestone."

US Rethink On Hedge Fund Rules (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

Top US policymakers believe fresh regulation of hedge funds may be needed to avoid a catastrophic hedge fund failure and that relying on banks and other counterparties to manage their exposure to the booming industry may no longer be enough.

The development marks a shift in thinking on hedge fund oversight since a US court in June struck down a rule that hedge fund managers register with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Hedge funds have since been in regulatory limbo.

The $6bn losses at hedge fund Amaranth have thrust into the spotlight concerns over the systemic risks associated with the $1,500bn industry.

Since the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets – made up of the Federal Reserve, Treasury, SEC and Commodity Futures Trading Commission – has believed that counterparty risk management is the best way to guard against risks to the financial system posed by hedge funds.

Ben Bernanke, US Federal Reserve chairman, in May expressed scepticism about giving regulators more oversight over hedge funds, saying that allowing hedge funds and trading partners to manage risk in the sector made "economic sense".

However, one senior official close to the group said the explosive growth of such funds, the leverage available and the increasing exposure of pension fund money to them had cast doubt on that approach.

Speaking on condition of anonymity, he said: "It's an unavoidable question that you ought to look comprehensively at how this framework is working . . . Is counterparty risk management still the right approach?"

A senior SEC official said: "There's an opening to thinking about alternatives."

One focus of concern was that hedge funds had access to financing from multiple prime brokers.

"Several years have passed [since LTCM], hedge funds are bigger and significant developments have taken place not just in the mechanics of the prime brokerage business but also the way in which leverage is provided," the first official said. "The real concern is the transmission mechanism of the failure of a hedge fund into entities of a size that really are of systemic consequence for the [financial] system. You don't want the failure of a hedge fund to bring down a Morgan Stanley or a JPMorgan."

With billions of dollars in pension plan money expected to flow into hedge funds in the next few years, policymakers also needed to consider ways to improve investor protection.

DOJ_NMG_0080661

"One idea would be to say there are certain things that pension plan administrators need to do before you invest into hedge funds," the official said. "You could see an overall package of measures evolving over time."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Feds Search For Causes Of Rise In Violent Crime (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Teams of federal investigators looking to curb increases in murder and robbery will visit several U.S. cities in order to pinpoint the root causes of community violence, the Justice Department is expected to announce today.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales plans to outline the initiative in an appearance at the annual meeting of the nation's police chiefs in Boston, the Justice Department said.

The Justice review comes after the Police Executive Research Forum, a national police advocacy group, reported last week that murder, robbery and assault offenses had increased substantially in a cross-section of cities during the first six months of 2006.

Last month, the FBI's national crime report for 2005 also revealed a nearly 2% increase in the nation's murder rate after a two-decade low in 2004.

The federal program will dispatch investigators to several cities during the next few weeks to look at possible causes of increased violence, according to an outline of the initiative provided by the Justice Department. The department didn't identify the cities.

Teams also are scheduled to visit communities where crime has declined to determine which crime-prevention tactics have been most effective, the Justice Department said.

Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, called the Justice Department review "an unprecedented effort" to assess the level of violence. "It's important for the Justice Department to get into these cities," Wexler said.

The Justice Department has maintained that the crime rate in 2005 was at a "near-record low" level. But the department said it was proceeding with the review "as a proactive measure" because of the surge in homicides and the overall increase in violent crime in 2005 reported last month by the FBI.

Abramoff Associate Met Bush Officials 12 Times (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

A lobbyist associated with Jack Abramoff, the convicted former "superlobbyist", met White House officials on 12 occasions in 2003 and 2004 on behalf of an association that represented PartyGaming and other online gaming websites, according to billing records released by Congress.

White House officials' meetings with Shawn Vasell, a former associate of Mr Abramoff, were documented by the latter's former lobbying firm, Greenberg Traurig. The documents were released following a broader investigation into contacts between Mr Abramoff's team and the Bush administration by the House committee on government reform.

A spokesman for Mr Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges this year, declined to comment. As payment for Mr Abramoff's lobbying effort to scupper anti-gaming legislation, Gibraltar-based International Interactive Association (IIA) spent millions of dollars on fees to Greenberg Traurig.

The effort was largely effective until recently, when Congress passed a bill that, in effect, criminalised gaming.

IIA, represented by James Levy, of Gibraltar-based law firm Hassans, has sought to distance itself from its ties to Mr Abramoff by asserting that, in common with his other clients, it was unaware of the lobbyist's shenanigans. These included the fact that IIA contributed $2m (€1.6m, £1.1m) to charities that Mr Abramoff used to disguise payments to other organisations.

DOJ_NMG_0080662

Tax records and the documents released by Congress show that IIA made -donations in 2003 to the National Center for Public Policy Research (NCPPR), a conservative group, and -Capital Athletic Foundation, a charity controlled by Mr Abramoff.

Robert Litt, an attorney at Arnold & Porter, another law firm representing IIA, said the $2m was contributed to the charities without IIA's knowledge, from fees it paid Greenberg Traurig. "IIA retained Greenberg Traurig to do lobbying and, not to put too fine an edge on it, it appears Abramoff stole their money," he said.

But in e-mails released by Congress, Amy Ridenour, the president of NCPPR, told Mr Abramoff in 2004 that she intended to send a letter to IIA to confirm that the $1.5m her organisation had received had, in fact, originated from IIA.

In an unsigned letter provided to the Financial Times by IIA – that Mr Litt said it sent to Ms Ridenour in August 2004 in response to her query – IIA said it had "no information" about the payments.

Today IIA still uses Greenberg Traurig as its primary lobbying firm in Washington.

Mr Litt said that, after the departure of the person who missapplied IIA's fees, it had no reason to doubt the honesty of Greenberg Traurig.

Mehlman Denies Role In Ousting Of Official (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

Ken Mehlman, the powerful chairman of the Republican National Committee, was on Sunday put on the defensive about his alleged role in the ousting of a State Department official in 2001 who was a political foe of Jack Abramoff, the former "superlobbyist" convicted on corruption charges this year.

Mr Mehlman said he did not recall the specifics of the removal of Allen Stayman, who supported changes to labour laws on the Northern Mariana Islands, an important client of Mr Abramoff, but said it was "not true" he had the authority to fire anyone in his former role as political director at the White House.

With mid-term elections looming on November 7 and the Republican party struggling to hold on to its majority in Congress, questions about Mr Abramoff's ties to the party as well as its response to the Mark Foley congressional sex scandal could not have come at a worse time.

The ties between Mr Mehlman and Mr Abramoff, which were highlighted in a report by the Los Angeles Times on Sunday, follow the release of hundreds of e-mails by a congressional committee investigating the former lobbyists' ties to the Bush administration.

The e-mails shed new light on Mr Abramoff's wheeling and dealing in Washington, including how he allegedly called in favours from a vast network of Republican allies for various political appointments and endorsements – succeeding in some endeavours and failing in others.

In one e-mail, one of Mr Abramoff's associates declared: "Mehlman said he would get him [Mr Stayman] fired."

Mr Mehlman said in an interview on CNN on Sunday that he frequently had people come to see him with political and personnel issues. "I had a way of dealing with all these matters, which is to let the policy-makers or the personnel deciders know exactly what people said. And they made the decisions," he said.

A lobbyist associated with Mr Abramoff met White House officials on 12 occasions in 2003 and 2004 on behalf of an association that represented PartyGaming and other online gaming websites, according to billing records released by Congress.

White House officials' meetings with Shawn Vasell, a former associate of Mr Abramoff, were documented by the latter's former lobbying firm, Greenberg Traurig. The documents were released following a broader investigation into contacts between Mr Abramoff's team and the Bush administration by the House committee on government reform.

Mob Trial To Start Today (SPT)

By Carrie Weimar

St. Petersburg Times, October 16, 2006

The four defendants are said to be members of the Gambino family.

TAMPA — Not so very long ago, Tampa was an underworld hub, a place where mobsters ran illegal gambling operations out of Ybor City coffee shops and killed the people who got in their way.

Those days are over, thanks largely to a crackdown by law enforcement in the 1970s and '80s. But experts say the Mafia never really left Tampa: It just changed form.

Starting today, four men alleged to be members of the Gambino crime family will go on trial in U.S. District Court in Tampa on charges of racketeering and extortion.

Prosecutors said the crew, headed by Ronald "Ronnie One Arm" Trucchio, committed a string of crimes from New York to Miami, including murder, robbery and extortion.

Trucchio, 55, and his band carved out a piece of Tampa's valet parking business and owned a company that parked cars at restaurants, hospitals and nude dance clubs, including Thee Doll House, court records show.

The stakes are high for the defendants, who face potential sentences of 20 years to life.

The trial will also offer a rare glimpse at a seamier side of Tampa.

"Organized crime is alive and well," said Ken Sanz, a special agent for the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, who investigated the Mafia for more than 30 years. "It's probably not comparable to what it was in the '80s, the '70s or the '60s, but it's here."

For years, organized crime in Tampa was under the control of the Trafficante crime family. But the death of Santo Trafficante Jr. in 1987 brought an end to that era.

Now, mobile groups of crime associates called "crews" migrate to Florida and work independently, making payments to heads of families in New York or New Jersey.

In exchange, the remote operations are granted protection from the families against other organized crime factions, Sanz said.

"It became open territory," he said. "Any crime family can come down here now and do business."

That's how Trucchio and his crew operated, according to federal documents.

Trucchio, who got his colorful nickname because of a deformed arm, started as a soldier in the Gambino crime family, one of the notorious five families that control organized crime in New York.

He was later elevated to captain or "capo" and put in charge of several crews, court records state.

Trucchio, who lived in Queens, N.Y., tapped fellow New Yorker John Alite to head Trucchio's Tampa crew beginning about 1993, the records state.

By that point, Alite was already well-known to federal authorities. In 1989, he and another man were arrested with John A. Gotti, son of the late mob boss, all accused of beating up two men and a woman in a Long Island night club.

Alite, 43, was arrested in Brazil in November 2004. He is fighting extradition to the United States.

'All about the money'

In the mid '90s, Alite became involved in a valet company called A&A of Tampa, which later changed its name to Prestige Valet, according to Florida business records.

Prestige had contracts with St. Joseph's Hospital and the shops in Channelside, according to court documents.

The company also parked cars at restaurants and nude dance clubs.

Valet parking would be an attractive business for the Mafia, said Scott Deitche, the author of Cigar City Mafia.

"It's all about the money," Deitche said.

"They're interested in any way they can make money and run money through. In valet parking, you're dealing with a whole lot of cash."

The president of Prestige Valet, Terry Scaglione, 40, was also charged in the case. His father, Nick Scaglione, was a member of the Trafficante crime family, Deitche said.

Terry Scaglione's attorney, Pat Doherty, said his client ran a legitimate business and didn't participate in any illegal activity.

The prosecution scored a major victory in August, when one of the defendants pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate with the government.

In a plea agreement unsealed this month, Michael Malone admitted to robbing a Sears cashier of $20,000 in Vineland, N.J., robbing a man at Thee Doll House in Tampa and killing John Gebert in 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0080664

Gebert, 30, was at Frankie & Johnnie's, a popular bar in Queens, when he was fatally shot in the back by two men in ski masks.

Members of the Tampa crew are also accused of roughing up a gambling ring in Port St. Lucie and extorting the owner of a rival valet business, Michael Malatin.

The other defendants are Kevin McMahon and Steven Catalano.

Recalling the old days

The last major Mafia trial in Tampa grew out of the Kings Court bottle club in Holiday, Deitche said. The phony club was set up in 1979 by an undercover FBI agent named Joe Pistone, who used the alias Donnie Brasco. Pistone went on to write a bestselling book about his experiences, which was made into a Hollywood movie.

It was a wild time to be in law enforcement, said Chris Hoyer, a Tampa attorney who served on the U.S. Department of Justice Organized Crime Strike Force and helped oversee the Kings Court sting.

Hoyer watched a high-ranking sheriff's official accept money from mobsters at the club. He also developed a grudging respect for Trafficante Jr., who developed a slew of ploys to thwart authorities.

"He used to drive 40 mph down the interstate," Hoyer said. "It's pretty hard to follow someone if he's only going 40."

The latest trial has also seen its share of drama, most of it surrounding Trucchio's lawyer, Joseph Corozzo Jr.

Corozzo, a New York City lawyer, is the son of Joseph "Jo Jo" Corozzo, believed to be the consigliere, or counselor, to the Gambinos.

The younger Corozzo is under investigation for potential involvement in witness tampering and obstruction of justice. Federal officials said the investigation could cause Corozzo to put his own welfare above his client's.

In May, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Trezevant requested a hearing to advise Trucchio of the potential conflict. Trucchio chose to remain with Corozzo, calling him his "most valuable asset."

But now the trial is scheduled to begin without Corozzo, who is stuck in a New York trial where he is representing another alleged Mafioso.

Instead, Trucchio will be represented by a last-minute replacement, Miami lawyer George Vila, who said he is completely unfamiliar with the case or organized crime in general.

Vila filed an emergency motion asking U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew to delay the trial. But Bucklew refused, saying it would be unfair to the other defendants.

Security will be a concern during the trial, which could last up to two months.

In court documents filed last week, Trezevant refused a defense request to provide a list of witnesses and the order in which they will testify.

His reason: At least two potential witnesses were threatened in the past month.

Times researcher Cathy Wos contributed to this report. Carrie Weimar can be reached at cweimar@sptimes.com or (813) 226-3416.

Mob Racketeering Trial To Start Monday (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini

Tampa Tribune, October 16, 2006

TAMPA - Lorraine Lamendola's terrifying tale of hiding from mobsters by crawling around on the floor of her darkened house is at the heart of what the federal government says was a brutal struggle to control the valet parking business in Tampa.

While members of the Gambino crime family - once headed by the flamboyant "Dapper Don" John Gotti - carried out murders, armed robberies and drug sales in New York, New Jersey and Florida, mobsters used extortion to gain dominance over valet revenue at hospitals, restaurants and nightclubs in the Tampa area, federal authorities allege.

The fight over local parking is but one facet of a wide-ranging racketeering case slated to go to trial Monday in U.S. District Court. It is also at the center of a pending civil case in Hillsborough County Circuit Court.

The two top figures in the federal racketeering trial are Ronald "Ronnie One Arm" Trucchio and John Alite. Authorities allege Trucchio is a capo in the Gambino crime family, heading a crew of soldiers who committed crimes in three states. Alite is accused of helping Trucchio plan and participating in the criminal activity. Alite, according to the indictment, used the influence of the Gambino crime family to "create and instill fears in others," including members and associates of his own crew.

DOJ_NMG_0080665

Trucchio, serving 20 years for a South Florida federal conviction, will be among the defendants to go on trial Monday. Alite is in custody in Brazil fighting extradition.

The former owner of Prestige Valet Inc., Alite is accused in court papers of extorting people who tried to compete with his company and refused to pay kickbacks.

The current president of Prestige Valet, Terry Scaglione of Tampa, is also scheduled to go on trial, also on racketeering charges. Scaglione's grandfather was Nick Scaglione, a convicted gambling racketeer who was a member of the Trafficante crime family in Tampa during the 1950s and '60s. Wanting More Money

Documents filed in the federal criminal case and the county civil case paint a picture of a violent struggle over the lucrative business of parking cars in the Tampa Bay area.

One man's struggle with organized crime is vividly described in an affidavit filed by his wife in the civil case.

In 1996, Robert Lamendola of Spring Hill was unhappy working as a plumber at Home Depot.

Thinking he could make more money for his family, he went to work for a childhood acquaintance, Alite, in the valet parking business.

Robert Lamendola became valet manager for Prestige at the Turtle Club in Clearwater.

It wasn't long before Lamendola became involved in criminal activity.

According to a federal court document, that March, Lamendola roughed up an unnamed college student who was running a sports gambling operation. He and another man, acting on orders from Alite, visited the student and took money, telling him at gunpoint he would have to pay money every week for "protection," according to a plea agreement Lamendola signed in 2002 in a deal that would put him in prison.

Lorraine Lamendola's affidavit doesn't mention her husband's crime, but gives the following account:

Robert Lamendola quickly became disenchanted with his work as a valet manager, and wanted more money. With Alite's blessing, he and his wife opened Imperial Valet in St. Petersburg in January 1997, serving mostly businesses in the Pasco County area and eventually Pinellas County. Success Brings Trouble

When Imperial Valet started getting business in Tampa, the couple's trouble with Alite began.

On instructions from Alite, Lorraine Lamendola sent the company's financial statements. In early spring 1997, Alite began demanding payments of $150 a week for each valet account. The payments lasted six or seven weeks.

After learning that Alite was in prison, Robert Lamendola met another man who said he had stronger mob ties and could help Lamendola. Feeling "empowered," Lamendola told his wife to stop sending payments to Alite.

Then the phone calls started from Alite's associates.

Robert Lamendola told his wife to send $75 a week to Louis "Duke" Mendel, president of Prestige Valet. That lasted for six to 10 weeks.

During the early summer of 1997, Robert Lamendola got into a fist fight with Mendel at Revelations, a Tampa nightclub, after Lamendola expressed interest in bidding for the club's business.

Alite then demanded copies of all of Imperial Valet's Tampa contracts. Robert Lamendola notified his Tampa clients that his company was being "muscled out of the business by the Mafia and Prestige Valet."

In 1997 and 1998, Alite would call the house and leave threatening messages on the answering machine. "I know where your kids go to school." "Listen to me and listen good. Just remember this - your [expletive] husband will be the first guy I see when I get out, and I will get out."

Alite was released from prison. The Lamendola phone started ringing. It was Alite's New Jersey cell phone number on the caller ID.

Then the doorbell rang. Robert Lamendola told his wife to look out the front window. There was a white van parked in front and a strange man inside. Lorraine Lamendola couldn't see who was at the door.

Later, they opened the door. There was a note. "Call me, John."

DOJ_NMG_0080666

"Fearful of Alite's intentions, we crawled around on the floor and closed all of the blinds and window shades, turned off all of the lights in the house, and sat in the bathroom or the center of the living area, the only areas without windows" Lorraine Lamendola said in her affidavit. "We were forced to stay inside the house for two to three days.

"When the sun went down, we did not cook, open the refrigerator, watch TV, or do anything that would alert the outside world that we were home. During this entire time, our residence phone, as well as Robert's cellular phone, repeatedly rang for hours and hours, back to back, non-stop," first from Alite's cell phone number and then from a private number.

When they looked outside, they saw a man sitting on a lawn chair across from their house. Sometimes the lawn chair was empty.

Finally, Alite called Robert Lamendola's sister, who told him the Lamendolas were in Boston for a doctor's visit. The phone stopped ringing for two days.

Robert Lamendola purchased three guns to protect himself, including a Glock. Later, the Lamendolas' son, Michael, used the Glock to kill himself.

"I believe my son committed suicide because he was traumatized by all of the phone calls and threats to the family and all the [effects] all this activity had on the family, including Robert's transformation to an abusive and violent person," Lorraine Lamendola said in her affidavit.

In 1999, Alite, Lamendola said, threatened a 19-year-old attendant for Imperial Valet at Legend's Steakhouse in Clearwater Beach.

Alite and an associate pinned the attendant against a wall with a black Lincoln Navigator and took the cash proceeds from that night's business.

Alite told the young man he was working for Alite from now on. Prestige then took over that valet account. Civil Lawsuit Draws Attention

Robert Lamendola is in federal prison in Atlanta, serving a sentence of three years and 10 months for roughing up the college student in 1996. His projected release date is next July.

Alite no longer owns Prestige, according to Michael D. LaBarbera, attorney for the valet company.

Lorraine Lamendola's affidavit was filed by the defense in a lawsuit that has drawn the attention of federal authorities. The suit was brought by Prestige against Michael D. Malatin and his company, Healthcare Parking Systems.

Prestige accused Malatin of unfair competition. Malatin formerly worked for Prestige, and the lawsuit alleges he used his contacts there to start Healthcare Parking Systems while he still worked for Prestige.

Defending the lawsuit, Malatin claimed he, too, had been threatened by Alite. In court papers, he said he recorded several conversations with Alite at the request of the FBI.

LaBarbera said the U.S. attorney's office blocked him from investigating Lamendola's claims or even interviewing Lorraine Lamendola. A federal prosecutor argued that the lawsuit was a veiled effort to gain information about the federal investigation.

LaBarbera said his entire civil case file was subpoenaed by a federal grand jury.

The attorney said he was unable to verify any of Lorraine Lamendola's claims. He said he has represented the Scaglione family for 20 years and has never seen any evidence that Terry Scaglione is involved with organized crime.

Protecting Children From Cyberspace Invaders (MH)

By Ana Veciana-suarez

The Miami Herald, October 14, 2006

The news is full of these stories lately: adult men trolling online for young victims to seduce. It's enough to scare families right out of cyberspace.

Yet, away from the headlines, do we really know how common these cases are or how much danger our children really face online? And, do tech-savvy teens understand what they're doing when they post suggestive photos on their websites and exchange provocative messages with online buddies?

Though the Mark Foley scandal has once again focused attention on adults who engage in sexual talk with children online, direct data about Internet danger to our children is hard to come by. The figures that do exist are questioned by a number of experts.

According to the only national study of its kind of children 10 to 17, about 13 percent say they have received an unwanted solicitation to engage in sexual activity or conversation in the previous year. That figure is actually lower than the 19 percent of five years earlier, in 2000.

Those being solicited were mostly teenagers, and the material was coming from both adults and other teens. In fact, solicitations from offline friends and acquaintances grew from 3 percent of all solicitations in 2000 to 14 percent in 2005.

"We think children are going to chat rooms less and talking to strangers less often," explains David Finkelhor, director of the Crimes Against Children Research Center, which conducted the survey. ``They've either gotten the message or they've had personal experiences in these chat rooms and have chosen not to visit."

The good news, however, ends there. Aggressive solicitations -- those in which solicitors try to make offline contact with the minor -- increased among girls, from 4 percent in 2000 to 7 percent in 2005. Only two youths reported actually meeting an adult in person. (Researchers conducted telephone interviews of a statistical sampling of 1,500 young people and reported a possible margin of error of 2.5 percent.)

More young Internet users (34 percent) are also seeing unwanted sexual material online than they did in 2000 (25 percent), despite increased use of filtering, blocking and monitoring software.

Though "one case is one too many," activist Ernie Allen believes ``there is some cause for optimism. I think this is a positive indication that pounding these alerts into the heads of youth and parents is working."

Nonetheless, Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, and other adults who anecdotally track online predators believe these figures don't tell the whole story. "Overwhelmingly," Allen adds, ``kids don't report when something happens to them. They shrug it off."

Xavier Von Erck, founder of Perverted-Justice.com, agrees. Most kids he talks to are either too embarrassed to say they've been solicited or fearful that their computer privileges will be taken away by panicked parents if they sound the alert. What's more, he believes, from his own experience online, that sexual solicitation of minors is relatively common.

"Any chat room we go onto, whether it's on Yahoo, AOL, Teenspot, MySpace, there's never a time we're not solicited," he adds. ``It is bad out there."

Parry Aftab, executive of WiredSafety.org, has had similar experiences. "I talk to 5,000 kids a month and almost all of them have received some kind of inappropriate communication," Aftab said. ``And it's getting worse because of the social networking sites."

CLOAK OF ANONYMITY

While the figures may be in question, experts do agree on one thing: The Internet has made sexual solicitation of minors easier and has allowed men who might not have otherwise acted on their impulses to do so under the cloak of anonymity.

"The Internet is a wonderful thing, but it's both a blessing and a curse," says Allen. ``In the physical world, if you're 40 years old and you want some kind of access, you have to directly approach the child, and then it's tougher to break down inhibitions. The Internet has provided a venue, a way for a lot of these people who have the interest or inclination to do what they want to do without directly risking the social stigma."

It is the same kind of anonymity that allows the predator to disguise not only his own identity but his intentions during the initial contacts, or at least until he has befriended the minor by showing interest and offering a sympathetic virtual ear. This kind of "grooming," says Aftab and others, is found in the released Foley messages as well as exchanges by other men.

"A lot of people will cross the line -- or at least put out feelers -- on the Internet that they wouldn't do in person," Aftab adds.

Most of those arrested are men with no criminal records, people who don't fit society's stereotype of a criminal. Many are middle- and upper middle-class men with respectable jobs and families, says Von Erck. "You can have the short, balding guy with glasses but also the tall good-looking guy," he adds. `There's no real profile."

Law enforcement officials, both nationally and locally, are focusing more resources on investigating computer-related child exploitation.

DOJ_NMG_0080668

FBI GOES ONLINE

About 18 months ago, the FBI's Miami division launched a separate Crimes Against Children Squad. The squad includes about 10 undercover investigators who mostly work online. Other local agencies, such as police departments and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, often assist.

Since the squad began, FBI agents have arrested or identified 82 suspects for a range of sex crimes against children, said Judy Orihuela, the FBI's Miami spokeswoman. A breakdown of which crimes involved an online component was not available.

The squad, which serves the Keys through Palm Beach County, also works with public schools to teach children how to stay safe. But police, like other experts, say it's ultimately up to the parents.

"We don't advocate for parents to try to keep their kids offline," said Supervisory Special Agent Terri Patterson. ``That's unhealthy. The kids have to spend time online. Their parents just have to monitor it."

These education campaigns, as well as very public arrests of men who solicit children online, have made parents and youth more aware of the dangers. Perverted Justice, an organization dedicated to outing online predators by using decoys, has teamed up with NBC's Dateline program to lure adult men who expect to rendezvous with a young sex partner. Instead, the men are met by TV cameras and, in some cases, by police.

These shows, however, may not fully address the danger a teen can find online. Reality is, many of the unsolicited comments and solicitations are actually coming from people the children have already met offline.

In the Crimes Against Children's Research Center's study, acquaintances -- mostly other teenagers -- played a growing role in many of the unwanted solicitations and in online harassment. (The study defines harassment as threats or other offensive behavior sent online to the youth or posted online about the youth for others to see.) In fact, 44 percent of online harassers were offline acquaintances, mostly peers, in 2005, compared with 28 percent five years earlier. Unwanted sexual solicitations from acquaintances were also up.

This has lead researchers to suggest that educational efforts include talks about the danger posed from acquaintances. "It's a mistaken idea for parents to think this is only stranger danger," says Finkelhor.

What's more, some youths are using their own sexuality and Internet knowledge to post provocative come-ons in chat rooms and message boards. Critics of social networking sites complain that there is little monitoring and few safeguards to protect young users. In response, MySpace and other sites have launched public service campaigns to promote safety, but it's not uncommon for teens to fib about their age.

A cursory look at online message boards also reveals teenagers posting suggestive invitations, including some with very graphic descriptions.

"It's a good idea for parents to have a frank conversation with their children," Finkelhor says. `At the same time we have to realize that the real danger comes in the way kids think and feel that they're having an adventure by participating in some kind of exchange. They don't think anything can happen to them."

Miami Herald staff writer Steve Rothaus contributed to this report.

Rape Accusation Has Ruined Lives, Students Say (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

In their first news interviews, three former Duke University students told the CBS News program “60 Minutes” that they were falsely accused of raping a woman hired to dance at a lacrosse team party last March.

One of the men has graduated from Duke, while the other two, who were sophomores, have been suspended from the university pending the outcome of the case, they said on the program, which was shown yesterday. They are free on $100,000 bail while awaiting a trial expected to start next spring.

“This woman has destroyed everything I worked for in my life,” said the student who graduated, David F. Evans, 23, of Annapolis, Md. “And, worst of all, she’s split apart a community and a nation on facts that just didn’t happen and a lie that should have never been told.”

DOJ_NMG_0080669

Also appearing on the show was James E. Coleman Jr., a professor at Duke's law school who criticized the prosecutor in the case and accused him of misconduct. Mr. Coleman, who led a university review of the men's lacrosse program after the party, said of Michael B. Nifong, the Durham County district attorney, "I think in this case, it appears that this prosecutor has set out to develop whatever evidence he could to convict people he already concluded were guilty."

In June, Mr. Coleman said Mr. Nifong should ask the state attorney general to appoint a special prosecutor and remove himself from the case. Mr. Coleman said Mr. Nifong "pandered to the community" and set up an improper photo lineup to identify suspects.

In a telephone interview last night, Mr. Coleman said, "He has forgotten about his obligation to protect the innocent, and in my view, that's prosecutorial misconduct."

Mr. Nifong did not return telephone calls and e-mail messages yesterday. The accuser, a student at North Carolina Central University, could not be contacted.

Mr. Nifong has said that he, the police and the woman are determined to take the case to trial despite a tide of criticism. Mr. Nifong has said that there is medical evidence of rape and that the woman made valid identifications of the suspects, both points challenged by "60 Minutes" after what the show said was a review of nearly the entire case file.

Mr. Evans, the team captain, told "60 Minutes" that he regretted his decision to give a party with alcohol and hire strippers.

"I was naïve, I was young, I was sheltered," he said. "And I made a terrible judgment. In five months I've learned more than I did in 22 years about life."

One of the suspended students, Reade W. Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., said the police had never interviewed him about the case. He also said the district attorney did not want to see evidence proving he left the event shortly after the dancing stopped and before the alleged rape could have occurred.

The other suspended student, Collin Finnerty, 20, of Garden City, N.Y., said he also had evidence showing he left the party early, but did not want to reveal it before trial. He said he left the party after the women stopped dancing and never saw them again.

For Violent And Lost Boys, Crime Stories Offer Hope (NYT)

By Dinitia Smith

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla. — On a recent weekday afternoon, Dennis Lehane, the best-selling crime writer, stood in front of 17 imprisoned teenagers, trying to establish his street credentials. He grew up in a violent neighborhood, he told them, Dorchester, in Boston. "One or two made it out of my neighborhood," he said. "Sixteen other guys went down."

Mr. Lehane was on a tour to publicize his new story collection, "Coronado" (HarperCollins), and had made an unusual stop: at the Youthful Offender Program at the Orange County Jail here. The participants had been reading "Coronado" as part of a class called, in an effort to use language familiar to teenagers, "Literature n' Living."

Most of the boys, who are 14 to 17, had been accused of crimes so serious that they were being tried as adults. Some were awaiting trial, others serving sentences of less than a year. Many of the characters in "Coronado," are, like the prisoners, young, lost and violent, and the book had been assigned to them by John Richter, the program's coordinator, in an effort to get them to read — anything.

Mr. Richter had tested the boys to make sure they understood the book, and had them write reports, which they were now delivering to Mr. Lehane, whose 2001 novel, "Mystic River," was made into a movie by Clint Eastwood. In addition to meeting Mr. Lehane, the boys would get another prize: a contact visit with their families (most visits at the jail are conducted by video screen), plus a real dinner: fried chicken, pizza, submarine sandwiches, collard greens.

Brian Mitchell, 17, accused of hiring a hit man to kill a witness in a murder case, focused his book report on a searing story called "Until Gwen." After serving his sentence, a young man is picked up from prison by his father in a stolen truck, with a prostitute in the back. The father wants his son to reveal the whereabouts of a stolen jewel. The story reaches a violent climax and contains a terrible revelation: "He got mean, told you you aren't his anyway, some whore's kid he found in a barrel, decided might come in useful on a missing-baby scam they were running back then."

Brian, an aloof, self-contained boy, read from his report in an assured voice: "I was able to relate this story to many aspects of my own life. I also grew up different from most people, isolated because of my physical handicap." When he was an infant both of his legs were amputated at the knee because of a birth defect.

After the reports were read, there were questions. Dexter Johnson, 17, charged with shooting a man and robbing him of his cellphone, read a question written in advance: "What's helped you drive through the obstacles in your life to achieve your ambition?" he asked, reading intently, his voice halting.

Mr. Lehane was succinct: "No. 1, my parents," he replied. "No. 2, just seeing the waste around me."

In one of the book's stories, "Gone Down to Corpus," the narrator's father is a depressed drunk who sits on his front porch weeping. The boy goes with a group of friends to the house of a rich family, intending to trash it. The story ends with him on a bed with a girl and a gun at his side, waiting for the family to return. "I wonder what I'll do," the character muses. "Make that pudgy man draw. I don't know. I know that at the moment I hate the pudgy man." Tyler Kucera, 16, charged with robbing a man and threatening to blow his leg off with a shotgun, asked Mr. Lehane in a shy voice, strangled in back of his throat, "What happened when the residents of the house came home?"

But Mr. Lehane had ended on that question, and he refused to say what happened.

When Mr. Richter first arrived at the unit in 1992, the youths were fighting among themselves and refusing to attend the jail's high school program. "A lot of them didn't know how to read," he said. They were ashamed, he said, and school was their nemesis, the symbol of all their failures.

Before being imprisoned, he said, more than half the boys had dropped out, been expelled or suspended from their regular schools.

"In order for them to learn to read you have to get them to focus on a piece of writing so they will struggle through it with a teacher," Mr. Richter said. " You have to be motivated," he said. "You can't use 'Dick and Jane.' " He tried a production of "Julius Caesar" with a gang theme, and got only so-so results. Around 1995 he found a book he thought might interest the boys, Walter Mosley's "Devil in a Blue Dress." "It was relatively easy to read, and you have black characters," he said. Most of the prisoners are black or Hispanic. The book worked, and so did the incentives of contact visits with families. "Literature n' Living " was born.

Mr. Richter began sending copies of the teenagers' book reports and photographs of classes to authors, hoping to entice them to visit the jail. Ernest J. Gaines was the first author to come, in 2001, after the group read "A Lesson Before Dying" (Random House), about a black youth sentenced to death. He has visited twice. Brian Jacques, author of the "Redwall" series, about mice who fight off evil rats, foxes and other predators, has also visited twice, on a book tour for his publisher, Penguin, from England. "They'd say, 'Why am I reading about mice?' " Mr. Richter remembered. "I'd say, 'Shuddup and read the book.' Now they love 'em." So far, 12 authors have visited.

Mr. Richter, 56, who has been working in prisons for 33 years, has no statistics testifying to the program's success or its effect on recidivism rates. But, he said: "When we first began there were lots of incidents of violence. It was nothing for somebody to walk into that unit and see three or four kids waiting in shackles to be put in disciplinary lockdown." Nowadays, he said, "we have very few incidents of violence. We may have a fight once every three months."

For Tyler, charged with armed robbery, the program, "brings you into a whole new life for a brief period. Whatever you're facing here, you can put it aside."

The boys stay at the jail for an average of four to eight months. Eighty-five percent are convicted and go to adult prisons where there are few programs like this. What's the point of offering them this brief look at literature? "If there is a salvageable lot, it's these kids," Mr. Richter said. "You can see it after they've been here a while. Their eyes grow a little less hard. They begin to believe there is hope for them."

"They realize they don't have to be dirtbags," he said, "though they might think they have to be."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Deaf Advocate Blasts Arrests (WP)

By Daniel De Vise, Washington Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0080671

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Protests Continue Against Incoming Gallaudet President

The president of the National Association of the Deaf weighed in yesterday on what she called the "totally unnecessary" arrests Friday night of 133 protesters at Gallaudet University in a dispute with campus administrators, and urged the board of trustees to take command of a situation that "is out of control."

Bobbie Beth Scoggins, head of the advocacy group, arrived at the Washington campus yesterday afternoon to cheers from scores of students and alumni, who have taken shifts occupying tents around the campus entrance for the past week. They shut down the campus for three days to protest the selection of former university provost Jane K. Fernandes as the school's next president.

Scoggins's appearance underscored the impact of the confrontation in the international deaf community. She said sympathizers around the world had erected more than 70 "tent cities" in solidarity with the Gallaudet protesters, four of whom launched a hunger strike at the start of the weekend.

"The whole world is with these people here," said Scoggins. "The administration claims this is a local issue. It is not."

Scoggins, who cut short a vacation in Mexico when she learned of the arrests, continued: "The arrests never should have happened. We had other options."

Fernandes said yesterday via e-mail that the arrests, "painful as they were," were necessary to regain control of the campus, which serves the local deaf community well beyond the parameters of university education.

"The first priority and focus must be that we must re-open our campus so that our children -- infants, toddlers, elementary schoolers, high schoolers and college students -- can continue learning and not fall behind their peers," she wrote.

In an e-mail sent to the campus yesterday, Gallaudet President I. King Jordan defended the arrests and said they resulted from "a complete lack of good faith" on the part of the protesters.

"You have been heard by me. You have been heard by the Board," Jordan wrote. "We have heard you from the beginning of your protest. We have considered and discussed your points of view. We just haven't agreed with you. And we still don't."

Board Chairman Brenda Jo Brueggemann said in an e-mail that her panel had not intervened because it is charged with policy and oversight at Gallaudet, not "the management of its daily matters."

Gallaudet, which had nearly 2,000 students enrolled last year, is the only university for deaf students in the country.

In a letter to the Gallaudet board, leaders of the National Association of the Deaf said the administration had lost control and should be relieved of command over the protest. Board members, the letter stated, "must waste no further time in stepping up to their fiduciary responsibilities and removing the administration's involvement in resolution of this crisis."

The letter cited the arrests as evidence of a "growing chasm between the university administration and the students, faculty, staff and alumni" and faulted university leaders for a lack of "trust and leadership."

Scoggins reiterated that message. "I see very little support for the administration," she said, surveying the crowd behind her. "I see very little."

Administrators had the protesters arrested Friday to end the campus shutdown. Students had been warned repeatedly that they could be arrested if they did not stop blocking the school's entrance. Nearly 1,000 protesters turned out Saturday, galvanized by the arrests.

Protests against Fernandes began with the announcement in May that she would replace Jordan as president in January. Jordan, who became the first deaf president of Gallaudet in 1988, has long been a hero in the deaf community. But his decision to arrest protesters Friday made him a traitor in the minds of some.

"We no longer recognize King Jordan as university president," LaToya Plummer, a Gallaudet junior who was among those arrested, said at a news conference yesterday afternoon. A student perched on the campus wall relayed her signs to the protesters beyond.

"We're looking at the last straw here," said Lois Bragg, vice chair of the faculty senate. "The problems are intense. They have been deep for a long time. The board of trustees is asleep."

Gallaudet faculty planned to meet today to consider several resolutions, Bragg said, including a call for Fernandes to resign and possible confidence votes in the board and Jordan.

The protesters, which include large numbers of alumni and university employees as well as students, say they oppose the incoming president's leadership style and the process that led to her appointment. Fernandes has said she believes the dispute is about identity politics within the deaf community, which is struggling to synthesize technology-driven shifts in what it means to be deaf.

Fernandes angered protesters with a letter to The Washington Post, published Saturday, that suggested she was under attack by deaf-culture preservationists who view her as a threat. Fernandes learned to sign at 23 and embraces, in her words, "many ways of being deaf."

Protesters yesterday accused Fernandes of playing "the deaf card" and said the incoming president was trying to create a false impression that students deem her, in the words of Professor Dirksen Bauman, "not deaf enough."

Home-Business Application Stirs Tensions In Manassas (WP)

By Nick Miroff

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

In the past three years, the Manassas City Council has received two applications for home-based massage therapy businesses, and members have approved both. Then Howard Daniel, who is gay, applied.

The backlash against Daniel's request began last month when nearly two dozen people, many of them members of a local church, spoke in opposition to it at a public hearing. When it came time for the city to decide on Daniel's application the next week, council members balked and voted instead to consider changing the city's zoning laws.

The city's response and the community opposition have blindsided Daniel and his supporters, one of whom had an anti-gay message written on his car.

"This should have been a business issue, and somehow it has become political," said Daniel, 44. "Why?"

Richard Devine, Daniel's partner of 22 years, sees the dispute in less uncertain terms. "I think it's obvious what's going on here," he said. "It walks like a duck."

Questions of discrimination are already sensitive in Manassas, which is currently under federal investigation for housing policies that allegedly target Hispanic residents, a violation of the Fair Housing Act. Now the city is again facing a land-use decision loaded with political overtones. At least one council member, Andrew L. Harrover (R), said he has received threats that Daniel's home will be picketed if the council approves his application.

"It's going to be terribly challenging for me" to decide, said Harrover, who lives around the corner from Daniel. His wife has signed the petition in support of Daniel's application, but Harrover said he is opposed to home businesses that bring more traffic to residential neighborhoods.

The vast majority of those who have mobilized against Daniel's application do not live on his street or even in his neighborhood. Many are affiliated with Manassas's All Saints Catholic Church, though there is no indication they have organized their opposition through the church.

"This isn't a Catholic thing; it's a city thing," said Amy Bookwalter, who has spoken out against Daniel's application. "This is about keeping a residential area a residential area."

Those claims are growing increasingly hard for Daniel and his supporters to believe. Just one year earlier, they noted, another massage therapist in Manassas applied for a permit, and not one resident voiced opposition. "No one has officially come and said it yet," Daniel said, "but why are all these people concerned about traffic on a street they don't live on?"

Daniel and Devine have lived for 10 years in their Cape Cod-style home on West Street, three blocks from the city's commercial district, in a neighborhood with towering maple trees and an eclectic mix of red-brick single-family homes and Colonials.

A former Marine Corps reservist, Daniel works full time as a database administrator and treats patients on a part-time basis at the local hospital and in their homes. Daniel said he was encouraged to apply for the permit by the city planning office because his proposed client load was a fraction of that of similar businesses already approved by the council.

Daniel then spent more than $800 preparing his application: providing blueprints, inspectors' signatures, a business plan, a petition signed by all of his immediate neighbors supporting his application and a copy of his certification from the Virginia Board of Nursing. Appointments would be scheduled to minimize neighborhood impact, and clients would park in his driveway. On Aug. 16, the planning commission approved Daniel's application and recommended its approval by the council.

DOJ_NMG_0080673

Then came the public hearing Sept. 18. Four of Daniel's neighbors spoke on his behalf. A long line of opponents followed.

"And you know what?" said Michael Hudson, Daniel's neighbor. "I started to look at these people, and I realized I didn't know any of them."

Of the 21 residents who publicly opposed Daniel's application, two live on West Street. Many said they were against home businesses on principle, and others expressed concerns about the preservation of "a family-friendly atmosphere" in Old Town, the presence of "unknown" people in the neighborhood and the unfair "competitive advantage" that Daniel could gain by working out of his home.

After the public hearing, Devine approached Daniel's opponents in the parking lot. "I went up to them and said I wanted to understand," he recalled. " 'I don't know who you are or where you live.' And the first person to speak said, 'It's not about your lifestyle.' "

Devine was stunned. "How do people from a different neighborhood know about our lifestyle?" he asked.

The next week, when council member J. Steven Randolph (I) introduced a motion to approve Daniel's application, no one seconded it.

Daniel's application hadn't actually been rejected, because no member was willing to introduce a motion to do so. That led to a 45-minute freewheeling discourse on the city's special-use-permit code, with council members ultimately voting to refer the issue to its Land Use Committee for further study -- leaving Daniel in the lurch. That same night, someone scrawled anti-gay graffiti on the car window of one of Daniel's supportive neighbors, escalating tensions further.

If the council votes on Daniel's application at next Monday's meeting, at least three of the council's six members said they are likely to vote against it. One is Jackson H. Miller, the Republican candidate for the 50th District of the House of Delegates, who introduced the motion to approve another massage therapy business a year earlier.

"I've had a mixed record on home businesses," Miller said. "I'm opposed if neighbors are opposed. That's been my standard," he said, noting that he voted with the council earlier this year to reject an application for a home-based optometry clinic.

But that standard seems like an arbitrary one to Daniel. "If they would have told me from the very beginning, 'We do not allow this,' it would have been fine with me," he said. "I would have never started the process."

ANTITRUST:

Consumer Advocates Criticize AT& T Deal (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, October 16, 2006

Consumer advocates say the new concessions AT&T has offered to close its $80 billion merger with BellSouth don't go far enough to preserve competition.

“They're a step in the right direction, but they don't resolve the most important competitive problems,” says Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union.

He also said AT&T's offer smacks of desperation to win approval.

At the urging of its two Democratic commissioners, the Federal Communications Commission postponed Friday's scheduled vote on the merger until Nov. 3 to allow time for the public to comment on proposed concessions that AT&T filed Friday. The four commissioners available to vote on the merger are split 2-2 along party lines.

AT&T's offer, an attempt to break the stalemate, includes a $10-a-month DSL broadband service for new customers for 30 months. The company also said it would also offer free DSL modems for new broadband subscribers next year.

AT&T's proposal followed a flurry of late-night negotiations Thursday with the FCC's two Democratic commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein. Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has recommended the merger's approval with no conditions. Democratic commissioners Friday indicated AT&T's offer represented progress.

DOJ_NMG_0080674

The Justice Department last week cleared the deal with no conditions or divestitures, enraging Democrats, who vowed to press for significant requirements.

The largest-ever telecom deal would forge a giant with 67 million phone lines and 57 million customers of Cingular Wireless, now jointly owned by AT&T and BellSouth. Consumers Union and others say the behemoth could crush rivals, and the deal means AT&T and BellSouth won't compete with each other. AT&T has said it faces new competition from cable companies.

AT&T also proposed to:

•Provide DSL in 85% of the combined company's 22-state region within two years and offer broadband service through satellite or wireless providers to all the rest.

•Freeze wholesale rates the companies charge rivals to lease their networks for business service. Rivals want lower rates or arbitration to settle pricing disputes.

•Assure it won't block consumers' access to any website. Websites such as Google want to prevent AT&T from offering faster downloads only to those sites that pay higher fees.

•Conduct wireless broadband trials using BellSouth spectrum that is not being used now. The Democrats and consumer advocates want the new company to sell the airwaves to a rival that would challenge the new giant.

Jonathan Lee of Comptel, which represents AT&T rivals, called the proposals "completely inadequate."

AT&T's Michael Balmoris says, "The companies are offering a number of pro-consumer conditions."

Oshkosh Truck Agrees To JLG Industries Pact (WSJ)

By Ilan Brat And Joseph T. Hallinan

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

Oshkosh Truck Corp. said it will acquire JLG Industries Inc. for about $3 billion, positioning the Oshkosh, Wis., maker of fire, military, concrete and garbage trucks to take better advantage of the global boom in nonresidential construction.

JLG, of McConnellsburg, Pa., makes aerial-work platforms, booms and related equipment that can lift people and heavy materials several stories. The all-cash deal at $28 per JLG share will create a company with 13,000 employees and $6 billion in annual revenue. Oshkosh will assume about $200 million in debt. Shares of JLG ended unchanged Friday at $20.75 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

While housing construction in the U.S. has slowed, construction of office buildings, warehouses, multistory parking lots and other nonresidential construction has been strong as companies spend cash on expanding factories and offices while interests rates are near historical lows.

The purchase of JLG, which Oshkosh expects to complete in the next 90 days, will be the company's 15th acquisition since 1996. "We respect the companies, we respect their culture, and then we grow the heck out of them," Oshkosh Chairman, President and Chief Executive Robert Bohn said in an interview. Charles Szews, the company's chief financial officer, said, "We're going to have scale that we've never enjoyed."

Bill Lasky, JLG chairman, president and CEO, said the acquisition is a "great combination of two great companies."

The purchase offers a chance for Oshkosh to balance the cyclicality of its current businesses. Over the past 15 years, generally defense spending has been stronger when nonresidential construction has been weaker, said Patrick Davidson, vice president of investor relations.

JLG's expertise at lifting and moving people and materials could help make Oshkosh's fire trucks with ladders lift firefighters more quickly and safely, said Mr. Davidson. More broadly, Oshkosh officials said the deal would give it greater global purchasing power and help to hold down costs of raw materials and parts. After the acquisition, Oshkosh will spend about $1 billion a year on steel. Oshkosh trucks and JLG telehandlers -- which can lift loads such as bricks 30 to 40 feet in the air -- and aerial platforms have similar engines, transmissions, axles and tires, Mr. Bohn said.

Oshkosh reaped the benefits of big increases in defense spending following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the launch of the Iraq war. The company makes a variety of heavy, severe-duty trucks that haul tanks, missile systems, ammunitions, fuel and cargo for combat units. Analyst Robert F. McCarthy of Robert W. Baird & Co. Inc., who has the company rated

DOJ_NMG_0080675

"outperform," said in a note to investors last week that Oshkosh had targeted "several opportunities" for its Bushmaster, a mine-blast-resistant armored truck.

Oshkosh's stock has more than quintupled since 2001. Friday, its shares ended at $55.54 in NYSE composite trading.

Oshkosh reported net income of $160.2 million on revenue of $2.96 billion for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30, 2005, while JLG reported net income of $149.3 million on net sales of $2.27 billion for the fiscal year ended July 31.

The acquisition is the latest step in the turnaround of Oshkosh. A decade ago, the company reported an operating loss of $3.1 million, thanks in part to a decline in U.S. defense spending with the end of the Cold War, Mr. Szews said in an interview.

The company replaced much of its top management and decided to shed underperforming businesses. Through acquisitions, Oshkosh began to reposition itself so it wouldn't be so closely tied to defense spending. In 1996 Oshkosh purchased Pierce Manufacturing Inc., a maker of fire trucks. Pierce is expected to contribute about 25% to 30% of Oshkosh's projected $3.4 billion in revenue this year, Mr. Davidson said.

JLG's stock has also enjoyed a strong run, more than quadrupling in the past three years before falling off earlier this year. At a recent investor meeting, the company indicated that it expected to increase revenue to $4 billion by 2011, and that it anticipated growth in Europe from both its own products and those generated by a recent alliance with Caterpillar Inc. Last year, JLG entered into a 20-year strategic alliance with Caterpillar related to the design, manufacture and sale of Caterpillar-branded telehandlers.

Write to Ilan Brat at ilan.brat@wsj.com1 and Joseph T. Hallinan at joe.hallinan@wsj.com2

VW Would Back MAN's Scania Bid With Restrictions (WSJ)

By Christoph Rauwald

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

German car maker Volkswagen AG said it would support MAN AG's attempt to acquire Scania AB for 95.89 billion kronor ($12.93 billion) if the German truck maker manages to acquire shares representing slightly more than 56% voting rights in its Swedish rival.

Volkswagen, Europe's biggest auto maker by sales and the biggest single shareholder in both MAN and Scania, said it would offer its shares -- representing 34% of Scania's voting rights and 18.7% of its equity -- to MAN in that case. Volkswagen said MAN must also win shares representing at least 71.31% of Scania's capital.

Volkswagen's supervisory board, the equivalent of a U.S. board of directors, "is convinced that a solution acceptable to all sides remains the preferred outcome," the company said in a statement following an extraordinary meeting yesterday. Volkswagen added it won't support a counterbid by Scania for MAN at the present time.

MAN said it welcomes "Volkswagen AG's continued support for its concept to combine MAN and Scania AB and its willingness to tender its shares into a successful merger."

Scania and Swedish investment company Investor AB, which owns a significant stake in Scania, have rejected the most recent bid, saying it still "significantly undervalues" the company's prospects. Investor said yesterday it still won't rule out a counterbid by Scania. Scania couldn't be reached.

MAN on Thursday raised its offer for Scania to about 475 kronor a share in cash and stock from about 449 kronor and said it holds 14.27% of the voting share capital in its Swedish rival as pressure to create Europe's biggest-selling truck maker increased. Under Swedish takeover law, its offer for the company is raised to the highest price it has paid for Scania shares.

The move came as a surprise after Volkswagen had rejected MAN's first offer made last month and announced a few days later that it acquired a 15.06% stake in the Munich company to "secure its strategic interest."

Write to Christoph Rauwald at christoph.rauwald@dowjones.com1

ENVIRONMENT:

U.S. Electricity Demand Is Outpacing New Resources, Report Warns (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

DOJ_NMG_0080676

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

A report by the North American Electric Reliability Council warns demand for electricity is increasing three times as fast as resources are being added in the U.S., a trend that could shake electric-system reliability in the coming decade.

In its first report since the organization's duties were expanded by Congress, the grid organization, known as NERC, said U.S. demand will increase by about 20% from 2006 to 2015, outstripping investment in new electrical supply. The pace of growth in Canada, while slower, also is cause for concern.

NERC counts 67,000 megawatts of resources in the works in the U.S. versus 141,000 megawatts of expected demand growth by 2015, leaving a shortfall of about 81,000 megawatts, an amount equivalent to 160 large power plants. One megawatt can power 500 to 1,000 homes.

Increasingly, it is left to a deregulated market to determine whether and when new resources get built. Available resources are expected to fall below safe levels in many parts of the U.S. and Canada, such as New England, the Rocky Mountain region and Texas, in the next two to three years.

As the system drifts closer to its physical limits, it is even more important that energy regulators and utilities promote conservation and use of the most energy-efficient equipment, said Rick Sergel, chief executive of the grid reliability organization. He added conservation programs will need to at least double their reach and effectiveness to help close the gap between supply and demand.

The report said 50,000 megawatts of generating plants are poorly utilized -- either aged units taken out of service or newer plants that have been unable to line up contracts, making them nearly useless.

"We've got a problem," Mr. Sergel said. "We can't continue this 'just-in-time' planning much longer. It works in manufacturing but it does not work in the power sector."

Mr. Sergel said NERC, a nonprofit industry organization with some powers granted by Congress, is pushing for more-comprehensive resource planning and it is attacking tools that it considers flawed.

For example, grid officials create annual forecasts that are built around "normal weather" patterns. Mr. Sergel said warmer winters and hotter summers are challenging conventional notions of normalcy. This past summer, consumer demand set records in most parts of the U.S., reaching levels not expected for several years and worrying grid officials. The increase came on top of unusual demand during the summer of 2005 that was 6% higher than in 2004, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

NERC intends to develop tools to determine "normal weather" for the eight regional reliability organizations that report to NERC to use when creating their forecasts. Where available resources are thinning, NERC may push state utility regulators to do more to promote investment. If investment isn't sufficient, the federal government could exercise new powers, conferred in the 2005 Energy Policy Act, to site major transmission projects.

Write to Rebecca Smith at rebecca.smith@wsj.com1

Consumers Less Power To The People (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

America is facing a crisis when it comes to electricity. But also a tremendous opportunity.

The forces that put us here look grim. Energy prices are high, supplies are increasingly tight, and anxiety is growing about climate change. But that dark outlook is driving consumers, utilities and public officials to finally take advantage of innovations that could radically reshape the nation's power consumption without lowering the standard of living.

THE JOURNAL REPORT

An influx of hedge funds2 is making energy markets more volatile than ever. And, it's in ethanol, where companies, private-equity firms and hedge funds see enormous opportunities3. • See the complete Energy4 report.

Some are technological fixes, from more-efficient light bulbs to variable-speed motors that use less energy when the load on them isn't as heavy. Others involve public policy. States are rewriting their building codes with an eye on conservation, and

DOJ_NMG_0080677

Washington is trying to lay down efficiency standards for more household appliances and electronic goods. Utilities are joining the effort as well, offering consumers rebates for buying efficient appliances and urging customers to use electricity more wisely.

The good news is, "we haven't found a major use of electricity for which there aren't great opportunities for savings," says David B. Goldstein, director of energy programs at the Natural Resources Defense Council and a recipient of a MacArthur Foundation award for his work on appliance-efficiency standards.

Of course, we've all heard revolutionary promises like these before. But the promises seem to fade as each crisis recedes. So what makes this time different? Forces are converging to make the prospect of big change much more achievable.

Most urgent, of course, is the skyrocketing demand for electricity -- and the tightening supply. Many parts of the country set new records for electricity use in July and August, which sent a warning signal to officials that they have little time to act. Conservation seems a much more feasible solution than quickly building dozens of new power plants to add generating capacity -- especially if reducing emissions is a goal. The fact that the nation's energy bill totaled $296 billion last year, up nearly 50% from 1993, also provides impetus.

We've also gotten smarter about saving energy. New technology makes it possible to build more-efficient hardware without breaking the bank. And public officials now have much better data to draw on when they plan conservation efforts. They know what's worked in the past and can build on that success.

BUILDING MORE PLANTS

5

PODCAST:6 Advances in energy efficiency won't be able to answer all the needs of a growing economy and population. WSJ's Rebecca Smith discusses the main sources of electricity in the U.S. and how the mix is changing. Listen Now7

Some experts expect a transformation more profound than any since the 1973-74 Arab oil embargo. As a result of that six-month crisis, U.S. electric utilities largely weaned themselves off oil and shifted to coal and nuclear fuel for their power plants. The federal government set efficiency standards for automobiles and appliances, and building codes were revised. But much is left to be done. After all, 80% of U.S. buildings were built before 1980.

At the very least, the current push should produce considerable savings for consumers and unmistakable environmental benefits. "If you consume a lot less energy, it solves a lot of other problems," says Peter Darbee, chief executive of PG&E Corp., the San Francisco utility that serves one in 20 Americans.

Indeed, James E. Rogers Jr., chief executive of Duke Energy Corp. and president of the utility industry's leading trade group, the Edison Electric Institute, calls energy efficiency the "fifth fuel." By that he means that it's an alternative to coal, natural gas, hydropower and nuclear fuel.

Here's a look at 10 innovations capable of making a big difference immediately and in coming years:

1) LET THE LIGHT SHINE

Lighting was the first market for electricity, and it's still one of the costliest. But because lighting is ubiquitous, it tends to get less attention than other big power burners like air conditioners. And that means some tremendous improvements in lighting have gotten overlooked.

Technology has improved conventional lighting systems, making them much more efficient. Take compact fluorescent bulbs, which have bases so small they can fit inside a standard screw socket. These bulbs can often cut lighting costs by 75%, and they last at least eight times as long as regular incandescent bulbs. Many even offer a soft white light that mimics incandescent light.

The bulbs are readily available in stores, and prices have dropped substantially recently. Sales volume has increased, and many utilities are offering rebates that cut the cost of 24-watt fluorescent bulbs that produce as much light as 100-watt incandescent bulbs to $1 or $2 apiece.

If each U.S. household replaced one regular bulb with a compact fluorescent, according to the Environmental Protection Agency, consumers would collectively save more than $600 million a year. The energy saved, meanwhile, would be enough to light seven million homes, and the greenhouse-gas reductions from power plants would be equivalent to taking one million cars off the road.

DOJ_NMG_0080678

Then there's LED, or light-emitting-diode, technology, which is based on semiconductors. This method already has slashed power use dramatically for many cities as a replacement for conventional traffic lights. Typically, an 11-watt LED unit in a traffic light replaces a 140-watt incandescent unit, producing a 92% energy saving.

Now LEDs are poised to sweep into more industrial applications, such as supermarket refrigeration cases. For now, white LED light is more difficult to make, and thus far more costly, than colored LEDs. But lighting experts say they expect the price to drop enough in the next couple of years to permit broader use of white LEDs.

Meanwhile, a host of new methods are being adopted by consumers and companies, such as systems that "harvest" daylight, concentrating it and shooting it indoors so that buildings don't need to use as much artificial light. Nature's Lighting, of Park City, Utah, manufactures solar dishes, lined with mirrors, that sit on flat roofs and project sunlight through skylights into buildings. Diffusers distribute the bright light.

Mike Basch, a founder of Federal Express who's now chief executive of Nature's Lighting, says warehouses, auto makers and big-box retailers have been especially keen on the systems, which employees like because of the full-spectrum light.

At Wal-Mart Stores Inc., electricity is the leading expense after labor costs, exceeding $1 billion a year. So the retailer has been perfecting harvesting techniques to channel daylight into stores through prismatic skylights that concentrate the light without radiating heat. Sensors automatically adjust the store's fluorescent lights up and down in response to the amount of natural illumination available.

Wal-Mart now uses the system at nearly all of its stores, representing 330 million square feet of floor space. The systems cost about $200,000 per location and pay for themselves in two to three years through reduced electricity and cooling costs. "It's a pretty sophisticated setup," says Charles Zimmerman, Wal-Mart's vice president in charge of the initiative, who adds that Wal-Mart will gladly share its equipment specifications with anyone who wants them.

2) MORE-EFFICIENT HARDWARE

The past few years have seen tremendous advances in the energy efficiency of hardware. For instance, new developments in industrial motors promise huge savings for businesses. Currently, the motors represent 67% of industrial energy use, according to Clark Gellings, vice president of innovation at the Electric Power Research Institute in Palo Alto, Calif. But older motors waste lots of power because they constantly switch on and off.

Now many companies are turning to variable-frequency drives. Instead of constantly turning on and off, the drives "let motors change speed in response to the load on them," says Mr. Gellings.

MGM Mirage, the big casino and hotel operator, is installing 22 of the new variable-speed drives on refrigeration units at its Las Vegas properties. The $4 million retrofit will pay for itself through reduced energy costs in about 2½ years and thereafter will save the company about $1.6 million a year.

Big gains also are being realized in air conditioning. New federal efficiency standards took effect in January for central air-conditioning units used by homes and businesses; the least-efficient units sold must be at least 30% more efficient than last year's least-efficient models. In industry parlance, that's a 13 SEER, short for seasonal energy efficiency rating, versus a 10 SEER, the standard that had been in effect for 14 years.

According to the Department of Energy, the higher standard will save a total of 4.2 quadrillion British thermal units, or "quads," of energy from 2006 through 2030 -- enough of a saving that utilities will be able to forgo building 40 new power plants nationally. Consumers, meanwhile, will save about $1 billion by 2020.

The saving might even be more pronounced than that. Many central-air units can achieve ratings in excess of 14 SEER at only slightly greater expense -- and manufacturers say consumers are very interested. One reason may be utilities like Austin Energy, a city-owned utility in Austin, Texas, which is offering a 20% rebate on air conditioners with SEER ratings of 14 or greater.

3) SMARTER SENSORS

Manufacturers are designing their products to be more intelligent, using advanced sensors to better control energy use and drive down operating costs. Sensors selling for a few dollars can save thousands of dollars over the course of a few years. And more companies are taking advantage of the technology.

DOJ_NMG_0080679

For example, custom-sensor maker Kavlico Corp., of Moorpark, Calif., is seeing robust sales for semiconductor-based controllers used in commercial refrigeration equipment. Sensors tell a controller when to begin the defrost cycle in the freezer case, replacing automatic timers that put equipment through unnecessary heat-up-and-cool-down cycles.

The new controllers "result in a 25% to 30% reduction in power use," says Scott Farrenkopf, general manager of Kavlico, a unit of Schneider Electric of France. He says auto makers and equipment makers are ordering more custom-tailored sensors for systems designed to improve fuel economy and energy efficiency.

4) BETTER MEASURES

Consumers, meanwhile, are getting better tools for tracking energy use around the house with tools that are inexpensive and readily available. Eric Bier, a retired group-home administrator in San Diego, got concerned about his rising home utility bill. So he bought a device called a Kill-A-Watt meter, made by P3 International Corp. of New York.

He plugs the gadget, which cost about $40, into a standard wall outlet. Then he plugs various other devices into the meter, and it tells him how much power they're consuming. By multiplying this kilowatt-hour reading by his local utility's rate, he can easily figure out the monthly cost of operating the device in question.

Mr. Bier was surprised at the results of a recent home test. He learned that his new computer and accessories were using 242 kilowatt-hours of electricity a month, costing $48.50, because he never turned them off. Once he began shutting them down at night, the monthly cost dropped to about $18.80 a month for 94 kilowatt-hours of energy. On the other hand, his Roomba vacuum cleaner, from iRobot Corp., provided a pleasant surprise, vacuuming 8,960 square feet of floor space automatically each month for a total of $1.17 in electricity. "Considering how much work it does, it's a baby," he says.

Tom Lynch, director of sales and marketing for P3 International, says sales of the meters took off last winter. Sales in the first quarter of 2006 exceeded sales for all of 2005, he says, lifted by consumer worries about high utility bills.

5) SETTING STANDARDS

The federal government sets minimum standards for energy efficiency on more than a dozen products, including dishwashers, refrigerators, water heaters, room air conditioners and electric motors. From 1990 to 2000, these standards saved consumers approximately $50 billion in energy costs, according to one federal estimate.

The EPA, meanwhile, puts its own Energy Star labels on about 40 products, generally identifying the 25% of products in each category that are the most energy-efficient. In 2005, consumers with Energy Star products saved an estimated $12 billion, as well as enough electricity to power 11 million homes, according to the EPA.

But there are some glaring omissions in the EPA standards, and closing those gaps will bring more savings in coming years. For instance, television sets. The government doesn't impose an efficiency standard on TVs, and the Energy Star label identifies only TVs with low power consumption in "standby" mode -- in other words, not turned on. (Any device with a remote control is never really shut off, unless you unplug it.)

The call for a standard has grown louder as electricity use by televisions has boomed in recent years. Television screens have exploded in size, and add-on devices have proliferated, from satellite dishes to programmable set-top boxes. Some families now spend more money powering home-entertainment systems than they do refrigerating their food.

The International Electrotechnical Commission, which prepares standards for electrical and electronic technologies that often are adopted by governments, is working on common metrics to measure TV electricity consumption. After the IEC concludes its work, some efficiency information may begin appearing on sets in early 2008, the government says. Meanwhile, the EPA says it's considering Energy Star labels that would look at total power consumption by TVs instead of just power use in standby mode to give consumers a valuable tool to use when buying a new television.

The push for better disclosure is receiving some resistance from the electronics industry. The Consumer Electronics Association encourages voluntary labeling, but opposes mandatory efficiency standards for goods like TVs because "the industry has so many products and they change so fast," says Brian Markwalter, the group's vice president of technology standards.

Activists argue that the speedy evolution of products makes new standards more urgent. "Energy use has changed, and it's time for labeling to catch up," says Chris Calwell, principal in Ecos Consulting in Portland, Ore., a firm that specializes in energy issues.

6) NEW BUILDING CODES

DOJ_NMG_0080680

All states have building codes for health, fire and safety. But 40 also have codes for energy efficiency. The rules require, for example, at least minimal amounts of insulation in new buildings. The Department of Energy estimates code changes saved consumers $4.7 billion in lower electric bills between 1991 and 2005.

Now some of the 10 states that don't have statewide energy-efficiency codes, including Mississippi and Alabama, are considering adopting them, in part because they're facing lots of hurricane-related rebuilding. Meanwhile, several states that already have efficiency codes are considering adopting the latest version of a model code, released last winter by the International Code Council, a membership organization that creates the building codes often adopted by governments.

Experts say the latest version is shorter and less complex than the previous one; for instance, it divides the nation into eight climate zones instead of 19. At the same time, the new rules set more-ambitious goals for energy savings. The code hasn't yet been certified by the Department of Energy, but many states are moving ahead to consider it anyway. Energy-efficient building codes are expected to reduce primary energy use in the U.S. enough to save consumers $10 billion annually by 2010.

7) INCENTIVES FOR UTILITIES

Most utilities earn higher profits as energy use rises; that's the way their rates are structured. So conservation efforts undermine their ability to make money and get reimbursed for their costs.

But many states have changed that pricing scheme to remove the disincentive for utilities to sponsor energy-reduction programs. California and some other states assess a larger proportion of a utility's costs in basic service fees, not volumetric charges based on the number of kilowatt-hours of power consumed.

In July, dozens of utilities, big energy users and regulators pledged to attack the rate-structure problem in states where it still exists and promote energy efficiency through resource planning, giving conservation more attention. Rather than build a new 500-megawatt power plant, for example, states would see if they could cut demand by 500 megawatts more cheaply and without environmental harm.

Utility regulators from more than half of these states have endorsed this National Action Plan for Energy Efficiency. The industry is engaged because most state regulators are confronted by "new plant proposals and rising rates" that they would prefer to avoid, says Diane Munns, a utility commissioner from Iowa and a leader of the effort. If the plan were adopted nationally, U.S. energy bills could be reduced by $20 billion annually, according to the EPA, a proponent of the effort.

Meanwhile, the California Public Utilities Commission is considering creating special monetary incentives for utilities that promote conservation. Says Michael Peevey, president of the commission, "I want to see utilities get a return on energy efficiency comparable to what they'd get for putting steel in the ground."

8) VARIABLE PRICING

One of the more ambitious conservation efforts utilities are trying out -- both on their own and at the urging of regulators -- is a new kind of metering. Sophisticated electric or gas meters monitor how much energy is consumed by individual customers, taking automatic soundings several times a day instead of monthly.

This makes it possible for utilities to charge different prices by time of day or season. Regulators might use higher rates when the electric system is stressed or when fuel prices are especially high to suppress demand so fewer power plants need to run. Mr. Peevey of the California Public Utilities Commission says some consumers balk at the idea, "but when people understand this is the more environmentally sensitive option, they are supportive."

Nationwide, about 6% of electric customers have the meters in place, according to a recent study by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Connecticut, Kansas, Idaho and Maine have the highest usage rates, ranging from 14% to 53%.

California soon will make the list with a massive remetering project expected to cost about $3 billion. Five million customers of Southern California Edison, a unit of Edison International, will receive new meters beginning in 2008, for example. The meters will be two-way communication devices, able to send the utility instantaneous readings as well as talk to other devices like smart thermostats, which allow remote control of temperature settings. This will let consumers better control energy use -- for example, by cutting use at periods of grid stress or especially high prices.

9) REBATES

DOJ_NMG_0080681

Many utilities also offer rebates on energy-efficient appliances and equipment, trying to permanently reduce demand by getting obsolete equipment retired. When New York offered a $75 bounty for old air conditioners in 2002, 160,000 units were turned in, saving enough juice over 10 years to equal a full year's output from a large power plant.

California, where consumers pay about $20 billion a year in electricity charges, has committed to spend $2 billion of customer funds on energy-efficiency programs from 2006 through 2008, a record expenditure for any state. Elsewhere, states are considered aggressive if they get utilities to spend the equivalent of 1% to 2% of electricity revenue on energy-efficiency programs.

PG&E's Pacific Gas & Electric utility will spend $974 million and expects to permanently cut demand by 600 megawatts, eliminating the need for one large power plant and 30 to 50 years of fuel. About 250 megawatts of reductions will come from lighting alone.

Some of these efficiency programs involve big rebates. GMH Capital Partners LP, a real-estate investment firm, bought a big apartment complex in Richmond, Calif., last year. It spent $327,428 rejuvenating the nearly 20-year-old structure, installing new lights, water heaters and heat-reflecting roofing materials. The expected annual energy savings: $112,000, most of which will be realized by renters at the 1,008-unit complex.

For its trouble, GMH got a rebate check for the full amount of the equipment and installation. The local utility, PG&E, made the move because most property owners won't do expensive retrofits if renters reap the savings. "It's a tough market to crack," says Beverly Alexander, vice president of customer energy at the utility.

10) CUSTOMER-RESPONSE PROGRAMS

Getting customers to trade up to energy-efficient equipment permanently reduces energy use. But there are ways to temporarily cut consumption, particularly among big energy users. These "demand response" programs will be more visible in coming years, especially in places like New England that are having trouble getting new plants built.

Early programs paid big energy users to reduce energy use, sometimes forcing them to curtail production. One current approach cuts consumption more painlessly, with the help of controls that dim lights or cycle air conditioners and pumps when requested by the utility.

In response to a directive from Congress, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission recently surveyed the electric-power industry and found existing demand-response programs can cut consumption by 37,500 megawatts when activated, equivalent to the output of 75 big power plants.

In July and August, when U.S. electricity markets set new records for energy use, the outfit that runs the high-voltage electric grid in the mid-Atlantic region got big energy users to cut their usage in exchange for payments. This benefited all consumers by cutting wholesale power costs by about $650 million.

Many experts think that well-designed programs, backed by the right technology, can easily cut peak energy use by 5% to 10%. In fact, California did better than that in the 2000-01 energy crisis.

Jon Wellinghoff, a member of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, says consumers "easily could save billions of dollars annually" with only a modest expansion of existing programs and no impact on productivity. What you need, he says, is "a willingness to try new things."

Some utilities seem willing to go down that road. Rick Green, chief executive of Aquila Inc., a Kansas City, Mo., holding company that owns utilities in five Midwestern states, says utility executives gradually are becoming convinced they can't build their way out of the current situation, as they did in the past.

He says one employee in Colorado recently told him that when he talks to conservationists, "I don't say 'no' anymore. I say, 'Yes, if...' "

Lax Oversight By BP Is Cited In Texas Fire (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

HOUSTON -- A July 2005 fire at BP PLC's Texas City refinery was caused by poor mechanical-integrity oversight, a U.S. safety board said.

DOJ_NMG_0080682

The fire occurred four months after an explosion at the refinery killed 15 workers and injured hundreds more. The London company has come under fire from regulators after a series of safety and compliance problems in its U.S. operations.

BP said it agreed with the findings -- disclosed yesterday -- of the Chemical Safety and Hazardous Investigation Board and described a series of steps taken to improve "positive material identification" at the plant, including an increase in the size of the inspection team from 50 people to more than 200.

The July 2005 fire lasted two hours, injured one worker and caused $30 million in property damage, the board said. Although less serious than the earlier incident, The July fire and a subsequent blaze Aug. 10, 2005, rattled regulators and local officials.

In August 2005, the board urged BP to convene an independent panel to review safety at BP's U.S. refinery. That panel, led by former Secretary of State James Baker, is expected to report on its findings in late November.

BP spokesman Neil Chapman said BP was "disturbed" by the operating culture at Texas City. But he described the current safety culture as much improved, saying the company won't run Texas City at full capacity until BP is convinced it can operate safely. The plant, BP's largest U.S. refinery, has been partially offline since it was shut for Hurricane Rita in September 2005.

Inquiry Is Critical Of BP In Refinery Fire (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 15 (AP) — The giant oil company BP did not have procedures in place that could have prevented a fire in July 2005 at its refinery in Texas City after workers installed the wrong type of pipe, federal investigators said Sunday.

The fire at the Resid Hydrotreater Unit, which combines heavy crude oil with hydrogen, caused more than $30 million in damage. One worker suffered minor injuries.

The fire occurred at the same BP plant where 15 people were killed and more than 170 were injured in a March 2005 explosion.

The plant is about 40 miles southeast of Houston.

BP officials said the fire started when an eight-inch section of heavy steel pipe failed between a compressor and heat exchanger.

Mexican Bats Find Cross-Border Benefactors (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Shortly before sundown they make their first foray, cruising up to 5,000 feet aboveground in search of mosquitoes, moths and other tasty treats. A few hours later, they return home to rest and feed their young before heading out again around midnight.

By daybreak, when Mexican free-tailed bats finally return to their cave, named Cueva de la Boca, the colony will have traveled as far as 62 miles and gobbled some 12 tons of bugs out of the skies near the U.S. border. And in cornfields from Texas to Iowa, farmers are giving thanks.

Or at least they should be.

Sure, bats are creepy. They hang upside down, squeal at high decibels and turn up in movies as blood-sucking fiends. Some even spread rabies. But, it turns out, that in the global ecosystem, bats are humanity's allies.

Every night, all night, as humans sleep, the flying mammals work feverishly. They pollinate plants such as the agave, the source of Mexico's iconic tequila. Their excrement, called guano, is a valuable fertilizer. And bats eat up to one-quarter of their body weight in insects every night, making them one of the simplest, safest, most cost-effective forms of pest control available.

Somehow, that message has not reached most people. For decades, intentionally or otherwise, property owners, hikers and sightseers have trampled habitat, dumped garbage and set fires, decimating the bat populations in many parts of the world.

"We scientists missed a chance to give farmers the right information in the right way at the right time," said A. Nelly Correa, a bat expert at the Center for Environmental Quality at the Monterrey Institute of Technology in Mexico. "Most of us were too busy giving the information to our peers in journals and not to the people who could be our partners."Bat Lovers Take Action

DOJ_NMG_0080683

Now, in a unique cross-border alliance, bat lovers have embarked on a multiyear effort to quantify the damage and replenish the bat population of northern Mexico. The project, being spearheaded by the nonprofit Texas-based Bat Conservation International (BCI), includes detailed mapping of hundreds of present and former bat roosts, educational programs for farmers and even purchases of land to protect the most vulnerable colonies.

In late September, armed with BCI data, the Mexican environmental group Pronatura Noreste bought the Cueva de la Boca cave outside Monterrey for about $500,000. It is believed to be the first purchase of a bat cave by Mexican conservationists, said Magdalena Rovalo, a biologist and director of the organization. Access is now limited to researchers, and plans are underway to build an observation tower in the hopes of generating tourism revenue at the cave, which takes its name from the Spanish word for "mouth."

"If we had a healthy population of bats, we would have pest control and healthy crops at no cost to society and no bad effects on health," Correa said. "And it would be a plus for the economy as bats can become a tourist attraction."

Scientists have identified more than 1,000 species of bats worldwide, representing about one-fourth of all mammal types. Latin America is home to 290 species, 140 of them in Mexico, making the region one of the most diverse bat habitats on the globe. Of all those bats, just two species feed on wild bird blood and only one eats cattle blood, said Correa, who tries at every opportunity to disabuse the public of those blood-sucking stereotypes.

"They have given all bats a bad image very unfairly," Correa said. "Bats are really great guys!"

Cueva de la Boca caught the attention of conservationists after researcher Arnulfo Moreno surveyed 10 major publicly accessible caves in northern Mexico and found that the bat population had fallen by 90 percent in five of them.

"They are especially vulnerable when they are concentrated in a single place and only produce one pup a year," said Moreno, who is based at the Technological Institute of Victoria City in Monterrey. In addition, Boca is a "maternity cave," where young pups were being suffocated to death by smoke from the torches that hikers fashioned with halved plastic bottles and old rags.

"If you're an adult bat and you cannot breathe, you just fly away," Correa said. "If you are a newly born baby bat waiting for your mom to feed you, you just fall down and die."A Shrunken Population

At one time, Cueva de la Boca was home to an estimated 20 million Mexican free-tailed bats, known to scientists as Tadarida brasiliensis . By last year, the colony had shrunk to 600,000. Pug-nosed, with a wrinkly lower lip and long, loose tail, the bats prefer warmer climes, choosing to live along the border from April to early November. There is evidence they continue south through the winter, but details of their migratory patterns are not well known.

Three other species live in the cave in smaller numbers, including the ghost-faced bat, which has folds of skin below its chin and eyes that appear to be tucked inside its ears, and the naked-back bat, so named for its smooth, almost rubbery-looking skin.

But Boca became a high priority because of the Mexican free-tailed bat and its proclivity to eat the corn earworm, a vicious moth that devours corn crops as it migrates and lays eggs all the way from Winter Garden, Tex., to the Canadian border. As a pest control, bats are more attractive than chemicals because they cost little, pose almost no risk to human health and target specific bugs, leaving the rest of nature undisturbed, Correa said. And because of their location along the border, Mexican free-tailed bats are well-positioned to eliminate earworms before they strike vital crops.

"These bats are of enormous ecological and economic benefit on both sides of the border," Merlin Tuttle, founder and president of Bat Conservation International, said in an e-mail. BCI and Fondo Mexicano, a private organization focused on biodiversity projects, have commissioned assessments of an additional 150 hard-to-reach caves along the border. The bat population in those has fallen from about 55 million to 15 million, Moreno said.

Though modest in size, the 20-acre Boca property offers conservation opportunities beyond bats. It is home to a pair of endangered peregrine falcons, a threatened cypress species and a few endangered American beaver, according to Pronatura. From a single location, visitors can take in an entire ecosystem -- the insects feeding on the plants, the bats eating the bugs and the falcons feeding on the bats.

DOJ_NMG_0080684

Since Pronatura began informing visitors about the fragile residents of Cueva de la Boca last year, the number of Mexican free-tailed bats has doubled to about 1.2 million, Correa said. It is quite a sight, she marveled, when the colony departs for another night of hunting and dining. When they emerge in one burst, their presence in the skies shows up on Doppler radar.

She can only imagine what 20 million or so would look like.

Showcasing The Growth Of The Green Economy (WP)

By Michael S. Rosenwald

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Keith Ware dressed naturally to set up his booth at the Green Festival. He wore an organic cotton hooded jacket, organic cotton blue jeans and organic hemp work boots, the soles of which are made from recycled surgical gloves. He was not, however, wearing his organic cotton underwear.

"That's not to say I don't own some," he said.

Ware is one of the owners of Eco-Green Living, a Logan Circle store that sells organic and fair-trade products such as teas, hemp boots and even the makeshift floor he was setting up, which was made from Marmoleum -- a combination of linseed oil, wood flour, rosin, jute and limestone. He was an exhibitor over the weekend at the Green Festival, which drew crowds of people to the Washington Convention Center to celebrate light bulbs that last 60,000 hours, investment funds targeting socially responsible companies and paper made from elephant dung by a company called Mr. Ellie Pooh.

The show, the third in the District, grew from 250 exhibitors in the first year to more than 350. Although some exhibitors were selling products, the chief intention of the show was to develop the industry by connecting the principles and products of green businesses with mainstream customers.

By many accounts, the green business movement is taking off, with the marketplace topping more than $228 billion in the United States and with such companies as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. getting into organic food and General Electric Co. plowing into renewable energy. Levi's is introducing organic cotton jeans. Vanity Fair recently published a green issue.

"I think the business has taken off like a rocket," said Kevin Danaher, co-founder of Global Exchange, a San Francisco organization that promotes social, economic and environmental justice around the world. "I think it's left the launching pad."

But as Danaher and others pound away at expanding the green economy, what was long a counterculture movement is now embracing one of its sworn enemies -- big business -- as a key component of the cause. Danaher's organization has railed for years against Nike Inc.'s manufacturing methods, accusing the company of running sweatshops, yet he says the Wal-Marts of the world can help the world go green. Such companies legitimize the movement and can offer a wider market for niche products from smaller companies, he said.

"It's the big guys genuflecting in the reflection of our values," he said. "The previous economy was based on money values. The next economy will be based on life values. You do commerce and make money, but you're making your money by saving nature and protecting human rights."

Danaher acknowledged that embracing big business may seem contradictory, and not all green groups agree with him. Wal-Mart has plenty of critics, who argue that the retailer's drive for low-cost products could degrade organic standards. "It creates confusion," Danaher said. "People have this anti-corporation, anti-big thing, which is understandable. Wal-Mart knocks out small businesses. They keep their wages down." But, he said: "They get it out into the public mind. That's why we do this show. Let's get into the general public. Preaching to the already converted doesn't take you anywhere. It's taking it into the mainstream that does."

Ware's store has been open for about a year. Besides selling to walk-in customers, the store supplies home-building and remodeling contractors with tankless water heaters, solar-powered roof fans, bamboo flooring and nontoxic paints. "We have grown phenomenally," he said. "We've gone from doing a couple hundred dollars a month to several thousand a day."

One of the most common questions Ware gets about his business is about competition, particularly from big companies. Wal-Mart, for example, has invested heavily in its organic business, becoming the world's largest buyer of organic cotton products. Last year, GE said that its Ecomagination program, which it describes as building "innovative technologies that help customers address their environmental and financial needs and help GE grow," generated $10.1 billion in revenue, up from $6.2

DOJ_NMG_0080685

billion in 2004. Waste Management Inc., the country's largest waste collector, is turning landfill gases into electricity for 400,000 homes.

"People always ask me about competition," Ware said. "No. No. There is only validation of the industry right now. It hurts the movement if they are doing small things for the publicity. If they are genuinely trying to do the things that they say they are doing for the right reasons, then it helps. I'm sure they are finding that, heck, they are earning more money off it. The idea is to get everybody moving."

Which raises the question: What if Target or Wal-Mart opened a store 10 blocks from him that sold everything he sells?

Ware doesn't think Wal-Mart would put him out of business. In fact, he thinks if Wal-Mart sells more green products, his business will be enhanced, with even more foot traffic. Ware said that if competitors were legitimately green, "I would be absolutely enthralled with it. . . . I know there will be more and more places coming up where you can buy Marmoleum flooring. Everyone will soon be selling organic cotton shoes and clothing."

And judging by the turnout at this year's show, there will be plenty of customers. The festival drew about 25,000 people, up from 17,000 last year. Fifteen minutes after opening Saturday morning, there were four lines with more than 60 people in each, waiting to get tickets.

The green industry's move toward the middle provided an interesting study in contrasts. While the show offered free valet parking for bicycle riders, high-profile Washington was also represented, and Tim Russert and his wife strolled through the hall.

Liz and Jim Staedler of Summit, N.J., were in town visiting their daughter when they came across a flier for the show. Though they have never been to a green event, their 22-year-old son has been pushing them to incorporate sustainable energy into their Colorado home. They decided to drop by for some ideas.

"I thought it would be hippies and granolas, that type of thing," Jim said. "What I see here is some of that, but it's really more toward the mainstream."

The Staedlers were standing in an aisle with a booth selling politically charged bumper stickers, including one that said "Too Poor To Vote Republican." But nearby, in a booth with an iPod playing the Jackson Five through a speaker, a tall man in a pinstriped suit introduced chic body products from Pangea Organics. Big selling point: The skin lotion boxes are plantable and will grow Genovese sweet basil.

The products displayed varied appreciably: stationery from Mr. Ellie Pooh; organic wine and beer; sustainable men's underwear at $10 a pair. There was wheat litter bedding for pets, organic yerba mate, and information on obtaining an MBA in sustainable management.

Zach Lyman is the managing partner of a District company called Reware, which sells backpacks and messenger bags that have small solar panels on the outside to provide electricity for charging. Connect cellphones, iPods, GPS navigation devices and other gizmos to the bag, and they can be charged in generally the same time it would take plugging them into a wall socket. The bags sell for about $240. Lyman estimated that he has sold about 3,500 of them.

The bags were popular with early adopters and green-product aficionados, but after Hurricane Katrina, when millions of Americans realized that they could be without power for months, Lyman's business expanded into the mainstream, to average consumers as well as disaster workers and utility companies.

"I'm a big mainstream guy," Lyman said. "That's the whole thing with this bag. How do we introduce renewable energy to people who don't think about it in their everyday life?"

Lyman said he was particularly enthusiastic about GE's efforts in green energy.

"My whole goal in life is to bring this stuff into the mainstream," he said. "I look at GE and I'm excited. They are getting the message out, and for us, here you have one of the most successful companies in the world and they are saying that climate change matters, that renewable energy matters. That is so exciting."

Mark Bisbee, the owner of Liberty Carpet One in Fairfax, has created an offshoot called GreenFloors. He sells, among other things, carpet made from recycled soda bottles, which are sorted by color, ground into chips that are turned into fibers, then spun into a carpet.

A curious thing happened in the carpet market. Because nylon carpet needs oil for production, the high price of oil has pushed nylon carpet prices about $3 per square yard above recycled carpet.

DOJ_NMG_0080686

Bisbee has customers in 48 states. He is still waiting for Wyoming and Hawaii.

"It was a small niche market and now it's more mainstream," Bisbee said. "Basically it's a question of awareness. Once people are aware they have choices it's easy, especially if it's economically similar. Then there is not really a decision."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

3 Vice Lords Convicted Of Drug Trafficking On West Side (HM)

Hilary Masell, October 13, 2006

Three high-ranking members of a Chicago street gang were convicted Thursday, culminating a massive federal probe into a network of drug trafficking on the city's West Side.

Troy Martin, Eddie Bell and Patrick Bray were each found guilty by a federal jury of running a highly organized drug ring as members of the Mafia Insane Vice Lords.

Share your thoughts

on this story on the ChicagoDefender.com message board.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Pravin Rao said the convictions send a message to other drug traffickers. "They can't . . . victimize the whole community," he said.

According to Rao, the group, led by Martin of Bolingbrook, had between 30 and 50 drug spots across the West Side. The spots operated 24 hours a day, seven days a week, selling cocaine, crack cocaine, heroin and marijuana.

Federal prosecutors called it a "sophisticated operation" with an elaborate infrastructure that earned $4,000 to $5,000 a day at each of the most active locations.

The men were arrested in May 2004 as part of "Operation Day Trader," a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigation. A total of 48 defendants were arrested on federal conspiracy charges, most of whom have been convicted.

Martin, 51; Bell, 45, also of Bolingbrook; and Bray, 34, of Chicago, each face life in prison. They will be sentenced in January.

Oak Park Drug Bust Adds To Busy Summer For D.E.A. (KOVR)

KOVR-TV, October 13, 2006

(CBS 13) SACRAMENTO Five people are under arrest after they were caught growing marijuana in plain view in their backyard, say D.E.A. agents. Federal agents say one of the suspects arrested is a leader of an Asian gang called Little Rascals, a gang the D.E.A. says is the boldest they've arrested all summer.

"It's been a busy season for us. It was pretty much unexpected," said Gordon Taylor, Special Agent, Sacramento D.E.A.

According to an affidavit, the leader lived in Elk Grove but ran the operation out of his mother's house in Oak Park. Inside the home, agents say they found 6,000 ecstasy pills, 39 marijuana plants in the backyard of the residence well as 19 boxes of processed marijuana.

Agents say the gang is not linked to the earlier arrests, where the plants were grown indoors. Despite this, agents say the arrests show a trend.

While were there, two cars pulled up and drove away. One nearby resident says he's had enough.

Agents were tipped off to the operation by neighbors who said they didn't know the leader, but they know he drove an expensive corvette.

If the men arrested in this raid are convicted, they'll face jail time, say agents.

More Local Rising Cost To Cross Body Uncovered In Starr County Well Valley's Evolution A Hispanic Celebration Olympic Legend Returns To The Valley Two Evade Police By Crossing Border Local For Last Seven Days Today Sunday Saturday Friday Thursday Wednesda (MON)

Monitor, October 14, 2006

McALLEN — Six defendants in a high-profile federal drug case have agreed to plead guilty to smuggling charges, opening the way for prosecutors to go after their 10 co-defendants.

The six men who have agreed to plea guilty are Jesus Lorenzo Meza, a former Edinburg police officer; Andres Solis; Ruben Meza; Arturo Javier Hinojosa; Miguel Hernandez-Rojas and Robert Lee Rodriguez, according to court documents. The six faced as many as nine federal counts, including conspiracy to distribute marijuana and cocaine and possession with intent to distribute.

Jesus Meza, Ruben Meza and Hernandez-Rojas are brothers of former McAllen police officer Francisco Meza-Rojas, the man who authorities believe led the escape from the federal prison in La Villa last month. Meza-Rojas was in the prison awaiting trial on charges in connection with this case.

The six men who have agreed to plead guilty could face as much as life in prison and a $4 million fine. The remaining charges against the six have been dropped.

"My understanding is that this was something that happened in the past," said Edinburg Police Chief Quirino Muñoz, Jesus Meza's former boss. "We are disappointed to see anytime a police officer violates the law in such a matter."

The case dates back to December 2005, when the 16 men were indicted after an almost 10-year Drug Enforcement Administration investigation into cocaine and marijuana smuggling near Peñitas.

Meza-Rojas, 41, led the family drug ring, according to court documents. He and the five other prisoners who escaped the prison in La Villa are still on the loose. The six are considered armed and dangerous. The other five men were serving sentences for unrelated charges.

Meza-Rojas and his four brothers were arrested April 19.

There are still four co-defendants in the drug case whose names have not been released because they have yet to be arrested.

Prosecutors have decided to go forward with the case against Meza-Rojas and the six others in custody who have not agreed to plead guilty.

The Meza family smuggled in drugs through an area between Granjeno and Peñitas for years, according to a DEA agent's testimony in April.

From 1998 until 2006, they would employ as many as 10 people to perform counters-surveillance and move the drugs from Mexico to the United States, according to court documents.

Using codes, cell phones and other technology, they managed to operate seemingly undetected. Based on wire taps of many of the defendants' phones, agents were able to determine that the players in the smuggling had a system to elude law enforcement, which included abandoning a vehicle loaded with drugs when officers were about to make an arrest, the documents show.

Members of the organization would also use their vehicles to block law enforcement from entering certain roads and areas.

The U.S. Attorney's office in Houston and DEA in McAllen declined to comment. Both cited the ongoing investigation into the case.

In fact, U.S. Attorneys and DEA agents haven't shared any details about the case. All information has been gleaned from public records.

Those records and testimony from court appearances show the case against the 16 defendants heavily relies on information gathered from wire taps and confidential informants.

One of the defendants, Solis, filed a motion to have the government disclose the name of the informants. Solis has since agreed to plead guilty. Before his plea agreement, federal prosecutors filed a motion hoping to deny the disclosure of those informants.

Local Doc Cleared Of Malpractice (STT)

Scranton Times-Tribune, October 15, 2006

SCRANTON — A former Honesdale doctor was found not to have committed medical malpractice after a two-week trial in front of Lackawanna County Judge Terrence Nealon.

DOJ_NMG_0080688

Lake Ariel resident Beth Batzel sued Dr. David George, who is now practicing medicine in New Mexico, claiming that he was negligent for performing a "cervical manipulation" on her spine in June 1999, five months after she'd undergone a cervical fusion. Dr. George denied he performed any manipulations on her spine and said that even if he had, Ms. Batzel's spine was well-healed by then.

Jurors deliberated about one hour before deciding that Dr. George was not negligent in his care of Ms. Batzel, according to Judge Nealon.

Man sentenced in drug-ring case

SCRANTON — A Kingston man was sentenced to more than eight years in prison for his role in a crack cocaine ring that operated in Luzerne and Lancaster counties.

Anthony Blaso, 54, of Kingston, pleaded guilty to a drug conspiracy count in July, four months after he was indicted in federal court as a result of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Wilkes-Barre Police Department.

U.S. District Judge William J. Nealon sentenced Mr. Blaso to 100 months in federal prison Thursday, followed by five years' supervised probation. The case was prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Francis P. Sempa.

Man turns self in after stabbing

PITTSTON — A 21-year-old man surrendered voluntarily Friday after he stabbed another man in the 200 block of North Main Street, city police said.

Nicholas Bonafede was charged with stabbing Seid Aptiliasimov, 23, in the abdomen at 273 N. Main St. about 8 p.m., police said.

Mr. Aptiliasimov was taken to Community Medical Center for treatment. Hospital officials had no information about his condition late Saturday night.

Mr. Bonafede was charged with aggravated assault, simple assault and recklessly endangering another person. He was committed to Luzerne County Correctional Facility, where he remained Saturday night in lieu of $35,000 bail, prison officials said.

U.S. Military Pilot Sentenced In Ecstasy Case (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

NEW YORK A U.S. military pilot who flew a U.S. Air Force jet from New York to Germany to pick up 200,000 pills of Ecstasy was sentenced Friday to 17 1/2 years in prison.

U.S. District Judge John G. Koeltl rejected appeals by defense lawyers for leniency for Capt. Franklin Rodriguez of the U.S. Air National Guard, saying the sentence was appropriate for "a particularly egregious and despicable crime."

"He took these actions while other members of the military are over there bravely fighting for our country," Koeltl said.

Rodriguez, 36, and Master Sgt. John Fong, 37, of the U.S. Air National Guard had pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges, admitting their roles in the April 2005 flight. Fong is awaiting sentencing.

"I'm very sorry," Rodriguez said before he was sentenced. "I just chose the wrong thing and my family suffered. ... I loved my job, that I served my country and I'm sorry for what I've done," he said.

Prosecutors told the judge that Rodriguez had repeatedly flown drugs on military flights, bringing hundreds of thousands of Ecstasy pills into the United States aboard cargo aircraft and that more than $700,000 (€557,768) in cash was found in a safe in his apartment.

The two men were arrested after flying the Air Force plane from Stewart Air National Guard Base in Newburgh, New York, to Germany and returning to Newburgh.

Federal law enforcement agents watched Fong load bags and boxes into a BMW before approaching the two men and asking to inspect their bags, where 28 bags of pills were found, authorities said.

Ecstasy is a synthetic drug considered part hallucinogen, part amphetamine.

Pilot Of Ecstasy Plane Sentenced To Federal Prison (MH)

Mid-Hudson, October 14, 2006

New York – A captain in the New York Air National Guard at Stewart Airport was sentenced Friday to 17_ years in federal prison for transporting ecstasy pills into the United States from Germany aboard a C-5A cargo plane.

Franklin Rodriguez, 36, and his co-defendant Master Sergeant John Fong, pleaded guilty in May to conspiring to import the drug into the country and conspiring to possess and distribute the drug.

The charges were the result of an international investigation into importation of ecstasy on military aircraft and its distribution in the United States.

It was charged that on April 12, 2005, Rodriguez and Fong flew from Germany to Stewart on a C-5A cargo plane on which they had hidden more than 200,000 ecstasy pills. Rodriguez also stored pills and $725,000 in cash in his apartment in the Bronx and the two men stored 60,000 pills in an automobile in Tampa, Florida.

Fong is scheduled to be sentenced next month.

Forest Pot Farms A Menace To Land (SDUT)

By Mike Lee, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 15, 2006

Drug agents sniffed out a major marijuana patch at Palomar Mountain State Park a few months ago in the kind of raid that has become all too common on U.S. public lands.

What officials initially thought might be a few hundred plants ended up being 15,000. Police also found two men and a woman tending the plots, whose yield would have been worth $60 million on the street.

The crop tenders scampered into the woods, leaving behind trash and terraces they had formed on the hillside. Initial repairs to such an area can cost taxpayers $10,000 per acre for staff time and a helicopter to haul away garbage, said the Office of National Drug Control Policy. On average, ten acres are fouled for every acre of marijuana planted in forests and on other public lands, the agency said.

“The whole process of these marijuana plantations brutalizes the landscape,” said David Graber, Pacific West regional science chief for the National Park Service.

The outdoor growing season for marijuana is coming to a close for the year, but some scars left by clandestine pot farms will take months to heal. Anti-drug agencies must deal with tons of trash, human waste, erosion and other forms of soil disturbance, loss of vegetation and chemical pollution that kills marine life.

The illegal plots also increase poaching of wildlife, raise the threat of wildfires started accidentally at campsites and put outdoor enthusiasts in harm's way. For instance, the U.S. Forest Service recently warned deer hunters to avoid two areas in Mendocino and Glenn counties until authorities could evict the marijuana growers.

Marijuana production on public lands in the United States has risen as the nation moves to further secure its borders and slow the movement of marijuana from Mexico. Mexican organized crime is behind the surge in such illegal plantings, according to law enforcement agencies.

Growers favor public property partly because if their plants are discovered, they can flee without leaving behind traceable evidence. But there are other reasons for the popularity of forests and parks.

“The nation's public lands have become a haven for this illegal activity due to the relatively few law enforcement personnel and the vast and often remote tracks of sparsely or uninhabited lands,” said the U.S. Forest Service's 2005 marijuana report.

Authorities – from the White House down to the local level – are paying more attention to the expanding practice of marijuana farming on public lands, especially national forests in California. Federal agents say that about 4.5 million outdoor marijuana plants have been seized nationwide this year, largely from public lands. That pace is well ahead of the 2005 count.

The problem has become so pervasive that President Bush's drug czar visited the Sequoia National Forest in August to discuss why drug cartels are having such success.

“Every American should be outraged that parts of their public lands are being held hostage by illegal drug traffickers,” John Walters, director of national drug-control policy, said at the time.

Appealing sites More than half the marijuana plants detected on public lands nationwide are in California, which has eight of the 10 U.S. national forests with the highest number of pot plants confiscated. And 2006 looks to be another record year for seizures.

DOJ_NMG_0080690

About 2.8 million marijuana plants were seized from outdoor farms in California through August, records show. About 75 percent of those seizures were on public lands.

The Cleveland National Forest, which cuts through central San Diego County, didn't rank among the national leaders in 2005, but authorities say about 13,000 plants were eradicated there last year.

Those Cleveland plantations caused ecological damage to 33 acres. Nationwide, the total reaches thousands of acres, according to the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

In San Diego County, the multiagency Marijuana Eradication Team removed about 250,000 plants from large-scale outdoor farms so far this year. This is about 30 percent higher than last year but below the average of about 300,000 plants in each of the past five years.

Anti-narcotics experts say the annual seizure totals nationwide vary based on enforcement pressure, weather and planting trends within the multibillion-dollar marijuana industry. In 2005, for example, heavy spring rains likely discouraged some growers and probably accounted for the county's lower eradication totals.

Some authorities say the escalating number of marijuana seizures on public lands in California indicate their enforcement methods are becoming more effective.

Robin Schwanke, spokeswoman for the state Attorney General's Office, credits the rise to better surveillance and increased understanding of what areas the growers prefer.

Others say cash-strapped, thinly staffed enforcement agencies aren't the reason for the rising rate of marijuana busts.

“At a grand scale, I see no solution anytime soon,” said Graber of the National Park Service. “At a local scale, the most we can hope for is that we harass (the growers) enough that they go somewhere else.”

Relatively few marijuana farms are found on public lands closest to the U.S.-Mexico border because the presence of immigration agents deters many potential growers.

But a few miles to the north, “any place you can think of that there would be water, they are growing it,” said Greg Meese, the patrol captain for the Cleveland National Forest.

Lasting degradation To make way for their crops, pot growers routinely use pesticides to remove swaths of native shrubs and grasses. Their plots often spread over dozens of acres. Taller trees are left as cover against aerial checks by police helicopters.

In a forest, the low-level plants keep dirt from washing into streams during rainfall. After the marijuana is harvested and winter rains come, the barren patches are highly susceptible to soil erosion. The result is that waterways in some of California's most pristine watersheds become polluted.

Marijuana growers also dam streams, haul in small pumps and run plastic irrigation lines through the forest to water their crops. The result can be dramatic changes to creeks that native fish rely on.

Often, the marijuana operations are highly sophisticated and may take weeks to set up.

A few years ago, Meese discovered an irrigation system that included pools up to 15 feet wide and just as deep.

“The head pressure in the (marijuana) garden hose was better than what you typically find in your home,” he said.

Growers commonly import rat poison to kill the critters that like to eat their profit-generating plants. They also use lots of chemical fertilizers to keep their plants green. These substances can easily contaminate nearby creeks, promoting algae blooms that can use up the oxygen in the water and kill fish.

In one case, Graber said his first clue about the presence of a major marijuana operation was extremely high nitrate levels that were detected during routine water monitoring.

A pot farm's most visible impact is trash. Marijuana growers commonly live with their plants for weeks or months at a time. At a large farm, the litter can weigh several tons and include miles of irrigation pipe.

“The camps themselves are filthy. There is garbage everywhere – anything you can think of that you would generate in your home . . . including human waste,” Meese said.

Threats to wildlife compound the other environmental concerns.

“At almost every (garden) we come across, there is some evidence of poaching, whether it be poaching salmon out of the creeks in Butte County or poaching deer,” said Patrick Foy, spokesman for the California Department of Fish and Game.

DOJ_NMG_0080691

In one instance, law enforcement agents found a camp where the tenants were making jerky out of three foxes they'd caught.

"These folks already have complete disregard for the law . . . so when anything that would serve as a food source comes by, they often take advantage of that," Foy said.

But perhaps the most serious danger is to unsuspecting hikers, hunters and mountain bikers who cross into marijuana farms, some of which are protected by booby traps and barbed wire. Most farms are well off the beaten path, but reports of run-ins between the public and growers have become routine.

On Sept. 30, for example, a hunter in the Mendocino National Forest said he stumbled onto the edge of a marijuana patch and found four men pointing rifles at him. They started firing but the hunter escaped unharmed, according to a Forest Service report.

Such incidents usually lead to raids by law enforcement teams. Once authorities haul away and destroy the marijuana plants, they remove the leftover garbage and leave the land to repair itself over time.

That was the case this summer on Palomar Mountain, where crews took out the trash and let nature take its course. Within several weeks, the native vegetation was resprouting, said Jim Dice, a senior environmental scientist for California State Parks.

"Any active restoration," he said, "would probably be more damaging than leaving it alone."

Pol Asked Fed Judge To Go Easy On Dealer (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, October 16, 2006

U.S. Rep. James P. McGovern asked a federal judge in Boston to go easy last week when sentencing a now twice-convicted drug dealer who was once moving up to 13 pounds of coke per month.

The Worcester Democrat wrote to U.S. District Court Judge F. Dennis Saylor IV asking leniency for Nicholas Police, 28, even though, McGovern said, "I am not personally familiar with Mr. Police or the specific details surrounding the criminal conduct with which he has been charged."

McGovern, a self-styled champion of human rights and the first pol to pledge his allegiance to Democratic gubernatorial hopeful Deval Patrick, could not be reached for comment last night.

It is unknown if his blind faith did any good. On Thursday, Saylor sentenced Police - an Assumption College graduate who once started his own record label - to the low end of the 8-to-10 years he was facing for pleading guilty to possession of cocaine and marijuana with intent to distribute.

The 8-year federal sentence absorbs the 3-to-5 years Police has been serving since 2004 on state cocaine trafficking charges.

In that case, according to a 2003 internal U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigative report, Police was arrested for trying to buy 40 pounds of pot from an undercover state trooper for $60,000 cash and 4 ounces of cocaine. He pled guilty.

The same DEA memo said Police kept coke in his Worcester apartment and, according to an informant who regularly brought drugs from him, was armed with "three handguns."

Still, McGovern, 46, wrote Saylor in a letter dated Sept. 18, "As a college graduate from a stable home environment with the support of loving parents, Mr. Police stands an excellent chance to be fully rehabilitated."

Acting U.S. Attorney Michael Loucks' office disagreed, arguing in their own written remarks to Saylor, "After his arrest on state drug charges (Police) had an opportunity to turn his life around and instead simply sold more drugs.

"If anything, (Police's) personal history and characteristics cut in favor of a higher sentence in that he grew up in a supportive, middle-class family and had the time and resources to obtain a college degree.

"Drug trafficking is a serious crime," prosecutors stressed. "It is not victimless."

Police's "devastated" parents declined to comment except to say they were "very appreciative of any help" McGovern was able to give their family.

Colombian Rebel's Trial To Begin In D.C. (AP)

By Hope Yen, The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0080692

AP, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The politically charged trial of a top Latin American rebel leader is set to begin in a 3-year-old kidnapping case that has the lives of three Americans hanging in the balance.

Opening statements were scheduled for Monday in the U.S. District Court trial of 56-year-old Ricardo Palmera, who is considered the most senior member captured from the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), on charges he provided material support to a terrorist group.

Palmera, better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad, was extradited in late 2004 after his capture in Ecuador. He is accused of conspiring to kidnap three Americans in connection with the February 2003 downing of a small U.S. airplane over a FARC stronghold in southern Colombia.

FARC is demanding that the U.S.-backed Colombian government release all of the group's imprisoned comrades, including Palmera, in exchange for the release of 62 hostages.

The hostages include three Americans on the plane _ Thomas Howes, Keith Stansell and Marc Gonsalves _ who authorities say were defense contractors involved in an intelligence-collecting mission.

Palmera is also charged in the killings of two others on the plane, U.S. pilot Thomas Janis and Sgt. Luis Alcides Cruz, a Colombian soldier, who were found near the crash site apparently shot to death.

The trial is the latest evidence of a stiffening U.S. stance against FARC, which the U.S. government considers a terrorist organization. Since 2000, the U.S. has given more than $4 billion to Colombia to fight the insurgency and the world's largest cocaine industry.

Family members of the hostages say they welcome Palmera's trial, although they acknowledge it could backfire. The three hostages are believed to be alive but haven't been publicly seen since a July 2003 video released by the rebels.

"I worry they may retaliate against the Americans," said Jo Rosano, mother of Marc Gonsalves.

Although Colombian President Alvaro Uribe has indicated an openness to a prisoner swap, he has suggested the release of Palmera and another leading rebel, Nayibe Rojas, is out of his hands because they had been extradited to the U.S. for trial.

A former banker from a wealthy family, the Harvard-educated Palmera says he took up arms to fight social injustice. FARC, along with a smaller leftist rebel group, has battled to topple the Colombian government for 42 years in a conflict that claims more than 3,000 lives every year.

He told The Associated Press in 1999 that he had chosen to "be alongside the progressive people fighting the 10 percent of landowners who are monopolizing 90 percent of Colombia's land."

The group funds itself through drug trafficking, extortion and kidnapping.

IMMIGRATION:

No Cause For Celebration (USAT)

By Dan Stein

USA Today, October 16, 2006

Overcrowded schools, congested highways, environmental stresses: We are a nation paving over its wildernesses while depending on our enemies for vital resources.

Why?

Because Americans have been blindsided by a government-mandated mass immigration program that's fueling this nation's runaway population growth. This growth was neither planned nor expected, but we feel the consequences every day.

The population of the USA will reach 300 million this week on a relentless march to half a billion before 2050. That's because about 80% of the current population growth in the USA is due to immigration policies — immigrants legally admitted, illegal immigrants, and births to immigrants after entering. Only a dramatic rollback in overall immigration can reverse these trends. The time to act is now.

Thirty years ago, the Rockefeller Commission could find no benefit from further increases in the size of the U.S. population. In 2006, it is hard to see how the massive government-mandated population growth of the past 30 years has improved life for most Americans. The addition of a staggering 100 million people since the late 1960s has accelerated virtually every environmental problem, exacerbated resource depletion, contributed to sprawl and congestion, and strained nearly all public services.

DOJ_NMG_0080693

Many of our nation's opinion elite now seem intent on further acceleration. The Senate recently approved an illegal alien amnesty and immigration increase that would have resulted in at least 66 million new immigrants arriving in the USA in the next 20 years — and we'd hit a billion people before 2100. This is insane, and only a massive public outcry and strong opposition in the House prevented this from occurring.

Our population future is entirely within our power to determine. Just as the government has mandated soaring overcrowding and congestion in the past several decades, it has the power to slow population growth by curtailing immigration and enforcing laws against illegal immigration.

It's time to talk about the purposes of immigration and its role in our national future. As responsible stewards for future generations, there is an urgency to consider how our decisions today will affect the nation they will inherit — before it's too late.

Dan Stein is president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR).

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's Press Secretary Is Raising Money, And Some Eyebrows (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

ST. CHARLES, Ill., Oct. 15 — Tony Snow draped his lanky frame across a wooden lectern, leaned forward and gazed out at 850 adoring Republicans who had paid $175 apiece to hear him speak. There was a conspiratorial gleam in his eye, as if he was about to reveal some deep inner secret from his new life as the White House press secretary.

"Yesterday," Mr. Snow declared, "I was in the Oval Office with the president ——"

He cut himself off, took a perfectly calibrated three-second pause and switched into an aw-shucks voice for dramatic effect: "I just looove saying that! Yeaaah, I was in the Oval Office. Just meeee and the president. Noooooobody else." The crowd lapped it up.

Live from the suburbs of Chicago — It's the Tony Snow Outside-the-Beltway Hour! Memo to White House press corps: you can't catch this show in the briefing room.

In the six months since Mr. Bush enlisted him to resuscitate a White House press operation that was barely breathing, Mr. Snow, a former Fox News television and radio host and a conservative commentator, has reinvented the job with his snappy sound bites and knack for deflecting tough questions with a smile. Now, he is reinventing it yet again, by breaking away from the briefing room to raise money for Republicans, as he did here on Saturday night for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert.

Mr. Snow, who will make 16 such appearances before Election Day, acknowledged he had entered "terra incognita"; to his knowledge, no other White House press secretary has raised money for political candidates while in the job. But with his star power from television and his conservative credentials, Mr. Snow, unlike his predecessors, is in hot demand.

His booking agent is the White House political shop, run by Karl Rove, the president's chief strategist. The White House is not keeping track of how much money Mr. Snow raises. His talks — Saturday night's was a cross between a one-man show and a religious revival — have attracted little scrutiny so far, but they are giving a much-needed boost to a party whose midterm fortunes appear increasingly bleak.

Yet even as the Republican establishment revels in his celebrity — "It's like Mick Jagger at a rock concert," Mr. Rove said — Mr. Snow's extracurricular activities are making some veteran Washington hands, including those with strong Republican ties, deeply uneasy.

"The principal job of the press secretary is to present information to reporters, not propaganda," said David R. Gergen, who served in the Nixon, Ford and Reagan administrations and also advised President Bill Clinton. "If he is seen as wearing two hats, reporters as well as the public will inevitably wonder: is he speaking to us now as the traditional press secretary, or is he speaking to us as a political partisan?"

DOJ_NMG_0080694

Indeed, Mr. Snow, whose commentary was so sharply critical of Mr. Bush that six months before he was hired, he referred to Mr. Bush as "something of an embarrassment," got the White House job in part because his independence gave him credibility with reporters. Kenneth J. Duberstein, former chief of staff to Ronald Reagan, said Mr. Snow must be careful not to damage that credibility.

"His profile should not be a political profile," Mr. Duberstein said, "but a press profile on behalf of the president."

But of course, press secretaries are naturally partisans; to think otherwise would be naïve. Ari Fleischer, Mr. Bush's first press secretary, said he saw nothing wrong with fund-raising appearances, "so long as you don't make yourself into red meat."

There was, for the record, not a shred of red meat in Mr. Snow's whirlwind performance Saturday night. For 28 minutes, Mr. Snow paced the stage, hands gesticulating, eyebrows arching, voice rising and falling, as he held forth without notes on the greatness of his job, his president and the American people.

Here was Mr. Snow on working in the White House: "The most exciting, intellectually aerobic job I'm ever going to have." On the nature of the American soul after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11: "There is an ember of greatness burning in every heart." On the intellectual acumen of his boss: "He reminds me of one of those guys at the gym who plays about 40 chessboards at once."

There were no mean words about Democrats. Mr. Snow, aware of his delicate balancing act, has vowed to "stick to factual defenses and advocacy for the president."

But as the keynote speaker, of course, he got to choose which facts to defend. There was no mention of Mark Foley, the Florida congressman who resigned in late September amid revelations he sent sexually explicit e-mail to teenage pages, or Jack Abramoff, the corrupt lobbyist, or anybody else who makes Republicans cringe.

That did not sit well with the local news media, which has been following accusations that Mr. Hastert's aides knew of the Foley scandal several years ago. Just two days earlier, Mr. Bush had been in Chicago to give the speaker his support. After his talk, Mr. Snow gave a mini news conference, and was asked why he failed to raise the Foley issue, "to reassure the people who are paying 175 bucks a plate here tonight."

"Because," Mr. Snow shot back tartly, "last time I checked Mark Foley didn't represent the people of this district."

Back in Washington, Mr. Snow has gained a reputation for such witty, if biting, repartee. Sound bites seem to flow from his tongue like water tumbling downstream.

Once, he accused the veteran White House correspondent Helen Thomas, who is 86 and has been covering presidents since Mr. Snow, 51, was in grade school, of "pestering the teacher." And when Bob Woodward painted a portrait of a dysfunctional Bush White House in his new book, "State of Denial," Mr. Snow dismissed it out of hand. "Sort of like cotton candy — it melts on contact," he said.

Jim Axelrod, chief White House correspondent for CBS News, said of Mr. Snow, "He's velvet glove and iron fist."

But when Mr. Snow missed a day of work to attend a fund-raiser after a leading Republican senator raised questions about the president's Iraq policy, Mr. Axelrod was critical. "This is the kind of thing you would expect the press secretary to be handling square on," he said.

Mr. Snow said his deputy handled the questions just fine.

It is often said that the White House press secretary serves two masters: the president and the press, which relies on the press secretary to advocate for the release of information. Mr. Snow believes that is true — to a point.

"The press secretary serves two masters," he said, "but not all masters are equal."

That gets back to his decision to headline fund-raisers, a decision he says he made only after soliciting the advice of colleagues, including the White House counsel, Harriet E. Miers. Mr. Snow said he set his own ground rules and would quit raising money if it interfered with his day job.

How will he know? "I have the feeling that all of us will know," he said. "You kind of know it when you see it."

Mr. Gergen sees this as the final "blurring of the lines between politics and news and entertainment." Mr. Fleischer says those lines blurred long ago.

"The modern-day briefing is not a briefing but a TV show," he said, "and Tony is the star."

DOJ_NMG_0080695

Mr. Snow said his stardom was only “the reflected glory of the president.” But on Saturday night, as he basked in the spotlight, his face beaming out at the crowd from six oversize screens, he looked awfully happy when he said, “Let me bring you greetings from the president of the United States.”

Hastert's Team Mentality To Be Tested As Foley Scandal Unfolds (WP)

By Michael Grunwald And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

On a table near the desk of the speaker of the House, nine bears sit in a wooden rowboat, eight with oars and one in charge. But the boat can't move unless the oars all row in the same direction. That's why House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) bought it.

Ever since an odd combination of scandal and turmoil catapulted Hastert into the speaker's job in 1999, the beefy former wrestling coach -- who's a bit bearlike himself -- has pushed House Republicans to work as a team. And he's had remarkable success. Largely unknown outside Washington, routinely underestimated as a powerless figurehead inside Washington, the accidental speaker has helped unify his fractious caucus, promote President Bush's agenda and expand the House's GOP majority.

"That rowboat is how he sees his job," said lobbyist David Thompson, a former Hastert aide. "He wakes up every morning thinking about how he can help the Republican team."

But now the Republican rowboat is leaking, and the longest-serving GOP speaker in history is at the center of the storm.

As investigators probe whether Hastert ignored warnings about former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.), Democrats across the country are portraying him as a symbol of a see-no-evil Republican House. They say Hastert's intense partisanship repeatedly blinded him to GOP misconduct -- not only Foley's inappropriate electronic messages with teenage pages but the corruption of lawmakers such as Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), as well as Bush's missteps in Iraq and New Orleans. Even Hastert's defenders acknowledge that his top priority as speaker has been protecting the GOP majority, not investigating the president or his own caucus.

Hastert doesn't seem capable of intense anything; he has a conservative voting record but a moderate temperament. He looks like a cross between actor Wilford Brimley and Jabba the Hutt, and his unassuming Midwestern public demeanor makes for dull television. He has shown none of the restless intellectual energy of Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), the frenetic revolutionary who preceded him as speaker; and he has often been dismissed as a frontman for former majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), the conservative firebrand who anointed him.

Hastert does not deliver the polished speeches and Sunday-show ripostes that typify leadership in Washington. But he sees himself as a coach, and his overriding goal is to help his team -- the Republican caucus, not the House. That team has enjoyed quite a winning streak over the past seven years. Republicans agree that if good-cop Hastert couldn't have done it without bad-cop DeLay, DeLay couldn't have done it without Hastert, either.

"Denny really smooths out the rough edges in the caucus," said former representative Rob Portman (R-Ohio), who is now Bush's budget director. "He's a kinder, gentler guy, but when he puts that big arm around you and says he needs you, it's hard to say no."

Coach Hastert is still beloved by his players, which is why he's survived the Foley mess so far. They appreciate how he listens to their concerns, shares credit and works overtime to keep the team together. He schlepped to 42 districts in August to try to maintain the GOP majority; it's no coincidence that his political arm is called the Keep Our Majority PAC.

"No one ever thinks he's put himself ahead of the team," said Rep. Adam Putnam (Fla.), a 32-year-old Hastert protÃ©gÃ© who chairs the Republican Policy Committee.

The question is whether Hastert's quiet commitment to winning at almost any cost will taint his legacy. He has always been loyal to team players like Foley, who defied his longtime supporters in the sugar industry last year to help Hastert pass a Central American trade bill. He eviscerated the House ethics committee after it admonished DeLay, and tried to change the House ethics rules to help DeLay stay in power. He didn't pay for a fundraiser he held at disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's restaurant until reporters asked about it two years later; the same month of the fundraiser, he wrote a letter opposing an Indian casino that Abramoff was trying to kill, and received $27,500 from Abramoff and five Indian tribes.

DOJ_NMG_0080696

Now Hastert finds himself disputing his leadership team over what he knew about Foley, insisting he did not know about Foley's inappropriate behavior until recently, while others say they warned him last spring. He is also under fire for a multimillion-dollar windfall he earned by buying land and then promoting a federal highway nearby.

Suddenly, Republicans such as Reps. Don Sherwood (Pa.) and Ron Lewis (Ky.) are canceling fundraisers with him, and Democrats are running ads attacking Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (Ind.) and Iowa candidate Mike Whalen for ties to the speaker. Even Hastert's lead over John Laesch, an unknown and under-funded challenger, in his heavily Republican district has shrunk to 10 points, according to a poll last week.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, says Hastert is a perfect symbol of a hypocritical party that always claimed to distrust government power until it discovered it liked the taste.

"When it's come to a choice between the integrity of the House or the Republican majority, he's always put his thumb on the scale to protect the majority," Emanuel said.

Hastert is 64 and diabetic, and many Republican insiders think he'll step down no matter what happens in November. But he's confounded expectations all his life.Focused on Winning

Denny Hastert was an unlikely politician, a mild-mannered country boy whose father owned a feed-supply store. He inherited a stolid Midwestern conservatism from his parents, and accepted Jesus as his savior in high school. His autobiography overflows with 1950s nostalgia, with Denny waking up at 3 a.m. to drive a milk truck, and operating on his own infected shoulder.

"I learned from experience that when bad things happen, don't complain," Hastert wrote. "You play the cards you're dealt and remember there is a way to win."

He became a teacher and coach, then led a charmed life in politics, winning a race for state representative in 1980 after a GOP incumbent got sick, then jumping to Congress in 1986 after another GOP incumbent got sick. (The designer of his first yard sign, Scott Palmer, is still his top aide; and is embroiled in the Foley case.) He was a popular backbencher, and DeLay made him chief deputy whip after the Republicans seized Congress in 1994.

In 1998, Gingrich was ousted and Rep. Bob Livingston (La.) chosen to replace him. Hastert didn't know Livingston well, so he made a date to see a private-sector headhunter. But the day before the appointment, Livingston suddenly stepped down because of an extramarital affair, and DeLay within hours orchestrated Hastert's ascension to speaker.

In his first speech as speaker, Hastert vowed to reach out to Democrats, declaring that "solutions to problems cannot be found in a pool of bitterness." But Hastert soon concluded there was no point working with Democrats. In his autobiography, he suggests he started to feel this way when he visited the office of House Minority Leader Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) and saw a "Gephardt for Speaker" sign. The relationship fell apart after a controversy over the House chaplain, when a few Democrats accused Hastert of anti-Catholic bias. "I have never seen a more cynical and more destructive political campaign," Hastert declared.

Hastert's team has shut House Democrats out of the governing process, refusing to allow their bills on the floor, limiting debate, calling midnight votes on complex bills that few have read. The Hastert Rule decrees that the House will consider only bills approved by the GOP caucus -- "a majority of the majority" -- and the speaker has enforced it with few exceptions.

"After the chaplain, he focused on winning," said lobbyist John Feehery, another former Hastert aide. "And with such a small majority, winning meant keeping the caucus together."

It was DeLay who spearheaded the K Street Project that made corporate lobbyists and rank-and-file Republicans so dependent on party leaders. And early in Hastert's tenure, DeLay whipped Republicans to defeat a resolution that Hastert supported on the Kosovo war, fueling perceptions that "the Hammer" was the real power in the House. But Hastert and DeLay agreed about almost everything else. And Hastert's influence gradually increased, especially as DeLay became distracted by scandal.

For example, Hastert encouraged an effort to oust Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) as a committee chairman after Smith bucked party leaders on veterans benefits. He angrily chewed out then-Sen. Robert C. Smith (R-N.H.) for holding up a bill full of pork-barrel projects for vulnerable House members before the 2000 election. He held open a 3 a.m. vote in 2003 on the prescription drug bill for three hours until he could round up a majority, and persuaded Rep. Robin Hayes (R-N.C.) to switch his vote to pass the Central American trade bill.

DOJ_NMG_0080697

Republicans say Hastert wins by appealing to party loyalty and taking care of members with earmarks, campaign cash and other goodies. Conservatives aren't happy that earmarks have quadrupled under the GOP Congress, but they recognize that the House has passed almost everything Bush has requested, including his efforts to expand executive power.

"He doesn't beat people over the head, but he's kept them in line," said conservative activist Grover Norquist. "Do I wish he made spending restraint a priority? Of course. But everyone knows he represents the caucus agenda, not his own agenda."

It is only recently that GOP oars have started rowing in disparate directions -- not only over Foley, but policy issues such as Social Security and immigration. Some insiders think the loss of DeLay has created a breakdown in discipline. "Everybody in the caucus loves Denny. The problem is that nobody really fears him," said one GOP lobbyist who spoke only on condition of anonymity. "I think he's done."

Hastert aides say he intends to fight to protect his job, and he intends to win. After all, his legacy is at stake on Nov. 7. He'll either be the unbeaten coach, or the coach who lost the big one. Either way, he'll be the speaker who presided over an era of unprecedented partisanship, an era when winning seemed to be the only thing that mattered.

A Secret In The Line Of Succession (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) shows no sign of resigning over the Mark Foley-House page scandal. But the mere suggestion that he might do so raises an intriguing political and constitutional question: Who would replace him while Congress is in recess?

The answer, it appears, is on a piece of paper locked away in the House clerk's office.

In a little-noticed action taken nearly four years ago, the House amended its rules dealing with the "continuity of Congress" in emergencies and the succession of speakers. The rule, cited recently in Roll Call, directs the speaker to "deliver to the Clerk a list of Members in the order in which each shall act as Speaker pro tempore . . . in the case of a vacancy in the office of Speaker."

Normally, "speaker pro tempore" is the title given for a few hours at a time to various members of the majority who preside over House sessions. But the rules revision made in January 2003, in response to worries about terrorist strikes that could wipe out large numbers of elected officials, appears to bestow upon a newly named replacement all the powers enjoyed by a full-time speaker elected by his peers.

That would include standing behind only the vice president in the line of presidential succession, said Sally Collins, spokeswoman for House administrators. But other House officials said it is extremely unlikely that a speaker pro tempore could assume the presidency before Congress would reconvene and elect a new speaker.

One thing is certain: The identity of the speaker-in-waiting is a closely held secret. Hastert's office declined to discuss the matter, citing security concerns, and the clerk's office confirmed only that Hastert's list is not made public.

Perhaps the biggest question, some lawyers say, is whether a House speaker -- full time or pro tempore -- can assume and keep the presidency under any circumstance. A statute, not the Constitution, lists the speaker's place in the line succession.

A case can be made that no one in Congress qualifies as an "officer" eligible to assume the presidency under Article II of the Constitution, said Neil Kinkopf, a professor of law at Georgia State University. The question may never be settled, he said, because the Supreme Court would take it up only if a speaker became president and someone challenged the action in court.

As for nightmarish constitutional what-ifs, Kinkopf said, "Imagine where the presidency falls not to the speaker, but to somebody on the speaker's secret list."

How A Blogger Put Himself In The Middle Of Mark Foley Story (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

MOORE, Okla. -- For three days, William "Wild Bill" Kerr huddled over an old computer, trying to solve a curious mystery.

DOJ_NMG_0080698

He wanted to figure out the identity of the congressional page who received the salacious instant messages that prompted Florida Rep. Mark Foley to resign Sept. 29, triggering the scandal that's rocking the House of Representatives just weeks before the election.

The 32-year-old conservative blogger said he felt the news media were distorting the story, and he suspected, among other things, that the page in question was over the age of consent.

Five days after the Foley news broke, Mr. Kerr thought he had found the former page -- a 21-year-old political operative who, by chance, worked about 10 miles north of Mr. Kerr's two-bedroom apartment here.

Mr. Kerr disclosed the results of his investigation Oct. 4, and gained the sort of instant celebrity made possible by the Internet age. Traffic to his site, Passionate America, shot up from a typical 32 hits a day to more than 40,000, he says. And the national media picked up the story.

Mr. Kerr is just a bit player in the unfolding Foley drama, but his experience shows the rapid-fire and harsh ways a scandal can unfold. Little-known bloggers -- with no inside connections, knowledge, or restraints imposed on mainstream journalists -- can play a big role furthering investigations, and affecting public perceptions of events.

Mr. Kerr drew immediate scorn from some fellow denizens of cyberspace after exposing -- without independent confirmation -- the name of Jordan Edmund. Mr. Edmund, through his lawyer, has neither confirmed nor denied that he was the page who engaged in sexually explicit Internet chats with Mr. Foley. But, as a result of Mr. Kerr's assertions, Mr. Edmund's name has been news on every major television network in America.

Mr. Kerr's own life has come under uncomfortable scrutiny. His 11-year-old son's photo was posted by one blogger in Ohio who hoped to spook Mr. Kerr, whom he believed had acted unethically.

It has been a heady time for the unemployed Mr. Kerr. He says he had been fired from several jobs over the years -- installing car radios, working for a call center -- and was discharged from the Navy in 1993 after faking a suicide attempt. He volunteers that years ago he was arrested for burglary. These days, he is a stay-at-home dad, taking care of his two sons, the younger of whom is 3 years old. Mr. Kerr's wife supports the family with her job at a call center here. Mr. Kerr says he has never met a famous person or a member of Congress. "I need to get out of the house more," he says.

He spends most of his days looking after his kids, working on his blog and doing an online radio show. He hosts it three times a week from his bedroom, hoping to break into conservative talk radio.

Mr. Kerr got into the business in 2003 with an independently published newsletter called the "Passionate Conservative." After a few issues, he concluded that the newsletter was too expensive to print, so he turned his attention to his Web site, where he has expressed the opinion that the Iraq war isn't going as badly as the media claim and that the Dixie Chicks should stop criticizing President Bush.

Shortly after ABC News broke the story on the Foley emails, Mr. Kerr says he felt the mainstream media were doing a poor job of covering the subject. He set out, he says, in hopes of "exposing ABC News as liars" and proving that at least one former page who received inappropriate messages from the Florida congressman was over the age of consent.

"Even if he was 17, he wasn't a victim. ... Was it a joke?" Mr. Kerr asks. And was the alleged transcript of messages a political dirty trick? Though he asked such questions, Mr. Kerr hastens to add, he wasn't defending Mr. Foley, whom he calls a "scumbag."

Mr. Kerr's investigation began when he found a Web page loaded on ABC's Internet server that wasn't easily accessible by the public. It contained what he believed to be the AOL screen name of a page who received messages from the congressman. He accomplished the feat by typing in variations on the Internet address that linked to the Internet page that featured Mr. Foley's instant messages. By slightly altering the address, he stumbled upon an older version of the exchange, which contained the AOL screen name ABC thought it had deleted from its site.

With the help of another conservative blogger Mr. Kerr had met online who goes by the name MsUnderestimated, Mr. Kerr then found the AOL profile of the page he believes received the instant messages. It said the person's first name was Jordan but didn't list a last name. Searching through congressional-page Internet sites, Mr. Kerr found a photo of a dark-haired page beaming at President Bush. The page was identified as Jordan.

DOJ_NMG_0080699

From there, Mr. Kerr and his friend began scouring Internet sites, looking for a surname. They eventually discovered Mr. Edmund's MySpace profile, which contained a photo of the same young man they had found on the congressional page Web site, along with detailed biographical information, such as where he went to school and whom he worked for, that seemed to track some of the information in the Foley instant messages posted by ABC. They also discovered that Mr. Edmund now lived in Oklahoma City and works for the gubernatorial campaign of Ernest Istook, a Republican congressman.

After connecting the dots, Mr. Kerr began emailing newspapers and prominent political bloggers on Oct. 3, hoping to make a big splash. He invited them to check out important news he promised to post the next day on Passionate America at 4 p.m.

He had not, however, contacted Mr. Edmund. Mr. Kerr says he called the Istook campaign, asked to speak to Mr. Edmund but didn't leave a message. He says he was getting ready to leave his apartment around noon on Oct. 4 to drive his rusty, gray Ford Tempo to Mr. Istook's campaign headquarters in downtown Oklahoma City when his laptop PC froze. When he rebooted, he discovered his investigation had been inadvertently published on his blog four hours ahead of time.

Mr. Kerr said it had been his intention to fix spelling errors, try to get comment from Mr. Edmund and add a last paragraph. But there's no taking things back in Internet publishing. Other bloggers had already seen his posting. Soon, other sites, including the widely viewed Drudge Report, linked to his investigation.

After Mr. Kerr's report, ABC News pulled the material off its server and apologized for failing to delete the screen name from the material Mr. Kerr unearthed from the ABC server.

ABC issued the following statement Oct. 5: "On Friday, ABC News published instant messages between a former page and Congressman Foley with the IM screen name of the teenage victim redacted. Immediately, we discovered that in one instance, the screen name of the teen on one IM exchange had not been properly redacted. ABC News immediately took down the posting, redacted the screen name and republished the posting. We certainly believed that we had taken care of the issue quickly. Last evening, after an inquiry from Matt Drudge, it came to our attention that a blogger was able to access our deleted file by typing in a slightly modified Web address. To be clear, no one visiting our Web site would have simply stumbled on the old version. We thank the blogger and Drudge for bringing this to our attention."

The day after Mr. Kerr named Mr. Edmund, Mr. Istook called a news conference on the sidewalk outside his campaign headquarters to defend his aide. He blasted Mr. Kerr, without naming him, as "an irresponsible Internet blogger."

Mr. Kerr was present at the news conference and afterward identified himself to reporters. At least one local TV news reporter put him on the air.

For Mr. Edmund, life hasn't been the same since. He talked to the FBI last week for its investigation of Mr. Foley. He still works for Mr. Istook's campaign but has been on an unofficial leave for a few days. His lawyer, Stephen Jones, who is best known for having represented Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh, complains the former page has been receiving threats. He has also been accused by bloggers of playing a joke on Mr. Foley and jeopardizing the Republicans' House majority in the November elections.

"I think it's disgraceful and clearly opportunistic," Mr. Jones says. Mr. Kerr "had his 3½ minutes of fame at the expense of a number of other people's reputations and careers," he adds.

Mr. Kerr got a letter from Mr. Jones asking him to cease any further efforts to publicize a connection between the former page and the disgraced congressman. Mr. Kerr promptly posted the letter on his blog.

He says he feels he did the right thing all along. His main complaint is that he hasn't been given the credit he deserves for his scoop. Reports usually refer to him only as "a conservative blogger."

Foley Loaded (WSJ)

By Christopher Hitchens

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

When I finally took a look at what we are all now doomed to call the "sexually explicit" emails between Rep. Mark Foley and the young male page, I found that I had an immediate difficulty in following the exchange. The congressman's side of the correspondence was denoted by his online name, while the page's name was asterisked to protect the innocent, but they both seemed to be talking about the same thing, or things. And it read for all the world like a chat between two dirty-minded adolescent boys. How often do you do this or think about that? How long is it? Material of that kind or "stuff like that," as we might say. Perhaps I have become jaded, or perhaps I lack some crucial moral element, but I could not see what was criminal about it, and I laughed when I read the solemn announcement from the FBI, promising to investigate whether an email could possibly have crossed an interstate line and thus aggravated the gravity of the offense. Our guardians never sleep . . . * * *

DOJ_NMG_0080700

The case would perhaps be altered somewhat if Mr. Foley had been the boy's teacher, or employer, or even priest. But pages are volunteers who are not on any one person's staff, and cannot be hired or fired by individual politicians. Neither coercion nor bribery was involved, as in the priestly scandals, which were quite often instances of actual rape. And the boy in this case was obviously a very knowing one, whose virginity was somewhere in his past. Indeed, it was Mr. Foley who seemed like the juvenile, or perhaps the case of arrested development. In what sense, then, does this constitute public business?

If there had been a sexual relationship between man and boy, it would almost certainly be illegal (as it would not have been if it were between man and girl) but there is no persuasive evidence that there was any sexual relationship. Indeed, it looks to me as if the email equivalent of phone-sex was the very thing that the wretched congressman was after, and probably the most he was likely to get. The youngster seemed able to look after himself, and to "turn" the conversation whenever it became too needy. It was all a bit sad and a bit sordid, but in the scale of things, no hanging matter or federal case.

I suspect that the hugeness of the current fuss must have something to do with our uneasy and only half-acknowledged awareness that the age of innocence is long over by the time that most of our children have turned 16. And this is why the Foley giveaway was contained in his ostentatious political activity in respect of the protection of minors. Have we not learned by now that the propensity of politicians to rave on about morality is often in direct proportion to their hypocrisy on the point? "Why dost thou lash that whore?" is the pertinent question asked of the lasher in "King Lear," and the answer comes plainly -- he hotly wishes "to use her in that kind" for which he whips her.

Anyone who has studied the fate of leading gay-bashers in American politics will know that the danger-signs are there from the start. Set your watch, and sure enough that fervent campaigner will be arrested kneeling abjectly on the men's-room floor. If the campaigner is an evangelist for purity and abstinence, he is booked to keep an early and certain date in a dreary motel, beseeching a drab hooker with an expired MasterCard.

Another free laugh, therefore, is provided by all the pompous talk about when exactly Mr. Foley's colleagues began to worry that his contents might be under pressure. Never mind the possible earlier emails, or signs of excessive interest in the problems of the pages. They should have known that Mr. Foley was a gay man in the closet, of course. And they should have taken alarm at the very first moment that he began to orate about sex-offenders and children. But the crucial word, here, is "closet." As long as a proper outward show of denial was made, Mr. Foley could as well have been asked to open the House's daily prayer session.

He has of course made himself even more contemptible by emitting easy babble about a hitherto unsuspected battle with "addiction," like a cuttlefish blowing off ink, and by alluding to a possible nasty moment in the woodshed with a man in holy orders. (If he does not come forward and say who that priest was, he is withholding evidence of a crime -- which really is against the law.) But the deafness, as well as the dumbness, of his party leadership is the truly extraordinary thing. It seems that the only offense of which he can possibly be accused, by the speaker of the House, is that of election-season indiscretion. In other words: How inconvenient!

Whether one is a stern defender of the present so-called "age of consent," or inclined to take a more relaxed view of dirty talk among males of all ages, or appalled at double-standards being applied for years to moralizing mediocrities, or merely concerned with that elusive thing the dignity of Congress, one has the right to expect more seriousness from the speaker than that. I am among the vast majority of people who never understood how Dennis Hastert got his job in the first place, or indeed how he has justified hanging onto it, and who would not really notice or care if he resigned it now. However, the speaker does have it in his power to do one decent thing before his term is up -- which is to get out while he can still save a rag of his integrity. There might be a person left in the world who believes that Mr. Hastert would have taken the same lenient or lazy view if Mr. Foley had been a member of the opposite party, but innocence on that level would actually be more sinister than cynicism. To add that the same would be true of Democrats if the situation was reversed is to say no more than we already -- from the forgiveness of numerous past "peccadilloes" -- have come to expect.

DOJ_NMG_0080701

For a "peccadillo," Mark Foley is gone from politics already. And a huge public holiday has been taken from the serious matters that confront the electorate. But before the waters close over this scandal, and before the next one surfaces, I would still like to know what crime was committed in this instance, and who if anyone was the victim. We like to think that we "learn" from such episodes, but I cannot think of any lesson that can be derived from this latest spasm of righteous indignation.

Mr. Hitchens is a columnist for Vanity Fair.

Loss Of Personal Data At Federal Agencies Is Widespread (WP)

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Federal workers at 19 agencies have lost personal information affecting thousands of employees and the public. Most of the data were lost or stolen. In a few cases, it was accessed by computer hackers, according to a report released Friday by the House Government Reform Committee.

In all, the committee reported 788 incidents involving the loss or compromise of sensitive information since Jan. 1, 2003. That was in addition to the "hundreds of security and privacy incidents" at the Department of Veterans Affairs.

"Data loss is a government-wide occurrence," the report said. "The vast majority of data losses arose from physical thefts of portable computers, drives and disks or unauthorized use of data by employees."

The committee asked all Cabinet agencies, the Office of Personnel Management and the Social Security Administration to report all losses of sensitive personal information since January 2003. The request came after a laptop with information for more than 26.5 million military personnel was stolen from a VA employee in May. The laptop was recovered, and the FBI said personal data had not been copied.

In many of the newly reported cases, agencies do not know the extent of the losses, the report said.

The Treasury Department reported the most incidents -- 340 -- including one in 2005 in which an IRS employee reported a missing computer drive a month after he had last seen it.

The Commerce Department reported 297 incidents since January 2003. But in another report in September, the department acknowledged losing 1,137 laptops since 2001; most had been used by the Census Bureau.

Other security breaches cited in the report:

· In August, a laptop containing personal information on 30,000 applicants, prospects and recruiters fell off a motorcycle driven by a Navy recruiter and was picked up by someone.

· In 2004, a federal student-aid contractor used a commercial shipper to send information on 8,290 borrowers. The package was lost in transit.

· A computer hacker used "malicious software" to access files containing personal information on 1,717 employees of the National Nuclear Security Administration in 2005.

· Two employees of a contractor for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services stole records containing information on 1,574 Medicare beneficiaries "for the purpose of identity theft" in 2005.

· A company that issues charge cards for the Interior Department lost data tapes containing information on 61,000 cardholders in 2005.

· In July, six Justice Department employees submitted computerized attendance reports containing Social Security numbers. The reports were downloaded 220 times and viewed 7,772 times.

GSA Consolidation Aims For More Transparency, Efficiency In Acquisitions (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

A major new acquisition division is officially up and running at the General Services Administration, but it remains a work in progress.

The new Federal Acquisition Service combines the Federal Technology Service and the Federal Supply Service, which together handle about $56 billion in annual sales. Officials hope that consolidation will improve financial controls; stem revenue losses in the old technology service and make for more efficient purchasing of services, equipment and supplies for federal agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0080702

James A. Williams , the new FAS commissioner, said the acquisition service will roll out in phases, in part to allow time to gather more feedback from members of Congress and GSA employees on how best to serve federal agencies. The GSA has put off restructuring 11 regional offices for at least 30 days.

At a news conference Friday, Williams said the GSA's top priority for the new service is to improve service to federal agencies. That effort will include a review of regional offices to see whether they should be organized by geography, by function or by a combination of the two, he said.

For the long term, the FAS will move to create a strategic plan that fits into the GSA's priorities and gives agencies "a total view of the GSA" that helps them track where their money is going for purchases of technology and other products, Williams said.

The GSA buys computers, software, telecommunications, cars, property and office supplies from the private sector and resells them to agencies, charging a fee for its management services. It is under pressure from federal agencies to become more competitive in the commercial market and more innovative in helping them find products and solutions.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who helped write the law authorizing the acquisition service, welcomed the reorganization. "These actions constitute the first major GSA reform in more than 20 years and will transform federal purchasing by bringing GSA in line with the commercial market it must capture for its federal agency customers," Davis said.

Larry Allen , executive vice president of the Coalition for Government Procurement, an association of companies that sell products and services to the government, said the FAS could become "a very large force in government acquisition" and "in essence, become a portal for a wide range of commercial item acquisitions."

But the FAS also could face risks when it acts as a buyer and a project manager for an agency, he said. That approach was used by the old technology service, which finished fiscal 2006 in red ink, partly because some agencies had become dissatisfied with GSA practices and partly because the GSA had to write off a contract management system that had not met expectations.

Allen said the procurement coalition hopes the FAS develops a number of options for vendors doing business with the government and maintains the GSA Schedules program. That program provides agencies with a list of approved, government-wide contracts and often permits direct transactions between contractors and agencies.

Williams said the FAS will feature four business operations: the office of general supplies and services, led by Joseph H. Jeu ; the office of travel, motor vehicle and card services, led by Barnaby L. Brasseux ; the office of integrated technology services, led by John C. Johnson , and the office of assisted acquisition services, led by Mary A. Davie .

Gary Feit has been named acting head of the office of strategic business planning and process improvement, Williams said.

Jon A. Jordan will serve as controller and Casey Coleman as chief information officer. Jeffrey A. Koses has been named the acting head of the FAS office of acquisition management.

G. Martin Wagner has been named deputy commissioner, helping Williams oversee the reorganization. Wagner also is serving as the acting head of the office of customer accounts and research.Appointee for MSBP

Chad Bungard , a key aide on the House federal workforce subcommittee, joins the Merit Systems Protection Board today as general counsel.

For the past four years, Bungard has served as chief counsel and deputy staff director for the House Government Reform subcommittee on the federal workforce and agency organization. On the subcommittee, headed by Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), he helped develop legislative proposals on an array of civil service issues, including law enforcement pay and electronic health records.

The merit board hears appeals from federal employees disputing major disciplinary actions taken by their agencies and conducts studies of the civil service.

Stephen Barr's e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Bush Niece 'Stands Up' To Poverty (WT)

By Michael Hunsberger

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

Lauren Bush -- model, Ivy Leaguer and niece of President Bush -- campaigned yesterday afternoon to help end world hunger at a Georgetown University conference on international development.

In the school's Red Square, she told a gathering of about 70 students from area colleges that rich nations need to help developing countries.

"We are here proudly as a generation that cannot stay seated in the face of poverty," she said.

The "Stand Up Against Poverty" event was part of a two-day campaign to set an official Guinness world record for the largest turnout for one cause, event organizers said.

Students said they wanted to draw attention to the lack of progress of the United Nations Millennium Development Goals to eradicate hunger, educate children, empower women, reduce mortality rates in women and children, deal with AIDS, and tackle debt in developing countries.

Miss Bush, 22, a senior at Princeton University, provided star power as a U.N. World Food Program student ambassador.

She said making it into Guinness World Records is one goal, but "the record we really want to break is the record of breaking promises" to developing countries.

Miss Bush carried a burlap shoulder bag that read "Feed the children of the world." She said the cost of each bag, which will be sold on Amazon.com at a price to be determined, is enough to feed one child for a year.

Douglas Coutts, a U.N. special adviser, said the first step to meeting the goals is to make sure people have enough food.

"It meets a very basic need," he said at a symposium held before the event. "Unless humans have the very basic elements they need for survival... nothing else matters to them."

Manuel Leon, a junior at Georgetown who helped organize the event, said his faith leads him to a concern for the poor and hungry.

"There is a strong correlation between social justice and justice," he said.

Have Hearings, Will Spend (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

If Republicans lose control of Congress next month, one big reason will be their record of overspending, especially on earmarks. What explains this GOP fiscal performance?

One answer comes from a new analysis by the Cato Institute on the Capitol Hill culture of spending under Republican rule. Examining hearings of 14 Congressional committees, political scientist James Payne found that 1,014 witnesses argued in favor of greater spending while only seven advocated less, an imbalance of 145 to 1. This is worse that a Cuban election.

In the same hearings, federal programs were described as "effective" or "efficient" 50 times more often than they were described as "ineffective" or "inefficient." Federal agencies were praised as "helpful" or "beneficial" in 990 instances, but they were scorned as causing "harm" or "hurt" only a dozen times. These are many of the same federal agencies that the U.S. General Accountability Office has found often can't pass the most basic financial audit.

"The problem is that advocates of spending overwhelm all aspects of Congressional communication," says Mr. Payne. Congressional hearings that are supposed to be impartial assessments of whether taxpayers get their money's worth become instead cheerleading sessions for bigger government. "No one wants to do the honest oversight of taxpayer spending," adds Oklahoma Senator Tom Coburn, a rare Republican exception to that rule.

In sum, Congressional hearings have degenerated into a lobbying process in which advocates sing the praises of the spending that their livelihoods depend on, while stroking the egos of the politicians as constructive philanthropists. Members of Congress begin to believe their own stacked juries. It's amazing they stopped spending at $2.7 trillion this year.

OTHER NEWS:

OPEC Sets Emergency Meeting On Output Cuts (WSJ)

By Ayesha Daya And Michael Williams

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080704

The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, hoping to forge an elusive deal to cut oil output and halt a slide in crude-oil prices, said it will hold an emergency meeting in Qatar Thursday.

OPEC has grown alarmed in recent weeks over the sharp decline in oil prices, from a high of about $77 a barrel in July to below $60 last week. Oil ministers have declared that OPEC intends to slash output by one million barrels a day, or about 4%, to prop up prices.

Behind the scenes, the oil czars have failed to nail down the all-important issue of how to allocate the cuts among the membership. Thursday's gathering in Doha -- coming during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan -- is a sign the cartel may be getting closer to putting aside its differences.

Still, one important OPEC country signaled there isn't a deal yet. Late Saturday, an official from the United Arab Emirates oil ministry said discussions were continuing ahead of the meeting. "Consultations continue between member countries," the U.A.E. oil official said. "We have not agreed to a cut in our production yet," the official said.

Qatar's oil minister, Abdullah bin Hamad Al-Attiyah, announced the meeting yesterday, saying representatives will discuss "the current market situation."

Many within OPEC, including the cartel's president, openly say the group has agreed it needs to cut one million barrels a day. Members have been debating whether a cut should come from the group's official output target of 28 million barrels a day, or from its actual output, estimated at 27.5 million barrels a day.

At the heart of the disagreement isn't the size of the cut per se but rather who will bear the burden of reducing output and thus forgoing revenue. OPEC effectively suspended its system of output quotas for each member last month to let countries adjust output on their own to more quickly respond to price movements. Now that members agree a sizable cut is needed, the issue of quotas is coming back to haunt OPEC.

Some members, including Saudi Arabia, Algeria and Libya, have ramped up output in recent years to meet soaring global demand and are producing above old quota levels. If they cut from old quota levels, some would have to make Draconian reductions to output. So, this group wants all members to cut output by a similar percentage from current levels. Others, including Venezuela and Iran, have had their production fall below their old output quotas. They want members who are producing above the old quota levels to cut the most.

Write to Ayesha Daya at ayesha.daya@dowjones.com1 and Michael Williams at michael.williams@wsj.com2

Consumer Unease With U.S. Health Care Grows (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, October 16, 2006

The U.S. health care system — touted as providing the best medical care in the world — is becoming more precarious to most Americans, who are rattled by rising costs, questions about quality and fears about the future.

"If you can afford it, it's the best health care system in the world, but, increasingly, people aren't able to afford it," says Clyde Bishop, a retired research scientist in Wilmington, Del.

He was among those polled about the health care system in a wide-ranging national telephone survey taken in early September by USA TODAY, ABC News and the Kaiser Family Foundation.

POLL: Americans weigh in on health care system, costs

The poll found a growing unease in America about the rising cost of health care, confusion about the causes, and a desire for major reform. But it also found a distaste for giving anything up to achieve sweeping changes.

An overwhelming 80% of respondents said they were dissatisfied with the total tab the nation spends on health care, estimated to hit $2.2 trillion, or $7,129 a person, this year. The survey, based on a national sample of 1,201 adults, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

"Every year, we wind up paying more and getting less coverage," says Tammy Dougherty of El Paso. Dougherty, another poll respondent, has health insurance through her husband's job.

Few, however, correctly singled out the biggest drivers of spending, choosing instead culprits that get a lot of attention — such as profits of medical companies or malpractice lawsuits — but play a lesser role.

DOJ_NMG_0080705

Quality was also an issue: Only 44% said they were satisfied with the quality of health care in the USA, although nearly 90% said they were satisfied with their own medical providers.

While solutions to rapidly rising costs remain elusive, some early steps are being taken to try to slow the rise and improve quality. For example, many U.S. hospitals are working to reduce errors and cut complications, steps that not only improve care but can also reduce costs.

A handful of researchers are conducting cost-benefit studies, comparing one type of drug or treatment with another to find which gives the best value. Results may lead some insurers or government programs to limit the use of less-effective treatments or to charge patients more if they choose the less-effective, more-costly option.

Meanwhile, other researchers are pondering the reasons behind the vast differences on what is spent for certain surgeries or end-of-life care from one part of the country to another.

Even with such efforts, most economists predict that health care spending will continue to grow faster than the economy — and far faster than wages.

Already, the average yearly cost of the most popular type of insurance plan offered by employers hit $11,765 this year, with the average employee paying $3,226 of that total, a Kaiser Family Foundation study shows. Average premiums have risen 87% since 2000, while workers' earnings have risen 20%.

The quality movement is still in its early stages.

"It's the beginning of a campaign that looks promising," says Uwe Reinhardt, a professor of economics at Princeton who focuses on health care costs. "In some instances, (the quality movement) will probably reduce costs. But some (quality efforts) will actually cost money."

So what's driving the rapid rise of health care spending ?

Major drivers of medical inflation include how rapidly Americans embrace new drugs and technology, which are often more expensive than older treatments. Public demand is a big factor. Patients generally want the newest treatment, equating new with "better," even before solid proof exists.

Other factors include rising prices for medical services, particularly hospital prices, growing labor costs and waste and inefficiency. America's obesity epidemic is also fueling spending on medical care.

Americans did not always select the same culprits for rising spending as do economists.

In the survey, only 28% picked new drugs, treatments and technology as among the single biggest factors, while the smallest percentage, 12%, said costs are rising because more people are getting better medical care than ever before.

Half of respondents blamed profits of drug and insurance companies as one of the single biggest factors, while 37% blamed too many medical malpractice lawsuits, and 36% blamed doctors and hospitals making too much money.

"Profits might explain part of why costs are high, but it doesn't explain why costs are rising," says Paul Ginsburg, an economist at the Center for Studying Health System Change. New treatments and increased demand are fueling the rise, he says.

"The thing I find dismaying is the public doesn't recognize that it's the additional medical care they're getting that's driving costs up," Ginsburg says. "They have to come to grips with the fact that we won't be able to slow the rise in costs without making trade-offs."

Misplaced focus

Reinhardt also says the focus on profits is misplaced.

Hospitals typically have margins of 5% or less, insurers range from 5% to 8%, while drug industry profits are higher, in the 15% to 20% range, he says. But, he says, even those profits can't be blamed for rapidly rising health care spending.

"I once calculated that if you rebated all the drug company profits to patients, health spending would only go down by 1.2%," he says.

Poll respondents were closer when it came to fraud and waste, with 37% choosing it as one of the biggest drivers. Reinhardt and others have said that fraud along with overuse and waste are big players in rising costs. Overuse and waste can include unnecessary treatments, tests repeated because original results were misplaced or reliance on ineffective treatments.

DOJ_NMG_0080706

"Several credible estimates have come up with around 30% of health care is unnecessary," says Richard Deyo, professor of medicine at the University of Washington in Seattle. "I suspect even an ideal system would have some unnecessary care delivered, but 30% seems a high percentage."

Few saw any consumer responsibility in rising costs, with only 29% citing Americans' unhealthy lifestyles as one of the biggest factors.

The poll results point out the difficulty policymakers will have in trying to slow costs. While medical care has certainly improved over the years, it has also become more expensive. Reinhardt says people can't be blamed for wanting 2006 medicine, rather than 1980s medicine or 1960s medicine, but they have to realize it comes at a cost.

"The overarching theme is that this cost explosion isn't my fault," Reinhardt says. "It's all these other culprits, such as drug company profits or this or that. If we don't really know the right target and shoot at the wrong target, we'll never get where we need to go."

No magic solution

Health policy experts say there is no magic solution to controlling costs.

"The current era of shifting costs to workers has hurt working people but has not had much impact on health care costs," says Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation. "But the American people have little appetite for slowing the spread of new medical technology, which is the biggest driver behind rising health care costs."

Current cost-control efforts include evaluating hospitals and doctors based on their quality and cost, then having insurers channel patients to the most efficient providers. Some insurers are also experimenting with paying hospitals and doctors a premium for providing the best care with the fewest problems.

Another idea now in vogue in political and health policy circles — that patients will be more judicious users of medical care if they have to pay for more of it themselves — is not popular with poll respondents. When asked if they would favor an insurance policy that covered mainly major medical problems, with more routine doctor visits and treatments paid for out of pocket after the patient exhausts a set pool of money, 66% opposed.

Such an idea is one of the cornerstones of the so-called consumer-driven movement in the USA, with proponents touting high-deductible insurance policies that are linked with tax-free savings accounts into which patients and/or their employers could deposit money to be used to meet the policy's deductibles. Money not used each year would roll over into the next.

Supporters say such plans will counter a belief fostered by HMOs — with low or no deductibles and small fees for seeing doctors — that health care was cheap. But critics, such as Consumers Union, say the approach will hurt those who have chronic illnesses and use medical services more than average and would never be able to save.

Only a few million such policies now exist, but benefit experts say they expect more employers to offer them in the coming years.

Among those who favored the idea was poll respondent Heather Jefferson, who says health savings accounts may get people to plan for medical costs.

"It's along the lines of setting aside for a rainy day," says Jefferson, 34, of Tucson. "A lot of people don't plan ahead and prepare themselves for the car breaking down or getting sick and not being able to work."

Rather than controlling costs, most of the reform ideas under debate in Congress and the states focus more on reducing the number of uninsured, which may or may not reduce total costs. Covering more people with insurance would likely increase spending initially, as more seek medical care. In the long run, the spending growth might slow if more patients receive preventive care or treatment in the early stages of a disease.

One of the longest-running debates is whether the U.S. should adopt some kind of universal coverage, such as those systems in Europe or Canada, where everyone has health care, financed mainly through taxes. Or if it should stick with the current system, which relies on voluntary efforts by employers and a private market.

Most survey respondents, 56%, said they prefer a universal system. But support for changes to the system dropped to about one-third or less when respondents were asked if they would support universal coverage if it included restrictions on the doctors or treatments they could have or if it cost them more than they're now paying in taxes or premiums.

DOJ_NMG_0080707

Significant majorities of poll respondents supported ideas for more incremental, but nonetheless controversial, efforts to reduce the number of uninsured:

• 79% support requiring businesses to offer health insurance to full-time employees, and 64% said employers should be required to cover part-timers, as well.

• 65% support requiring all Americans to have health insurance, either from an employer or another source, with tax credits to help low-income people pay for it.

• 82% support expanding other government health programs such as Medicaid or the Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides insurance to nearly 4 million children and some parents, to cover more people.

Fewer employers offer benefits

Most poll respondents recognized that it is better to have insurance than none at all.

About six in 10 told pollsters that they fear rising costs — or a job loss — will someday banish them from the ranks of the insured.

Bishop, 66, who gets health coverage through his wife's employer, says he was forced to retire earlier than he had expected from his research scientist job for a plastics company and is looking for a new job.

While worried about his own opportunities, Bishop says, he also fears for the country in an era that is seeing a shrinking percentage of employers offering insurance and other benefits. Last year, the percentage of people who received health insurance through their jobs was 59.5%, Census Bureau data released in August show. That's the lowest rate since 1993 and below the recent peak of 63.6% coverage in 2000.

While most larger companies offer insurance, smaller companies increasingly do not.

"No one wants to give you pension benefits or health plans or anything else these days," Bishop says. "It's a dissolving of the middle class."

Nationally, nearly 16% of the population, or 46.6 million, are uninsured, according to recent Census estimates.

Slightly more than half of those polled, 52%, say the rising number of uninsured is a "critical problem" for the USA.

"My daughter does not have any health care, and she has four little ones," says Dougherty in Texas. "If it weren't for Planned Parenthood, where she can go and get care, she would not have any medical care at all."

To Predict Losers In A Power Shift, Follow The Money (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Pharmaceutical and oil companies had better beware if Democrats make major gains in the upcoming elections.

If Democrats win control of one or both chambers of Congress as many analysts expect, those and other industries could lose a raft of the legislative goodies they've garnered in recent years and also find themselves under congressional investigation.

Such are the spoils when power shifts in the federal legislature. Some groups that have been getting what they want from Congress for a long time won't anymore. Others that have failed repeatedly to get their agendas passed will succeed more often.

How can we guess the winners and losers? Just follow the money.

The best way to identify Democrats' friends and foes is to examine patterns of campaign contributions. Groups that have given much of their money to Democrats can be considered their true allies and will likely benefit from the items that Democrats push on Capitol Hill. Groups that have been delivering most of their campaign largesse to Republicans will probably see their druthers suffer under a more Democratic-leaning Congress.

Political scientists debate endlessly whether political money buys congressional action or if organized interests just naturally shower with cash the lawmakers and parties that champion their causes. What isn't in dispute is that fundraising is an excellent guide to who will receive the most attention in Congress -- both good and ill.

Democratic leaders have signaled, in campaign commercials and elsewhere, that they intend to attack pharmaceutical and oil companies in a variety of ways when Congress reconvenes. That isn't a surprise; neither industry has been very supportive of Democrats in recent years. Since 2002, drug firms have given about two-thirds of their donations and energy companies have given roughly three quarters of theirs to Republicans, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics (CRP).

DOJ_NMG_0080708

Other industries that would be wise to watch their backs if Democrats take over include insurers, electric utilities, manufacturers, chemical makers, home builders, general contractors, food processors, railroads and building material producers -- all of which gave 60 percent or more of their contributions to Republicans since 2002, according to the CRP's statistics.

Democrats are likely to play favorites as well. If they win, they will almost surely give high priority to the wishes of labor unions and trial lawyers, which have generally been dismissed by Republicans. The CRP classifies the political action committees of both as either solidly or strongly Democratic. Environmental groups, which work closely with Democrats, would also have a leg up.

Each party knows precisely who its strongest backers are and who are its greatest enemies.

That's why both Republicans and Democrats summoned their most reliable financial backers to separate meetings on Capitol Hill at the end of last month. Given the enormous stakes and potential peril of the midterm elections, party leaders pleaded for every spare nickel and by all accounts, donors coughed up plenty.

Before Congress left town, major donors had an absolutely crazed fundraising period. One labor lobbyist I know attended five fundraisers and receptions in a single night. A business lobbyist said he received seven faxed invitations to fundraising events within 20 minutes.

The loyalties of most PACs -- which are pools of money from individuals that are dispersed by companies, labor unions and interest groups -- aren't predictable. Corporate PACs in particular are notoriously fickle. When ranked for their partisan leanings by the CRP, many company-controlled PACs fall in the category of "fence-sitters" -- neither overwhelmingly Republican nor Democratic in their campaign donations. These include some of America's most prominent corporations such as Citigroup, BellSouth and General Electric.

If such companies do give more to the lawmakers of one party, that party is almost always the one in power or the one that's about to be in power. That's why Democrats this year have been getting a bit more money than usual from some PACs. The latest full set of fundraising numbers don't come out until the end of this week. So far, several of the country's largest PACs, such as those of the National Association of Realtors and United Parcel Service Inc., have given a slightly higher percentage of their dough to Democrats than they did two years ago.

The increase is tiny, but if Democrats win a notable number of additional congressional seats, that advantage will grow and become to some extent self-perpetuating. The cause is simple: Company PACs are political investment vehicles. Like any investors, PAC managers don't want to risk too much.

That's why 80 percent of the money donated by PACs to federal candidates go to people who are already in office. They are, after all, the people who can vote in Congress. What's more, they also usually win reelection -- 90 percent of the time or better. Some PACs are actually prohibited from contributing to non-incumbents for these reasons.

"To maximize their dollars, nearly all PACs -- particularly among business groups -- give the overwhelming proportion of their campaign dollars to incumbents," the CRP's Web site says.

Industries and interests will always have their partisans, and therefore some will do better than others depending on which party rules in Congress. But a lot of corporations are opportunists and not ideologues. They will tilt whichever way improves their chances of winning.Lobbying the Statehouse

An increasing number of former members of Congress turn to lobbying for their second careers. Now the Center for Public Integrity says the trend is hitting state capitals as well.

After a six-month study, the nonpartisan research group concluded that more than 1,300 former lawmakers registered to lobby state legislatures last year. Texas and Florida had the most legislators-turned-lobbyists, registering 70 and 60 ex-lawmakers, respectively. Virginia had the smallest number: six.

Just as it is in Washington, the highest-ranking former lawmakers were especially drawn to the lucrative profession. At least 98 former legislators who had been state House speakers, state Senate presidents or presidents protempore worked as lobbyists in 2005.

It's official then: Public service is a steppingstone to private profit.

DOJ_NMG_0080709

Jeffrey Birnbaum writes about the intersection of government and business every other Monday. His e-mail address iskstreetconfidential@washpost.com.

Down To The Wire (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

ELIZABETHTOWN, KY.-The first caller into Rep. Ron Lewis's "tele-town hall meeting" last week neatly captured the grim public mood. "When are you going to bring some of our boys home?" the caller demanded. "That process is not too far into the future," Lewis replied. "The last time I checked there were 250,000 [Iraqi] defense force personnel being trained."

The woman on the line from Owensboro wasn't about to let the six-term Republican congressman off so easy. "We were starting to turn things around, then the Iraqis start killing each other," she said. Lewis agreed, suggesting it was up to Sunnis and Shiites to end the growing sectarian violence. The exchange was nearly as scratchy as the one between Lewis and a caller in the previous week's town hall meeting, who asked what the congressman was doing about the Mark Foley congressional page mess.

Those are the kinds of questions that appear to have turned Lewis's re-election bid in Kentucky's Second District-the most pro-George W. Bush district in this red state in 2004-into a real footrace in just the past couple of weeks. That's partly because Lewis is facing his first well-funded challenger, a retired Army officer who calls himself "The Colonel" and whose campaign slogan is "Faith. Family. Freedom." But with the ongoing investigation into the Foley scandal, continued bloodshed in Iraq, and Bush's approval numbers tumbling back to their basement levels, this central Kentucky race is just one in which a bunch of Republican-held seats have suddenly become competitive less than a month before Election Day. "Normally, as the election moves closer, you have a declining number of battleground districts," says election analyst Rhodes Cook. "To have the field of play expanding is unusual." Whether Democrats wind up winning in these districts will determine whether they can go beyond picking up the 15 seats they need to claim just a bare majority in the House to a landslide victory.

In the past 10 days, the authoritative Cook Political Report has moved six GOP-held House seats into the "competitive" column, bringing the number of vulnerable Republican seats to 43, compared with just nine competitive races in districts held by Democrats. The Rothenberg Political Report, another respected elections newsletter, last week raised the projected number of seats the Democrats will pick up next month from the 15-to-20 range to 18 to 25, its first such recalibration since August.

"Arrogance." In many of the newly competitive House races, and in more than half a dozen already competitive races that have tightened further in recent days, Democratic challengers say the Foley scandal was a turning point. Mike Weaver, challenging Lewis, says the scandal played into his main campaign themes: that Democrats can be just as strong on "values" issues as Republicans-Weaver says he opposes abortion rights and is anti-gay marriage-and that the GOP monopoly in Washington has the party putting its interest ahead of the nation's, demanding a "restoration of balance" that a Democratic-controlled House would provide. In a conversation with farmer Steve Wooden, who has seen crop prices fall as costs for seed, fuel, and health insurance have risen, Weaver says the scandal shows how Republicans have fallen out of touch with ordinary Americans-just as he says they have by getting too cozy with the agricultural, oil, and health insurance companies that Wooden blames for his economic woes. Standing beside his John Deere combine, Wooden, 51, nods in agreement. "To have a congressman send those E-mails illustrates their arrogance," he says. "There's too much of that in Washington." The scandal is taking its biggest toll on GOP incumbents by denying them the chance they'd ordinarily have, with control of the White House, to set the terms of the political debate. "Republicans can't break through to change the conversation," says the Cook Political Report's Amy Walter. "The debate now is over who knew what when about the page scandal, rather than, 'What are the Democrats going to do about immigration, security, taxes?'"

Even for some Republicans, Washington has become toxic. Last week, Lewis canceled an event here with House Speaker Dennis Hastert because of questions concerning what he knew about Foley's behavior. "I'm not accusing the speaker of anything," Lewis says. "But I wanted to ... not be in contact with the speaker until I found out what's going on." Lewis trusts voters to distinguish between the actions of Foley, the GOP leadership, and himself: "To bring every Republican ... into this and allow them to be tainted would be like saying the pope had been tainted by some priests within the Catholic Church."

DOJ_NMG_0080710

The National Republican Campaign Committee, meanwhile, notes that most voters continue to express approval of their own representative. A Washington Post/ABC News poll last week found that 64 percent of Americans think Republican leaders tried to cover up the Foley scandal but just 23 percent trusted the Democrats to handle it any better. The NRCC says it is unconvinced that races beyond those involving members of the leadership, like NRCC Chair Tom Reynolds, who according to one poll has fallen behind in his re-election race, will be affected by Foley. Of the race in Kentucky's Second, NRCC spokesman Carl Forti says, "It's not even on our radar screen."

For most of the newly competitive races, the Foley scandal laid bare Republican vulnerabilities that had been there before. Even in seemingly marginal districts, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee recruited candidates early on who had strong fundraising ability and compelling personal stories that made it difficult to peg them as liberal Democrats, including military vets like Weaver and Charlie Brown, whose race against California Rep. John Doolittle was recently declared competitive by the Cook Report.

"The next layer." In other places, demographic changes have made Republicans vulnerable. In California's 11th District, which encompasses the Central Valley, a stream of independent and moderate voters from the Bay Area and the Silicon Valley have diluted Republican Rep. Richard Pombo's conservative agricultural base. University of California-Berkeley political science Prof. Bruce Cain says that Pombo's fate might be in the hands of those newcomers, concerned about Pombo's conservative environmental policies and his ties to disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Pombo got roughly $43,000 in donations from Abramoff and his associates. Recent press reports have also focused on an oil firm called VECO Corp., which has contributed about $18,000 to Pombo's re-election campaign. The company is named in an FBI investigation into political corruption in Alaska. Pombo challenger Jerry McNerney is concentrating his grass-roots campaign on the district's new housing developments. With California's 11th District race now in the "competitive" column, Democrats are facing tough decisions about where to spend their money. "There's not an unlimited amount," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean tells U.S. News. "And instead of focusing money on fewer races, you're focusing more money on more races." Much of the $630,000 of TV ad time the DCCC had reserved for Democratic challenger Angie Paccione in Colorado's Fourth District was canceled last week, even though the DCCC recently enrolled Paccione in its "Red to Blue" program for the most competitive candidates; a Denver Post poll last week showed a 10-point lead for incumbent Rep. Marilyn Musgrave.

At the same time, more competitive races have forced Republicans to pull money from districts where they hoped to unseat Democratic incumbents. "Because we've looked beyond the races in play to say 'What's the next layer?' ... we are in a position ... to handle the risk of the increasing number of seats," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman tells U.S. News, "and also ... to say, "Now this seat's safe-we don't have to worry about it."" Asked to name a Republican-held seat that has gone from competitive to safe, Mehlman declined. But the RNC chair warned incumbents of the difficult political environment early in the election cycle, and many, including Lewis, amassed $1 million-plus war chests.

Indeed, marginal districts like Kentucky's Second are still uphill fights for Democrats, even as they have tightened. "Weaver looks good on paper, but Lewis hasn't done anything particularly wrong," says the Rothenberg Report's Nathan Gonzales. "That's what Democrats are wrestling with nationwide." After Lewis fielded the initial call about Iraq last week in his phone-in town hall meeting, none of the other callers asked him about the war-or about Foley. Most urged him to crack down on illegal immigration, to support the constitutional amendment banning gay marriage, and thanked him for helping them secure disability or veteran benefits. They were asking, in other words, for more of the same.

Free Fall? What Free Fall? (USNEWS)

By Will Sullivan

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

With November 7 on the horizon and polls showing GOP control of the House and Senate in serious jeopardy, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman is racking up the frequent-flier miles. This week alone, the former Bush campaign manager will be in Florida, Georgia, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin, preparing candidates for the sprint to the finish. Coming from Michigan and on his way to Ohio last week, Mehlman sat down with U.S. News to discuss why he's not as pessimistic about

DOJ_NMG_0080711

Election Day as the latest poll numbers might suggest, as well as his thoughts on North Korea's nuclear test, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential prospects, and his own plans for the future. Excerpts:

After a number of polls this week showed very bad results for Republicans, some analysts said the party is in free fall. Is that accurate?

Let me first say I do think that we are in a very challenging environment. I think that the situation with [Rep. Mark] Foley has made it even more challenging, but ... I have not seen a significant impact in most of the races around the country, and I certainly haven't seen a free fall. In the last 25 years, the electorate has ranged from plus-4 Democrat to plus-2 Republican in '02. Every one of these [new] polls has an electorate that looks more Democratic than any electorate has looked in 25 years. If the American electorate is twice as Democratic as it's been in 25 years, it's going to be a bad day for us, but that's a huge assumption.

What has been the political impact of North Korea's nuclear tests?

It seems to me people who have consistently been on the record against missile defense and whose secretary of state tried to ply the North Korean dictator with a signed basketball by Michael Jordan are not necessarily the best people to be critical of what's happening in North Korea. I think one thing we know was the attempt to appeal to the better side of Kim Jong Il did not work, and so it seems to me that the party ... that said there is an axis of evil, that said we need missile defense, and that said we need to be tough in dealing with this threat is the one that is likely, if you're looking at the issues and looking at the facts, to benefit in terms of the public's focus on this.

Has the Republican push for stricter immigration alienated Hispanic voters?

Do I believe that being for border security is inherently anti-Hispanic? No, I think that's ridiculous. If you lived in America for five generations or for five months and you were in the World Trade Center, your life was at risk, and the key is to control the border because of the need of protecting our national security. Whether you're Hispanic, whether you're Asian-American, Jewish-American, Anglo-American, you name it, that's in your interest.

How is this election like or unlike 1994, when Democrats lost control of the House?

First of all, in '94 the Democrats were particularly [vulnerable] to a terrible year because they had a lot of open seats and a lot of those open seats were in Republican presidential districts. There are 20 Republican open seats this year; 17 of the 20 Republican seats this year are Bush-leaning seats, meaning Bush won those districts with an average of 61 percent. The second difference from '94 is the people who are in the toughest races; people like [Connecticut Rep.] Nancy Johnson and [New Mexico Rep.] Heather Wilson and others are very battle tested. Important difference No. 3 that I think is going to be relevant this year is that Republicans had a positive agenda they could be for, and voters in '94 embraced many of the concepts behind that positive agenda. You don't see that at all this year.

After Hurricane Katrina, how successful can you be at winning over black voters?

Our ability to target voters differently means there are conversations going on in the black community that maybe didn't go on as aggressively before. In a world where you have a limited budget, if you're targeting entirely by geography, to target a neighborhood where you're able to get 1 in 10 votes or 1 in 5 votes may not have been cost effective. On the other hand, if you're targeting based on lifestyle, which is what we do today, you can be much more effective at reaching out to people.

Do Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani have a chance of winning the 2008 presidential nomination?

As the referee, I don't think it's appropriate to speculate on the quality of the teams, but I will say that I think that we have a lot of potentially very strong candidates running.

What about Sen. Hillary Clinton?

I think that the asset and the liability that Mrs. Clinton brings to the table is the passion she arouses in voters. And she arouses passion in their side; she arouses passion in our side.

Will you run again for chairman?

I'm going to decide in the next few weeks. I'm not going to decide with regard to the election. It'll be as much as anything a personal decision. I mean, I've now traveled over 300,000 miles.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

DOJ_NMG_0080712

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, October 15, 2006

School Boss's Fear: Failing Jeopardy!

When the dream invitation from host Alex Trebek's team came in last spring to play Celebrity Jeopardy! Education Secretary Margaret Spellings was wildly happy-and equally worried. What if she bombed? Worse: What if she failed against the Hollywood stars she'd face? Couldn't happen, she vowed, scrambling to set up Jeopardy! study halls and prepare notebooks the likes of which she hadn't seen since graduating from the University of Houston. Spellings's biggest concern? Music, movies, and TV. "I was a little worried about pop culture categories like TV and movies," she confides to Whispers. "Fortunately, I had two teenage daughters helping me do my homework-a nice change for them!" Good thing: In her taping this month for the show being broadcast in November, Elton John was one of the categories.

More help came from her staff, who looked up past categories for strategy and trivia tips. "We helped her on everything from Shakespeare to Broadway musicals," says one. The chatty Texan took care of the charm, gabbing with Trebek about their shared Ukrainian heritage. Now, Jeopardy!'s rules block us from revealing the results, but rest assured, her charity choice, ProLiteracy Worldwide, got a nice check. That's because she didn't get skunked. "She was happy she didn't come in last," says a pal. Or in Jeopardy! form: What is relief, Alex?

The Newtster's New Friends at 1600

The Newt Gingrich for president buzz is back, and we're hearing it from a rather odd corner of Washington: 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. Top Bushies tell us that they think the former disgraced House speaker would make a great president. Gingrich thinks big, they say, and represents the old Reagan-style of smaller-government conservatism. As for his past marital infidelity, they think it's a nothing-burger, especially if he faces Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, whose hubby had his own problems she'd rather forget.

Now Pinch-Hitting for...Paul Harvey

Add successful radio host-and Paul Harvey fill-in-to former Sen. Fred Thompson's leading roles. The Watergate investigator turned Hollywood star turned senator and now Law and Order prosecutor turned up on ABC Radio last week during the first of two weeks he's taking over for Harvey. We had to ask: Is it as easy as Harvey makes it sound? "No way," says the folksy Thompson, whose wife is about to deliver their second child, a son, any day now. "He's the master. It's like pinch-hitting for Babe Ruth." Naturally, the news and comments during his two shows daily are laced with politics. But the Tennessee conservative avoids partisanship. "It's not," he says, "like what I say when I go out to raise money for my Republican friends."

For the Record, Dean Hates Fox

Just in case you're wondering if Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean attended the Fox News Channel anniversary party last week, the answer is simple. No way, no how. "I happen to despise Fox News because I think they're nothing but the propaganda arm of the Republican Party," he tells us. But he doesn't hate everybody there, even the Fox News Sunday host who recently grilled Bill Clinton on Iraq. "Let me just go on the record as saying I happen to like Chris Wallace. Let me just do that," he says.

New Map Out West (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

AURORA, COLO.-Sipping hot tea from ceramic cups, Alex and Mirlin Rohr and their friends Betty Williams and Ray Hanson looked up politely when a smiling stranger approached their table at the Golden Shanghai Restaurant. It was Ed Perlmutter, Democratic candidate for Congress in suburban Denver's Seventh House District, trolling for votes amid trays of egg rolls. The affable lawyer apologized for interrupting, then proceeded to give a brief spiel about the need for a "new direction" in Washington.

Perlmutter's message of change and independence is a common one among Democratic candidates out west these days. After years of conservative dominance, this region of majestic mountains, endless plains, and sprawling suburbs seems to be moving to the pragmatic middle. And the longtime "out" party sees an opportunity not only to score big wins on November 7 but also to redefine the battlegrounds for the 2008 presidential race.

DOJ_NMG_0080713

There's plenty of work left to do. Back at the Golden Shanghai, the Rohrs, both 61, said the biggest issue by far is illegal immigration. Alex, an accountant, said many illegals will simply have to be deported. The husband and wife are independents who usually vote Republican, and they plan to do so again this year. Williams, 77, a retired rancher, feels no allegiance to either party and said the biggest issue is healthcare. Hanson, 78, a former engineer who said he is nonpartisan, is most concerned about the war in Iraq. He vehemently argued that America's recent military conflicts, all the way back to Korea, have wasted billions of dollars and cost countless lives-and "haven't accomplished anything." He and Williams seem to be likely Democratic voters.

Demographics. With the Democrats trying to pick up 15 seats to take control of the House and six in the Senate, they are looking to the West, where a half-dozen House races and the Montana Senate race could help determine the new lineup. Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, and Nevada are the main flash points. All four states have undergone seismic demographic and political shifts. From 2001 to 2005, Nevada was the nation's fastest-growing state. Arizona was second, Colorado eighth, and New Mexico 16th.

Many of the newcomers are Latinos; they tend to be conservative on social issues such as abortion and school prayer but liberal on economic matters, such as the need for government spending on healthcare and education. This has, on balance, helped the Democrats, but the Hispanic turnout remains a big question mark for November 7.

Overall, service and professional jobs are multiplying throughout the West as farming and mining employment, economic staples for years, have declined. Demand is growing for public services such as mass transit, healthcare, and schools, making the Democrats' pro-government image more appealing and the GOP calls for lower taxes and less government more problematic. Increasingly pragmatic voters also appear less interested in the "values issues" that have tended to help Republicans, such as same-sex marriage, abortion, and gun control.

Add it all up, and Democrats hope a new day is dawning. "We intend to contest Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, and Nevada as a unit next time in the presidential because we think we can win there," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean told U.S. News. Dean's theory is that, with a combined total of 29 electoral votes, those four states would make it unnecessary for the Democrats to win Florida, with 27 electoral votes, which they have lost in the last two down-to-the-wire presidential elections. "Bill Clinton won every single one of those states at one time or another," Dean added.

Big brother. Dean said the key to the Democratic resurgence lies in what he sees as the rightward, interventionist shift of the national GOP. "The Republican Party has become the big-brother party, and this is a very libertarian part of the country. ... [Westerners] don't believe it's the government's place to tell them what to do with their personal lives, and this is a government that specializes in telling people what to do in their personal lives."

For his part, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman told U.S. News: "We do need to have aggressive efforts in the West. ... The complexion of the electorate has changed out there. And if we're smart, then we are working to make sure we reach those new voters."

But it is the Democrats who have gotten most of the good news in recent years. In 2002, Democrats won the governorships in Arizona, New Mexico, and Wyoming. In 2004, while President Bush was winning most of the states, Democrats scored in state and local races, even winning the governorship of Montana with tough-talking, horseback-riding rancher Brian Schweitzer, who criticizes free-trade agreements as unfair to American workers and opposes gun control. In Colorado, Democrats won control of the state House and Senate for the first time in more than 40 years. And two Hispanic brothers, Ken and John Salazar, both centrist Democrats, won Republican-held seats in Congress-Ken in the Senate and John in the House.

This year, the GOP is under attack from Helena to Albuquerque. In Montana, buzz-cut farmer Jon Tester, president of the state Senate, is mounting a serious challenge to Republican Sen. Conrad Burns, who had ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. In New Mexico, Democratic Attorney General Patricia Madrid is running even with incumbent GOP Rep. Heather Wilson. In Arizona, former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords, a Democrat, is neck and neck with GOP former state Rep. Randy Graf for the House seat being vacated by Republican Jim Kolbe. In Wyoming, Democrat Gary Trauner is in a surprisingly competitive race with six-term Republican Rep. Barbara Cubin. No Democrat has held that seat since 1979.

DOJ_NMG_0080714

In Colorado, former Denver District Attorney Bill Ritter is far ahead of Republican Bob Beauprez-the current Seventh District representative-in the race for the governorship. Even in the conservative Fifth District centered on Colorado Springs, the Republican congressional candidate is in trouble. Doug Lamborn is under attack-from fellow Republicans-for being too negative as he tries to hold off Democrat Jay Fawcett, a small-business man and Air Force veteran.

Nowhere are the trends more clear than in Colorado's Seventh District, which includes the big Denver suburbs of Lakewood, Wheat Ridge, and Aurora. In 2002, Republican Beauprez won with a razor-thin margin of 121 votes. In 2004, Beauprez won narrowly again, but the district-almost evenly divided among Democrats, Republicans, and the unaffiliated-backed John Kerry for president.

Standing clear. Republican congressional candidate Rick O'Donnell, former state higher-education commissioner, has been trying to distance himself from the national GOP and establish an image of independence. On October 6, he told a forum in Wheat Ridge that if elected he would model himself on two liberal Democrats-former Rep. Pat Schroeder of Denver and former Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York. O'Donnell said he disagreed with them on issues but admired their work ethic, accessibility, and willingness to fight for their constituents. For his part, Democratic candidate Perlmutter, a former state senator who leads by double digits in some polls, said O'Donnell was masking his conservatism because his party is so unpopular. But Perlmutter also felt the need to establish his own independence. He told U.S. News he won't be in lock step with national Democrats. Still, his message is strongly anti-GOP. A fiery critic of the Iraq war, he says the Republicans have gotten America bogged down in the Mideast and on many issues at home. More generally, Perlmutter said most Coloradans today reject the extremes in either party. "People in this state are, at a basic level, moderate, independent thinkers," he told U.S. News.

But neither candidate should rest easy. After the Wheat Ridge forum, a waiter at the chicken-and-pasta luncheon was asked his impression of the candidates. He preferred not to give his name but admitted he hadn't paid much attention to what O'Donnell and Perlmutter were saying because he had been too busy serving food and clearing dishes. He will make his decision later. Like many other westerners, he said he usually votes Republican but is open to the other side this year.

One-Letter Politics (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

In a recent interview with The Hartford Courant, Senator Joseph Lieberman said something that wasn't credible. When the newspaper asked him whether America would be better off if the Democrats took control of the House of Representatives next month, he replied, "Uh, I haven't thought about that enough to give an answer."

Why wasn't this a credible answer? Because anyone with the slightest interest in American politics — a group that obviously includes Mr. Lieberman — is waiting with bated breath to see how this election goes, and thinking a lot about the implications. If the Democrats gain control of either house, no matter how narrowly, the American political landscape will be transformed. If they fail, no matter how narrowly, it will be seen, correctly, as a great victory for the hard right.

The fact is that this is a one-letter election. D or R, that's all that matters.

It's hard to think of an election in which the personal qualities of the people running in a given district or state have mattered less. Given the stakes, voters who answer "yes" to the question Mr. Lieberman claims not to have thought about should think hard about voting for any Republican, no matter how appealing. Conversely, those who answer "no" should think hard about supporting any Democrat, no matter how much they like him or her.

There are two reasons why party control is everything in this election.

The first, lesser reason is the demonstrated ability of Republican Congressional leaders to keep their members in line, even those members who cultivate a reputation as moderates or mavericks. G.O.P. politicians sometimes make a show of independence, as Senator John McCain did in seeming to stand up to President Bush on torture. But in the end, they always give the White House what it wants: after getting a lot of good press for his principled stand, Mr. McCain signed on to a torture bill that in effect gave Mr. Bush a completely free hand.

And if the Republicans retain control of Congress, even if it's by just one seat in each house, Mr. Bush will retain that free hand. If they lose control of either house, the G.O.P. juggernaut will come to a shuddering halt.

DOJ_NMG_0080715

Yet that's the less important reason this election is all about party control. The really important reason may be summed up in two words: subpoena power.

Even if the Democrats take both houses, they won't be able to accomplish much in the way of new legislation. They won't have the votes to stop Republican filibusters in the Senate, let alone to override presidential vetoes.

The only types of legislation the Democrats might be able to push through are overwhelmingly popular measures, such as an increase in the minimum wage, that Republicans don't want but probably wouldn't dare oppose in an open vote.

But while the Democrats won't gain the ability to pass laws, if they win they will gain the ability to carry out investigations, and the legal right to compel testimony.

The current Congress has shown no inclination to investigate the Bush administration. Last year The Boston Globe offered an illuminating comparison: when Bill Clinton was president, the House took 140 hours of sworn testimony into whether Mr. Clinton had used the White House Christmas list to identify possible Democratic donors. But in 2004 and 2005, a House committee took only 12 hours of testimony on the abuses at Abu Ghraib.

If the Democrats take control, that will change — and voters should think very hard about whether they want that change. Those who think it's a good idea to investigate, say, allegations of cronyism and corruption in Iraq contracting should be aware that any vote cast for a Republican makes Congressional investigations less likely. Those who believe that the administration should be left alone to do its job should be aware that any vote for a Democrat makes investigations more likely.

O.K., what about the Senate race in Connecticut, where Ned Lamont is the Democratic nominee, and Mr. Lieberman, who lost the Democratic primary, is running as an independent but promising to caucus with the Democrats if he wins? Is this a case where the man, not the party, is what matters? Only if you believe that Mr. Lieberman's promise not to switch parties is 100 percent credible.

In Final Weeks, G.O.P. Focuses On Best Bets (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 15 — Senior Republican leaders have concluded that Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio, a pivotal state in this year's fierce midterm election battles, is likely to be heading for defeat and are moving to reduce financial support for his race and divert party money to other embattled Republican senators, party officials said.

The decision to effectively write off Mr. DeWine's seat, after a series of internal Republican polls showed him falling behind his Democratic challenger, is part of a fluid series of choices by top leaders in both parties as they set the strategic framework of the campaign's final three weeks, signaling, by where they are spending television money and other resources, the Senate and House races where they believe they have the best chances of success.

Republicans are now pinning their hopes of holding the Senate on three states — Missouri, Tennessee and, with Ohio off the table, probably Virginia — while trying to hold on to the House by pouring money into districts where Republicans have a strong historical or registration advantage, party officials said Sunday. Republicans also said they would run advertisements in New Jersey this week to test the vulnerability of Senator Robert Menendez, one of the few Democrats who appear endangered.

Senior national Republican strategists who had been briefed on decisions made during the party's internal deliberations discussed the overall strategic thrusts but declined to provide specific dollar figures, saying that would give too much information to the Democrats.

The decision involving Mr. DeWine offers the most compelling evidence so far that Republicans are circling their wagons around a smaller group of races, effectively conceding some Senate and House seats with the goal of retaining at least a thin margin of control when the 110th Congress is seated next January. Democrats need to win 6 seats to capture the Senate and 15 seats to win the House on Nov. 7.

Mr. DeWine has proved to be a successful fund-raiser on his own, and, with $4.5 million on hand, already enjoys a large financial advantage over his Democratic opponent, Representative Sherrod Brown; he is not dependent on financial support to keep campaigning. The Republican National Committee and the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee have already spent $4.6 million on his race; party officials said they concluded that there were now simply more opportune races to focus on.

DOJ_NMG_0080716

Asked about the decision, a spokesman for Mr. DeWine, Brian Seitchik, said, "We've been pleased with the support we've received from the R.N.C. thus far." Mr. Seitchik declined to comment further.

Republicans noted that Mr. DeWine, in addition to having a sizable financial advantage, was a well-liked figure in Ohio who handily won his first two terms in the Senate and still had enough time to recover, even though recent internal party polls showed him lagging badly.

Brian Nick, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said, "The committee doesn't discuss internal strategy in terms of where financial resources are allocated."

Democratic strategists said Sunday that they were polling in search of other races with vulnerable Republicans, pointing to Representative Richard W. Pombo of California as one incumbent they might take aim at.

Republicans said they remained confident that the party's considerable financial advantage would allow them to hold back a Democratic onslaught over the next three weeks, and they said they were preparing to spend significantly to bulk up any Republican who their polling over the next few days suggested might be faltering.

A critical question in the days ahead is the size of the Republican financial advantage for the final three weeks; the next filing reports are due on Friday.

Still, in interviews, Republican strategists said that the flow of bad news out of Iraq and the resignation of Representative Mark Foley after admitting he had sent sexually suggestive messages to teenage Congressional pages had soured the environment for incumbents and blunted the impact of a long-planned crush of negative advertisements Republicans had prepared to undercut Democratic challengers this month.

In one sign of the shifting political environment, as of this weekend, national Republicans were running advertisements in 29 districts; of those, 26 are held by Republicans and 3 by Democrats, though Republicans plan to begin running advertisements this week against an Illinois Democrat, Representative Melissa Bean. National Democrats are on the air in 30 districts, and defending Democrats in just 3 races.

"For a midterm election in the sixth year, based on historically the number of seats lost, you've got to play defense," said Carl Forti, the communications director for the National Republican Congressional Committee. "We have the luxury of being in the majority, so all we have to do is hold our own."

National Republicans are no longer running advertisements in three districts where they once thought they had a chance to take over Democratic-held seats — in South Carolina, West Virginia and Ohio — as well as a district in Arizona now held by a Republican. The party has not broadcast any advertising in four days on behalf of Representative Chris Chocola, one of three Indiana Republicans who polls suggest are headed for defeat, though Republican officials said that does not mean they have written off Mr. Chocola's seat.

Even before this development, Republicans had been bracing for the defeat of three sitting Republican senators: Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Conrad Burns of Montana and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, based on polling.

At the start of the fall campaign, national Republican leaders developed a strategy to pour most of the national money into three states — Ohio, Tennessee and Missouri — to create a firewall against a Democratic takeover. One Republican Party official said Mr. DeWine's continued problems in Ohio had persuaded them to in effect rebuild a firewall that has now partly collapsed, and to find a state to replace it.

The decision about Mr. DeWine's seat came after recent internal polls showed Mr. DeWine's Democratic challenger, Representative Brown, jumping to a large lead. Mr. Brown's surge came despite a barrage of Republican advertisements intended to portray him as weak on national security — the very line of attack that had given party officials confidence earlier this year that Mr. DeWine would be re-elected.

Normally, a party would be averse to scaling back its help for a senator in a state with as many as five competitive Congressional races also on the ballot. But in this case, Ohio Republicans said, Mr. DeWine and Republican Congressional candidates face the added problem of being dragged down this November by the party's candidate for governor, J. Kenneth Blackwell, who polls show is facing a double-digit loss to the Democrat, Representative Ted Strickland.

The next important decision for Republicans is whether to compete in New Jersey; they plan to spend about $500,000 on advertising this week, followed by polling to see how vulnerable Mr. Menendez is to his Republican challenger, Thomas H. Kean

Jr. Going into New Jersey is a costly gamble, because it requires advertising in both the New York City and Philadelphia markets, which party strategists said could easily eat up $2.5 million a week.

An alternative being strongly considered by some Republican strategists is Virginia, where Senator George Allen, a Republican once viewed as breezing toward re-election, is now struggling. A poll published in The Washington Post on Sunday showed Mr. Allen in a tie with his Democratic challenger, Jim Webb. Virginia is a much more Republican state than New Jersey, not to mention less expensive, and thus might prove an easier place to make a stand.

Some Republican strategists have been pushing the party to go after Senator Debbie Stabenow, a Michigan Democrat, but other party officials said that based on the most recent polling data, Ms. Stabenow seemed assured of re-election. On the other side of the scale, Democrats said they were increasingly skeptical that they would be able to knock out Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican who had been on an early target list.

In the House, the Republican committee has spent $61 million so far, compared with $50 million by Democrats, aides to both parties said Sunday.

For Republicans, the vast majority of that money has gone to protecting incumbents. The party is on the offensive in races for three seats: two held by Democrats, Representatives Leonard L. Boswell of Iowa and Jim Marshall of Georgia, and one being vacated by Representative Bernard Sanders, an independent from Vermont who typically voted with the Democrats.

Mr. Forti said Republicans had now placed $1 million into protecting the Florida district that was represented by Mr. Foley, the Republican who resigned in the page scandal. Party officials had at first written off that seat, because it was too late to replace Mr. Foley's name on the ballot with the name of the Republican who replaced him, State Representative Joe Negron. Party officials said their polling showed that the district was so overwhelmingly Republican — Mr. Foley won 68 percent of the vote in 2004 — that they believed they could succeed again. In any event, they said they were not prepared to write off any seats in this environment.

"When you look at the polling numbers, they don't want to vote for the Democrat," Mr. Forti said. "Believe me, we are not going to waste two million bucks if we don't think we have a shot."

Faithful Rally To A Senator In Distress (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

ROSYLN, Pa. — Keith Hollenberg, a member of the evangelical Assemblies of God church, is worried that one of his political heroes is about to lose his bid for reelection.

So when he saw Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) at a car show here, Hollenberg volunteered to help in what has become an urgent project for social conservatives in Pennsylvania and around the country: keeping Santorum in the Senate.

"I'm a big fan of yours," Hollenberg told him. "Keep on pulling for the right thing."

Santorum, an outspoken advocate of banning same-sex marriage, restricting abortion, and other social conservative causes, is considered this year's most-endangered senator.

It is a four-alarm fire for conservatives, who are bringing water buckets from all corners of the political world. Across Pennsylvania, pastors are preparing to stuff voter guides into their Sunday bulletins. In Washington, D.C., Paul Weyrich, a national conservative leader, hosted a conference call to give a pep talk to Republicans in Pennsylvania. In England, some Santorum fans are planning to cross the Atlantic to help campaign.

"I think it's important for people across the country to recognize how important it is not only to pay attention but to get engaged in this race, whatever way they can," said Colin Hanna, head of Let Freedom Ring, a conservative group based in Pennsylvania. "If Rick Santorum were to lose, it would be cited as a turning point in the social conservative movement."

Santorum is not just a key link between the Republican Party and Christian conservatives. He is also one of President Bush's most unapologetic allies in Congress and a member of the Senate GOP leadership. And he is the apotheosis of a younger generation of Republicans — led by former House speaker Newt Gingrich — that transformed the party in the 1990s into a more confrontational, ideological political force.

DOJ_NMG_0080718

If 2006 turns into the electoral romp for Democrats that many analysts now are predicting, a loss by Santorum would be a signifier of the end of that Republican revolution.

If Democrats are unable to defeat Santorum, they are unlikely to win a majority in the Senate, which Republicans control 55-45.

For most of the year, polls have found Santorum trailing his Democratic opponent, state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., by double-digit margins. The senator's backers last week cheered a poll by the Allentown Morning Call showing the gap narrowing to 46% to 41%. They were hoping that a spirited televised debate last week) opened a new chapter of voter education about Casey's liabilities that could work to Santorum's advantage.

But G. Terry Madonna, a pollster and professor at Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster, Pa., said Santorum was in deep trouble if he was still drawing only 40% support, having already leveled a heavy barrage of campaign ads and attacks on Casey.

Among Santorum's political problems: He is running in a state that went for Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry in the 2004 presidential election. Here in Philadelphia's suburbs, considered crucial to the election's outcome, even fellow Republicans are not as conservative as he is. At a recent GOP meeting in Upper Darby, Santorum sounded less like a champion of social conservatism and instead circulated a flier, "Delivering for Upper Darby," that detailed the federal money he had secured for local sewer repair, garage construction and more.

Even if Santorum gives social issues short shrift on the campaign trail, conservative leaders understand what is at stake. They stand to lose a powerful spokesman for their agenda. Some worry that Santorum's defeat would also be a body blow to the influence of social conservatives within the GOP.

"You would then start to see party apparatuses say things like, 'We're not sure we want to support a candidate whose conservatism is as deeply rooted as Sen. Santorum's,' and they will begin casting about for moderate conservatives," Hanna said.

At age 48, with boyish looks that make him appear a decade younger, Santorum does not look the part of a man who could be near the end of a fast-rising political career. Walking in a parade one rainy Saturday outside Philadelphia, Santorum jogs robustly from one side of the street to the other to greet spectators. Tie-less and in chinos, he wears the unflappable smile of a man who is nowhere near ready to concede defeat. Even when people boo him from curbside, he boldly reaches into the crowd to shake their hands.

Twelve years ago, Santorum was swept into the Senate when his opponent and other Democrats tripped on the coattails of Bill Clinton in the Republican tide of 1994. With a 49% plurality, Santorum beat Democratic Sen. Harris Wofford.

Santorum had already spent four years in the House, where he worked with Gingrich and the "Gang of Seven" conservative rebels who exposed a scandal at the House bank. He was eager to stir the pot even in the more staid Senate, where one of his first acts was to challenge the seniority system.

Nevertheless, Santorum zoomed up the leadership ladder. At 42, in 2001, he was chosen to be Senate Republican conference chairman, the party's No. 3 post, after having won reelection to the Senate with 52% of the vote.

Many more factors are working against Santorum now than in his 2000 campaign — most notably, his link to a president whose approval ratings are below 40% in many polls. Unlike other vulnerable Republicans who have run away from the White House, Santorum continues to embrace Bush's policy in Iraq, his controversial ideas about overhauling Social Security, even his beleaguered secretary of Defense, Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Santorum is not just a victim of political circumstance. Even his admirers say he routinely suffers self-inflicted wounds from his own sharp tongue.

In 2002, he blamed Boston "liberalism" for the Roman Catholic Church's sex abuse scandal. In a 2003 interview, he linked gay consensual sex with bigamy, polygamy, incest and adultery. In a 2005 book, he found fault with two-income families and working women. The ensuing controversies have so engulfed Santorum's image that his campaign website has a long feature, "Myth vs. Fact," to counter what people "hear about the water cooler" about Santorum.

With polls showing Casey consistently in the lead, the son of a popular former governor has run a low-key campaign with a light schedule of public events — a classic front-runner's strategy. Santorum accuses him of hiding from voters, running on his name and refusing to be specific. He ridiculed Casey for refusing to attend a debate last month, bringing an empty chair to dramatize his point.

DOJ_NMG_0080719

When the two did meet in a televised debate last week, the exchange was bitter and personal.

"I don't know how you can say so many words and say nothing," Santorum said.

Casey replied, dismissively: "Don't be a desperate campaigner."

If there is one thing voters know about Casey, it is that he opposes abortion rights. That may cut into Santorum's ability to draw support from socially conservative Democrats.

Some conservatives are focusing on differences between the candidates on social issues other than abortion. A voter guide being distributed by the American Family Assn. of Pennsylvania, designed to be slipped into church bulletins, highlights their differences on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage (Santorum supports, Casey opposes), allowing over-the-counter sale of a morning-after pill (Santorum opposes, Casey supports) and expanding federal hate-crime protections to homosexuals (Santorum opposes, Casey supports).

Hanna's group has set up a network of conservative pastors around the state to mobilize churchgoing voters. Although it cannot by law endorse a candidate, the Pastors Network of Pennsylvania has enlisted nearly 1,000 pastors in voter-registration and get-out-the vote drives.

"I think this race is drawing very, very close," said Hanna. "The deciding factor may be which set of supporters is more motivated to turn out."

Minnesota Senate Candidates Clash On Iraq, Taxes (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, October 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Candidates in Minnesota's closely watched Senate race clashed Sunday on Iraq and tax policy, with the Republican defending his vote to authorize the war in Iraq.

"You can't really play Tivo and rewind," said Rep. Mark Kennedy.

During a debate on NBC's "Meet the Press," he was asked whether he would still vote for the war knowing that Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction. "We acted on the information we knew at the time. I stand by my vote."

Democrat Amy Klobuchar, the Hennepin County attorney, said it was time to have Iraqis take more control of their country and start bringing U.S. troops home.

"You cannot solve a problem that you don't admit exists, and that is what's going on here with the congressman," she said. "This war has basically devolved into a civil war."

The answer, she said, is not more troops on the ground but a diplomatic and political solution.

Kennedy and Klobuchar are seeking to succeed Democratic Sen. Mark Dayton, who did not run for re-election. With about three weeks before the Nov. 7 election, a Star Tribune Minnesota Poll published Sunday showed Klobuchar ahead 55 percent to 34 percent among likely voters, nearly the same margin as it was in September.

Kennedy, a three-term congressman, dismissed that poll in a meeting with reporters after the debate. "This is a single-digit race," he said. Separately, Klobuchar said the "only poll that matters" is on Election Day.

In the debate, Kennedy said Iraq was the top issue in the race and that the war was central to the global fight against terrorism.

He said Klobuchar "has set out a specific timetable for bringing our troops home that would tell the terrorists when they can take over an oil-rich country as a sanctuary for terrorists," Kennedy said.

Klobuchar said she was not pressing for an immediate return of all U.S. troops from Iraq.

"We have to be reasonable," she said. "I have never been one to say 'Bring them all home tomorrow.' I have never subscribed to one of those mandatory dates, because I understand that, despite my opposition to the war from the beginning, that we have to be responsible about how we bring our troops home."

DOJ_NMG_0080720

Asked what the U.S. should do if it were to leave Iraq and a full-blown civil war were to erupt, Klobuchar said American troops should be redeployed to surrounding areas so they can return quickly if needed. She also called for bolstering security in the U.S.

On tax policy, Kennedy criticized Klobuchar for calling for a rollback of President Bush's tax cuts for the richest 1 percent.

"We cannot be raising taxes, putting this economy back on its back, and also not growing jobs," Kennedy said. He argued that a line-item veto would help rein in spending, and acknowledged, "I would like the president to take a little bit more leadership on spending."

Klobuchar said that returning tax levels for the richest to what they paid during the Clinton administration, when the economy was doing well, would help lower the federal deficit.

"When a liberal says they're going to soak the rich," quipped Kennedy, "the middle class gets drenched."

With the latest Star Tribune Minnesota Poll showing Bush's disapproval rating at 61 percent, his highest level ever, Kennedy was asked if he was running as a "George Bush Republican."

"I'm running as Mark Kennedy," he responded.

Kennedy, who usually votes with Bush, pointed out several votes where he broke with the president, such as opposing drilling for oil in an Alaskan wildlife refuge and the No Child Left Behind education law.

Klobuchar suggested Kennedy was running away from Bush.

"He spent the last few campaigns bragging about how close he was with President Bush, and now he's spending this campaign bragging about how independent he is from President Bush," she said.

Meanwhile, Klobuchar's campaign announced Sunday it had raised $1.35 million in the five-week period ending Sept. 30, and had just under $2.25 million in the bank. Kennedy's campaign said it raised $975,000 during the period and had just over $2.03 million in cash on hand.

Sharp Exchanges In National Spotlight (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - "Coffee, water or whiskey?" joked Tim Russert, who seemed to be in a fine mood Sunday morning when his Minnesota guests -- Senate candidates Amy Klobuchar and Mark Kennedy -- showed up for a debate in his NBC television studio in Washington.

As the two sipped their drinks, Russert, a native of Buffalo, N.Y., and a fan of the Buffalo Bills, commiserated with his visitors, both Vikings fans. "You may have lost four Super Bowls, but we lost four in a row," said Russert, host of "Meet the Press."

After the laughs and pleasantries, the hard-nosed Russert got down to business and got Klobuchar and Kennedy to display big differences on some big issues in their network television debate.

As they sparred for nearly 40 minutes, they traded especially sharp barbs on the war in Iraq and tax policy.

Kennedy, a Republican congressman since 2001, said he stood by his vote to authorize the war in 2002 and vigorously defended his party's tax cuts, saying they've helped produce 6 million new jobs. Klobuchar, the DFL candidate and Hennepin County attorney since 1999, said it's time to change course in Iraq and to eliminate tax cuts for the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans.

When Russert asked Kennedy if he would vote today to back the war, even if the CIA told him that former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction, Kennedy replied: "We acted on the information that we knew at the time. ... I stand by my vote. We can't rewind. We acted on the information we knew at the time and acted correctly."

Klobuchar said that the war is now a civil war and that the United States should pursue "a diplomatic and political solution."We cannot, as Congressman Kennedy and the president are talking about, just stay the course indefinitely, with more troops dying, over $300 billion spent," she said.

Kennedy said the war will require the United States "to make adjustments," but he suggested it would be impossible to come up with a diplomatic solution: "You can't negotiate with people that are ruthless and glory in killing innocent women and children."

DOJ_NMG_0080721

Klobuchar asked Kennedy to "admit that he was wrong about voting for this war." She told the stories of a mother in Mahnomen, Minn., who can't sleep because her child is going on his second tour of duty in Iraq and of a father in western Minnesota who cries when questions are asked about Iraq because he lost his son. "These are real people in the real world who are looking for solutions," she said.

On tax policy, Kennedy said that the economy "was flat on its back" after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, but that Congress and the president passed tax cuts that helped revive it. "We cannot be raising taxes, putting this economy back on its back, and also not growing jobs," he said.

Klobuchar, who wants to roll back the tax cuts for those who earn more than $336,000 a year, said her plan would save $56 billion a year and is part of her proposal to start reducing the national debt, which is approaching $9 trillion.

"I'm the only candidate in this race that has come out with a plan to balance the budget," she said.

How they see themselves

When Russert asked Kennedy, who has been a close ally of President Bush, if he believes that Bush is a great president, Kennedy said: "I believe history is going to make that decision." And when Russert asked Kennedy whether he's running as "a George Bush Republican" this year. Kennedy replied: "I'm running as Mark Kennedy. I'm running as a guy who believes strongly in values that I was raised with in Minnesota."

Klobuchar billed herself as a tough prosecutor, "someone who puts people in jail for a living." But she also described herself as a mother, a wife and an advocate, and stressed her deep ties to Minnesota: "I'm the granddaughter of a miner. I'm the daughter of a newspaperman and a teacher."

The debate came on the same day that a Star Tribune Minnesota Poll showed Klobuchar with a 21-point lead, favored by 55 percent of likely voters, compared with 34 percent for Kennedy.

In an interview after the debate, Kennedy dismissed the poll, saying voters are focused on issues.

"I'm still waiting for the first person that believes the Minneapolis Star Tribune poll," he said. "I don't think anybody takes it seriously. This is a single-digit race. I know how to win tight races."

Klobuchar said the only poll that matters will be on Nov. 7.

"I don't look at the polls, except I can feel it out there," she said in an interview. "You can feel that the wind's at our back and people want a big change in Washington."

Sunday's debate, the seventh of 10 scheduled, did not include Robert Fitzgerald, the Independence Party candidate.

"There's not much we can do," Fitzgerald said. "I'm not personally disappointed that I'm not invited. It's not a dis on me. I don't think Tim Russert's hating on me or anything. But I am dismayed, I guess, that 'Meet the Press' is not willing to reflect the race as it's happening here in Minnesota. Minnesotans know that they have three major-party candidates that they get to choose from."

Bush, Clinton To Host Rival Va. Fundraisers (WT)

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

President Bush and former President Bill Clinton will host competing fundraisers in Virginia on Thursday for their favored candidates in the U.S. Senate race.

Mr. Bush will rally Republicans at an event for Sen. George Allen at the Science Museum of Virginia in Richmond. Mr. Clinton will headline a soiree for Democrat-ic challenger James H. Webb Jr. at the McLean home of former Sen. Charles S. Robb. Mr. Allen unseated Mr. Robb in 2000.

The current president remains one of the Republican Party's best fundraisers. This is his second visit to Virginia on behalf of Mr. Allen this year.

The Webb campaign told reporters last week that the Bush visit gives it an opportunity to remind voters that Mr. Allen has voted with the president 97 percent of the time since being elected to the Senate.

Mr. Clinton, who held a fundraiser for Democrat Timothy M. Kaine last year during the gubernatorial race, is expected to bring in a big chunk of cash for Mr. Webb.

DOJ_NMG_0080722

Mr. Bush touched down in Air Force One on election eve last year to appear with Mr. Kaine's opponent, Republican Jerry W. Kilgore, a visit many political observers think ultimately hurt Mr. Kilgore at the polls the next day.

Mr. Allen has a narrow lead or is statistically tied with Mr. Webb in most polls.

Meanwhile, Mr. Webb received the endorsement Wednesday of the Richmond Crusade for Voters, a 50-year-old nonpartisan organization that aims to increase the influence of blacks in the political process.

"We are not impressed with Mr. Allen's Johnny-come-lately 'sensitivity' to the plight of minorities and the African-American community," said Crusade President Melvin Law. "We do not appreciate nor admire his record. ... Mr. Allen deserves nothing more than an F for his service."

Mr. Allen, who as governor in the 1990s issued a proclamation in honor of Confederate Heritage Month, has been criticized for once hanging a noose in his law office.

Earlier this year, he lost the support of Southern heritage buffs when he said he realized the Confederate battle flag is seen by some as a symbol of hatred and racism.

•Not-so-nasty ads

Political ads in Maryland this year are using unconventional styles and have been far less negative than those in other states, researchers at the University of Maryland at College Park said.

"We've been closely analyzing political ads in the state, and so far, we haven't seen the level of nastiness you might expect," said Trevor Parry-Giles, a communication professor there.

He said the candidates may be avoiding "a costly backlash if they go too negative."

Mr. Parry-Giles said ads by Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee for U.S. Senate, are "innovative and compelling."

The ads present Mr. Steele talking to the camera in a relaxed and conversational tone. Some feature Mr. Steele holding a puppy or with the puppy standing nearby.

Other props included a row of trash cans, which Mr. Steele indicates as symbols for negative attacks by his opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee for senator.

"The Steele ads are long on atmospherics and symbols apparently designed to sell his brand and to inoculate him from Democratic attacks linking him to President Bush," said Shawn Parry-Giles, a professor of communications and director of the university's Center for Political Communication and Civic Leadership. She is the wife of Mr. Parry-Giles.

"Some of Cardin's ads have been very simple -- the very opposite of slick -- using devices such as a shaky hand-held camera," she said. "This could well be a deliberate attempt to draw a distinction between Cardin and Steele."

The two professors have developed a Web site called "Political Advertising Resource Center" that is devoted to analysis of campaign ads. The site is available at www.umdparc.org.

"There's a certain numbness that sets in as an election approaches, and the ads start to blend in to the wallpaper," Mrs. Parry-Giles said. "Yet, political ads are one of the most important tools in a campaign arsenal. Citizens need to pay close, critical attention."

•Thinking globally

Virginia can thrive in the 21st century's global marketplace with an international airport and a major port, but it will falter if it cannot provide road and rail access to both, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine says.

Solving the state's transportation difficulties, the governor told industry leaders, will require "some changes in faces" in the Virginia General Assembly.

Mr. Kaine, a Democrat whose efforts to fund transportation in his first year in office have hit roadblocks in the Republican-controlled legislature, said he was not making a partisan statement.

"There are a lot of Republicans who want to solve problems," he said, "and a Democrat or two who don't."

He urged the audience of about 700 at the annual Virginia Transportation Conference in Roanoke last week to support candidates next year who are problem-solvers.

DOJ_NMG_0080723

Last month's scheduled four-day special legislative session on transportation funding ended two days early because of philosophical differences between the Senate and House of Delegates leadership -- the same differences that led to this year's unprecedented budget impasse.

Simply put, the Senate wants tax increases, and the House Republican leadership is vehemently opposed. Mr. Kaine, who supports increasing taxes and highway "user fees" to finance transportation, acknowledged that he has had "a very challenging first year."

"I'm not going to give up," he said. "I'm staying at the table on this."

The governor referred to Virginia's listing by Forbes magazine as the most business-friendly state in the nation, but he said the state's ability to compete in a global market-place will be the key to its futur.

The 27 million passenger visits a year at Washington Dulles International Airport could be increased to 50 million, he said, but more roads and rail access are needed in the traffic-clogged region.

The same is true of Hampton Roads, he said, where the port could become the busiest in the nation with dredging to accommodate even bigger ships.

"Are we going to be winners, or are we going to leave these great assets withering and dying?" he said.

•Seeking security

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee for U.S. Senate, is hammering the Bush administration for cutting homeland security funding.

"Terrorism has a price ... and we will either pay that price in dollars or in lives. I'd rather write the check," Mr. Steele said in a keynote luncheon address at the 2006 Mid-Atlantic All Hazards Forum, a regional emergency-management and homeland security symposium last week at the Baltimore Convention Center.

"Any formula in this environment that cuts homeland security funding for Washington, D.C., and New York City, let alone the rest of the nation, is bad public policy," he said.

Mr. Steele addressed the convention in his role as lieutenant governor, but the speech echoed his campaign platform on homeland security.

He also took a swipe at the Washington establishment, which was consistent with his run as a "Washington outsider" and his promise to be a "new kind of senator."

"We can no longer have decisions made in isolated chambers in Washington and then dictated to the states and the local communities without some understanding and appreciation of what [first-responders] do every single day to protect and defend that little patch of ground you call home," he said. "We have to be serious about this business because our enemies are serious about the business of coming after us."

Mr. Steele is running against Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a 10-term Democratic congressman from Baltimore who also has called for more homeland security funding for "jurisdictions with the greatest risks and vulnerability."

Mr. Cardin's campaign strategy includes linking Mr. Steele to President Bush, who is highly unpopular in heavily Democratic Maryland.

In the speech, Mr. Steele did not name the president.

He cited the 40 percent cut in funding to New York and the District and the $6 million in cut in funds to Baltimore that Homeland Security announced in May. The District's homeland security grant was slashed from $77 million to about $46 million, and New York's went from more than $200 million to about $124 million.

The cuts targeted large cities, mostly in the Northeast, and coincided with increased grants to midsized cities, including St. Louis and Jacksonville, Fla.

"Today, we face the unique and ever-changing threat of terrorism that has attacked us before, and most say it is not a question of if it will happen again, but when it will happen," Mr. Steele told the crowd of firefighters, police officers and emergency-management officials. "It is therefore the responsibility of leadership at these times, more than at any other time, to not just identify and confront threats to our national security, but more importantly, to implement smart policies that prevent these threats from ever materializing."

DOJ_NMG_0080724

"This means using the newest and best technologies for securing our infrastructure, our airports, our ports against terror threats," he said.

Nelson, Ricketts Continue Attacks In Final Debate (LJS)

By Don Walton

Lincoln Journal Star NE Senate Debate, October 16, 2006

SCOTTSBLUFF — Sen. Ben Nelson and Republican challenger Pete Ricketts came out swinging Sunday in a debate that attracted an overflow crowd of more than 200 on a sunny afternoon in the Panhandle.

It didn't take long to establish the tenor of their third and final direct confrontation.

In an opening statement, Nelson repeated his claims that Ricketts supports enactment of a national sales tax, an end to farm payments, privatization of Social Security, amnesty for illegal immigrants and opposes an increase in the federal minimum wage.

All those positions may be good for Wall Street, the Democratic senator said, but they're not good for Main Street in Nebraska.

Ricketts' opening remarks took the form of a bare-knuckles response.

Nelson, he said, has benefited from "a revolving door career in the public and private sectors (and) cashed in" on his public service experience as governor by acting as a paid lobbyist for a brief period before he was elected to the Senate.

"He is irresponsible, cannot be trusted and deserves to be fired," Ricketts declared.

Introducing a new allegation into a Senate race that has overflowed with them, Ricketts said Nelson "sits on the board of a company that contaminates groundwater in Nebraska," namely Behlen Manufacturing in Columbus.

"You've seen a preview" of Ricketts' tactics, Nelson said. "It's attack, attack, attack. My opponent has just a little problem with the truth."

Nelson said he is a member of Behlen's board of advisors, after earlier serving as a director, and suggested Ricketts inform the state's environmental quality agency about his concerns since "It's news to me."

But Ricketts said the issue allegedly involving disposal of drums of toxic waste in an area that affected some local landowners and another property owner had been a concern even during Nelson's governorship.

The Senate opponents traded blows on a number of familiar topics during the hourlong debate at the University of Nebraska's Panhandle Research Center.

But the final debate also gave each candidate an opportunity to frame his case.

Ricketts said Nelson has been an ineffective senator whereas he's the candidate of change.

If Nebraskans want change in Washington, he said, "you can't send back the same career politicians." Nebraskans who may want change from the current Republican leadership in Washington "should not give Democrats control of our values or our pocketbook," Ricketts said.

Nelson said Ricketts offers "blind party loyalty and radical bad ideas" whereas he "put(s) people and policy ahead of partisanship and always put(s) Nebraska first."

What Ricketts proposes in policy reforms "might be good for Ameritrade," Nelson said, but is not good for either Main Street or most Nebraskans. Ricketts left his post as chief operating officer of Ameritrade to enter the Senate race.

Nelson and Ricketts parted company on a number of issues.

On agriculture, Ricketts attacked Nelson, a member of the Senate Agriculture Committee, for failing to include drought disaster relief as part of the farm program.

"If your administration would quit fighting drought relief, we'd already have it," Nelson responded.

Nelson said he would "continue to fight for funding for Nebraska" by earmarking appropriations for projects like the Heartland Expressway in the Panhandle. Ricketts opposes the earmarking system and would like to replace it with block grants to states.

DOJ_NMG_0080725

Ricketts said Nelson has failed to offer any plan for dealing with the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants already living in the United States. But Nelson said Ricketts' early support for the comprehensive immigration reform bill passed by the Senate represented endorsement of amnesty.

Not true, said Ricketts, who has proposed a compromise plan to require illegal immigrants to return to their home country before they return legally to the United States with work permits.

"Amnesty with a road trip," Nelson said.

Nelson urged direct one-on-one engagement by the United States with North Korea to seek an agreement ending North Korea's development of nuclear weapons. What the United States should offer, he said, is an assurance of no sanctions and no military attack by the United States in exchange for an end to North Korea's nuclear program.

"I oppose unilateral talks with North Korea," Ricketts said. "That would reward them for bad behavior."

Instead, Ricketts said, the United States should focus on current multilateral talks, urge China to apply pressure on North Korea and implement tough sanctions.

Reach Don Walton at 473-7248 or at dwalton@journalstar.com.

Viewer Comments:

Brad wrote on October 15, 2006 10:19 PM:"Is there a 3rd person we can vote for??"

Go away Pete wrote on October 15, 2006 10:15 PM:"Go back to your country club we don't want you in Washington (or should I say Warshington)"

Tom wrote on October 15, 2006 10:08 PM:"It is very difficult to consider voting for either one of these individuals. They are both like pit bulls! I sure wish that Tom Osborne was running in this race for he certainly would get my vote. "

gail wrote on October 15, 2006 9:57 PM:"Ben Nelson is a long-time leader in our state. Pete Ricketts is a bored rich kid. This is an easy call."

Rudy wrote on October 15, 2006 9:51 PM:"I live in Columbus and our water is very fresh and tasty. I don't work at Behlens but they employ plenty of people around here that will be voting Nelson thanks to good ole Pete! Can't wait 'till this one is on the grapevine!"

gloria wrote on October 15, 2006 8:36 PM:"I am sick of pete ricketts' attacks. He is like a spoiled child who has a tantrum when he doesn't get what he wants. "

Career Politician wrote on October 15, 2006 8:03 PM:"Pete says you cant send the same career politicians back to office. But isn't Pete the one using career politicians' support for him in his ads? Pete says you cant have "unilateral" talks with North Korea. He's right, you cant have unilateral talks with anyone, those would be talks where you talk to your self. Bilateral talks is what he must oppose, or not, who knows? Pete says Ben Nelson is at fault for no drought assitance? Its the Bush White House and Chuck Hagel who blocked Nelson's drought bill. Pete, you're desperate, and behind. Your advisors have failed you miserably. you should fire them - ask yourself if you got your $12 million worth from them. "

Ricketts Says Nelson Didn't Push Drought Relief (AP)

AP NE Senate Debate, October 16, 2006

SCOTTSBLUFF, Neb. -- Republican Senate challenger Pete Ricketts said Democratic incumbent Sen. Ben Nelson was remiss by not pushing for drought relief as part of the last Farm Bill.

But Nelson said in Sunday's debate in Scottsbluff that Republicans were the ones stopping the payments. Nelson also said that there needs to be a cap when it comes to crop payments and that there was no way to predict the current drought would have lasted as long as it has.

Ricketts said drought relief must be part of the new Farm Bill and agreed that a cap must be in place. He also suggested crop insurance would help and that a "safety net" needs to be established to help farmers and ranchers.

Ricketts said that entrepreneurship and growing the economy through block grants can help revitalize rural areas. Then he criticized Nelson for not taking measures to improve the last Farm Bill. Ricketts said Nelson needed to be fired.

Nelson said that many of his efforts in the Senate had helped western Nebraska grow.

The two were asked whether they supported transportation earmarks that have been criticized as pork barrel politics.

DOJ_NMG_0080726

Nelson said he does support and will continue to support earmarks.

Ricketts suggested the same thing could be accomplished through block grants that would give more control to officials in Lincoln instead of Washington.

Ricketts told the crowd of less than 200 that Nelson can't be trusted and that a change is needed in Washington.

Nelson said he learned his values growing up in McCook, and that he always has been interested in helping people on Main Street rather than those on Wall Street. Nelson said he would like to see an end to partisanship in government.

But Ricketts fired back, saying Nelson is a career politician and can't be trusted.

Nelson countered by saying his opponent has trouble with the truth.

Mich. Senate Candidates Spar On Economy (AP-Y)

By Tim Martin

AP-Yahoo, October 16, 2006

Democratic U.S. Sen. Debbie Stabenow and Republican challenger Mike Bouchard sparred over issues ranging from the economy to the Iraq war on Sunday as they met in their first debate.

Bouchard, the Oakland County sheriff, said Stabenow has been ineffective and has flip-flopped on several issues. "She says one thing here and does another thing in Washington," he said.

The former state lawmaker also criticized Stabenow's record on the economy, noting that Michigan has lost thousands of jobs in recent years.

Stabenow, seeking a second term, said Bouchard would support the "failed policies" of the Bush administration.

She defended her economic stances, including a plan to have a prosecutor enforce trade agreements with other nations to protect U.S. jobs. She said "nobody in Washington understands better" than she what is at stake for the middle class.

"We are in a fight for our way of life," Stabenow said.

On the Iraq war, Stabenow said it's now time for the Iraqi police and military to "step up so we can transition out." Bouchard said a withdrawal should be "based on when is it more safe and secure, and then as quickly as possible bring our troops home."

The two candidates also sparred over Bouchard's role on the board of a Lansing-based insurance company, Jackson National Life. Bouchard has been paid up to $60,000 a year for his work with the company.

Stabenow said the company has outsourced jobs overseas, but Bouchard said that her claims were "unbelievably untrue" and that the company is held up as a Michigan success story. He said Stabenow has received thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from people associated with the company.

A message was left seeking comment with a Jackson National spokesman Sunday afternoon.

A telephone poll released Sunday of 643 likely voters by Selzer & Co. of Des Moines, Iowa, found Stabenow had a 13-point lead, with 17 percent listed as "other/not sure" and a sampling error margin of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

The poll was conducted for the Detroit Free Press and Detroit television station WDIV, from Oct. 8 through Wednesday.

The debate was recorded at the Public Broadcasting Service studios of WGVU-TV, for broadcast later in the day on PBS stations statewide.

Senate Candidates Square Off In Debate (DETN)

By Gary Heinlein

Detroit News MI Senate Debate, October 16, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS -- U.S. Sen. Debbie Stabenow and challenger Mike Bouchard occasionally exchanged sharp accusations as they sparred on subjects ranging from Iraq to Social Security in a Sunday debate at WGVU-TV.

Bouchard, the Republican sheriff of Oakland County, repeatedly has charged that Stabenow has done little during her first senate term. Stabenow linked him to President Bush, whose approval rating has been plunging and characterized his criticism as "Washington-speak."

"I have a proven record, I get results," said Bouchard, citing bills he helped pass as a member of the state senate and his current membership on a national panel addressing homeland security issues.

DOJ_NMG_0080727

Stabenow said that Bouchard "supports the failed policy of the Bush administration," while she has been fighting to protect the middle class way of life.

The debate was recorded in studio on Sunday morning for viewing on public television stations across the state at 8 tonight.

WGVU is affiliated with Grand Valley State University, with campuses in Grand Rapids and Allendale.

The candidates differed over key issues:

Stabenow said she wouldn't support an increase in Social Security tax for those who earn more than $94,000 a year to help shore up the fund. Bouchard said he would set up a bipartisan group "to look at every option," but didn't say whether he would back a higher tax.

Bouchard said the U.S. should move expeditiously to disengage from Iraq but should rely heavily on evaluations for military commanders and not make a hasty decision. Stabenow, who voted against invading Iraq, said the nation's involvement has been "misstep after misstep" and "it's time for Iraqis to step up so we can step back."

Stabenow said she supports the concept of universal health care, but through a public private partnership unlike government run programs in Canada and England. Bouchard said he opposes universal health care and favors such efforts as limiting malpractice lawsuits to help reduce costs.

Roger Moilen, a Grand Valley State University political science professor, said the televised debate helped Bouchard reach viewers who haven't seen his political ads, especially in western Michigan.

"He really needs to cut into her lead right now if he is going to keep national (Republican Party) money coming in," Moilen said. Recent polls have show Stabenow to have a double-digit lead over Bouchard.

Moilen said he thought both candidates did a good job getting out the messages that they wanted to put before voters.

How The Economy Can Define An Election (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

LANSING, Mich. -- Economic anxiety hangs heavy over the midterm elections in this cradle of the American auto industry.

That has meant trouble for the re-election campaign of Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm. Her response: flexing the power of incumbency and mounting a minibailout of the Big Three, along with other companies in the state, as Washington stands by.

1 • Take a closer look at Michigan's economy and auto industry, and see what the gubernatorial candidates have to say.2

She is offering tax incentives and cash loans in return for promises -- which critics describe as vague -- to preserve or create jobs. In April Ms. Granholm gave General Motors Corp. $40 million in tax breaks for a pair of factory retoolings. Last month she attended the ribbon-cutting of a drivetrain plant in Flint, which the company rehabbed in return for $28.2 million in state tax breaks. In August Ms. Granholm offered Ford Motor Co. $151 million for investments she claimed would retain more than 50,000 Michigan jobs.

As economic policy, the value of Ms. Granholm's corporate largess is questionable. The state aid is minuscule compared with losses the auto makers face. GM says the breaks are unlikely to swell its payroll. And even with the $151 million on offer, Ford appears bent on reducing its global work force by 40% within three years -- a move Ms. Granholm's critics say could wipe out 7,000 Michigan jobs.

"A good announcement here, a good announcement there; the fact is that government handouts don't create jobs," state Republican Party Chairman Saul Anuzis says.

But as a political move, the drumbeat of business-subsidy announcements looks to be working for the 47-year-old incumbent. She recently took a 50-45 poll lead against an opponent she trailed in July.

"Good policy is good politics," the governor says, when asked if her tax breaks involved political calculation. "What's good for GM is good for Michigan."

Ms. Granholm's tough race bucks the national trend this campaign season, which appears to favor Democrats over Republicans in congressional and gubernatorial races. Currently, there are 28 Republican governors and 22 Democrats. Polls suggest Democrats could net the four seats required for a majority. In Ohio, Republican Ken Blackwell is nearly 20 points behind challenger Ted Strickland in the race to succeed Republican Gov. Bob Taft, who is retiring. Democrats also expect gains in Arkansas, Colorado, Maryland, and New York.

DOJ_NMG_0080728

The Michigan governor's race serves as a reminder that, for all the attention to scandal and Iraq, the economy remains a factor, particularly in the Midwest, that can sting incumbents of both parties.

Tapping into that, Republicans have rallied around gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos, a conservative billionaire whose family-owned company, Amway Corp., of Ada, Mich., is a household name in the state. Now owned by closely held Alticor Inc., the company, cofounded by Mr. DeVos's father, operates in 80 countries. Mr. DeVos, who turns 51 this week, is the former president of Alticor. The DeVos campaign spent $21 million through early September; $16 million of that was the candidate's own money.

On the stump, Mr. DeVos talks of a "single-state recession," noting that Michigan has lost about 100,000 jobs during Ms. Granholm's tenure. Mr. DeVos, whose company employs 4,000 Michigan residents, casts Ms. Granholm, a Harvard-trained lawyer, as lacking the corporate acumen to steer the economy. "What I'm hearing from people is that they'd like someone with a business background to take a crack at it," he says.

Ms. Granholm isn't considered particularly pro-business, having relied heavily in her first term, as do most Democratic politicians here, on union support. Her campaign against Mr. DeVos has included traditional Democratic business-bashing, with jabs at her opponent for decisions he made at Amway. In the 1990s, Mr. DeVos oversaw the elimination of about 1,400 jobs and turned the company toward the world's biggest potential market: China.

Layoffs, outsourcing, China: "In Michigan, these are fighting words," Ms. Granholm often says.

Mr. DeVos says Ms. Granholm has unfairly conflated two discrete events. "I didn't outsource a single...job and she knows it," he says.

The second leg of Ms. Granholm's re-election strategy is, essentially, turning the state's corporate bosses into re-election proxies. Last fall, she advanced a proposal through the Legislature that allows her to borrow as much as $1 billion against tobacco settlement proceeds to bankroll the "21st Century Economic Fund." The fund, overseen by a governor-controlled panel, distributes cash awards to business start-ups that agree to relocate to Michigan or expand here.

The first tranche of money from the fund -- $101 million to 61 microbusinesses and university research shops -- was distributed early last month. "Stay tuned. Hold on to your hat. We've got a lot more to do," Ms. Granholm said at a news conference here, as the awards were announced. To ensure the news wasn't missed by the electorate, the governor's staff hired a satellite truck to beam the news conference live to every television station in the state.

While other states dispense incentives to companies, few governors have done as much and as fast as Ms. Granholm -- especially during a re-election campaign. In August and September, Granholm-controlled development boards doled out $315 million in tax breaks and loans.

Ms. Granholm's strategy appears to be working, as company executives applaud the Democrat for helping Michigan's business climate. In early August, Mark Fields, Ford's North American president, shared the stage with Ms. Granholm, to trumpet the state's tax-abatement offer. "Thank you, Gov. Granholm, and thank you to the people of the state of Michigan for your support of the home team," Mr. Fields said.

The mileage Ms. Granholm received from the Ford announcement wasn't lost on the state's Republican Party, which found itself in the delicate position of criticizing major Michigan businesses in a radio ad broadcast shortly after the offer was made public.

In the ad, a man and a woman discuss the news of the day, with the woman's tone growing sharp over what she is apparently reading in the newspaper. "This sounds like a rip-off," the woman says. "With Gov. Granholm's deal, this car company can lay off seven or eight thousand more workers and still get the big tax breaks from the state."

The radio spot was provocative. Within hours of its release, a Ford executive was on the phone with Mr. Anuzis, the Republican Party chairman, whose organization produced the ad. "To say Ford wasn't happy with the ad and asked them to pull it, I think that would be accurate," a company official said.

Mr. Anuzis says, "We're just being honest."

DOJ_NMG_0080729

Such criticism of a storied Michigan company puts Mr. DeVos, who also received a call from Ford, in a tight spot. His family's business has received similar state largess, such as in 1992, when it threatened to move a catalog distribution center in West Michigan to Georgia. At the time, Gov. John Engler, a Republican, gave the company $325,000 to retrain employees, and a $640,000 transportation grant to improve its entrance, in a move that was seized on by Mr. Engler's political rivals during his re-election campaign.

"I don't begrudge Ford or the others getting what they can out of this: If you have the political savvy and the scale, you can make a deal with the governor," says Mr. DeVos. "My worry is about the businesses that are being left behind."

Women Look To Gain More Ground In Senate (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The door to the women's club in the traditionally male-dominated Senate appears to be inching wider.

If polls hold true, there will be a record number of women in the Senate next year, up from the current all-time high of 14 — nine Democrats and five Republicans.

Only 33 women have served in the Senate: 20 Democrats and 13 Republicans. Until the late 1990s, there had never been more than 10 female senators at any one time.

"Each one of these steps is a big achievement … but it's a pretty high staircase," says Ruth Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University. "This is a Senate that no one had ever seen 20 or 30 years ago."

Mandel says having more women in the Senate is important because it gets voters more used to seeing women in government leadership roles. That can help change perceptions about whether a woman can be elected president. "Women are now becoming visible," she says.

Six female incumbents up for re-election Nov. 7 are leading their challengers, according to the most recent polls. Democrats Dianne Feinstein of California, Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, Maria Cantwell of Washington and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York hold double-digit leads, as do Republicans Olympia Snowe of Maine and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas.

Snowe faces a female challenger, Democrat Jean Hay Bright. So does, Hutchison who is up against Democrat Barbara Ann Radnofsky.

Polls also show two more women could join the Senate:

•In Minnesota, Democrat Amy Klobuchar leads Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy 49%-41%, according to a Mason-Dixon poll from late September.

•In Missouri, Democrat Claire McCaskill narrowly leads Republican Sen. James Talent, 44%-41%, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Sept. 27 to Oct. 1.

Dennis Simon, co-author of Breaking the Political Glass Ceiling: Women and Congressional Elections, says the increasing number of women in the Senate reflects the slowly but steadily growing roster of female elected officials at all levels of government.

He also says this year's emphasis on unethical behavior by members of Congress, such as then-congressman Mark Foley's lewd electronic messages to a teenage congressional page, helps female candidates. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned Sept. 29.

"When ethical issues or what we call 'scandals' are center stage, that advantages female candidates because they are seen as outsiders, not part of the regular power structure," says Simon, a political science professor at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

Among other female Senate candidates facing voters next month, Republican Rep. Katherine Harris in Florida trails Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson by double-digit margins. Harris, who oversaw the 2000 presidential vote recount in Florida, has been dogged by missteps, staff disarray and ties to a corrupt defense contractor. A poll by the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute released last week found Nelson leading 61%-33%.

DOJ_NMG_0080730

In Hawaii, there have been no recent polls gauging Republican state Rep. Cynthia Thielen's bid to unseat Democratic Sen. Daniel Akaka. Thielen was named by the state Republican Party to face Akaka when the candidate who won the GOP primary, Jerry Coffee, withdrew from the race for health reasons.

Simon says there is also a chance that the House of Representatives could see its greatest increase in female members since 1992, when the number of women jumped from 23 to 47. There are now 70 women serving in the House: 46 Democrats and 24 Republicans. That includes three non-voting delegates, all Democrats.

Mandel says a large increase in the number of women in the House will be more likely if Democrats see major gains across the nation. She says that of 139 women running for the House, 97 are Democrats and 42 are Republicans.

"First and foremost, women are seen as the candidate of change," says Ellen Malcolm, president of EMILY's List, a political action committee that works to elect Democratic women who support abortion rights. "Voters don't see them as part of the old boys' network that they're so angry about."

GOP Voters Have Extra Task (USAT/AP)

By Joe Stinebaker, The Associated Press

USA Today, October 16, 2006

PEARLAND, Texas — Voting Republican here wasn't difficult when Tom DeLay's name was on the ballot.

With DeLay out of the race and the GOP unable by law to substitute a name on the ballot, voters must write in the Republican candidate, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula Gibbs. That could prove to be such a chore that Democrats might walk away with a seat that has long been in the GOP's hands. President Bush won the district in 2004 with 64% of the vote.

Republican Cynthia Hart said she was unaware she would have to write in the GOP candidate. "I guess I have to be more careful," she said. "But I'm not so sure I would take the time to go through all that."

That would be welcome news to Democrats out to capture the former House majority leader's seat, which could help them wrest control of the House of Representatives from the GOP. Democrats need to gain 15 seats.

The Democratic candidate is Nick Lampson, 61, a former congressman who has outraised, outspent and campaigned longer than the Republicans.

"Some thought that I was nuts, but I guess when you believe strongly enough that something needs to change, you're willing to do extraordinary things to do it," Lampson said.

DeLay resigned in June. He was indicted last year on charges of violating state campaign-finance laws. He denies wrongdoing. The courts refused to allow Republicans to replace him on the ballot.

National Republicans were supposed to invest $3 million to $4 million to help Sekula Gibbs, according to state GOP chairwoman Tina Benkiser. The House GOP campaign committee has donated $134,000. Lampson had $2.2 million to spend as of June 30.

Sekula Gibbs, 53, insists the media attention surrounding the race has helped her overcome any disadvantages. "It was essential to me that we maintain a conservative voice in Washington," she said.

Advertising may help voters gain familiarity with the write-in campaign, but there are other hurdles. Voters will have to highlight and enter the "write-in" entry. They will then turn a small wheel on the voting machine and spell out Sekula Gibbs' name. Errors will be accepted as long as the voter's intent is clear to a panel of Republicans and Democrats.

GOP Running Against A Stiff Northern Wind (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

GROTON, Conn. — The political equivalent of a nor'easter is bearing down on Republicans from New England through Pennsylvania.

With President Bush's approval ratings collapsing across the Northeast, the region presents Democrats an unusually rich concentration of opportunities to capture Republican-held House and Senate seats in the November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0080731

In this tempest, Democrats are pressing GOP Sens. Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island and Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania, and mounting fierce challenges to pick up about 10 Republican-held House seats in several states. Half a dozen other House Republicans also could be swept away.

The campaign's atmospherics give Democrats the chance to establish in the region an equivalent to what Republicans have built in the South: an overwhelming regional advantage that anchors their bids for House and Senate majorities. Indeed, if Democrats win most of the House races in play in the Northeast, they will be virtually assured of the net gain of 15 seats nationwide that they need to control the chamber.

On the plus side for the GOP, many of the targeted Republicans are strong candidates.

Rep. Rob Simmons, who represents a sprawling district in eastern Connecticut centered around Groton, is an example. He prepared for heavy political weather by diligently promoting local interests, taking generally moderate positions on social issues and seizing chances to show independence from Bush. Simmons and many of the other at-risk Republicans also are fiercely attacking their Democratic opponents.

Still, analysts in both parties agree that even with these efforts, Republicans in the Northeast's Democratic-leaning states remain especially vulnerable because of pervasive voter dissatisfaction with Bush, the Iraq war and scandals in Washington.

The endangered Republicans usually benefit from "some natural insulation because they happen to be fairly good fits for their districts," said Saul Shorr, a Democratic consultant based in Philadelphia. "But when there is a wave … places that weren't on the map [as competitive races] just get sucked in."

For decades, Northeast Republicans have experienced a decline that represents the flip-side of the GOP advances in the South. While the party's national identification with a conservative agenda, especially on social issues, has keyed its gains in Dixie, those issues have weakened it in the region that once produced such icons of political moderation as former Sens. Jacob K. Javits of New York and Lowell P. Weicker Jr. of Connecticut.

This year, the climate for further Democratic gains could hardly be more favorable. In an ABC/Washington Post survey this week, Bush's approval rating in the East stood at 27%, much lower than in any other region.

Joe Courtney, the Democrat running against Simmons, feels that wind at his back. He lost to the incumbent, 54% to 46%, in 2002 when Bush was still riding a wave of public support after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"Running in the wake of 9/11 before the invasion of Iraq was a very tough environment as a challenger with a message of change," Courtney said. "Nothing could be more different than today. People have gotten a very good look at [the GOP] agenda … and I think in a district like this people have really crossed the line as far as wanting out."

That discontent, echoed across the region, has created strong Democratic opportunities in two Senate races. In Pennsylvania, polls have shown Santorum consistently trailing Democrat Bob Casey Jr. In Rhode Island, Chafee is facing a smaller and less settled deficit against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse.

Democratic pickups in these two states, however, could be undercut in New Jersey. There, Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat appointed to the seat earlier this year, is locked in a tight contest with Republican Tom Kean Jr.

In the House, top Democratic targets include four GOP-held districts in Pennsylvania, an open seat in central New York being vacated by Republican Sherwood Boehlert and a Buffalo-area district where Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds is vulnerable, in part because of the sex scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

At the apex of the Democratic target list are Simmons and two other House Republicans in Connecticut — Reps. Nancy L. Johnson and Christopher Shays.

Across the region, most Democrats want to nationalize their contests, making them a referendum on the direction Bush and the GOP-led Congress have set for the country. The Republicans want to localize the races, making them a referendum on their personal service to the district — and the personal shortcomings of their opponent.

Courtney, for instance, last week accused Simmons of failing to hold the administration accountable for reversals in Iraq and denounced him for supporting Bush-backed energy and Medicare prescription drug bills. Courtney characterized those measures as giveaways to the oil and drug industries.

Slight in build and contained in manner, Courtney is hardly a dynamic presence as a candidate. But he is firm in labeling Simmons, at every opportunity, "the president's No. 1 supporter in Connecticut."

DOJ_NMG_0080732

Simmons, a hyper-kinetic campaigner, is airing ads pounding Courtney for supporting tax increases during his tenure as a state legislator.

Above all, Simmons focuses on his role in the state's offensive to prevent the closing of the Groton naval base and his efforts to generate contracts for the nearby General Dynamics' Electric Boat submarine shipyard. His campaign website, meanwhile, contains an interactive map that lists, town by town, the federal money he has steered into the district.

"Joe Courtney doesn't know anybody in Washington D.C.; he doesn't have any clout; he doesn't have any experience," Simmons said this week at a fundraiser. Later, he whipped out his cellphone and brandished it before reporters, saying, "He doesn't have [former Veterans Affairs Secretary] Tony Principi's cellphone number. OK?"

With rare exceptions, Republicans across the region are claiming independence from Bush and spotlighting their commitment to working across party lines.

In his latest ad, Shays says, "I've gone against the president and the Republican leadership when I think they're wrong." Democrats counter that even Republicans with moderate voting records bolster Bush and the GOP by providing another vote for the party's congressional majority. In Rhode Island, Whitehouse recently unveiled an ad saying, "Bush needs Chafee to keep Republican control of the Senate. That's how Bush keeps his agenda alive."

When Courtney visited a senior center in Hebron, Conn., Jean Lyman, a retired secretary, said she had voted for Simmons before but would not this year because "he's just too tied to Bush and all his plans and programs."

By contrast, Del Knight, a medical researcher and political independent from Ledyard, Conn., who voted against Bush in 2004, still turned out for a Simmons fundraiser this week. The incumbent, Knight said, is "a good guy, and I think he has gone his own way."

Voters such as Knight have been the life raft for many Northeast Republicans as the region has turned away from the GOP. This year's results will measure whether these Republicans can still find enough support from such voters even as the intensely polarizing disputes of the Bush era have widened the distance between the two parties.

Hawaii Governor Leads From The Center (WT)

By Christopher Pala

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

HONOLULU -- When Gov. Linda Lingle addressed leaders of the state's top 250 corporations during a banquet earlier this month, she might have been expected to brag about the state's booming economy and her promise to cut corporate taxes and government regulations.

After all, Mrs. Lingle, a Republican, is running for re-election next month, and her audience included many potential and current contributors.

Instead, she spoke about her efforts to alleviate homelessness, get welfare recipients back to work and reform the state's troubled public school system, even as she acknowledged that most of those in the audience send their children to private schools.

Hawaii residents readily remark that on the mainland, Mrs. Lingle, who has a 66 percent approval rating, would be a liberal Democrat. But in a state that hadn't elected a Republican governor in 40 years, she is expected to be re-elected by such a wide margin that Hawaii's leading Democrats preferred to campaign for other jobs, leaving the challenge to Randy Iwase, a 58-year-old former state senator.

During the campaign's only televised debate, Mrs. Lingle, 53, promised to serve out another term and is expected to challenge Sen. Daniel K. Inouye in four years, when he is expected to be seeking, at 86, his ninth term. Mr. Inouye, like the rest of Hawaii's congressional delegation, is a liberal Democrat.

"Lingle is the future of the Republican Party," said Ira Rohter, a political science professor at the University of Hawaii. "I think eventually the party will move back to the center, and people like Lingle will take over."

Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, agrees.

DOJ_NMG_0080733

"Candidates who succeed despite being from the heavily minority party on average are stronger and with greater talents than those nominated by the majority party," he said. "Lingle is a perfect example. Hawaii is such a Democratic bastion that it's amazing any Republican was ever elected statewide, and that she's a heavy favorite for re-election is even more amazing."

Mrs. Lingle also is an observant Jew in a state with a minuscule Jewish community. She is the first female governor and the first not to be born and raised in Hawaii in 40 years.

Mrs. Lingle is from St. Louis and was educated in California. She came to Hawaii in 1976, first working for a Teamsters boss in Honolulu. She then moved to Molokai Island and edited a community newspaper.

In 1980, she left the newspaper, joined the Republican Party and was elected to the Maui County Council, where she served 10 years. In 1988, she was elected mayor of Maui County, which includes Molokai. She served for another decade and consolidated a reputation for efficiency and merit appointments, denouncing cronyism in the unions and government.

After winning the 2002 election, in which both houses of the Legislature retained large Democratic majorities, she behaved, said state House Majority Leader Marcus Oshiro, "more like a dictator than a governor."

Democrats dismissed her proposed constitutional amendment to change the school system and, by all accounts, she accomplished little in her first two years except streamlining the executive branch.

But she remained popular because, as Mr. Oshiro put it, "her timing was perfect." The recession that hobbled the previous administration turned into a boom that brought one of the country's lowest unemployment rates and allowed her to turn a budget deficit into a surplus.

Mrs. Lingle backs the Bush administration on the Iraq war. She opposes a withdrawal of U.S. troops because Iraq would "become a sitting target for terrorists" who would "be able to take over this country again and rule it in terror," she told a small group of journalists.

"We need a good strategy to make certain that democracy gets up and running as soon as possible so that they can take care of their own security and we can bring our troops home."

Clinton's Iowa Visit May Serve Wife's Aims (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

DES MOINES, Oct. 15 -- Former president Bill Clinton entered the Hy-Vee Hall here on Saturday night like an aging rock star, striding up a red carpet, wearing a big smile, his arms outstretched to touch the hands of Democratic admirers lined up along his walkway to the stage.

Clinton came to rally Democrats three weeks before critical midterm elections. But his visit may have served another purpose as well. Alone among prospective Democratic presidential candidates for 2008, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) has not set foot in the state all year, and the futures market in Clinton political stock here has been suffering.

Early polls by the Des Moines Register have shown former North Carolina senator John Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice presidential nominee, to be more popular among Democratic activists than the New York senator. A more recent survey of Iowans showed her running weaker than Edwards, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) in a series of hypothetical general election matchups against prospective Republican candidates.

The senator's political advisers dismiss those numbers and perhaps for good reason. Clinton has chosen to focus on her own reelection in New York, they note, and so has not spent time in a state where voters insist on getting to know the candidates before they make a commitment to support them. If she decides to run, say her advisers, attitudes will change.

But Iowa Democrats said Clinton's standing reflects more than her absence. They say there is general unease within the party about her ability to win a general election. Beyond that, some Democrats are troubled by her support for the war in Iraq long after other Democratic politicians such as Kerry and Edwards had renounced their votes for the congressional resolution that authorized President Bush to launch the invasion.

Attitudes in Iowa are important in part because the state holds the opening caucuses of the nomination battle every four years. But Iowa also is a small but significant Midwestern swing state, one that swung to the Republicans in 2004. Any Democrat running for president will need to convince voters that he or she can win Iowa.

DOJ_NMG_0080734

"I think Hillary's got a problem with just about everybody with that under-the-radar thing of 'she can't win,' " said Rob Tully, a former Iowa Democratic Party chairman, and as one of Edwards's leading supporters, someone with his own biases. "That's something she's going to have to get over if she gets in. She knows that. She's an articulate, astute politician."

Antiwar sentiment has always run deep among Democratic activists in Iowa, which was why former Vermont governor Howard Dean found traction for his long-shot presidential candidacy in the opening of the 2004 nomination battle before his campaign collapsed in the weeks just before the caucuses.

If she runs, Clinton will meet skepticism or hostility among many of these antiwar Democrats. "The problem I have with Hillary is she voted for the Iraq war and did [support it] until a few months ago," said Bruce Stone, a liberal activist who attended Saturday's dinner.

Ann Selzer, who conducts the Iowa Poll for the Des Moines Register, said Clinton's problems go beyond the fact that she hasn't spent much time here recently. The problem is that many people already have an unfavorable opinion of her. "Her negatives are so negative," Selzer said in a phone interview.

It was Bill Clinton, during his first presidential campaign in 1992, who described the political partnership with his wife to voters as a buy-one, get-one-free deal. That still appears to be the case. He carries obvious political baggage, some of which his wife would inherit if she runs, but he is demonstrating that there are things he can do, small and large, that she cannot do for herself right now that could boost her candidacy.

The New York senator has avoided New Hampshire this year, like Iowa. Among other things, this has kept her out of the effort among New Hampshire Democrats to preserve their state's first-in-the-nation primary status, which the Democratic National Committee is challenging.

Every likely Democratic candidate save for Clinton has signed a letter to Gov. John Lynch (D) backing the state. But when the former president visited last summer, he offered a ringing endorsement of New Hampshire's traditional status at the front of the calendar and said his wife shared those views.

Many Democrats still look at Clinton as the party's most effective strategist and communicator, and on Saturday night he was applauded just for saying, "Here's what we [Democrats] ought to say," and used part of his 49-minute speech to road-test a message that will resonate long after next month's election.

He advised on how Democratic candidates should talk about national security and Iraq -- robustly but also critically of the administration. He outlined an ambitious domestic agenda: expanded health-care coverage, energy independence, fiscal responsibility, tax cuts for the middle class. He condemned what he described as the giveaways to big corporations, drug companies, corporate executives and the wealthiest Americans.

It was all in the guise of the midterm elections, but it could and likely will be taken right off the shelf with minimal modifications by Hillary Clinton, if she chooses to run. She already has on some of the issues he outlined.

Clinton joked that one of his main jobs these days is as the "chief caseworker for the junior senator of New York." But he is working in her behalf far beyond the borders of the Empire State and is reaching people she is not -- some of them more receptive to him than to her.

Asked before Clinton's speech what he thought of the former president, Stone brightened. "I think he walks on water, and the only way you'd get me to vote for Hillary is to tell me it's a package deal." She will decide how explicitly to make such an offer.

Woo GOP Voters, Clinton Urges Party (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa -- Former President Bill Clinton told Iowa Democrats that they should appeal to disaffected Republican voters in their efforts to win control of Congress.

"We've got a big responsibility. Forget about 2008. Forget about the politics. Just go out and find somebody and look them dead in the eye and say, 'You know, this is not right,' " Mr. Clinton said in a 45-minute speech before 3,500 Democratic Party activists Saturday night at their annual Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner.

DOJ_NMG_0080735

Few doubted that the former president was present as a surrogate for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, whose likely run for the White House in 2008 would start in the important caucus state.

Democrats seeking their party's presidential nomination regularly attend the dinner during election years. Most in attendance paid $100 to attend the fundraising event that also included speeches from Iowa Democrats Gov. Tom Vilsack and Sen. Tom Harkin.

Despite his call for focus on this year's midterm elections, Mr. Clinton did work in a joking pitch on behalf of his wife.

"I am under no illusions as to why I'm here," he said. "You were so desperate for a Democrat with any name recognition at all who isn't running for president that you resorted to the chief caseworker to the junior senator from New York."

Mrs. Clinton did not attend the fundraiser and is the only member of the prospective class of 2008 Democrats who has not made a campaign stop in Iowa. In 1992, Mr. Clinton made only one visit during the primaries and lost the state to Mr. Harkin before eventually winning his party's nomination and the White House.

Even though Mrs. Clinton was not in Iowa, an independent organization supporting her likely 2008 campaign had a large presence at the dinner.

"The response has been overwhelming," said Peter Fedde, of VoteHillary.org, based in Chester, Va.

Mr. Fedde said Mrs. Clinton is focused on her Senate re-election, but that Mr. Clinton's speech was "very symbolic" of themes that Mrs. Clinton would tout as a presidential candidate.

"It was the same kind of issues, including working with Republicans," Mr. Fedde said.

Most of Mr. Clinton's speech focused on what he considers the faults of the Bush administration and a Republican-led Congress. Mr. Clinton cited the war in Iraq, the federal budget deficit and increased political polarization.

"You cannot blame the entire Republican Party for this reason," Mr. Clinton said. "The entire government of the United States -- the Congress, the White House and, increasingly, the courts -- for the last six years has been in the total control not of the Republican Party, but of the most ideological, the most right-wing, the most extreme sliver of the Republican Party."

Mr. Clinton said Republicans have three leading principles of governance: concentration of wealth among the nation's wealthiest people, "unlimited and unaccountable executive power" and appealing to an ideologically driven political base.

"We believe in evidence and argument, not assertions and attack," Mr. Clinton said.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton called Sen. John McCain on Saturday to personally apologize and denounce comments an adviser of hers reportedly made that slammed the Republican senator over his time in captivity in North Vietnam, the New York Post reports.

The move from one potential 2008 presidential candidate to another was sparked by a column in the New York Times in which Maureen Dowd quoted an anonymous adviser talking about Mr. McCain's criticism of the Clintons over their North Korea position.

The adviser said Team Clinton thought Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, was doing the White House's dirty work by criticizing the Clintons and ended up "looking similar to the way he did on those captive tapes from Hanoi, where he recited the names of his crewmates."

That was a reference to an unsubstantiated rumor used to malign Mr. McCain, a Vietnam war hero, as off-kilter during the 2000 Republican presidential primary.

Aides to both senators said Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, reached out to Mr. McCain to denounce the comments.

Mrs. Clinton is said to have a good relationship with Mr. McCain, and her circle clearly wasn't pleased with the remarks.

Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson said, "These comments are reprehensible, and they in no way reflect Senator Clinton's feelings."

McCain spokesman John Weaver replied, "Senator Clinton is correct: The remark was reprehensible."

DOJ_NMG_0080736

Last week, Mr. McCain took what many saw as the first shot of the 2008 race, blasting Mrs. Clinton for placing blame for North Korea's recent nuclear test on President Bush -- and pointed to her husband Bill's policies as a "failure."

True believers

"Global warming is a religion, not science. That's why acolytes in the media attack global-warming critics not with scientific arguments, but for their apostasy," San Francisco Chronicle columnist Debra Saunders writes.

"Then they laud global-warming believers not for reducing greenhouse gases, but simply for believing global warming is a coming catastrophe caused by man. The important thing is to have faith in those who warn: The end is near," the columnist said.

"So a New York Times editorial Thursday took after Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., not for being a Doubting Thomas, but as the headline read, a 'Doubting Inhofe.' The brunt of the editorial was not a scientific refutation of Inhofe's arguments against the global-warming craze -- other than to cite a National Academy of Sciences report that warned that the Earth is approaching the warmest temperatures in 12,000 years -- a short blip in time to your average geologist.

"The Times' focus was on Inhofe's refusal to bow to 'the consensus among mainstream scientists and the governments of nearly every industrialized nation concerning manmade climate change.' That is, Inhofe has had the effrontery to challenge elite orthodoxy. Or, as the editorial put it, Inhofe 'has really buttressed himself with the will to disbelieve.'

"Get thee away, Satan.

" 'I see a sense of desperation that I haven't seen before,' Inhofe told me by phone Thursday, 'and frankly I'm enjoying it.' "

Michigan debate

Sen. Debbie Stabenow, Michigan Democrat, and Republican challenger Mike Bouchard sparred over issues ranging from the economy to free-trade agreements yesterday as they met in their first debate.

Mr. Bouchard, the Oakland County sheriff, said Mrs. Stabenow has been ineffective and has flip-flopped on several issues. "She says one thing here and does another thing in Washington," he said.

The former state lawmaker also criticized Mrs. Stabenow's record on the economy, noting that Michigan has lost thousands of jobs in recent years.

Mrs. Stabenow, seeking a second term, said Mr. Bouchard would support the "failed policies" of the Bush administration, the Associated Press reports.

A slim lead

The Democratic candidate running for the House seat once held by Florida's Mark Foley has a slim lead over a Republican rival, according to a newspaper poll published yesterday.

Democrat Tim Mahoney led Republican state Rep. Joe Negron 48 percent to 41 percent, with 11 percent undecided, according to the poll commissioned by the South Florida Sun-Sentinel and Scripps Treasure Coast Newspapers.

Mr. Negron is filling the campaign vacancy left after Mr. Foley, a six-term congressman, resigned amid reports that he exchanged sexually explicit Internet messages with male teenagers who worked on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Foley's name will remain on the ballot, with votes cast for him going to Mr. Negron.

The poll also found that many voters in the 16th Congressional District in South Florida say their voting plans will not be influenced by the scandal. The poll has a margin of error of 4 percentage points. Maryland-based Research 2000 conducted the telephone survey of 600 likely voters in District 16 Wednesday through Friday for the newspapers.

Backing Arnold

The Los Angeles Times yesterday endorsed Arnold Schwarzenegger for a second term as governor of California.

After a "disappointing sophomore year," Mr. Schwarzenegger had managed to direct the state on a "moderate course" that deserves another four years, the newspaper said.

"In the last year, the Republican has formed relationships with legislative leaders that focused the usually fractious and often obstructive Democrats on a productive agenda."

Polls show Mr. Schwarzenegger with a sizable lead over Phil Angelides, his Democratic rival in the governor's race.

Kerry's charge

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, yesterday accused the Bush administration of a "cut-and-run policy" in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0080737

Asked on "Fox News Sunday" about the U.N. Security Council resolution against North Korea's nuclear- weapons program, Mr. Kerry instead changed the subject to Iraq and Afghanistan, condemning as "a complete fantasy" the foreign-policy prescriptions offered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who had preceded him as a guest on the Fox News Channel program.

"It's a failure in Afghanistan where they have a sort of cut-and-run policy of not completing the job," said Mr. Kerry, adding that the U.S. has "seven times the troops in Iraq" as in Afghanistan.

"The problem with Iraq is that it has diminished our hand and reduced our ability to be able to deal with Iran and North Korea. They are related," Mr. Kerry said.

'We Are A Nuclear Power' (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh, Melinda Liu And George Wehrfritz

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

Great historical events can spring from small slights. Kaiser Wilhelm never forgave the French for not treating him to a parade in Paris. "The monarchs of Europe have paid no attention to what I have to say," the German emperor whined before setting the Continent aflame in 1914. By many accounts, North Korea's Kim Jong Il also suffers from a tender ego. For one thing the 5-foot-3 dictator is sensitive about his height (hence, one suspects, his bouffant hairstyle and elevator shoes). After ordering the kidnapping of a South Korean actress, Choe Eun Hee, in 1978 to help him start up a national film industry, the first thing the movie-mad Kim jokingly asked her at a welcoming dinner was: "Well, Madame, what do you think of my physique?" More painfully, he fears that in the eyes of his countrymen and allies, he can never match the achievements of his revered father, the "Great Leader" Kim Il Sung (who was close to six feet tall and who led a guerrilla army against the Japanese occupiers in the 1930s). By many accounts, the young Kim is fed up along with his top aides, who often reflect his views. "What I hear is, Big Brother is telling Little Brother, 'Don't do that'," the North Korean vice minister of Foreign Affairs, Kim Gye Gwan, complained when Beijing urged Kim Jong Il to cancel his planned missile tests in July. "But we are not boys. We are a nuclear power."

And so one can understand the reaction at the highest levels of Kim's secretive regime when he learned of George W. Bush's contemptuous comments about him at a meeting of Republican senators in 2002. In a private diatribe that left listeners stunned by its vehemence, the U.S. president called Kim a hateful "pygmy" who behaved like "a spoiled child at a dinner table." Since those remarks and other personal cracks by Bush were reported in NEWSWEEK and other Western publications, North Korean officials have regularly complained about them to Washington-based Korea scholar Selig Harrison, who visits Pyongyang often. "How can we deal with you when your leader doesn't show us even a minimum of respect?" Kim Gye Gwan asked Harrison in 2004.

History is not just about abstract forces like economics or ideology or geography. It is also shaped, often most decisively, by the aims and ambitions of deeply flawed men—men like Kim, his father and generations of North Korean soldiers, scientists and spies who have spent years trying to join the Nuclear Club. Did Kim decide to test a nuclear device last week because the leader of the world's only superpower refuses to talk directly to him? It's more complicated than that, of course, just as World War I had many more causes than Kaiser Wilhelm's Napoleon complex. But the trail of events that led to this perilous moment—making North Korea the first new declared nuclear power in eight years, and undoubtedly the most unstable of the eight (not including Israel) in the world today—had a great deal to do with years of misplaced pride and prejudice between Pyongyang and Washington, of deep misunderstanding and disastrous missed chances. In an Oct. 10 interview with a Seoul newspaper, a North Korean diplomat confirmed that Pyongyang was sending a message: "When we declared that we had weapons, the U.S. underestimated our abilities and doubted that we really had them. The nuclear test has proven [our word]."

I. Secrets of the North

No one in Washington has ever known quite how to deal with North Korea. As a lonely Stalinist regime, Kim's nation is a political toxic-waste site that has festered for 50 years amid East Asia's glittering successes. It is also a place of truly Orwellian oddity, where traffic cops in Pyongyang's empty boulevards go through the motions of directing cars when there are none, where thousands of people starve unnoticed and where Kim administers "a gulag the size of Houston," in Bush's words. Bill Clinton likewise despised Kim, and as president, Clinton came much closer than Bush ever has to attacking him. But the incumbent American president is, by many accounts, offended by Kim on a more deeply moral and personal level.

DOJ_NMG_0080738

During his first trip to Seoul, soon after his Axis of Evil speech in early 2002, Karen Hughes, then Bush's counselor, told reporters that the president was fascinated by satellite pictures of the Korean Peninsula at night, showing bright lights over the South and darkness over the power-starved North. To Bush, the pictures showed "the light and opportunity that comes with freedom, and the dark that comes with a regime that is oppressive," Hughes said. Just two weeks ago, at a press conference in the Rose Garden days before Kim's test, Bush recalled a meeting he had last April with a Japanese mother who had lost her teenage daughter to a North Korean abduction 29 years ago, possibly to be turned into a prostitute. He said the session—which he has called "one of the most meaningful moments of my presidency"—broke his heart.

While the size of North Korea's new test was unimpressive—at half a kiloton or less, it was little more than a nuclear popgun—Pyongyang continues to be the world's No. 1 missile proliferator. And the regime's long, shady history of secret kidnappings, amphibious commando missions and other spooky operations make American intelligence officials as nervous as they've ever been about what Kim has and what he might do with it. While the North has not yet been caught shipping nuclear materials abroad, it is conceivable that an enraged or cash-strapped Kim Jong Il could someday permit a baseball-size lump of plutonium loaded into a terrorist bomb to make its way to America.

Just as scary is what the North might pass on to other nuclear-minded regimes, especially its Axis of Evil companion, Iran. At the dawn of the Nuclear Age, during World War II, scientists worried that atomic technology could never be fully controlled—that the weapons produced to fight tyranny were demons in thin disguise. A NEWSWEEK investigation traces North Korea's nuclear demons back to their origins, and the story shows that, tragically, what was feared in the middle of the 20th century could become a commonplace of the early 21st.

Last week's half-kiloton explosion was the product of an effort spanning a half century or more. It is difficult to pinpoint the precise moment Kim Il Sung decided he needed the Bomb and a ballistic-missile program to go with it. But the ambition was in keeping with his deep insecurity going back to the dubious origins of his regime.

North Korea, after all, is an invented country, a relic of the cold-war divide. After the World War II defeat of Japan, which had occupied Korea, the regime was created by Stalin in 1945 out of the northern half of the Korean Peninsula, and Moscow propped up Kim Il Sung as a strongman. The Americans, meanwhile, built their client state in the southern half. Both sides never gave up their claims to the whole peninsula, putting them on a permanent war footing. To consolidate power, Kim created a cultlike ideology of self-reliance called juche, a curdled brew of traditional Korean xenophobia and nationalism, Confucian deference to authority and utopian Marxism-Leninism. Some experts argue that Kim decided he needed a nuclear security blanket soon after the 1950-53 Korean War, which he battled to a draw. Then came the early 1970s, when he realized he was losing the economic contest against his blood enemies in Seoul, and after that the Soviet Union disintegrated—a failure that suddenly left Pyongyang without a communist patron or a nuclear umbrella to shield it. An increasingly paranoid Kim Il Sung also sponsored many acts of terrorism against the South, including the alleged sabotaging of a Korean Airlines plane in 1987, killing all 115 passengers and crew, the year before the Seoul Olympic Games. And he taught his son well.

Driven by two men with near-absolute power, North Korea's program was produced by a staggering cast of characters. They included idealistic Korean scientists educated in Imperial Japan and repatriated after World War II, their students educated in the Soviet Union and the thousands of homegrown technicians. Japan, one of the North's hardiest enemies today, gave Pyongyang the man deemed the "first father" of North Korea's nuclear program, the late scientist and inventor Lee Sung Ki, who earned a degree in chemical engineering at Kyoto Imperial University in 1931. In fact, despite its deep isolation, the Hermit Kingdom is known or suspected to have received nuclear assistance from 14 countries: Russia, China, Austria, France, Canada, Romania, Germany, Pakistan, India, Japan, Iran, Ukraine, Kazakhstan and the Democratic Republic of Congo.

There were privateers, too: defectors, Chinese technology firms, Japanese trading houses and front companies scattered from Thailand to Scandinavia—all provided critical technologies, components or know-how by circumventing a global nonproliferation regime designed to thwart such commerce. Even the International Atomic Energy Agency unwittingly helped: analysts say a single North Korean diplomat, Choi Hak Gun, who was posted to IAEA headquarters in Vienna from 1974 to 1978, scoured the agency's library for nuclear know-how.

DOJ_NMG_0080739

The human costs of North Korea's nuclear ambitions on the nation's best and brightest were terrible. Few paid a higher price than Kimchaek University's class of '62, according to a grad who defected from North Korea several years ago and told NEWSWEEK his story. As graduation at the elite college neared more than 40 years ago, the buzz on campus was that Kim Il Sung had ordered construction of an advanced research facility to study atomic energy, and that patriotic young scientists so on would be mobilized to work there. "Our professors really pushed the need for nuclear development," he recalls. "The rumor circulating among students was that those of us sent there wouldn't have long to live."

The defector, spared the fate of those assigned to nuclear labs, spent his adult life watching unlucky classmates grow sick, weak and despondent. On leave, one confided a Confucian desperation to marry and sire children before radiation rendered him sterile. "It was exactly what we feared," the defector says, still saddened by their sacrifice. "These guys went bald. Many of them lost their eyebrows. Some of them had constant nosebleeds. They looked so weak it was hard to even face them. The thinking was, 'If one scientist falls there will always be others to take his place'." That logic not only ravaged a generation of scientists sent like worker bees into toxic nuclear labs. It cost billions in hard currency that might have fed starving people and hobbled the national economy by imposing perpetual austerity under slogans like "Military first."

North Korea was also helped by its participation in the rogues' club of nations that have suffered U.S. sanctions for pursuing nuclear ambitions, led by Pakistan, since the end of the cold war. After Washington shut down exports of military hardware to Pakistan in 1985, none other than Harvard-educated Benazir Bhutto concluded a missile deal with the North. Pakistan's black-marketing lead scientist, AQ Khan, visited North Korea 13 times over the next seven years. Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf has denied he knew anything about this, but according to former senior Pakistani officials those visits occurred with the knowledge and consent of the military leadership. Pakistan agreed to provide second-rate P1 centrifuge technology to North Korea in return for missiles, enabling Pakistan to extend the reach of its nuclear weapon deep inside India, and North Korean scientists received nuclear briefings at KRL (Khan Research Laboratory), Pakistan's main nuclear facility. Even so, the imported uranium enrichment technology has barely gotten off the ground. In the end, it was juche that prevailed.

Despite all this effort, the North Korean program remained a rather ramshackle affair, demonstrating that it's not so easy after all to build nukes. In the early 1990s, after Washington and Pyongyang nearly came to blows over the program, evangelist Billy Graham and Jimmy Carter went on peacemaking visits to the North, leading to Bill Clinton's "Agreed Framework" deal with Pyongyang. Under that 1994 pact, Clinton obtained a commitment to freeze plutonium reprocessing in exchange for aid and a civilian nuclear plant. When American experts were finally allowed in to inspect Yongbyon, the center of North Korea's nuclear programs, that year, they could hardly believe their eyes. Inside, the cooling pond looked like an abandoned swimming pool. Above it, a window was broken; a bird's carcass floated on the water. Below a film of algae, underwater cameras revealed metal receptacles—they looked like milk-bottle baskets—at the bottom of the pool containing spent nuclear fuel rods that could be reprocessed to produce weapons-grade plutonium. Some rods were broken, many mired in sludge. Tree leaves and twigs littered the place. Staring at the debris, inspectors suddenly realized that frogs were living in the water.

But since the breakdown of the Agreed Framework in 2002—the Bush administration discarded it as a flawed Clinton-era policy—Yongbyon has been cleaned up and repaired, says Sig Hecker, a former director of Los Alamos who was invited to inspect it in January 2004. Hecker later said the North Koreans were now "beyond dispute competent" at the chemistry and metallurgy of plutonium reprocessing. Indeed, the history of North Korea's program is evidence that "any country on the map with a population of 20 to 25 million will have the core group of people who can [go nuclear] if they squeeze their economy hard enough," says Daniel Pinkston, a nonproliferation expert at the Monterey Institute for International Studies. And North Korea has long been, to say the least, quite open to squeezing people in pursuit of power—including many along the Potomac River half a world away.

II. Missed Signals

Oct. 17, 2000, was a beautiful moonlit night in Washington. Marshal Cho Myong Rok, second only to Kim in North Korea, stood sipping drinks with Madeleine Albright on the terrace of the State Department's opulent Benjamin Franklin Room. In a meeting earlier that day with President Clinton, Cho had declared that Pyongyang had renounced terrorism, and he delivered Kim Jong Il's personal invitation to the president to visit Pyongyang.

DOJ_NMG_0080740

The two sides were tantalizingly near a deal to stop all North Korean missile exports and cease development, testing and deployment of anything other than short-range Scuds. At least so the Clinton team believed. In exchange, the North would get full diplomatic recognition, the promise of billions in aid from Washington and Tokyo, and the stamp of legitimacy and guarantee of security that a Clinton visit would bring, says Albright's former senior aide, Wendy Sherman. According to Yang Sungchul, the South Korean ambassador to Washington who was there that night, Albright and Marshal Cho conversed in one corner, she looking comfortable and the general bolt-upright as if standing at attention. "I'm sure he was overwhelmed" by the culture shock, says Yang: here was Cho, the leading general of a country whose capital features a U.S. war-crimes museum, surrounded by the enemy.

A week later Albright was in Pyongyang, meeting with what she described as a well-informed and charming Kim, who gave a sophisticated rundown of his security situation and graciously directed his waiters not to give her too much alcohol during toasts. At one point, recalls Sherman, Kim even called for U.S. troops to remain on the Korean Peninsula (to guard against China). Albright was also treated to a show involving tens of thousands of acrobats and dancers at a stadium, intended to impress her with the glorious feats of the North Korean revolution. During the spectacle, a mass of performers flipped colored placards that together depicted Kim's Taepodong I missile taking off for its first test in 1998. Kim turned to Albright at that moment and said, "That was the first launch of that missile, and it will be the last."

In retrospect, that evening was the high point of U.S.-North Korean relations. Since then, GOP hard-liners have gleefully criticized Albright for the visit, and dismissed the North Koreans as blackmailers. But had a lasting settlement been reached, many Asian and U.S. diplomats believe North Korea would likely not have tested a nuclear device, and would not have developed an intercontinental missile, the Taepodong II, with a range that can reach Alaska or Hawaii (though its first test failed).

In the end, Clinton was absorbed by Mideast peace talks, which the White House thought more important than a risky deal many aides doubted. But the incoming secretary of State, Colin Powell, was so impressed with the deal's terms that, when Albright and her aides briefed him and the then national-security adviser Condoleezza Rice, he praised it to the press. On March 6, 2001, Powell declared that the new administration "plan[s] to engage with North Korea, to pick up where President Clinton left off. Some promising elements were left on the table." South Korean President Kim Dae Jung, full of messianic fervor about his new Sunshine Policy of détente with the North, rushed to Washington to make his case as well.

That's when the hammer dropped. Powell, it turned out, had forgotten to check with his boss before spouting off about North Korea. And Kim Dae Jung was stunned when he stepped out for a joint news conference after meeting Bush in March 2001. "He didn't talk about what we had agreed upon but began to criticize North Korea by saying that a regime that couldn't even feed its people was making nuclear weapons," Kim Dae Jung told NEWSWEEK last week. "From that time on, things began to go wrong. I am confident that if President Bush had [pursued] the agreement sought by President Clinton the North Korean issue would have been resolved, and I am very sorry about that."

The Bush team says both Powell and Kim Dae Jung got ahead of themselves, imposing policy on the new president when he'd barely been in office. There was, at the time, a hostile "anything but Clinton" tone in the White House, and Kim Jong Il was also a handy villain to have around to justify the centerpiece of Bush's foreign policy, the expensive missile defense program.

The attacks of September 11 cemented Bush's attitude toward Kim, and shifted him toward regime change. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, especially, was obsessed by the possibility that terrorists might get their hands on a nuclear weapon. He asked his team to review which nations had the capability to produce a nuclear weapon and which had links to terrorist groups. The review came up with a list of a dozen or so nations, including countries like Syria and Libya that might be coerced into abandoning their ambitions, but it concluded that a hard-core trio—Iran, Iraq and North Korea—were probably immune to any peaceful pressures. That, more than any other review by the administration, was what led to Bush's "Axis of Evil" State of the Union speech in January 2002.

While Clinton came very close to traveling to Pyongyang, Bush maintains that he has a much more realistic approach to Kim's perfidies. In fact, Bush himself approved a plan to cut off Kim and the North Korean elite's illegal financing, only days after America, China and other countries announced a new round of talks with North Korea a year ago. Bush's former senior director for Asia, Michael Green, told NEWSWEEK last week: "The president said, 'We apply the law'." Not surprisingly, the talks broke down.

DOJ_NMG_0080741

There is some evidence that the Bush administration was seeking to manipulate intelligence on North Korea. During a visit to Pyongyang by lead negotiator James Kelly in October 2002, he presented what U.S. officials described as "proof" that the North had a secret uranium-enrichment program, undercutting Clintonite claims that Kim was adhering to a pledge not to advance his nuclear program. Bush officials later said the North Koreans had confessed. But diplomats now say that was a translation error. (Kelly could not be reached for comment.) While Kim was clearly violating the spirit of his '94 agreement by secretly importing centrifuge equipment, U.S. intelligence sources tell NEWSWEEK that their monitors in the region have never detected telltale emissions from any centrifuges. Earlier in 2002, the then Pacific commander Adm. Dennis Blair told a Pentagon meeting chaired by Under Secretary of Defense Stephen Cambone that Blair's surveillance and monitoring teams had still detected nothing. According to a participant who would speak only if he was not identified, that led Cambone to stalk over to Blair after the meeting, jab his finger into his chest and declare that he expected more out of him.

Things grew so icy between the two countries in recent years that, in what is perhaps one of the more bizarre episodes in the long history of diplomacy, the North Koreans turned to one of their few American friends, the Hackensack, N.J., restaurateur Robert (Bobby) Egan, who heads a trade group promoting business with Pyongyang. For years Egan used to joke that North Korean diplomats at the United Nations frequented his Hackensack restaurant, Cubby's, because they liked feeling "naughty": his place pushed the limit beyond which the foreign diplomats were forbidden to travel without U.S. government permission. As Egan tells it, the North Koreans were once again offering to "sell" their nuclear and missile programs to the U.S. government. "They were willing to accept a price, spread over a number of years," Egan says. There were no takers.

South Korean diplomats point out that even Ronald Reagan negotiated with the Soviet Union after calling it an "evil empire." "Having dialogue is not to make friends," Kim Dae Jung says. "You can have dialogue even with the Devil if it is necessary."

III. A Spreading Global Danger

Dealing with the devil is exactly how many U.S. officials would view a pact with Kim Jong Il, now that the work of two dictators, generations of scientists, black marketeers and military officers has apparently catapulted North Korea into the ranks of the nuclear. The administration does have a war plan for Korea. OPPLAN 5027 has long been part of the U.S. Pacific Command's inventory—initially as a plan only for the defense of the South, but since the early 1990s also laying out a follow-up invasion of the North and the toppling of the regime. Washington also has a contingency plan for taking out all known North Korean nuclear facilities—also worked up during the Clinton administration during the 1992-93 crisis. But military officials say the casualties on both sides would be enormous, even in the best case. One reason Bill Clinton decided to cut a deal, in fact, is that on May 19, 1994, Defense Secretary Bill Perry briefed the president on the likely costs of invasion: 52,000 U.S. military and 490,000 South Korean soldiers killed or wounded, and untold numbers of civilian casualties, all in the first 90 days. Perry ultimately was the one who went to Pyongyang to negotiate.

No surprise, then, that Bush has made clear he has no intention of attacking Kim. But there appears to be no easy diplomatic way out, either. Last Saturday the U.N. Security Council unanimously passed a resolution imposing sanctions, but China and Russia are still balking at anything too severe. In an interview with NEWSWEEK, the Treasury Department under secretary in charge of antiterrorism operations, Stuart Levey, said that Bush's decision to sanction the Macau-based bank that laundered money for Kim has had a ripple effect by warning other banks and businesses not to do business with North Korea or companies or financial entities linked to North Korea. The North Koreans are "looking for other access points" to the world financial system, but "they are having trouble finding new ones," he said.

The problem with Bush's approach, say his critics—who include Kim Dae Jung and many Asian diplomats—is that while he waits for regime collapse, bad things can happen. North Korea could be even more dangerous, since the removal of legitimate bank funds means Kim must resort to illicit funds instead—the kind that can come from WMD sales. And in the past six years Bush has permitted the North Korean leader to cross more U.S. "red lines"—by reprocessing spent fuel into plutonium, kicking out inspectors and declaring he has nuclear weapons—than Clinton did.

The gravest danger going forward is proliferation to like-minded regimes, especially to Iran. Despite the lack of any common goal—one regime would like to see the world turn Islamic green, the other wants things juchered—the two countries are closer to being an actual "axis" than they were when Bush launched the phrase in January 2002. And if Pyongyang is seen as getting away with its nuclear test, some Iranian officials indicate they may raise their own demands for a nuclear program. That's partly why Rice is traveling to Asia and Russia in a new diplomatic offensive this week: she will link North Korea and Iran together once again, arguing that as nuclear offenders they should be made outcasts, the new slavers of the 21st century.

DOJ_NMG_0080742

For Washington, the greatest hope against Kim lies with China, which controls some 70 percent of the North's fuel supplies. U.S. officials hope that Chinese President Hu Jintao will decide he's finally had enough of his out-of-control former junior partner. Officials close to Vice President Dick Cheney are warning their Chinese counterparts that Japan could be forced to join the Nuclear Club. They are also warning that North Korea may threaten the Beijing Olympics in 2008. The fear? That Kim might resort to terror to make a point. As precedent, they cite the 1987 Korean Air disaster.

Last week, even as North Korea's apparatchiks threatened to fire off another test, its diplomats privately sent wistful messages to American counterparts imploring them to come back and talk. North Korean envoy Han Song Ryol, who was winding up a posting at his country's U.N. Mission in New York, sounded plaintive as he bid goodbye to U.S. friends. Han asked an American acquaintance who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter: "What can we do to get the Americans to talk with us?" Back came the answer: nothing. Still, Rice will tell her counterparts this week that, even after the test, Bush is open to letting the North back into negotiations.

In Bush's Oval Office sits a bronze bust of Winston Churchill, who served both in the government and at the front in the war Kaiser Wilhelm started partly out of pride in 1914. Churchill's was a long life: a veteran of the trenches, in 1955 he spoke to the House of Commons about the hydrogen bomb and arms control. He was worried, he said, about what might happen "if God wearied of mankind," but he would not give in. "Never flinch, never weary, never despair," Churchill said, and took his leave. The Nuclear Age is bleak, but an old man's words might help us see our way forward as we struggle to tame the demons.

The Fresh Face (TIME)

By Joe Klein

Time, October 16, 2006

It is 9 A.M. on a fresh, sunny Saturday in Rockford, Ill., and nearly a thousand people have gathered in the gymnasium at Rock Valley College to participate in a town meeting with their Senator, Barack Obama. It is an astonishingly large crowd for a beautiful Saturday morning, but Obama--whose new book, The Audacity of Hope, is excerpted starting on page 52--has become an American political phenomenon in what seems about a nanosecond, and the folks are giddy with anticipation. "We know he's got the charisma," says Bertha McEwing, who has lived in Rockford for more than 50 years. "We want to know if he's got the brains." Just then there is a ripple through the crowd, then gasps, cheers and applause as Obama lopes into the gym with a casual, knees-y stride. "Missed ya," he says, moving to the microphone, and he continues greeting people over raucous applause. "Tired of Washington."

There's a sly hipster syncopation to his cadence, "Been stuck there for a while." But the folksiness pretty much disappears when he starts answering questions. Obama's actual speaking style is quietly conversational, low in rhetoric-saturated fat; there is no harrumph to him. About halfway through the hour-long meeting, a middle-aged man stands up and says what seems to be on everyone's mind, with appropriate passion: "Congress hasn't done a damn thing this year. I'm tired of the politicians blaming each other. We should throw them all out and start over!"

"Including me?" the Senator asks.

A chorus of n-o-o-o-s. "Not you," the man says. "You're brand new." Obama wanders into a casual disquisition about the sluggish nature of democracy. The answer is not even remotely a standard, pretaped political response. He moves through some fairly arcane turf, talking about how political gerrymandering has led to a generation of politicians who come from safe districts where they don't have to consider the other side of the debate, which has made compromise--and therefore legislative progress--more difficult. "That's why I favored Arnold Schwarzenegger's proposal last year, a nonpartisan commission to draw the congressional-district maps in California. Too bad it lost." The crowd is keeping up with Obama, listening closely as he segues into a detailed discussion of the federal budget. Eventually, he realizes he has been filibustering and apologizes to the crowd for "making a speech." No one seems to care, since Obama is doing something pretty rare in latter-day American politics: he is respecting their intelligence. He's a liberal, but not a screechy partisan. Indeed, he seems obsessively eager to find common ground with conservatives. "It's such a relief after all the screaming you see on TV," says Chuck Sweeny, political editor of the

DOJ_NMG_0080743

Rockford Register Star. "Obama is reaching out. He's saying the other side isn't evil. You can't imagine how powerful a message that is for an audience like this."

Obama's personal appeal is made manifest when he steps down from the podium and is swarmed by well-wishers of all ages and hues, although the difference in reaction between whites and blacks is subtly striking. The African Americans tend to be fairly reserved--quiet pride, knowing nods and be-careful-now looks. The white people, by contrast, are out of control. A nurse named Greta, just off a 12-hour shift, tentatively reaches out to touch the Senator's sleeve. "Oh, my God! Oh, my God! I just touched a future President! I can't believe it!" She is literally shaking with delight--her voice is quivering--as she asks Obama for an autograph and then a hug.

Indeed, as we traveled that Saturday through downstate Illinois and then across the Mississippi into the mythic presidential-campaign state of Iowa, Obama seemed the political equivalent of a rainbow--a sudden preternatural event inspiring awe and ecstasy. Bill Gluba, a longtime Democratic activist who sells real estate on both sides of the river in the Quad Cities area, reminisced about driving Bobby Kennedy around Davenport, Iowa, on May 14, 1968. "I was just a teenaged kid," he says. "But I'll never forget the way people reacted to Kennedy. Never seen anything like it since--until this guy." The question of when Obama--who has not yet served two years in the U.S. Senate--will run for President is omnipresent. That he will eventually run, and win, is assumed by almost everyone who comes to watch him speak. In Davenport a local reporter asks the question directly: "Are you running for President in 2008?" Obama surprises me by saying he's just thinking about the 2006 election right now, which, in the semiotic dance of presidential politics, is definitely not a no. A few days later, I ask Obama the obvious follow-up question: Will he think about running for President in 2008 when the congressional election is over? "When the election is over and my book tour is done, I will think about how I can be most useful to the country and how I can reconcile that with being a good dad and a good husband," he says carefully, and then adds, "I haven't completely decided or unraveled that puzzle yet."

Which is even closer to a yes--or, perhaps, it's just a clever strategy to gin up some publicity at the launch of his book tour. The current Obama mania is reminiscent of the Colin Powell mania of September 1995, when the general--another political rainbow--leveraged speculation that he might run for President into book sales of 2.6 million copies for his memoir, My American Journey. Powell and Obama have another thing in common: they are black people who--like Tiger Woods, Oprah Winfrey and Michael Jordan--seem to have an iconic power over the American imagination because they transcend racial stereotypes. "It's all about gratitude," says essayist Shelby Steele, who frequently writes about the psychology of race. "White people are just thrilled when a prominent black person comes along and doesn't rub their noses in racial guilt. White people just go crazy over people like that."

When I asked Obama about this, he began to answer before I finished the question. "There's a core decency to the American people that doesn't get enough attention," he said, sitting in his downtown Chicago office, casually dressed in jeans and a dark blue shirt. "Figures like Oprah, Tiger, Michael Jordan give people a shortcut to express their better instincts. You can be cynical about this. You can say, It's easy to love Oprah. It's harder to embrace the idea of putting more resources into opportunities for young black men--some of whom aren't so lovable. But I don't feel that way. I think it's healthy, a good instinct. I just don't want it to stop with Oprah. I'd rather say, If you feel good about me, there's a whole lot of young men out there who could be me if given the chance."

But that's not quite true. There aren't very many people--ebony, ivory or other--who have Obama's distinctive portfolio of talents, or what he calls his "exotic" family history. His parentage was the first thing he chose to tell us about himself when he delivered his knockout keynote speech at the Democratic National Convention in 2004: his father was from Kenya and his mother from Kansas. He told the story in brilliant, painful detail in his first book, Dreams from My Father, which may be the best-written memoir ever produced by an American politician. His parents met at the University of Hawaii and stayed together only briefly. His father left when Obama was 2 years old, and Barack was raised in Hawaii by his Kansas grandparents, except for a strange and adventurous four-year interlude when he lived in Indonesia with his mother and her second husband. As a teenager at Hawaii's exclusive Punahou prep school and later as a college student, Obama road tested black rage, but it was never a very good fit. There was none of the crippling psychological legacy of slavery in his family's past. He was African and American, as opposed to African American, although he certainly endured the casual cruelties of everyday life--in the new book, he speaks of white people mistaking him for a valet-parking attendant--that are visited upon nonwhites in America. "I had to reconcile a lot of different threads growing up--race, class," he told me. "For example, I was going to a fancy prep school, and my mother was on food stamps while she was getting her Ph.D." Obama believes his inability to fit neatly into any group or category explains his relentless efforts to understand and reconcile opposing views. But the tendency is so pronounced that it almost seems an obsessive-compulsive tic. I counted no fewer than 50 instances of excruciatingly judicious on-the-one-hand-on-the-other-handedness in The Audacity of Hope. At one point, he considers the historic influence of ideological extremists--that is, people precisely unlike him. "It has not always been the pragmatist, the voice of reason, or the force of compromise, that has created the conditions for liberty," he writes about the antislavery movement of the 19th century. "Knowing this, I can't summarily dismiss those possessed of similar certainty today--the antiabortion activist ... the animal rights activist who raids a laboratory--no matter how deeply I disagree with their views. I am robbed even of the certainty of uncertainty--for sometimes absolute truths may well be absolute."

DOJ_NMG_0080744

Yikes. But then Obama is nothing if not candid about his uncertainties and imperfections. In Dreams from My Father, which was written before he became a politician, he admits to cocaine and marijuana use and also to attending socialist meetings. In The Audacity of Hope, I counted 28 impolitic or self-deprecating admissions. Immediately, on page 3, he admits to political "restlessness," which is another way of saying he's ambitious. He flays himself for enjoying private jets, which eliminate the cramped frustrations of commercial flying but--on the other hand!--isolate him from the problems of average folks. He admits that his 2004 Senate opponent, Alan Keyes, got under his skin. He blames himself for "tensions" in his marriage; he doubts his "capacities" as a husband and father. He admits a nonpopulist affinity for Dijon mustard; he cops to being "grumpy" in the morning. He even offers his media consultant David Axelrod's opinions about the best negative TV ads that could have been used against him in the 2004 Senate campaign. (He once--accidentally, he says--voted against a bill to "protect our children from sex offenders.")

There is a method to this anguish. Self-deprecation and empathy are powerful political tools. Obama's candor is reminiscent of John McCain, who once said of his first marriage, "People wouldn't think so highly of me if they knew more about that." Obama's empathy is reminiscent of Bill Clinton, although the Senator's compassion tends to be less damp than Clinton's: it's more about understanding your argument than feeling your pain. Both those qualities have been integral to Obama's charm from the start. His Harvard Law School classmate Michael Froman told me Obama was elected president of the Law Review, the first African American to hold that prestigious position, because of his ability to win over the conservatives in their class. "It came down to Barack and a guy named David Goldberg," Froman recalls. "Most of the class were liberals, but there was a growing conservative Federalist Society presence, and there were real fights between right and left about almost every issue. Barack won the election because the conservatives thought he would take their arguments into account."

After three years as a civil rights lawyer and law professor in Chicago, Obama was elected to the Illinois state senate and quickly established himself as different from most of the other African-American legislators. "He was passionate in his views," says state senator Dave Syverson, a Republican committee chairman who worked on welfare reform with Obama. "We had some pretty fierce arguments. We went round and round about how much to spend on day care, for example. But he was not your typical party-line politician. A lot of Democrats didn't want to have any work requirement at all for people on welfare. Barack was willing to make that deal."

The raising and dashing of expectations is at the heart of almost every great political drama. In Obama's case, the expectations are ridiculous. He transcends the racial divide so effortlessly that it seems reasonable to expect that he can bridge all the other divisions--and answer all the impossible questions--plaguing American public life. He encourages those expectations by promising great things--at least, in the abstract. "This country is ready for a transformative politics of the sort that John F. Kennedy, Ronald Reagan and Franklin Roosevelt represented," he told me. But those were politicians who had big ideas or were willing to take big risks, and so far, Barack Obama hasn't done much of either. With the exception of a bipartisan effort with ultra-conservative Senator Tom Coburn of Oklahoma to publish every government contract--a matter of some embarrassment to their pork-loving colleagues--his record has been predictably liberal. And the annoying truth is, The Audacity of Hope isn't very audacious.

A few weeks ago, I watched Obama give a speech about alternative energy to an audience gathered by MoveOn.org at Georgetown University. It was supposed to be a big deal, one of three speeches MoveOn had scheduled to lay out its 2008 issues agenda, a chance for the best-known group of activist Democrats to play footsie with the party's most charismatic speaker, and vice versa. But it was a disappointment, the closest I had seen Obama come to seeming a standard-issue pol, one who declares a crisis and answers with Band-Aids. In this case, he produced a few scraggly carrots and sticks to encourage Detroit to produce more fuel-efficient cars. The audience of students and activists sensed the Senator's timidity and became palpably less enthusiastic as Obama went on. Just two days before, Al Gore gave a rousing speech in New York City in which he proposed a far more dramatic alternative energy plan: a hefty tax on fossil fuels that would be used, in turn, to reduce Social Security and Medicare taxes. I asked Obama why he didn't support an energy-tax increase married to tax relief for working Americans in the MoveOn speech or in The Audacity of Hope. "I didn't think of it," he replied, but sensing the disingenuousness of his response--talk of a gas tax is everywhere these days, especially among high-minded policy sorts--he quickly added,"I think it's a really interesting idea."

DOJ_NMG_0080745

I pressed him on this. Surely he had thought about it? "Remember, the premise of this book wasn't to lay out my 10-point plan," Obama danced. "My goal was to figure out the common values that can serve as a basis for discussion." Sensing my skepticism, he tried again: "This book doesn't drill that deep in terms of policy ... There are a slew of good ideas out there. Some things end up on the cutting-room floor."

Universal health insurance also found its way to the cutting-room floor. I asked about the universal plan recently passed in Massachusetts, which was a triumph of Obama-style bipartisanship. The plan requires everyone who earns three times the poverty rate to purchase health insurance and subsidizes those who earn less than that. Shouldn't health insurance be mandatory, like auto insurance, for those who can afford it? Obama wouldn't go there. "If there's a way of doing it voluntarily, that's more consonant with the American character," he said. "If you can't solve the problem without the government stepping in, that's when you make it mandatory."

After we jousted over several other issues, Obama felt the need to step back and defend himself. "Look, when I spoke out against going to war in Iraq in 2002, Bush was at 60-65% in the polls. I was putting my viability as a U.S. Senate candidate at risk. It looks now like an easy thing to do, but it wasn't then." He's right about that: more than a few of his potential rivals for the presidency in 2008 voted, as a matter of political expediency, to give Bush the authority to use military force in Iraq. Then Obama returned to the energy issue. "When I call for increased fuel-economy standards, that doesn't sit very well with the [United Auto Workers], and they're big buddies of mine ... Look, it's just not my style to go out of my way to offend people or be controversial just for the sake of being controversial. That's offensive and counterproductive. It makes people feel defensive and more resistant to changes."

Talk about defensive: this was the first time I had ever seen Obama less than perfectly comfortable. And his discomfort exposed the elaborate intellectual balancing mechanism that he applies to every statement and gesture, to every public moment of his life. "He's working a very dangerous high-wire act," Shelby Steele told me. "He's got to keep on pleasing white folks without offending black folks, and vice versa." Indeed, Obama faces a minefield on issues like the racial gerrymandering of congressional districts and affirmative action. "You're asking him to take policy risks? Just being who he is is taking an enormous risk."

There is a certain amount of political as well as psychological wisdom to what Steele says. The most basic rule of presidential politics is that you run against your predecessor. If Obama, 45, chooses to run in 2008, his consensus seeking would stand in stark contrast not only to the hyperpartisan Bush Administration but also to the histrionic, self-important style of baby-boom-generation politicians. Or it could work against him. An old-time Chicago politician told me Obama's thoughtfulness might be a negative in a presidential campaign. "You have to convey strength," he said, "and it's hard to do that when you're giving on-the-other-hand answers."

Meanwhile, back in our interview, I offer a slightly barbed olive branch: Maybe I'm asking for too much when I expect him to be bold on the issues, I suggest. Maybe my expectations for him are too high? "No, no," he says, and returns for a third time to energy policy--to Gore's tax-swap idea. "It's a neat idea. I'm going to call Gore and have a conversation about it. It might be something I'd want to embrace."

But he's not ready to make that leap just yet. Boldness needs to be planned, not blurted--and there are all sorts of questions to ponder before he takes the next step.Would the arrogance implicit in running now, after less than one term in the Senate, undercut his carefully built reputation for judiciousness? Is the Chicago politician right about the need to be strong and simple in a run for President? Or can Obama overturn all the standard political assumptions simply by being himself? "In setting your expectations for me now, just remember I haven't announced that I'm running in 2008," he concluded. "I would expect that anyone who's running in 2008, you should have very high expectations for them."

DOJ_NMG_0080746

Kerry Says He Deserves 2nd Chance In '08 (AP-Y)

AP-Yahoo, October 16, 2006

Sen. John Kerry says he deserves a second chance if he decides to take another crack at becoming president.

The Massachusetts Democrat, who lost to President Bush in 2004, said it is a basic principle that "Americans give people a second chance. And if you learn something and prove you've learned something, maybe even more so. Now, I don't know what I'm going to do yet. We'll make that decision down the road."

Ronald Reagan twice unsuccessfully sought the GOP nomination for president before he got it — and won two elections for the White House.

"John McCain, their leading candidate — didn't he get kicked around South Carolina by the same president because he wasn't patriotic enough as a prisoner of war? He's now their leading candidate for president," Kerry said of the Republican Party. "Richard Nixon seemed to get kicked around pretty badly both running for president and governor, turned around and came back and got elected president."

Kerry faces a major challenge trying to convince Democratic activists that a recently defeated candidate can still carry his party's hopes for recapturing the White House.

If Kerry runs, he would have to overcome other Democratic presidential hopefuls such as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joe Biden of Delaware, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut.

The list of potential opponents also could include New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, former Indiana Gov. Sen. Evan Bayh, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, and even Kerry's ex-running mate in 2004, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

Running With Blinders (NYT)

By Kevin Sweeney

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Berkeley, Calif.

AT this point in the fall campaign, unabashed negativity clogs every media outlet. The stench of foul political advertising is everywhere, and one senses that little will change: Americans once again will hold their noses and vote.

For this round, there really isn't much to be done. But looking to the 2008 presidential race, there is still time to find a new way of campaigning — specifically, for progressive candidates to consider a fresh approach to running for office.

Why progressives? Because it's in their interest: pervasive negativity takes a far greater toll on progressive causes than on conservative ones. Conservatives typically rail against big government and bureaucrats. But by attacking the current administration, progressives unwittingly join the anti-government chorus. The differences between the two — one side making general attacks, the other specific ones — are details. Both project negative messages about government, but the advantage still goes to the conservatives.

To level the playing field, and restore clarity to progressive values, I propose "the forward-looking campaign."

The rules are simple. Never mention the opponent. Don't talk about the opponent's policies. Don't question the opponent's character. Don't talk about votes the opponent may have cast last week, last year or even 10 years ago. Refuse to run against anything or characterize any group; choose instead to run for something. Rather than engaging the opposition, the forward-looking candidate will engage the American people in a conversation about our future, keeping the focus on what we can accomplish as a nation and as individuals.

This is not just a commitment to be positive. Many candidates have tried that and failed. I was one of them. In 1992, I ran what many would consider a positive congressional campaign; my advertising never mentioned my opponent. But during a debate, I read statements she had made about me, noting that they were inaccurate. I made the corrections and moved on, doing so — I thought — without venom.

DOJ_NMG_0080747

The next day's newspapers, however, described my actions as a personal assault, suggesting that sparks flew when I "stood up to attack." Any luster I had gained from being positive had been tarnished.

I should have known then what is now quite obvious: one person's "clarification" is another person's "brutal attack." This is why the forward-looking candidate commits to avoiding any mention of the opposition, focusing instead on those whom he seeks to serve. It is a campaign promise that can be kept before a single vote is cast.

This commitment must be announced at the very outset, and must be the most visible element of the campaign throughout the early months. No matter how negative any other campaign chooses to be, voters must know that there is one candidate who refuses to put a foot on the slippery slope. What matters to the forward-looking candidate is where we can go and how we can get there. There is confidence and power in making that kind of statement.

There are also tactical reasons for the approach. It cuts through the background noise of American politics. It responds to the national disgust with negative campaigning. It gives voters an easy handle on the candidate, distinguishing him or her from others in the race.

And the approach is a natural shield. A forward-looking candidate who emerges from the Iowa caucuses would be difficult to attack; he would have spent much of a year building a case for this new model. He can stay visibly focused on the future, adopting a posture that suggests that anything else — any sideways glance — is a distraction. At last, there would be a penalty for unleashing negative ads, because the mere fact of the ads would be more important than their content. It is political jujitsu.

The first conversation I had along these lines was with Senator Gary Hart, as we considered media strategies for his 1988 presidential campaign. (He was then the Democratic front-runner; I was his press secretary.) We talked of a campaign in which every commercial would feature Mr. Hart looking into the camera, speaking directly to voters. In some of the ads, he would note how attacks by faceless announcers were damaging American politics, and would promise that his campaign would never rely on them.

As we considered various possibilities, we hit on an interesting bonus: Every negative ad, in every race in the country, could serve as a reminder that one candidate was taking a principled approach. We never saw this approach play out, as Mr. Hart's campaign ended abruptly following allegations of an extramarital affair. But the brutal attacks that came to define that election season suggested that we might have been right to consider the strategy.

The forward-looking campaign can help a progressive candidate satisfy America's yearning for moral values in politics. The landscape is crowded with political leaders who talk of morality, and who wear their Christian values on their sleeves. (The religious values of love and forgiveness, of course, are often contradicted or overwhelmed by political tactics evoking hate, fear or vengeance.) Rather than framing divisive issues like abortion and gay marriage to project its values, the forward-looking campaign would let its very conduct do the job. Without mentioning any religion, it could project religious values.

We reap what we sow. Divisive campaigns lead to divided government, a fate the American people can no longer afford. The forward-looking candidate, focused not just on electioneering but on governance, knows we must ultimately join hands — so he stops pointing fingers.

The 2004 election, according to some, was a race between fear and anger. Republicans raised fears; Democrats expressed anger. But it is obvious in the abstract that anger could never defeat fear; the two emotions are too closely linked. A forward-looking campaign offers a better strategy for combating fear. It offers, finally, respect and hope.

The Center Fails (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

With Mark Warner out of the 2008 Demstakes, the chief anti-Hillary centrist is Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana. This is a depressing commentary on the state of the Democratic Party. Bayh may have cleared his schedule to woo Warner supporters on Thursday. But he has yet to prove himself a real contender -- and he may not be a real centrist, either.

Two weeks ago Bayh circulated a preposterous letter to his Senate colleagues. It urged them to oppose what Bayh called "documented unfair trade" in a type of steel that's used in vehicles. It noted the Commerce Department's finding that lifting the tariff on this steel would lead to dumping by foreign producers. That would hurt U.S. steelmakers, the letter continued; so when the fate of the tariff is considered at a sunset review tomorrow, it should on no account be lifted.

DOJ_NMG_0080748

This is not a policy that protects workers, as Bayh's letter pretended. It's a sellout to a self-serving lobby. It would help the steel guys at the expense of the car guys, even though the car guys are hurting more and they employ more workers.

The tariff that Bayh wants to preserve is one of more than a hundred that protect the steel industry. These fortifications were erected on the theory that the steel business is inherently unfair because every nation in the world wants its own steelmaker. The creation of these national champions guarantees global oversupply of steel, or so the argument used to go. Therefore the United States had to protect itself from dumpers' unfairly low prices.

This argument was always flawed. If foreigners wanted to sell artificially cheap steel, the United States should have been happy to pocket the subsidy. But the protectionist argument is now worse than flawed, because the steel industry has changed substantially. A wave of mergers has rationalized some of the old national champions, and the alleged oversupply of steel has disappeared in the face of exploding demand from developing countries.

You can see this transformation in the steel companies' own statements. When they are lobbying senators such as Bayh, the steel guys plead that they are poor and weak and hungry. But when they are addressing investors on Wall Street, they boast that steel is scarce and that they can charge what they want for it.

If there is now a sellers' market in steel, why does the Commerce Department assert that lifting the tariff would trigger dumping? It's nice that you asked, because the answer is hilarious. The department's practice, in sunset reviews such as this one, is to rely on its original analysis -- and never mind that this dates from more than a decade ago, when the steel industry looked utterly different.

Wait, it gets better. The steel lobby has been running newspaper advertisements citing another Commerce finding: that lifting the tariff would allow foreign steel into the country at prices 10 to 36 percent below normal value. But that 36 percent margin is a fraud. The Commerce Department applied it to Nippon Steel because Nippon failed to cooperate with its review, not because Nippon is selling 36 percent below cost. During the previous go-round, when Nippon did cooperate, Commerce found a dumping margin of just 2.5 percent.

Why did Nippon refuse to cooperate with Commerce in the latest review? Nice question again: because Nippon had entered an alliance with one of the top producers in the United States and did not want to compete with its partner. In other words, consolidation generated the fraudulent 36 percent margin, but the margin is nonetheless used by the steel lobby to pretend that it remains as weak as in the pre-consolidation era.

Bayh is not the only senator to take dictation from the steel lobby. When the sunset hearing convenes at the International Trade Commission tomorrow, the steel lobby will present a petition from Sens. Arlen Specter and Jay Rockefeller, co-signed by perhaps 10 others. But Bayh stands out because centrists like him have traditionally been pro-trade and because his sights are set on the White House. Presidential aspirants are supposed to champion the national interest, not special interests.

smallaby@washpost.com

Why Don't Americans Like To Vote? Politics Are Only One Reason (WSJ)

By Cynthia Crossen

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

If you're an American who is not planning to vote Nov. 7, join the crowd. In the past few decades, less than 40% of eligible voters in the U.S. have bothered to cast ballots in midterm elections.

Your forebears would be ashamed. In late-19th-century midterm elections, turnout ranged from 65% to 78%. For presidential elections, almost 80% of the nation's eligible -- rich and poor, educated and illiterate -- voted. In 1888, 10 states had turnouts of more than 90%. Eight years later, Indiana voters set a record with 97% casting ballots.

Then, in the early 20th century, turnout began falling precipitously. By 1920, less than half of the voting-age population made it to the polls on Election Day. "The drop in voting was nationwide, substantial and cumulative," wrote Mark Lawrence Kornbluh, author of "Why America Stopped Voting." It was also unprecedented, both in America and other Western democracies. Americans, it seemed, no longer prized their right to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0080749

But the new nonvoters were only partly to blame for their disengagement. A century ago, a raft of new state laws, supported by leaders across the political spectrum from conservatives to progressives, transformed the idea and act of voting so radically that hundreds of thousands of people dropped out of the political system. Many of them -- and their children -- would never return.

A 19th-century man (in most states, women weren't enfranchised until 1920) could decide to vote on the spur of the moment, pick up a simple ballot from party headquarters and drop it at the poll on Election Day, where his like-minded neighbors would give him a cheer and perhaps a beer. No preregistration was required, no taxes, no proof of residency, literacy or even citizenship. If, like most people then, he was a party man, his vote might earn him a reward -- a small cash gift or even better, a job with the post office.

Election day was rowdy and festive, a thrilling climax to a political campaign that featured bonfires, barbecues, parades, torchlight rallies and passionate oratory. Politics were social and recreational at a time when there wasn't much other public entertainment. More than 20% of people were actively involved in campaigning. "Political matters were not complex, intangible and remote, but simple, concrete and directly related to the concerns of daily life," wrote Paul Kleppner in his 1982 book, "Who Voted?"

Newspapers covered little besides politics. The races were often close -- the presidency changed hands in every election between 1876 and 1896 -- and the differences between the two parties seemed enormous. People wore their allegiances proudly. "We love our parties as we love our churches and our families," said a New Hampshire senator in 1885.

But many people thought the political parties, which basically ran the elections, were too powerful and corrupt -- that the government should administer elections, and ballots should be secret so party leaders couldn't monitor their flocks' choices. Party symbols, like the elephant and donkey, would no longer appear on ballots, creating a de facto literacy test. The practice of rewarding loyal voters with cash on Election Day was widely outlawed. Competitive exams replaced patronage in awarding government jobs.

And citizens would no longer be able to depend on their party officials to vouch for their eligibility. Voters would have to register themselves in person, well ahead of the election, usually during working hours. Some states even required voters to register every year. Preregistration "increased the costs of participation to the individual and priced out of the system... marginally involved citizens," noted Mr. Kleppner. After a registration law was passed, for example, the number of voters in Philadelphia dropped from about 385,000 to about 251,000.

Victor Rosewater, a Republican politician, wrote in 1928, "Much of the seeming lethargy" among voters "is chargeable to the hurdles which, by our registration laws, we put in the way of voting -- absurd laws that make it hard to vote instead of facilitating voting."

Other broad social trends also damped the electoral spirit. Americans were leaving their small towns, where social ties often reinforced their political biases. Candidates for office began using radio, rather than rallies, to spread their messages, making voters more passive. With the proliferation of other recreational activities -- spectator sports, vaudeville, movies -- Americans no longer "needed to look to politics for escape," Mr. Kornbluh said. And when women began voting in national elections, they voted at a lower rate than men.

Many scholars believe that lower voter turnout was an unintended consequence of much-needed electoral reform. Others think it was calculated. "A primary cause of the decline in turnout at the turn of the century was deliberate disenfranchisement," wrote Michael J. Avey in his 1989 study, "The Demobilization of American Voters." "Changes in election laws were clearly focused on particular segments that the political elites wanted out of the political process."

Mr. Kleppner came to a similar conclusion. The goal of election reform was to make it difficult for some citizens to vote. "That objective was cloaked in culturally acceptable rhetoric, emphasizing electoral 'purity' and, above all, progress."

A Tale Of Two GOPs (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

In the Ohio governor's race, Ken Blackwell is trailing his Democratic competitor, Ted Strickland, by double digits. Save a last-minute miracle, Mr. Blackwell will lose the governor's mansion, and so end 16 years of GOP dominance.

DOJ_NMG_0080750

In the Florida governor's race, Charlie Crist is leading his Democratic competitor, Jim Davis, by double digits. Save a last-minute misstep, Mr. Crist is set to give the state GOP a third term in the governor's mansion, overseeing a strong Republican legislative majority.

Their respective failure and success is not ideological: Messrs. Blackwell and Crist are both running on the same agenda of tax cuts, fiscal responsibility and broad government reform. This, instead, is a story of the state parties behind them. In Florida, Republicans have spent the past eight years keeping their promises to voters; in Ohio the GOP forgot what "promise" meant somewhere in the '90s. The tale of these two GOPs offers broader lessons for congressional Republicans, who are facing a rout this fall.

That this election is a referendum on the entire Republican philosophy is the standard line so far this year. Democrats from Nancy Pelosi to Chuck Schumer argue that voters who vote blue are sending a message that they are tired of Republicans' "extreme" views on national security, taxes or social policy.

Quite the opposite, really. If voters are unhappy with Republicans, it's because the party hasn't lived up to its own principles. In the Capitol, in Ohio, and in plenty of places between and beyond, the party that promised to reform government has become the party of government.

Take Ohio. Republicans have practiced one-party rule in the state since 1994 -- more than enough time to lose one's principles. Former Gov. George Voinovich set the standard in 1992 by breaking his word and signing tax hikes. His successor, Bob Taft, with the help of the GOP legislature, in 2003 broke pledges not to raise taxes without voter permission. Some $3 billion in tax increases later, Ohio jumped to fourth place in the rankings for state and local tax burdens. (It was 23rd in 1994, when the GOP took over.) Over their first 10 years in power, Republicans increased Ohio's general operating budget by 71% -- the highest increase in the nation.

The Taft and Spend strategy socked it to the Ohio economy. Its gross state product grew a measly 1% between 2004 and 2005, while Ohio lost 150,000 jobs between 2000 and 2005. Unemployment levels have hovered above the national average. If corruption is the product of big, unconstrained government, it was no surprise to watch the GOP engulfed by scandals that swept up everyone from Mr. Taft to Congressman Bob Ney. By November of last year, Mr. Taft's approval rating was 6.5%; if anyone had been keeping track, the legislature may have scored even lower.

Mr. Blackwell didn't sign onto any of this. While the rest of his party was riding down the big-government river, the secretary of state was pushing a voter initiative to create a constitutional limit on spending. He's been running this year on tax cuts, charter schools and privatizing the Ohio Turnpike. He hasn't been touched by the scandals.

"There hasn't been a bigger critic of the Taft administration than Ken Blackwell," says Ken Blackwell . . . again and again. Voters can't find it in themselves to make the distinction. The Ohio Democratic Party understands that better than anyone, and routinely refers to its opponent as "Ken Taftwell." Mr. Strickland is so good at keeping the focus on the failed GOP, nobody has noticed he's a fan of the very tax-and-spend policies that landed Republicans in trouble in the first place.

But now look to Florida. Jeb Bush came to office in 1999 touting a sweeping reform agenda of the sort that gives Ms. Pelosi the "extremist" fits. More to the point, the governor, with the support of a Republican legislature, has instituted most of it.

Florida Republicans have passed tax cuts every year of the eight Mr. Bush has held office -- a whopping $19 billion, including the elimination of the infamous "intangibles" tax, levied on investments. While Florida's budget has grown at a rapid clip, Mr. Bush vetoed more than $2.1 billion in wasteful spending, earning him the nickname "Veto Corleone" among frustrated state lobbyists. He's trimmed 11,000 state jobs.

Tort reform? Did it. Overhauling the child welfare system? Done. Florida has led the way in greater education accountability and school voucher programs; test scores, especially among minorities, are on the rise. The state won federal permission for the most dramatic Medicaid reforms in the country, the first to inject private competition into the system.

Florida today has the highest rate of job creation in the country, and an unemployment rate of 3.3%. It's bond rating hit triple A. Revenue is pumping into the state coffers, giving Florida $6.4 billion in reserves. Gov. Bush's approval rating stands at 55%. Even the House Democratic leader, Dan Gelber, admitted his chief nemesis was a "rock star."

Mr. Crist, the state attorney general, promises more of the same, and voters have no reason to doubt him. He's already demonstrated reform bona fides as the state education commissioner who helped push through the governor's school reforms.

DOJ_NMG_0080751

He's promised further tax cuts, and is zeroing in on voter anger over double-digit property tax hikes. Mr. Crist has been blowing past Mr. Davis in fundraising and in opinion polls.

If congressional Republicans are facing a rout come November, it's in no small part because they've been headed down the Ohio highway. A few Supreme Court appointments and tax cuts aside, Republicans have largely abandoned the reform agenda that swept them to power in 1994. Their zeal has instead been directed at retaining power, which explains the earmarking epidemic and the Abramoff corruption that followed. Reform of Medicare and Social Security, the death tax, immigration, health care -- all fell off the map.

Democrats would certainly call this agenda extreme, but it was never the existence of the platform that angered voters. It was Republicans' failure to act on it.

Ms. Strassel is a member of the Journal's editorial board based in Washington.

Iraq: A Growing Body Count (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron

Newsweek, October 16, 2006

Iraqi doctors who helped compile the latest survey on civilian fatalities since 2003 came close to becoming statistics themselves. The survey, conducted jointly by Johns Hopkins, MIT and Baghdad's Al Mustansiriya University, said 600,000 Iraqis have died violently since just before the U.S. invasion (31 percent killed by Coalition troops; the rest in sectarian violence). President George W. Bush recently put the figure at 30,000; other estimates have ranged up to 300,000. The actual number is impossible to fix; estimates are just that—estimates.

Dr. Gilbert Burnham, of the Center for Refugee and Disaster Response at Johns Hopkins, says the methodology of the study he oversaw is standard practice. It involved teams of Iraqi doctors visiting more than 1,800 households to ask about fatalities and view death certificates. Surveying became dangerous. "On several occasions, members of our teams were grabbed by militias and taken to their commanders," Burnham told NEWSWEEK. "Coalition checkpoints, because of the rules of engagement, were also dicey affairs." The doctors wore white robes, and some draped stethoscopes over the necks to stand out as medical personnel.

The figure, disputed by some researchers as too high (the Iraqi Health Ministry itself cites 150,000 dead), represents about 2.5 percent of Iraq's population—more than 15,000 fatalities a month. By comparison, 10 percent of Vietnam's population was killed during America's decadelong war there. Administration officials said the study, published in the medical journal The Lancet, was timed to hurt the GOP in the midterm election. "There's no political motivation in this," says Burnham. "I feel very confident in the numbers."

Great Candidates? That's Debatable (NYT)

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

This year in New York, when it comes to debates, the magic number seems to be two. Senator Hillary Clinton, who refused to debate her primary opponent at all, has agreed to two debates with John Spencer, the Republican former mayor of Yonkers. The Democratic front-runner for governor, Eliot Spitzer, agreed to two debates with the Republican candidate, John Faso. The Democratic candidate to succeed Mr. Spitzer as attorney general, Andrew Cuomo, agreed to appear at two debates with Jeanine Pirro, the Republican former Westchester County district attorney, but seems likely to sit out a third already agreed to by Ms. Pirro.

We'd like to see more. Candidates for statewide office should face each other in different parts of the state, in debates centering on different topics. It's not as if the other demands on their time — fund-raising, handshaking and giving the same speech over and over to friendly audiences — were too important to be infringed upon.

The real disappointment this year, however, is the Democratic state comptroller, Alan Hevesi, who is refusing debates altogether. Mr. Hevesi did not even budge after his Republican opponent, Christopher Callaghan, uncovered misuse of government resources that required Mr. Hevesi to repay the state more than $80,000. Mr. Hevesi is way ahead of Mr. Callaghan, but we can't help wondering if his reluctance to face the opposition is more a reflection of weakness than strength.

Left, Right And Religion: A Double Standard (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0080752

By Patrick Hynes And Jeremy Lott

USA Today, October 16, 2006

Should our laws be based on the Ten Commandments? How much religion in government is too much? When does legitimate participation by the pious in civic life take on troubling theocratic overtones? These are questions that conservative religious leaders wish the press would put to them.

In our political tradition, most evangelicals and other conservative Christians today are really moderates. They want a government that is non-sectarian without being hostile to organized religion and people of faith. That's a whole lot closer to what the Founders had in mind than the officially godless public square advocated by the American Civil Liberties Union.

What's more, the creation of the religious right was largely a function of the courts and politicians pushing the boundaries the other way. Evangelicals were moved to civic activism because the IRS threatened to revoke the tax-exempt status of private Christian schools; because the U.S. Supreme Court removed abortion from the political process; because mentions of the Almighty began to be scrubbed from valedictory addresses for fear that someone, somewhere might take offense. Today, the term "goddamn" is treated as protected speech, but remove the "damn" and watch the lawsuits roll in.

So evangelicals did the only responsible thing they could in a democracy. They organized and reached out. They found allies in churchgoing Roman Catholics, mainline Protestants, Jews and even some agnostics who believed that religion plays a vital role in holding society together. In this they were not so different from the civil rights leaders of the past, whose rallying cry was the God-given dignity of every American. The new coalition grew over time to the point that the religious right (or "values voters," if you prefer) became the single largest voting bloc in American politics.

That fact is intolerable to many intellectuals.

After the 2004 election, historian Garry Wills compared conservative Christians to jihadists on the op-ed page of The New York Times.

In a recent monograph, former senator and Democratic presidential candidate Gary Hart claimed to know exactly what "today's religious right has in mind." They want to "return America to a pre-Enlightenment age, an age in which the church, in this case in the form of one wing of evangelical Protestantism, dictates terms to the political process and sets the boundaries of what can and cannot be legislated and regulated by the state."

This sort of suspicion and insinuation makes it all the more difficult for the pious to participate in politics. Worse, critics such as Dartmouth College's Lucas Swaine, an assistant professor of government, have demanded that Christians not frame their arguments with reference to the Bible, a book that millions of Americans believe to be the inspired word of God, because that wouldn't square with "public reason." And any pronouncements on "values" are treated with scorn, at best.

It must be rough. Even so, we think Christian conservatives should take solace in the fact that most of their critics don't mean a word of it.

As proof, we offer Exhibit A: the religious left. No comparable group of political activists has received as much news media attention since the last election.

According to the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life, religious lefties are about 7% of the electorate. They are called on regularly by Democratic politicians seeking to win over values voters.

What's interesting is that leaders of the religious left have not been hit with a similar and constant charge of "theocracy." This despite the fact that religious lefties articulate public policy positions in the context of the Bible and frame their political entreaties in the moral "values" language we are accustomed to hearing from Christian conservatives.

Think back to 2002, when the Evangelical Environmental Network launched the "What Would Jesus Drive?" campaign. It wasn't a joke. It was an attempt by the religious left to convince Christian voters that "transportation is a moral issue" and that they should therefore "advocate for government policies," including higher fuel economy standards and more public transportation. As with cars, so with a whole lot of other things. This small but loud minority wants to remake America with its own interpretation of Christ's teachings.

The Rev. Jim Wallis, author of the bestselling God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It, insists that federal and state budgets are "moral documents." He argues that national and state legislative priorities ought to comport with "God's vision of a good society offered to us by the prophet Isaiah." For you sleep-in-on-Sunday types, he means Robin Hood-like government policies that shake down the wealthy and fete the poor.

DOJ_NMG_0080753

In fact, one initiative that was championed by Wallis and his fellow (oh, let's call them) Leftwing Theocrats might help to explain how misunderstood and close to the mainstream the religious right actually is. In 2003, Alabama Gov. Bob Riley decided his state's tax and education systems were decidedly un-Christian. He wanted to cut income taxes for the poor, hike the top marginal rates for the well-off, raise property and luxury taxes, and use the estimated $1.2 billion in additional revenue to boost teacher salaries and scholarships to state schools. Riley tried to convince voters to go along with these changes by saying Jesus would vote for "the least among us." He campaigned for his plan by appealing to churches and church leaders, many of whom decided to campaign for the governor's initiative. The people who normally fret about mixing church and state were beside themselves … with glee. Maybe Riley could finally draft the Bible Belt into the service of enlightened public policy. Then-New Republic editor Peter Beinart called him "that rarest of creatures: A genuinely inspiring politician."

Most churchgoing Alabamians didn't see it that way. Their rejection of Jesus-flavored progressivism at the ballot box was in keeping with how a majority of Americans think through these issues. Americans have proved willing to grant some authority to religious leaders in matters of faith and morals, and rightly so. But they are more skeptical when it comes to ceding control of the economy to people who draw paychecks from the not-for-profit sector.

The religious left is usually given a respectful hearing. That's a good thing. After all, this is a democracy in which people can make up their own minds about such things. But the same deference should be given to the arguments and ideas of religious conservatives.

Critics are out of line for lambasting the religious right for advocating their beliefs, and they'd be just as wrong blasting the religious left. Yet for liberal and secular pundits, this has been a one-way street.

It's time to give the "Theocracy!" catcalls a rest.

Faith-Based Profits (NYT)

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Mary Rosati, a novice training to be a nun in Toledo, Ohio, says that after she received a diagnosis of breast cancer, her mother superior dismissed her. If Ms. Rosati had had a nonreligious job, she might have won a lawsuit against her diocese (which denies the charge). But a federal judge dismissed her suit under the Americans With Disabilities Act, declining to second-guess the church's "ecclesiastical decision."

Ms. Rosati's story is one of many that Diana Henriques told in a recent Times series examining the fast-changing legal status of churches and religious-affiliated institutions. The series showed that the wall between church and state is being replaced by a platform that raises religious organizations to a higher legal plane than their secular counterparts.

Day care centers with religious affiliations are exempted in some states from licensing requirements. Churches can expand in ways that would violate zoning ordinances if a nonreligious builder did the same thing, and they are permitted, in some localities, to operate lavish facilities, like state-of-the-art gyms, without paying property taxes.

Some of the most disturbing stories, like Ms. Rosati's, involve employment discrimination. Ms. Henriques told of a New Mexico rabbi who was dismissed after developing Parkinson's disease and found himself blocked from suing, and of nurses in a 44,000-employee health care system operated by the Seventh Day Adventists barred from joining unions.

Religious institutions should be protected from excessive intrusion by government. Judges should not tell churches who they have to hire as ministers, or meddle in doctrinal disputes. But under pressure from politically influential religious groups, Congress, the White House, and federal and state courts have expanded this principle beyond all reason. It is increasingly being applied to people, buildings and programs only tangentially related to religion.

In its expanded form, this principle amounts to an enormous subsidy for religion, in some cases violating the establishment clause of the First Amendment. It also undermines core American values, like the right to be free from job discrimination. It puts secular entrepreneurs at an unfair competitive disadvantage. And it deprives states and localities of much-needed tax revenues, putting a heavier burden on ordinary taxpayers.

DOJ_NMG_0080754

Like most special-interest handouts, these privileges exist in large part because the majority is not aware, or is not being heard. With property taxes growing ever more burdensome, it is likely that localities will start to give religious exemptions closer scrutiny. People who care about discrimination-free workplaces, the right to unionize and children's safety should also start to push back.

In a few places, at least, that has started. After Texas exempted religious day care centers and drug-treatment programs from state licensing, a study found that the "alternatively accredited" facilities had 10 times the rate of abuse and neglect of the others, and several were investigated. In 2001, the Texas Legislature, no enemy of organized religion, did the right thing and ended the exemption.

The New Finger On The Nuclear Button (USNEWS)

By Thomas Omestad

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

North Korea proclaimed it part of a "great leap forward." But to most, it looked like a huge step back. Last week's announced test explosion of an atomic bomb deep inside a North Korean mountain tunnel heralds an ominous new era in northeast Asia. It also, arguably, marks a historic policy failure-one decades in the making-that risks tragic consequences far beyond the Korean peninsula.

If the seismic event detected around the world is confirmed as a nuclear blast-and so far it has not been-the impoverished, hunger-ridden North will have managed to join the elite global club of declared nuclear powers. In the amoral logic of nuclear weapons, that may well confer more staying power to the hard-line regime. And it will put more pressure on its neighbors-especially Japan and South Korea-to eventually consider going nuclear. The problem of separating North Korea from its nuclear arms and ambitions, in other words, has just gotten a lot more difficult. "This is a whole new world," worries Michael Green, a former Bush administration national security official now with Georgetown University and the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "There is no example of rolling back a rogue state to rid it of nuclear weapons."

Sanctions. North Korea's latest move triggered uncommonly swift action at the United Nations Security Council, which plans to castigate the North and last week debated how far to go with sanctions. The toughest measures advocated by the Bush administration-to curtail suspect financial transactions with North Korea and force inspections of cargo heading into and out of the country-are opposed by China and Russia. Their argument: Pyongyang would see such interdictions as an act of war.

Hanging over these developments is some uncertainty about just what, exactly, North Korea did. U.S. spy planes last week cruised over the Sea of Japan, armed with sensors to detect radiation and other signatures of an atomic explosion. More will follow. Seismic sensors indicated a subkiloton explosion-unexpectedly small and possibly indicative of a faulty test or design. Or even of a massive conventional bomb portrayed as atomic. Another explanation: that the mountain cavern muffled the blast. The working assumption, an intelligence official tells U.S. News, is that it was a nuclear test, albeit "more a fizzle than a pop."

The explosion, in any event, has sparked an election-year scrap over President Bush's policy on North Korea-a policy reflecting a precarious balance between hawks who promote regime change and others who favor engagement. Some administration hard-liners contend that a nuclear test would be a "clarifying" event, affirming North Korea's status as an international outlaw and bringing countries like China and Russia closer to Bush's preference for pressuring Pyongyang. But, as it has before, Pyongyang seemed almost driven to defy Washington's warnings. Not surprisingly, as a senior U.S. official noted, "we're not fond of using the words red line."

"Stalker state." Democrats charge that Bush's approach has been a strategic blunder, with North Korea having expanded its plutonium stash from enough for one or two bombs at the start of his administration to enough for about a dozen now-all while refusing to allow direct talks with the North outside of six-nation nuclear negotiations. Bush blamed Kim's "intransigence" for the collapse of those negotiations, denying any failure of U.S. policy. Administration officials said that the test had deepened suspicion among advisers that North Korea-which has pursued nuclear technology for decades-intends to keep an arsenal regardless of what inducements are dangled. For its part, the North claims that it still wants a denuclearized Korean peninsula.

When Outlaws Get The Bomb (TIME)

By Bill Powell

DOJ_NMG_0080755

Time, October 16, 2006

The tremor out of the far north of the People's Democratic Republic of Korea was unremarkable. It registered a magnitude 4.2, a light earthquake. Its significance had to be declared by its perpetrator, the unpredictable regime of Kim Jong Il. North Korea, one of the poorest and most hermetic nations on earth, was claiming a successful underground nuclear bomb test and entry into the once exclusive club of nuclear powers as member No. 9. "More fizzle than pop," said a U.S. intelligence source dismissively, though he conceded the blast was likely to have been nuclear. A sniffer plane would later pick up hints of radiation in the atmosphere. Days of diplomatic consternation ensued at Pyongyang's announcement, and after stops and starts, the U.N. Security Council imposed sanctions on North Korea, demanding that it dismantle its nuclear-arms program. It also banned the sale of conventional weaponry and luxury goods to the country. Pointing at Washington as its nemesis, Pyongyang said any increased American military pressure would be deemed a declaration of war.

Welcome to the bad new world. As crude as the North Korean blast was, it punctuated a scary fact: the rules that governed the nuclear road during the cold war and its immediate aftermath have become irrelevant, replaced by the law of the jungle--every state, rogue or otherwise, for itself. The risk now, says former Clinton Administration Defense Department official Graham Allison, is the emergence of a more dangerous nuclear age. Pyongyang's test, says Allison, threatens to set off a "cascade" of nations seeking the ultimate weapon. "The North Korean test blew a hole in the nonproliferation regime of Northeast Asia," says Allison. "I think this is bad news for the country, bad news for the region, bad news for the world."

What we have now is not a tight club of nuclear powers with interlocking interests and an appreciation for the brutal doctrine of "mutually assured destruction" but an unpredictable host of potential Bomb throwers: a Stalinist Bomb out of unstable North Korea; a Shi'ite Bomb out of Iran; a Sunni Bomb out of Pakistan; and, down the road, possibly out of Egypt and Saudi Arabia as well; and, of course, an al-Qaeda Bomb out of nowhere. Israel is a nuclear power already. And Turkey may just decide it had better be too. Even Japan and South Korea could eventually move toward the Bomb, if they feel the U.S. nuclear umbrella begins to fray in East Asia. What are the consequences for the U.S. and the rest of the world? Are we in an era of barely controlled proliferation, in which countless nations must at least consider the possibility of going nuclear? Or are those fears, in the wake of the North Korean test, overblown? Is there still time to manage the situation?

THE CASCADE STARTS HERE

The North Korean incident impetus to what appears to be a determined push by Iran to acquire the capability to produce its own nuclear bomb. Tehran insists it is interested only in a civilian nuclear program for energy purposes. The main outside players--the U.S., the European Union, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)--are increasingly skeptical about those claims but thus far have been powerless to do much about it. Western intelligence agencies assume Iran could become the next nuclear power if it proceeds undeterred with its clandestine program. Like North Korea, Iran is a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT), the diplomatic edifice erected in 1970 precisely to deter countries from going nuclear. (Pyongyang formally withdrew from the NPT in 2003.) The North Korean test, says General Giora Eiland, Israel's former National Security Adviser, means "Iran will reach the obvious conclusion--that nobody will stop them."

"If Iran goes nuclear militarily," says an Egyptian official, "others will not sit idly by." The official says Turkey would think seriously about going nuclear, and if "Iran, Israel and Turkey are all nuclear, the Arab states would feel they have no choice but to follow. Forget about eradicating poverty, all efforts will go into acquiring nuclear technology." In a private memo he wrote on May 1, which was reported in a Bob Woodward article in the Washington Post on Oct. 8, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld noted that at least two Middle Eastern states--which he did not name--have been thinking about developing nuclear weapons. In all likelihood, he was referring to Egypt--which has a civilian nuclear program for its energy needs--and Saudi Arabia. The leaders in the Arab world have made due note of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's success in using the pursuit of nuclear power as a way to rally popular support.

When Pyongyang declared the success of its test, Japan swore it would continue to abjure nuclear arms. At a minimum, however, the incident will surely spur Japan's efforts to develop a missile-defense system in cooperation with the U.S. That, in turn, is bound to anger China and could push Beijing to spend more on nuclear weapons to ensure that Japan doesn't feel invulnerable. An icy East Asian cold war and a very hot arms race between Japan and China are a greater prospect now than they were a week ago.

DOJ_NMG_0080756

And while Tokyo seems sincere about not going nuclear now--the antinuclear sentiment in that country, for obvious reasons, runs strong and deep--there are limits to how secure Japan may come to feel under the U.S. nuclear umbrella. If North Korea proves capable of putting a nuclear warhead on a missile that can reach the U.S.--it already has short-range missiles capable of reaching Tokyo--the strategic game changes. If North Korea could nuke Japan, or blackmail it, while credibly threatening to strike the U.S. with a nuclear warhead, would Japanese officials truly believe the U.S. would retaliate against Pyongyang--and risk a North Korean nuke landing in Honolulu? The day may come when Tokyo will have to make that precise calculation.

WHAT ABOUT AL-QAEDA?

Ashton Carter, a counterproliferation expert at Harvard, believes the risk of nuclear proliferation out the back door of a rogue state is increasing. North Korea or Iran could conceivably sell a bomb to a terrorist group, and Osama bin Laden is unlikely to be put off by traditional methods of deterring a nuclear attack. That means plugging the source. Says Derek D. Smith, author of Deterring America: Rogue States and the Proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction: "If you can't deter the terrorist organizations, you'd better be sure to deter whoever is supplying them."

Reacting to the blast, President Bush said, "The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action." That was an explicit embrace of Graham Allison's concept of "nuclear accountability." Thus, according to Allison, if Kim Jong Il were to sell a weapon to bin Laden and that weapon were used against the U.S. or one of its allies, then the principle would require the U.S. to "treat this precisely like a nuclear-tipped-missile attack" and retaliate against Pyongyang. "That danger [of North Korean proliferation] has always been there," says Michael Green, until last year a senior staff member on the National Security Council. "But North Korea has a mailing address, and they know it. If there was a nuclear explosion somewhere, it would probably be traced back to them, and their country would be destroyed. That's a deterrent."

The Pentagon and the IAEA both devote considerable resources to the task of identifying the source of any bomb that is tested. Still, tracking the source of nuclear material is a complex, difficult endeavor--one that is hardly guaranteed success. To this day, there are questions about the origins of the material that Pakistani nuclear scientist A.Q. Khan sold to Libya. Among the material that Libya turned over after it abandoned its program was a precursor to highly enriched uranium--uranium hexafluoride. U.S. intelligence agencies believed it came from North Korea but spent months trying to prove it. They still haven't.

THE CASE FOR STAYING CALM

It is perhaps surprising at a moment when one of the world's most isolated and despotic regimes says it has gone nuclear that some current and former security strategists view Kim Jong Il's move as far less than a disaster. No one, to be sure, regards it as a good thing. But it is possible to view the test--and the state of play in the nuclear world more broadly--in more apocalyptic terms than is warranted. Many question, for example, Allison's argument that North Korea will unleash a sort of nuclear domino effect--with one country after another scrambling to get nukes. Take, for example, the nonnuclear countries in East Asia closest to North Korea: South Korea, Japan and Taiwan. All are wealthy, technologically sophisticated countries that could go nuclear in a heartbeat. (South Korea had a clandestine nuclear-arms program in the mid-1970s.) But all reside snugly under the so-called U.S. nuclear umbrella--any attack by Pyongyang would bring the full destructive force of the U.S. military in response. And last week all swore off any notion that North Korea's test would make them rethink their policy of eschewing nukes.

Indeed, since the end of the cold war in 1991, not all the news on the nuclear front has been bad. South Africa, Ukraine and, more recently, Libya all willingly gave up nuclear weapons or the pursuit of them. Brazil and Argentina formally abandoned any thought of going nuclear. "I would also disagree with the basic premise that the pressure is all in the direction of going nuclear," says Mark Fitzpatrick, a proliferation expert at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. The North Korea test, he says, will have only marginal effects on how other countries view their own security and the role nukes should play in them.

And some are dusting off the cold war theory that nukes are inherently stabilizing. "Nuclear weapons increase the international responsibility of every state that has acquired them," says a British general. Even Pakistan, roundly condemned as a rogue for its nuclear test in 1998 (conducted in response to India's tests held a couple of weeks earlier), is now viewed, as Fitzpatrick puts it, as a "responsible" nuclear state. It has not gone to war with India, its archrival, and--precisely because war now brings risk of nuclear annihilation on both sides--that prospect is less likely than it was before Pakistan joined India. Deterrence worked during the cold war, and it can work now.

DOJ_NMG_0080757

MANAGING THE NEW RISK

What, then, can be done to rein in countries like North Korea? Pyongyang is especially prickly and dangerous, and already holds 10 million residents in the South Korean capital as virtual hostages. Seoul is only 30 miles from the border and has always lived under the threat of immediate destruction from North Korean firepower. Says a senior U.S. military officer: "[It is] within easy and rapid range of perhaps 10,000 artillery tubes with a 57-second flight time. That can cause World War II--size casualties." And that's without nuclear weapons. Now, unless the U.S. goes back to the bargaining table and somehow entices North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons--something most experts believe is unlikely--deterrence and containment become even more important. "The tactical game with North Korea--trying to get them to stand down their nuclear program--is now pretty much over," says Henry Sokolski, a former Defense Department nonproliferation expert in George H.W. Bush's Administration. "Now it's a strategic game, containing them and waiting for the regime to collapse."

The international community can also make it difficult for rogue nuclear states to make a buck off their new technology. To its credit, the Bush Administration has implemented the Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI), a program now involving about 80 countries. They work to interdict material and equipment they believe is headed for use in the production of weapons of mass destruction. The U.S. and its allies credit improved intelligence sharing and cooperation for successes like the October 2003 interdiction of the German-owned ship BBC China, which was intercepted carrying centrifuge components to Libya. But there are still huge gaps. The PSI relies on "actionable" intelligence, and Representative Pete Hoekstra, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, acknowledges that U.S. human-intelligence assets in "hard targets" like North Korea are sorely lacking. Says Derek Smith: "It really comes down to having the intelligence capability to be able to determine which modes of transferral are going to be used, so you know which ship to go after. Certainly, we're not going to be able to put a blockade in place on air, sea and land all around North Korea."

China, which has not signed on to the PSI, has been a valuable partner. This summer North Korea conducted conventional- missile tests--in defiance of its chief patron Beijing and the rest of the world. And now China, which has sold conventional missiles to Iran in the past, is stepping up efforts to deter Pyongyang from moving missile and missile-related technology to Iran. A high-ranking diplomat in East Asia tells TIME that China has denied overflight rights to North Korean aircraft bound for Tehran.

Overshadowing everything is the reality that this is a different world from the one that existed during the cold war--and the established powers are at sea in trying to cope with it. Defense intellectuals like Thérèse Delpech, director of strategic affairs at the Atomic Energy Commission in France, reject classic deterrence theory as a model for today's nuclear age. "The new actors, such as Ahmadinejad or Kim, are much more prone to act [impulsively] rather than like the United States or the Soviet Union" during the cold war, she asserts. And even if that's not true--Iran's Ayatullahs and Kim may want nukes primarily to secure their hold on power--there is little question that the world faces big problems dealing with the new nuclear challenges. "The United Nations keeps pushing back deadlines, and the matters at hand get more and more serious," says Delpech. "There has to be the will among the principle powers to recognize that proliferation has to be viewed in a way that goes beyond parochial national interests."

Is there that will? The Bush Administration insists there is, and that cooperation among the Western allies will ultimately rein in North Korea and deter future nuclear wannabes like Iran. Yet that may be more hope than reality. Says Delpech: "We're now facing two very grave cases of proliferation at the same time, and we have to use this moment of condemnation to pull the [established world] powers together." But considering how long it took for the Security Council to ban the sale of luxury goods to Pyongyang, time does not appear to be on our side. [This article contains a diagram. Please see hardcopy or pdf.] NUCLEAR WORLD

North Korea is defiantly rushing to become the ninth country on earth to have the Bomb. President Bush has said the U.S. "will not tolerate" a nuclear North Korea, but containment may be the only viable option remaining

•Countries with nuclear weapons; Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) signatories

•Countries with the ability to develop nuclear weapons

DOJ_NMG_0080758

•Countries with nuclear weapons; not NPT signatories •Argentina, Brazil, Chile

•South Africa

France

Britain Israel Unconfirmed arsenal Iran Suspected program Pakistan Russia

China

North Korea Testing weapons

India

•Indonesia, Australia The U.S. and Russia control most of the world's nuclear warheads. Those stockpiles are shrinking, but other countries are pursuing nuclear weapons Deployed nuclear weapons, in thousands 1950-2000 U.S. U.S.S.R/Russia Others

Estimated nuclear stockpiles, 2005

Russia 8,800 inactive 7,200 deployed U.S. 10,315

Est. warheads

China 410 France 350 Britain 200 Israel 100-170 India 75-110 Pakistan 50-110 North Korea Unknown

Russia has about 8,800 warheads in reserve or awaiting dismantling

In addition to the known nuclear powers, North Korea says it has nuclear weapons. Iran could be next

Sources: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; Natural Resources Defense Council

U.S. Expects China To Lead On Sanctions (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

Top U.S. diplomats yesterday said they expected China to enforce sanctions unanimously passed by the U.N. Security Council to curtail North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons.

In an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said China, which shares an 880-mile border with North Korea and is Pyongyang's principal trading partner, would shoulder the major responsibility of stopping trade with the isolated communist state. Without China's cooperation on enforcement, sanctions likely would be ineffective.

"North Korea has a long border, as you say, with China. It also has very close relations with China, but China has come a very long way in being willing to sign on to a resolution that makes China now responsible to make certain that North Korea's not trading," said Miss Rice, who leaves tomorrow for a diplomatic trip to Asia, including a stop in Beijing.

"I'm quite certain that China is going to live up to its responsibilities," she said.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, made similar comments yesterday, saying that North Korea's apparent nuclear test "had to have been humiliating to China," which had been protecting Pyongyang from international sanctions for years.

China's cutting its support "would be powerfully persuasive in Pyongyang," he said. "They've not yet been willing to do it. I think that China has a heavy responsibility here."

The final resolution passed by the Security Council on Saturday demands that North Korea scrap its nuclear-weapons program but rules out military action against the country, on the demand of the Russians and Chinese. It also orders countries to prevent North Korea from importing or exporting any material for ballistic missiles and to freeze the assets and restrict the travel of people or businesses connected to the country's nuclear and missile programs.

That resolution passed by the Security Council is weaker than an earlier version that called for mandatory searches of ships entering and leaving North Korean waters and seizures of any weapons or goods that could be used to create a nuclear weapon. China, rejected that version along with Russia.

"Let's remember, the inspections are a tool to effectuate the sanctions themselves. China voted in favor of the resolution. They eventually agreed to even broader sanctions," said Mr. Bolton on ABC's "This Week."

"This means China itself now has an obligation to make sure it complies with the resolution, and it has full national authority on its side of the border to conduct any inspections it wants," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0080759

But China urged caution in a statement posted yesterday on its Foreign Ministry Web site.

"We call for relevant parties to be restrained and calm, adopt a cautious and responsible attitude to prevent the situation from worsening and break the stalemate as soon as possible so that process of the six-party talks can resume," ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said.

Miss Rice said she would discuss with China's leaders the best methods and procedures for enforcing the sanctions, adding that forcible searches on the high seas might not be the best way to handle the situation.

"I think that we don't want to get out ahead of ourselves. ... But we'll want to use [sanctions] in a way that does not enhance the possibility for open conflict," she said.

In an appearance on CNN's "Late Edition," Mr. Bolton said the U.S. "had not proposed" a blockade of North Korea.

"The overwhelming predominance of the inspections would take place in ports and at land crossings," he said.

North Korea immediately denounced the resolution, and its U.N. ambassador walked out of the council chamber after accusing its members of a "gangsterlike" action that neglects the threat that Pyongyang says is posed by the U.S.

Japan and Australia have pledged immediate enforcement of the penalties, including sending their warships, and said they were considering harsher measures on their own.

South Korea, which has taken a conciliatory approach to Pyongyang and has provided its neighbor with aid, said it would abide by the resolution's terms but did not say how. Its Unification Ministry, which handles dealings with the North, indicated that the sanctions would not affect a tourism venture and a joint industrial complex in the North, saying the "projects have nothing to do with the weapons of mass destruction program."

In Seoul last night, Russian and South Korean diplomats agreed to try to restart the six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program.

"The North Korean side several times returned to the point that the six-sided process should continue," Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Alexeyev said about his meetings Friday in Pyongyang.

But Chun Yung-woo, South Korea's main nuclear negotiator, said, "We have to see how North Korea will respond to the sanctions. After then, we can confidently talk about the diplomatic process."

The six-party talks involve the U.S., Russia, China, Japan, North Korea and South Korea.

•This article is based in part on wire service reports.

U.S. Seeks Asian Support On Squeezing Pyongyang (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

Armed with a United Nations resolution condemning North Korea for its apparent test of a nuclear weapon, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will head to Asia tomorrow to try to enlist Chinese and South Korean help in further isolating the North, while reassuring Japan that its alliance with the U.S. is stronger than ever.

On Saturday, the U.N. Security Council voted to ban trade with North Korea of most weapons and all luxury goods, condemning Pyongyang for last Monday's detonation, which mounting evidence suggests was a nuclear test. But, having decided on penalties, the U.S. and others must now figure out how to impose that punishment.

A fundamental disagreement remains between China, Russia and South Korea and other countries, such as the U.S. and Japan, over how tough to be on the North and its leader, Kim Jong Il. For one thing, neighbors such as South Korea and China worry they'll pay the price of a refugee crisis if the Kim regime collapses.

Some are already resisting key terms of the U.N. sanction. For example, although China voted for the penalties, its U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said afterward that Beijing found the provision allowing the boarding of ships to inspect cargo unacceptable. In South Korea, the chairman of the ruling Uri Party urged the country's leaders not to go along with cargo inspections.

China's Mr. Wang also questioned the ban on luxury goods, noting that the sanction didn't define them. "Luxury goods can mean many things for different people...if they don't have [them]," he said. For years, the North's leader, Mr. Kim, has rewarded the country's elite and military for their loyalty by providing them with cars, food and TVs, even as millions of ordinary North Koreans have lived with little food or electricity.

DOJ_NMG_0080760

As it was, the resolution, which the Security Council passed in a rare Saturday meeting after days of negotiations, had already been weakened during the course of various drafts. China and Russia had objected to earlier U.S. proposals that they feared would endorse a full-blown military embargo on North Korea and serve as a pretext for potential military action.

The resolution passed Saturday demands that North Korea get rid of its nuclear weapons but bars military action against the country and limits a military embargo to heavy equipment such as ballistic missiles, aircraft, tanks and ships. As North Korea's closest ally, China also objected to language that would have authorized the U.S. and others to stop North Korean ships to search for banned products. The Security Council instead settled for less-formal language calling for "cooperative action" on cargo inspection.

The resolution does tighten restrictions on military sales to North Korea and requires states to seize funds and ban travel for officials involved in North Korea's nuclear program. And the measure increases the ability of states to inspect cargo going to and from North Korea.

Despite the watering down of Washington's original proposals, U.S. officials cheered the resolution passed Saturday, with President George W. Bush praising the "swift and tough" penalties, and repeating the longstanding U.S. offer of economic assistance for the North if it verifiably ends its nuclear-weapons program.

North Korea's U.N. representative, Pak Gil Yon, strongly protested the U.N. sanctions and repeated his country's desire for two-way discussions with the U.S. He said North Korea "would feel no need to possess even a single nuke when it is no longer exposed to the United States' threat, after it has dropped its hostile policy towards [the North], and confidences have been built between the two countries." The U.S. has rebuffed Pyongyang's calls for bilateral talks, and Saturday's resolution calls on North Korea to re-enter six-way talks with the two parties, plus China, Russia, Japan and South Korea.

U.S. officials say that a top objective of Ms. Rice's trip will be to encourage both China and South Korea to cooperate with Japan and the U.S. on monitoring cargo flows to and from the isolated communist state. The U.S. wants both countries to participate in an antiproliferation initiative that Washington launched in 2003 to crack down on the flow of nuclear materials and missile technology to countries such as North Korea and Iran.

U.S. officials now say they have picked up evidence of radioactive debris that appears to confirm that North Korea did test a nuclear device, though a final determination has yet to be made.

Ms. Rice will stop first in Japan, where the government has moved rapidly to impose its own restrictions on trade with North Korea. While there, Ms. Rice will seek to ease jitters in Tokyo over North Korea's nuclear advances and to reaffirm that the U.S. is prepared to help defend Japan from any outside attacks. The U.S. is concerned that saber-rattling in North Korea could lead Japan and others in Asia to pursue their own nuclear weapons, further destabilizing the region.

Ms. Rice will then travel to Seoul and Beijing, and possibly to Moscow on the way home. Rice aides say one theme throughout the trip will be U.S. hopes that North Korea's recent action will spur moves toward greater security cooperation in Asia, where bitter divisions, going back decades, have prevented the region from developing anything like what the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is for Europe.

"There are no existing...pan-Northeast Asian security structures there," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack. "Those are discussions that are worth having."

While no regional gathering is planned for this trip, Ms. Rice may push for a meeting next month of Asia's major powers, plus the U.S., perhaps on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Hanoi in mid-November. The point of such a gathering would be to talk about strengthening the regional security architecture to meet the North Korean challenge, U.S. officials said.

Diplomats began talking yesterday about how to resolve the differences over the U.N. resolution's provisions and about options for carrying out the order. Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Alexeyev, the first foreign official to visit Pyongyang after the test, arrived in South Korea yesterday to discuss what he had learned there. Meanwhile, the chief U.S. diplomat for Asia, Christopher Hill, left Washington for Japan, to be followed by Ms. Rice.

DOJ_NMG_0080761

Before the vote, Chinese leaders had hosted South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun for a summit meeting on Friday. In a statement issued after the summit, the two countries said it is an "absolute necessity" to resolve the North Korean nuclear issue "through dialogue while putting the highest priority on a stable denuclearization of the Korean peninsula."

China Hedges On Enforcing N. Korea Penalties (USAT)

USA Today, October 16, 2006

The Bush administration pressed China on Sunday to help enforce sanctions that the United Nations imposed on North Korea after that country announced it had tested a nuclear weapon.

China joined the rest of the U.N. Security Council in voting 15-0 Saturday for a range of sanctions against North Korea. The impact of the vote was undercut immediately by suggestions from China that it might not help carry out inspections of ships and cargo entering and leaving North Korea.

Chinese cooperation on enforcement will be on the agenda when U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visits China, Japan and South Korea this week.

"I'm quite certain that China will live up to its responsibilities," Rice told Fox News Sunday. "I'm quite certain that China has no interest in seeing the proliferation of dangerous materials from North Korea."

Much of the cargo in and out of North Korea passes through China.

Rice said the sanctions might not be strong enough to persuade North Korea to return to negotiations on halting its nuclear program. "There may be other steps that will be necessary, given North Korea's behavior," she said.

The U.N. sanctions were not tough enough for Japan. It imposed penalties of its own, including a ban on all North Korean imports. Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Japan could take further action.

John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the U.N., emphasized the importance of North Korea's traditional allies Russia and China in persuading the communist regime in Pyongyang to return to negotiations. "The pressure we hope they will apply on Pyongyang, together with these very significant sanctions … could have an impact."

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, questioned the effectiveness of sanctions.

"The Chinese already said that they're not going to enforce inspections against goods going into North Korea," Levin said on CNN's Late Edition. "There's no way a sanctions regime can work."

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee told CNN, "We're not going to resolve the issue … through a sanction."

Jack Pritchard, former U.S. envoy in talks with North Korea during President Bush's first term, said the U.N. resolution is "clearly less than what the U.S. would have liked but about the best it could hope to get."

China and other countries want to signal North Korea that "it's not business as usual" after last week's claim of a nuclear test, Pritchard said. North Korea's closest neighbors, however, are reluctant to endorse steps that could lead to armed conflict or bring down the North Korean regime, he said.

A collapse of the regime could lead to a flood of refugees into South Korea, China and Russia, the nations that border North Korea.

Others were more upbeat about the resolution's chances of slowing North Korea's ability to amass nuclear weaponry.

Michael Green, who handled Asia matters on the White House National Security Council from 2001 to 2005, said the resolution's provisions regarding North Korean financial assets "will completely clog up North Korean bank accounts" abroad and hurt its ability to buy weapons materials.

"What the resolution will not do," Green said, is "cause the regime to collapse or cry uncle anytime soon."

US Expects China To Act Against N Korea (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

The US said on Sunday it expected China to play a decisive role in enforcing sanctions against North Korea, brushing aside suggestions that Beijing was not committed to a United Nations resolution against its reclusive ally.

DOJ_NMG_0080762

The message comes just days before Condoleezza Rice, Secretary of State, heads to Japan, South Korea and China on a diplomatic mission to negotiate how Saturday's UN resolution should be enforced.

Ms Rice told Fox News Sunday on Sunday: "This is the toughest action that China has ever signed on to vis-à-vis North Korea."

Her remarks that she was "quite certain" China would live up to its responsibilities countered an earlier statement by Wang Guangya, Chinese ambassador to the UN, who said China did not approve of inspecting cargo to and from North Korea and urged restraint from "provocative steps".

John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, emphasised that China had a "heavy responsibility" to influence Pyongyang. In response to a question about China's trade with North Korea, Mr Bolton said it would be "powerfully persuasive" if China moved to cut off food and energy supplies to its neighbour.

Mr Bolton also said on ABC's This Week that the supposed nuclear test performed by North Korea last week "had to have been humiliating to China".

"After all of the efforts they've made over the years to protect North Korea, for the North Koreans in the face of all that to test had to get quite a reaction in Beijing. And I think we're still seeing that play out."

North Korea on Saturday accused the UN of acting in a "gangster-like" way in imposing the sanctions, declaring that it would not give in to the US and might even detonate another device.

The UN resolution labelled the test a "clear threat to international peace and security". It will allow countries to stop cargo going to and from North Korea to check for weapons of mass destruction (WMD) or related supplies. The resolution also bans trade in heavy conventional weapons and luxury goods and urges countries to freeze funds connected with North Korea's non-conventional arms programmes.

The South Korean government, which has traditionally been reluctant to take tough action against its neighbour for fear of antagonising or destabilising the regime of Kim Jong-il, vowed to support the resolution and urged a return to six-party talks to resolve the stand-off.

Seoul is also warming to the idea of joining, or at least supporting, the proliferation security initiative, a scheme to stop the proliferation of WMD by interdicting ships or aircraft suspected of carrying them.

Taro Aso, Japan's foreign minister, said on Fuji TV that his country was considering passing a new law to make it easier to participate in UN-led inspections on cargo moving in and out of North Korea. Japan might also use an emergency law for the first time that would allow it to provide support to US forces in areas surrounding Japan, he said.

Separately, Shinzo Abe, Japan's prime minister, said the government was considering additional unilateral sanctions should Pyongyang carry out a second nuclear test. This came as Alexander Alexeyev, Russia's deputy foreign minister and its chief negotiator in the six-party talks involving North Korea, returned from Pyongyang.

"They said that only after analysing the UN resolution would they plan the subsequent character of their actions . . . including in relation to the resumption of the six party process," he told the RIA-Novosti news agency.

U.S. Officials Call On China To Help Enforce U.N. Resolution On N. Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

One day after passage of a U.N. Security Council resolution punishing North Korea for its apparent test of a nuclear weapon, senior U.S. diplomats said yesterday that China must help enforce it and use economic leverage to compel Pyongyang to return to disarmament talks.

The resolution, passed unanimously, calls on states to prevent North Korea from selling or buying certain banned weapons and technology. But China said Saturday that Beijing would not inspect cargo entering or leaving North Korea, for fear of raising tensions in the region.

China's unwillingness to act against its longtime ally raises the stakes for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's diplomatic mission to Northeast Asia later this week. Ever since the current nuclear crisis with North Korea began in 2002, the Bush administration has relied heavily on China to use its influence with North Korea's leaders. But Beijing's caution has frequently disappointed U.S. officials.

DOJ_NMG_0080763

U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John R. Bolton said on ABC's "This Week" that China had a "heavy responsibility" now that Pyongyang has detonated a nuclear device. "This test by the North Koreans had to have been humiliating to China," he added.

Rice, who along with Bolton made the rounds of the Sunday talk shows, said on CBS's "Face the Nation," "You're going to find China carrying out its responsibilities, undoubtedly carrying it out in a way that it believes will not enhance conflict. None of us want to enhance conflict with these measures. We just want to keep North Korea from trading in dangerous materials."

U.S. officials said yesterday that they were pleased with the terms of Resolution 1718, which bans North Korean trade in materials linked to its weapons of mass destruction program, ballistic missiles, high-end conventional weapons -- including warplanes and battle tanks -- and luxury goods. It will create a U.N. committee to monitor the sanctions' effectiveness and to draw up a list of individuals and institutions linked to North Korea's weapons programs. They will be prohibited from traveling abroad, and most of their financial assets will be frozen.

China, which shares an 880-mile border with North Korea, has generally argued that pressure on its neighbor would be counterproductive. It frequently lured North Korea back to six-nation negotiations on Pyongyang's nuclear programs with tens of millions of dollars in payments -- in one case, China even provided North Korea with a glass factory.

In April 2005, when North Korea was boycotting an earlier round of the talks, China rejected a U.S. suggestion of a "technical" interruption in the supply of oil to North Korea, which imports all the oil it consumes.

U.S. officials continue to believe a fuel cutoff would be devastating to the North Korean government. Bolton said yesterday that if China were to interrupt energy supplies or other aid to North Korea, "it would be powerfully persuasive in Pyongyang."

Rice stressed on "Fox News Sunday" that the U.N. resolution passed very quickly, even though it required China to vote against its communist neighbor.

"This is the toughest action that China has ever signed onto vis-Ã-vis North Korea," she said. "It sends a very strong signal to North Korea that it is now completely isolated. You cannot underestimate how big a blow it is."

Questions Grow Over U.N. Curbs On North Korea (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

TOKYO, Monday, Oct. 16 — Questions over the effectiveness of the Security Council's punitive sanctions on North Korea for its claimed nuclear test grew Sunday, as both South Korea and China — the North's two most important trading partners — indicated that business and economic relations would be largely unaffected.

A day after the Council unanimously passed the resolution, following nearly a week of intensive diplomatic negotiations, the South Korean government said it would still pursue economic projects with North Korea, including an industrial zone and tourist resort in the North. Those projects are not explicitly covered by the Security Council resolution, but they are an important source of hard currency for the North.

China, which shares a 870-mile porous border with North Korea and is perhaps its most critical economic gateway to the outside world, said Saturday that it had no intention of stopping and inspecting cross-border shipments, as called for, but not specifically required, in the resolution. The Chinese government said nothing on Sunday about how it intended to carry out the sanctions, and American officials said they would be focused on whether the normal trade flow across the border was slowed.

The relative silence on Sunday about how the resolution would be enforced, coupled with the vagaries of the resolution itself, raised concerns that the Security Council action would not have much of an impact for the foreseeable future.

"We're in the situation where everyone is saying what they won't do, but no one has yet said what exactly they will do," said Jonathan D. Pollack, a North Korea expert at the Naval War College in Newport, R.I. "The question for the next few days is what this all means, because there is a lack of specificity in the resolution."

DOJ_NMG_0080764

North Korea, which announced last Monday that it had successfully detonated a nuclear device, has denounced the resolution, accused the Security Council of gangsterism and warned that any American pressure on the North Korean government would be regarded as an act of war. But North Korea has not specified what it may do next in response.

In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that China was part of "a Security Council resolution that demands very clear cooperation of member states to make certain that dangerous goods are not getting in and out of North Korea," and added that she expected cooperation.

But in interviews on two Sunday television programs she acknowledged that exactly how China would cooperate remained unclear, and she hinted that the United States would not rush to interdict North Korean ships at sea, at least initially. Instead, she expects most searches to take place at ports, she said.

"This is a powerful tool, but it's also a tool that needs to be used carefully," she said, adding, "I don't think I want to speculate about how it's going to be used." Responding to statements by the Chinese ambassador at the United Nations that China would not interdict shipments at its border with North Korea, Ms. Rice said on "Fox News Sunday" that China's support of the resolution was effectively a pledge of "cooperation in stopping the proliferation trade with North Korea."

She said she was "quite certain" that China would act in accordance with this objective, but she declined to offer details. The resolution approved Saturday condemning North Korea and calling for sanctions against it "came about more rapidly, perhaps, than any in recent memory of this magnitude," Ms. Rice said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "So there will be some matters to be worked out."

In fact, under a loose coalition with other countries around the world known as the Proliferation Security Initiative, a few countries have already boarded ships to and from North Korea in ports throughout Asia. These countries have carried out naval exercises to practice for such interdictions. But their powers to intercept ships in international waters — except when they have permission of the owners, the captain or the country whose flag the ship is flying — have been murky, and remain so under the new Security Council resolution.

The resolution, drafted by the United States, bans trade with North Korea in materials linked with unconventional weapons, and authorizes countries to inspect cargo going into and out of the North. This last measure was diluted, however, by China's insistence that the resolution state that countries be requested, not required, to do so.

In Japan, however, enthusiasm for the new resolution was greater. Hawkish politicians close to Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said the Japanese were prepared to assist the American military in inspecting North Korean ships despite Japan's pacifist Constitution, and called for a debate on whether Japan should possess nuclear arms. Mr. Abe himself has said he has no intention of changing the government's longtime ban on the weapons.

Like China, South Korea fears that inspecting North Korean ships by force could lead to a military confrontation. As a result, despite pressure from Washington, Seoul has not joined the three-year-old American-led Proliferation Security Initiative, concerned that intercepting North Korean weapons could begin such an encounter.

"We judged that the contents of the resolution of the U.N. Security Council do not directly affect the economic cooperation programs between the two Koreas, including Kaesong and Kumgang Mountain," Choo Kyu-ho, the spokesman for the Foreign Ministry, said Sunday, referring to an industrial park and a tourist resort. "We will go ahead with the economic cooperation programs in harmony with the resolution." Mr. Choo declined to say whether South Korea planned to proceed with long-held plans to expand the Kaesong industrial zone.

Such comments are bound to worry the Bush administration, however, because President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea told President Bush in Washington last month that a North Korean nuclear test would drastically change the South's policy, away from engagement and toward punishment.

Some Korea experts said that with the reluctance of China and South Korea to crack down on North Korea, as well as Russia's initial unwillingness to take a hard line against the North, it was unclear how effective the sanctions would be.

"Limited sanctions and cooperation will continue, so we're basically in the same boat as before," said David C. Kang, a Korea expert at Dartmouth College who is visiting Seoul. "It's untenable globally to oppose sanctions right now. So South Korea will go along with them for a while, put some projects on hold, but resume them in a year or sooner."

DOJ_NMG_0080765

Mr. Kang added: "The sanctions are at best kabuki theater. They're not going to have much effect on North Korea's behavior."

China is opposed to restricting the flow of nonmilitary goods to North Korea, which remains one of the most impoverished and isolated countries and depends on that commerce for its economic survival. Chinese border cities like Dandong and Yanji are significant trading posts where North Korean trucks line up daily, stocking up on Chinese food and consumer goods.

China is also North Korea's biggest supplier of oil, most of it shipped by rail. While the vehicles have to pass customs inspections on both sides, there is no indication that the Chinese strictly control what is sold to North Korea.

As North Korea's largest trading partner, China accounts for nearly 39 percent of its imports and exports, followed by South Korea, which has a 26 percent share, according to the South Korean government.

Thailand, Russia, and Japan are the North's other significant trading partners.

Most of the China-North Korea border is demarcated by the Yalu River. While troops patrol the border on both sides, it is widely considered porous, especially in the winter months when the Yalu freezes and people on both sides can cross without fear of detection.

China's opposition to restricting the flow of nonmilitary goods to North Korea, and what appears to be its reluctance to inspect cargo shipments in or out of the country for materials banned by the United Nations sanctions, could sharply limit their effectiveness.

The utility of seaborne inspections of North Korea cargo ships by the United States or Japan could be undermined if the North Korean government determines that it can import or export goods covered by the sanctions through Chinese ports.

Even so, Beijing agreed to punitive sanctions on North Korea for the first time, and the details of their enforcement may take longer to negotiate. Whether they will be made public remains unclear. Government officials in China typically do not provide detailed information about policies relating to North Korea or other delicate matters.

The resolution came as somewhat of a relief in South Korea, which is caught between its fear of destabilizing the North and its need to show solidarity with its American ally.

The South Korean government's engagement policy toward the North has been fiercely attacked by the political opposition in the last week. But experts said that the government's decision to press ahead with cross-border economic projects indicated that the South would stick to its engagement policy.

"The feeling is that the engagement policy itself was not to blame for the nuclear test," said Kim Sung-han, a senior analyst at the government-financed Institute for Foreign Affairs and National Security in Seoul. "The issue is how to implement it. Should there be more elements of dialogue or reciprocity? There is the feeling that implementation was not balanced enough. From now on, the government will be more realistic in implementing the engagement policy instead of giving it up altogether."

U.S. Presses China To Influence N. Korea (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug

AP-Yahoo, October 16, 2006

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations said Sunday that China had a "heavy responsibility" to influence North Korea's behavior and urged Beijing to heed a U.N. resolution intended to punish the North for its claimed nuclear test.

John Bolton also said North Korea's Oct. 9 detonation amounted to a public humiliation for China, the North's major ally and supplier of crucial shipments of food and energy aid.

If China were to cut that support, Bolton said, it "would be powerfully persuasive in Pyongyang," the North's capital. "They've not yet been willing to do it. I think that China has a heavy responsibility here."

Bolton and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice played down suggestions that Beijing would balk at parts of Saturday's U.N. resolution against North Korea.

It demands that North Korea abandon its nuclear weapons program and orders all countries to prevent the reclusive nation from importing or exporting any material for weapons of mass destruction or ballistic missiles.

But China, which shares a long border with North Korea, said it would not go along with a call to inspect cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea to prevent any illegal trafficking in weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0080766

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, noting that China signed on to and voted for the resolution, said, "I'm quite certain that China is going to live up to its responsibilities."

Added Bolton: "China itself now has an obligation to make sure it complies with the resolution. We'll see what actually comes out of Beijing."

Bolton said that if North Korea continues along the path of building a nuclear arsenal, the United States will "ratchet up the pressure, make it clear that their international isolation is only going to increase, and we're going to make it, to the extent we can, impossible for them to continue the program."

President Bush is sending Rice to Asia this week on a diplomatic mission to consult with allies in the region. Rice said she will try to negotiate differences over how the resolution should be put in place.

"I understand that people are concerned about how it might work so it doesn't enhance tensions in the region, and we're perfectly willing to have those conversations," Rice said.

The North's apparent nuclear test, Bolton said, "had to have been humiliating to China. After all of the efforts they've made over the years to protect North Korea from international approbation, for the North Koreans in the face of all that to test had to get quite a reaction in Beijing. And I think we're still seeing that play out."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said Rice's comments show how the Bush administration is "living in a world of make-believe" because their foreign policy is a failure. He said U.S. involvement in Iraq has diminished America's credibility to deal with nuclear threats in North Korea and Iran.

Bolton appeared on NBC's "Meet the Press" and ABC's "This Week," while Rice and Kerry spoke on "Fox News Sunday."

'North Korea Should Be More Realistic' (WP)

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Last week the members of the United Nations selected a new secretary general -- the foreign minister of South Korea, Ban Ki Moon, 62. On Saturday in New York, Ban discussed his new role with Newsweek-Washington Post's Lally Weymouth. Excerpts:

Q: The Security Council is voting on sanctions that will include some kind of blockade and inspection of certain goods entering North Korea. How will North Korea respond?

A: North Korea has declared very defiantly that if the Security Council adopts any sanctions, they will regard this as a declaration of war. This is very worrisome and shows total disrespect of the United Nations.

What role do you see for yourself as secretary general in this dispute?

I think that I would be in a much better position than any other previous secretary general -- as I come from Korea and have experience. I will try to coordinate with the concerned parties. If necessary, I will take my own initiative, which will include visiting North Korea and meeting with North Korean leaders.

Will you meet with President Kim Jong Il?

I hope so. When the secretary general of the United Nations visits [a country], normally the secretary general deals with the leaders of the member states.

People say that Kim Jong Il is not so normal.

But he has met many leaders of the world.

Some argue that the recent test is a reaction by North Korea to the economic sanctions imposed by the U.S. on the Macao-based Banco Delta Asia in 2005 right after North Korea and the U.S. appeared to have arrived at a political deal.

First of all, the financial measures imposed on the North Korean accounts in Banco Delta Asia were because of the suspicion of North Korean illicit activities, including counterfeiting [of U.S. currency]. It's wrong that North Korea has linked this issue to the six-party process.

[Recently] the American government has said that if and when North Korea returns to the six-party talks, they will be prepared to have bilateral discussions . . . on all pending measures, including these financial restrictions.

Shouldn't the U.S. have had bilateral talks with North Korea previously?

DOJ_NMG_0080767

The South Korean government has been asking the U.S. to engage in bilateral talks with the North. The U.S. government's position is not to directly engage with North Korea on bilateral issues except within the framework of the six-party talks.

Isn't this a mistake?

I would not characterize it. That's American policy.

Do you see a way to go back to negotiations and to stop North Korea from conducting further tests, or will North Korea test again in reaction to the U.N. sanctions?

I think North Korea should be more realistic. Considering the economic and political difficulty they are facing, they should have taken a wiser path.

Is there hope that you can deal with a regime like North Korea's?

The Security Council resolution is primarily [focused] on taking sanctions against North Korea, [but] in the resolution there is a paragraph leaving the door open for North Korea to come to the dialogue table. We need a two-pronged approach. While we take a very strong and stern message and deliver it to North Korea, at the same time we need to leave some room for negotiations so as not to escalate the situation.

Do you worry that North Korea may feel so isolated that they'll pursue a closer alliance with Iran and Pakistan?

There is a concern about the proliferation of materials relating to weapons of mass destruction and nuclear materials and missiles. . . . There were some dealings and cooperation between A.Q. Khan of Pakistan and North Korea. It's my understanding that at this time they don't have such close cooperation.

Do you regard the "sunshine policy" as a failure?

I don't think it's a total failure. The philosophy and objective of engagement is a good one. If we have to blame someone, it's North Korea. We have been trying to help North Korea in humanitarian matters and exchanges and cooperation. . . . But the testing of nuclear weapons was a total display of disrespect to our goodwill.

Hard-liners argue that the North Korean regime has never changed its behavior.

You should sympathize and appreciate how difficult it is for the South Korean government and people to deal with the North. Peace and prosperity come when we have a good and solid relationship with the North. When there is a crisis like this, the South Korean people are affected in a very negative way.

What do you want to accomplish as secretary general?

Development is the key issue. Without the eradication of poverty, you will always see conflicts.

What do you plan to do about U.N. reform?

U.N. reform is my top priority. The United Nations should be reborn to be able to address all the challenges more objectively and efficiently. It's frustrating that people talk about the irrelevance of the United Nations. . . . We should change the culture by making the secretariat more professional, more accountable, more transparent, with a higher level of ethics.

So no more oil-for-food scandals?

That's right. I'll try to lead by example.

U.N. Reforms, Nuke Programs Top Annan Successor's Agenda (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The South Korean diplomat set to become the next United Nations chief brings insight — and possibly baggage — to one of its most pressing problems: the North Korean crisis.

Last week, the 192-member United Nations chose Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's foreign minister, to succeed Kofi Annan as its secretary-general.

Since 2004, Ban, 62, has steered the South Korean team taking part in six-nation talks with North Korea. Those discussions, aimed at halting North Korea's nuclear program, also involve the United States, China, Russia and Japan. The talks have stalled since North Korea walked away from the negotiating table in November.

DOJ_NMG_0080768

Before the talks collapsed, Ban worked on a proposal to give North Korea civilian nuclear reactors and security assurances in return for halting its weapons program. North Korea initially agreed, then balked when the Bush administration said it must disarm first.

Ban's selection as U.N. chief poses a potential problem: The Pyongyang regime might refuse to deal with him, says David Straub, a former State Department official who dealt with Korean issues.

"To have a South Korean as head of the United Nations is a terrific embarrassment for the North Koreans," Straub says. "On the other hand, being so knowledgeable about the issue, he could play a very useful role."

The two Koreas, separated by the world's most heavily armed border, remain bitter rivals 53 years after their war ended in a truce rather than a peace treaty. About 28,000 U.S. troops are in South Korea.

Attempts to reach Ban were unsuccessful. In an interview Sunday on ABC, he said he was confident sanctions against North Korea would be enforced, despite expressions of reluctance by China and Russia. At the same time, he urged other countries to talk to the isolated regime headed by North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

Kim "is in control of all of North Korean society," Ban said on Good Morning America Weekend Edition. "The problem is that we have to talk to him."

Charles Kartman, a former U.S. negotiator in talks with North Korea, says Ban believes the South Korean government has been too conciliatory toward North Korea.

Ban has also been unhappy with Bush administration policy, which rejects one-on-one talks with North Korea. Two years ago, standing next to then-secretary of State Colin Powell, Ban chided the United States for failing to offer enough to North Korea to convince it to halt its nuclear program. The United States "must come up with a more creative and realistic proposal," Ban said at a news conference in Seoul.

Ban won the U.N. job over candidates from Latvia, Jordan, Thailand, India, Afghanistan and Sri Lanka. A diplomat for four decades, he is the second Asian to hold the job — Burma's U Thant served from 1961-71.

Any of the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council — the United States, Russia, France, China and Britain — could have killed Ban's candidacy.

Respected for his negotiating skills, Ban drew no opposition because he "is a very non-threatening character," says Edward Luck, a U.N. expert at Columbia University.

Ban will need both finesse and steel to perform three big jobs as secretary-general, Luck says:

•Public spokesman for the concerns of the world.

•Manager of an unwieldy and abuse-ridden U.N. bureaucracy.

•Mediator on difficult issues including rolling back the nuclear programs of North Korea and Iran.

Luck says Ban may have greater success than Annan in trimming the U.N. secretariat's 10,000-person payroll and establishing ethical standards.

Management reform has been a key issue for the United States, which contributes 22% of the organization's $3.8 billion annual budget. Reform efforts have been resisted by many developing nations among the U.N. members.

U.S. Uses Korea Sanctions To Warn Iran (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 16, 2006

The United States on Sunday used new U.N. sanctions against North Korea to warn Iran, another country with nuclear ambitions.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said Iran should pay attention to Saturday's U.N. resolution against North Korea for its claimed nuclear test last week.

"I hope the lesson they learn is that if they continue to pursue nuclear weapons, they will face the same kind of isolation and restrictions that we have just imposed on the North Koreans," Bolton told CNN's "Late Edition."

DOJ_NMG_0080769

Repeated attempts by the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members and Germany to entice Iran into negotiations on its nuclear program foundered earlier this month over Tehran's refusal to give up uranium enrichment, which can be used to develop nuclear weapons.

The six powers have agreed to start working on U.N. sanctions against Iran next week, officials have said, but they still have to bridge differences on how harsh the penalties should be.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday that, just as with North Korea, efforts against Iran are "a multilateral effort, not just a U.S. effort, and that is extremely important because the United States doesn't need to do this alone and can't do it alone."

Rice told "Fox News Sunday" that "the United States is much better off working with its allies than trying to do this bilaterally and being isolated itself."

Bolton said the Iranians "could enjoy a completely different relationship with the United States if they would suspend their uranium enrichment activities."

Iran, he said, "seemed to be obsessed with the idea of getting nuclear weapons. And as long as they pursue that course, we will have to respond accordingly."

Saturday's U.N. resolution against North Korea demands that Pyongyang abandon its nuclear weapons program and orders all countries to prevent the reclusive nation from importing or exporting any material for weapons of mass destruction or ballistic missiles.

Iran on Saturday called threats of sanctions "psychological warfare" and said it would not be intimidated.

Iran contends its nuclear program is for generating electricity; the U.S. and some of its allies allege Tehran is trying to develop atomic weapons.

In Jerusalem, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told Israeli Cabinet ministers Sunday that Iran remained the greatest threat to Israel and he was concerned about the precedent set by the nuclear test conducted last week by North Korea.

"Whoever takes the Korean matter lightly will soon find a nuclear weapon in Iran and ultimately a nuclear weapon in al-Qaida," he said, according to an official who attended the meeting and spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to discuss the matter on the record.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., told Fox that U.S. failures in Iraq have "diminished our hand and reduced our ability to be able to deal with Iran and North Korea."

Kerry said the Bush administration "has lost credibility in the world. And that's why Iran is emboldened, and that's why North Korea is emboldened."

U.S. Pursues Tactic Of Financial Isolation (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 15 — As debate swirls about whether new international sanctions against North Korea will be effective, the Bush administration appears to have made some headway in using new American legal tools to cut off both North Korea and Iran from the international financial system.

The American campaign to use its own financial regulations to put pressure on North Korea and Iran has been a mix of implicit threats backed by explicit action, American officials and banking experts say.

Over the last year, American officials have met with many private banks overseas to warn them of the risk of doing business with certain Iranian and North Korean trading companies and businesses that the United States says have been tied to terrorist groups or to the spread of nuclear materials.

One of the main unspoken messages of the visits, experts say, is that the United States government may eventually bar American banks from working with financial institutions doing business with groups tied to terrorism.

This campaign of pressure has been backed up by specific actions. The most notable was when the United States last month barred American banks from facilitating certain transactions, including the sale of oil, for a leading Iranian bank with reputed ties to terrorist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0080770

As a result of the American campaign, banking officials and experts say that some foreign banks are cutting ties with North Korea and Iran.

But while achieving some unilateral success in economically punishing North Korea and Iran for their nuclear ambitions, some experts say the moves against Iran, at least, could damage American economic interests if that country switched to currencies other than the dollar for its large oil trades.

The United States had turned to unilateral action in part out of frustration that its efforts to mobilize international sanctions had run into trouble. That frustration might remain if the United Nations sanctions against North Korea, passed Saturday, prove not to be as effective as the United States hopes.

Most experts acknowledge that a globally cooperative effort would be much more effective than the American unilateral efforts, but that the United States can inflict some pain with the creative use of the reach of its own laws and pressure.

The ban on American transactions with the Iranian bank, Bank Saderat, means that it will no longer be able to obtain American dollars for its dealings with any other bank in the world. Bank Saderat is one of Iran's half-dozen largest banks.

The technical term for the banned activity is a "U-turn transaction." Such a transaction permits, for example, Iran to sell oil to a German customer, who in turn directs a European bank to deposit dollars obtained from an American bank into an Iranian bank account located in Europe. The phrase "U-turn" applies because the funds are transferred to a United States bank and instantly turned back as dollars to a European bank.

Many American banking officials predict that, in coming months, the United States will ban American bank involvement in transactions involving the other leading banks in Iran. That is because there is a widespread assumption among bankers that all of Iran's state-owned banks engage in the same activities as Bank Saderat. The likely result is that Iran will have difficulty selling its oil for dollars, the international medium of exchange for all oil sales.

"This is a pretty dramatic uptick of pressure from the United States," said Judith A. Lee, a law partner specializing in economic sanctions at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Washington. "It is going to create significant difficulties for European banks and European countries."

American officials decline to say whether the move against Bank Saderat would apply to other Iranian banks.

Stuart Levey, under secretary of the Treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence, said recently that in the last two years the United States had "learned a number of lessons about how best to use financial tools to apply financial pressure" on countries like Iran and North Korea.

In the last year, Mr. Levey has traveled to several countries in Europe to exert pressure on Iran and to Singapore, China, Macao, Hong Kong, Vietnam and South Korea to press banks to break their ties with North Korea.

The message was reinforced a year ago when the United States barred financial transactions with a bank in Macao, Banco Delta Asia, which officials said was involved in North Korean nuclear dealings, money laundering and counterfeiting.

Last month, citing news media reports, Mr. Levey said that at least two dozen financial institutions overseas had curtailed or suspended business with North Korea.

China, for instance, froze the accounts of North Korea in a Macao branch of the Bank of China and also cracked down on the circulation of counterfeit American dollars in China near the North Korean border.

The administration hopes that could set a pattern for the future, American officials said. "We have no reason to believe that China will not continue to protect their financial system from abuse," a Treasury official said Sunday.

As for Iran, several European banks, including Credit Suisse and UBS in Switzerland, HSBC in Britain and ABN Amro in the Netherlands, have announced curbs on dealings with Iranian banks and businesses.

"We are seeing a whole series of banks not doing business with Iran, restricting the flow of funds into Iran significantly," said Edward Morse, chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers.

Last month, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. suggested at an international meeting in Singapore that banks around the world should stop doing business with more than 30 Iranian companies and government enterprises that American intelligence had linked to various illicit activities.

DOJ_NMG_0080771

Evidence that American moves against Iran might be having an effect came at the same meeting, when Ebrahim Sheibany, the Iranian central bank governor, told a local paper at an international financial meeting that Iran would have "no choice" but to shift its sale of oil away from the dollar and to the euro or Asian currencies.

Whether that shift away from dollars could have the unintended effect of hurting the United States is a matter of debate. Some experts say there is a danger that if Iran does shift currencies, it could weaken the standing of the dollar as a reserve currency, forcing the United States to raise interest rates to attract dollar purchasers.

"This is a step where the end result could clearly weaken the dollar," said John G. Heimann, an investment banker and former comptroller of the currency in the Carter administration. "What has to be considered is whether or not we are shooting ourselves in the foot."

Ordinary Chinese Angry Over N. Korean Claim Of Nuke Test (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, October 16, 2006

BEIJING — By claiming to test a nuclear device, North Korea has set off a wave of anger among ordinary Chinese, who appear split about whether blame lies with North Korea or the United States.

In the streets and online, Chinese responded to last week's announcement out of Pyongyang with fear.

Many said a nuclear-armed North Korea meant less security for China and East Asia. They called into question China's historic role as North Korea's ally and patron. Others suggested North Korea is right to arm itself in response to U.S. and Japanese threats against it.

Pyongyang's nuclear bombshell left Zhai Huixia, 24, "shocked and furious." The Beijing graduate school student said North Korea's move "seems very selfish, intruding on Chinese interests, and aggravating turbulence in the region."

For Korean War veteran Zhang Zeshi, North Korea's claim was a bitter betrayal by an "evil" regime. "We have given them so much food, fuel and support, but they don't listen to us," he said.

Zhang, 77, was among more than a million Chinese soldiers sent by Mao Zedong to fight with North Korea in the 1950-53 Korean War. He spent two years in a South Korean POW camp. He was imprisoned again when he returned home, disgraced along with other former POWs for failing to die in battle against American "aggressors."

"We spilled our blood in vain," Zhang said. "It kept alive (North Korea's) feudal dictatorship."

Other Chinese saw North Korea's decision to go nuclear as a response to pressure by the United States, which has tried to isolate the regime headed by Kim Jong Il.

"Maybe the North Korean government would already have collapsed if the U.S. adopted an enlightened policy towards it," said Wang Miao, 25, an electrical engineer in the eastern city of Nanjing. He blamed America's "high-pressure … Cold War strategy" for forcing Pyongyang's hand.

On Saturday, Beijing joined other United Nations Security Council members in approving sanctions against North Korea. Afterward, though, Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said China would not help conduct inspections of ships leaving and entering North Korean ports.

China is North Korea's biggest trading partner and supplier of food and energy. It could see a flood of Korean refugees to northeast China if the secretive regime in Pyongyang collapses.

In China's swelling cyberspace, North Korea has provoked debate. On the forum at beelinkclub.com, based in eastern Shandong province, moderator Xiaocao Qiqiang called the United States and Japan warmongers. He argued that a nuclear North Korea would guarantee peace by forcing the United States and Japan to ease up.

There was no way to verify the identity of the bloggers on beelinkclub.com or other sites where North Korea dominated conversation. But such sentiment was consistent with other postings and online discussions in Chinese chat rooms monitored by Yawei Liu, a China specialist at Georgia Perimeter College.

Liu said much of the debate is colored by a "strong anti-American sentiment among many of the most informed Chinese citizens." Liu said many of those commenting "are sympathetic to North Koreans and see a vast U.S. conspiracy to undermine China."

DOJ_NMG_0080772

In another online debate, one blogger, identified as Wang Jinggu, saw Pyongyang as the villain. North Korea is too much of a liability for China and too backward to be worth the trouble, Wang wrote, adding that its people are not even allowed to use mobile phones.

The outpouring of anger — against both North Korea and the United States — is no accident, said Shen Dingli, a foreign policy specialist at Shanghai's Fudan University. The Chinese government "has the ability to censor opinion, but it has intentionally allowed public debate to let the both the U.S. and North Korea know we are unhappy," Shen said. "When the criticism is against Chinese foreign policy, the freedom will be less."

A majority of Chinese believe "we should abandon" North Korea, though their view is unlikely to sway decision-makers in Beijing, Shen said. North Korea "may no longer be our friend," he said. But its strategic value to China as a counterweight to U.S. and Japanese interests means "we must never build it into our enemy."

An Offer Kim Can't Refuse (WP)

By Aaron L. Friedberg

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Though the hour is late and the odds long, there is still a chance that North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il can be persuaded to give up his nuclear arsenal.

Despite what many have suggested, this cannot be achieved simply through face-to-face negotiations or by offering security guarantees and economic aid. Kim is a cynical realist and will not exchange his nuclear capabilities for empty acts of diplomatic deference or what he would doubtless regard as mere scraps of paper. The hope that he might be tempted to ease the suffering of his people is also sadly misplaced. Kim has been described by psychological profilers as a "malignant narcissist"; he cares only for himself and is indifferent to the pain of others.

Whatever his quirks, Kim is also a cunning and rational strategist with one overriding objective: ensuring his own survival by maintaining an absolute grip on power. The only way to move him is by confronting him with a stark choice -- turn over existing nuclear weapons, dismantle production facilities and submit to rigorous international inspections, or face a steadily rising risk of overthrow and untimely death. This demand can be sweetened with promises of aid and peace pacts, but in the end Kim needs to be presented with an offer he cannot refuse.

North Korea is an impoverished nation with virtually no legitimate exports. Most of its citizens scratch out a meager subsistence. Yet Kim and those around him enjoy a life of comfort, driving powerful foreign cars, drinking expensive imported whiskey, watching bootlegged DVDs and treating their ailments with the best Western medicines.

The hard currency needed to pay for these luxuries, as well as imports essential to the North's programs for weapons of mass destruction, is generated through a variety of illicit activities: counterfeiting U.S. and other currencies, manufacturing and exporting narcotics and phony name-brand cigarettes, and selling weapons from small arms to ballistic missiles to any customer with cash.

Choking off the flow of dollars to Pyongyang would do more than cramp Kim's lavish lifestyle; it would threaten his grip on power. Like other crime bosses, Kim rewards his underlings and ensures their loyalty by letting them share the loot. Kim's extended family, the top echelons of the Communist Party, and the upper ranks of the military and security services all benefit from this arrangement.

For his part, Kim is able to sleep at night because he knows that those on whom his safety depends have a stake in his well-being. If times get tough and money grows tight, however, those people will begin to feel the pinch, the circle of beneficiaries in the spoils system will become smaller and Kim will steadily grow less secure. What Kim has to fear is not a popular uprising but a palace coup. The North's people are too beaten down and weak to stage a revolution, but Kim knows that a handful of disgruntled generals or disaffected party leaders could bring a sudden end to his brutal reign.

With the help of allies such as Japan and Australia, Washington has already taken steps to disrupt North Korean arms sales, counterfeiting and drug smuggling. Last year the United States also began to go after the network of financial institutions through which dollars flow back to Pyongyang. These initiatives need to be greatly intensified and coupled with other measures to constrict Kim's dollar lifeline.

DOJ_NMG_0080773

Recently announced U.N. sanctions are a step in the right direction, but they are not enough. China must take responsibility for preventing illicit activities on or through its territory, and both China and South Korea need to ensure that whatever assistance they provide the North's people cannot readily be converted to cash by Kim and his cronies.

Seoul and Beijing have thus far been reluctant to take such steps for fear that they might provoke Kim or cause the North to collapse. The time for hesitation has long since passed. Kim may test more nuclear devices and ballistic missiles, but he is not about to attack the South or make other moves that would bring crushing retaliation. As for the danger of regime collapse, the "Dear Leader" has even more reason to fear it than do his neighbors. It should be made clear to all, including Kim, that the objective of ratcheting up financial pressure is not to topple him but to squeeze him until he chooses to abandon his nuclear ambitions.

Getting China and South Korea on board will not be easy. Both may prefer feeble gestures and empty rhetoric to tough, united action. If Seoul and Beijing remain reluctant, however, they must be made to understand that they are endangering not only the security and stability of Northeast Asia but also their future relations with the United States. The weapons Kim is perfecting could one day lay waste to an American or Asian city. Passivity in the face of this threat will lead to sharp questions from Congress and the public about the continuing value of the U.S. alliance with South Korea, to say nothing of China's supposed status as a "responsible stakeholder" in the international system.

Absent sufficient cooperation, Washington will have to weigh other risky measures. Among these are a stop-and-search blockade of North Korea's ports, secondary sanctions against companies that continue to trade with it, and aggressive criminal proceedings that could entangle individuals and institutions in other countries, including China, with unforeseeable but potentially far-reaching diplomatic and economic consequences.

The writer is a professor at Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School and a former deputy assistant for national security affairs to Vice President Cheney.

Olmert: Palestinians Holding Up Summit (AP)

By Mark Lavie, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 16, 2006

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Sunday said a planned summit with Mahmoud Abbas has been put on hold because of the Palestinian president's insistence that Israel release large numbers of Palestinian prisoners — the latest setback for U.S.-led efforts to restart peace talks.

Abbas has denied demanding a prisoner release as a condition for a summit. Israel insists that before it frees any of the estimated 8,000 Palestinians it is holding, a soldier captured in June by Hamas-linked militants in a cross-border raid must be returned.

Olmert announced late last month that he soon hoped to hold a meeting with Abbas, but the preparations bogged down over the prisoners. The two have met only once since Olmert took office in March, an informal chat in Jordan.

"We offered to meet with Abu Mazen, but apparently he is not interested," Olmert was quoted as telling a Sunday meeting of lawmakers from his Kadima party. Abbas is also known as Abu Mazen.

"He is conditioning a meeting on the release of prisoners and we will not release any prisoners until (captured soldier) Gilad Shalit is released."

An official who attended the meeting spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter with reporters.

Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian lawmaker who is close to Abbas, said preparations remain on track. "The efforts to schedule a meeting are still ongoing, and both sides are determined to ensure a successful meeting," he said.

Still, the disagreements over prisoners and a summit are not the main impediments to diplomatic progress.

Internal Palestinian and Israeli political turmoil and control of the Palestinian government by the extremist Islamic group Hamas are larger obstacles in the way of U.S. efforts toward peace talks, which have been stalled for six years.

Hamas won Palestinian parliamentary elections in January. Israel has boycotted the militant group, which is committed to the destruction of the Jewish state, but considers Abbas an acceptable negotiating alternative.

DOJ_NMG_0080774

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in the region this month to try to prop up Abbas, leader of the moderate Fatah Party that was ousted by Hamas in the January elections. Abbas was elected separately a year earlier and remains in office, but his power and influence have been severely curtailed.

Olmert also rejected Sunday the possibility of talks with Syrian President Bashar Assad, saying Assad was responsible for harboring terrorists and was attempting to destabilize the entire region, according to the official who attended the meeting.

Israel has accused Syria of providing weapons to Hezbollah guerrillas before and during the recent war in Lebanon. Olmert said that since an Aug. 14 cease-fire went into effect, Syria has continued to meddle in Lebanese affairs and tried to undermine the country's pro-Western leader.

Assad told the German magazine Der Spiegel last month "we want to make peace — peace with Israel." In an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp. broadcast last week, Assad said it remained to be seen whether Israel had the will to make peace.

Israel has been carrying out a widespread offensive in Gaza since Cpl. Gilad Shalit was captured. Israeli forces have killed 21 Palestinians in fighting since Thursday. Most of the dead were militants, but two minors, ages 10 and 14, and a 29-year-old woman also were killed.

Israel says the latest raid is aimed at targeting the repeated fire of homemade rockets from the northern Gaza Strip. "We cannot allow ourselves to accept this pace of rocket fire," Olmert said in Sunday's Cabinet meeting. Several rockets have landed in southern Israel; no serious injuries have been reported.

During the Cabinet meeting, senior military officials said they believe Hamas has smuggled anti-aircraft weapons into Gaza for the first time, participants said. If true, this could pose a serious challenge to Israel, which relies heavily on its air force to attack militants in Gaza.

Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisen said the weapons are coming from Iran and "other countries that sell them." She was concerned that Palestinian militants are learning "how to use the new weapons, and especially how the Palestinians can fight against Israel the way that Hezbollah fought in Lebanon."

Abbas has been trying to pressure Hamas to moderate its views, but efforts to form a national unity government — which could lead to new peace talks — have stalled. The militants have demanded the release of hundreds of Palestinians jailed by Israel.

Nevertheless, Olmert said he hoped a summit would lead to broader peace talks. Negotiations have been frozen for years, with both sides refusing to carry out their initial obligations under the internationally backed "road map" peace plan.

During Rice's visit early this month, Olmert reportedly promised to "create a better environment" and return to peacemaking.

Associated Press Writer Aron Heller contributed to this report.

Rape Charge Advised Vs. Israel President (AP)

By Josef Federman, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 16, 2006

Police recommended Sunday that Israeli President Moshe Katsav be charged with rape, sexual assault and fraud, the most serious charges ever to face an Israeli leader.

The recommendation came at a meeting between police investigators and Attorney General Meni Mazuz. The final decision on whether to put the president on trial is up to Mazuz.

He does not have a deadline for making his decision and is expected to take several weeks to study the evidence.

Katsav has denied all wrongdoing. In a statement released by his office, his lawyer, Zion Amir, said police are not authorized to bring charges, noting that in the past, when police have recommended putting senior officials on trial, the attorney general has dismissed most of the cases.

Katsav asserted in a recent Israel radio interview that the complaints against him were staged by political enemies.

DOJ_NMG_0080775

A police statement issued Sunday said the complaints were filed by "women who worked under his (Katsav's) authority." It said there was evidence he committed crimes of "rape, aggravated sexual assault, indecent acts without permission and offenses under the law to prevent sexual harassment."

The statement also said police found basis for charges of illegal wiretapping, and fraud and malfeasance in office in the case of pardons granted by the president.

Investigations into allegations of disrupting a police investigation and harassing a witness were still in progress, police said.

The investigation began earlier this year after a former employee alleged Katsav forced her to have sex under the threat of dismissal. Police repeatedly questioned Katsav at his official residence and seized personal documents.

Israel Radio and Channel 2 TV have said the case against Katsav is based on complaints by five women who allege he made unwanted sexual advances toward them during his tenure as president and before that, as a government minister.

Complaints by five other women are not being pursued because the statute of limitations has run out, the reports said.

If indicted, Katsav would likely have to step aside. In Israel, the president holds a largely ceremonial role with little authority, but is considered a unifying force in a fractured society.

Israeli Police Recommend Charges Against President (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 15 — The Israeli police recommended on Sunday that President Moshe Katsav face charges of rape and sexual assault allegedly committed against several women in his office. Israel's attorney general must now decide whether to file such charges.

Mr. Katsav, who has held the mostly ceremonial post since 2000, has denied any wrongdoing. He has said that at least one of his accusers was trying to extort money and that his political enemies were behind the investigation.

After an inquiry that lasted nearly two months, the police on Sunday handed their findings to the attorney general, Menachem Mazuz. He will review the material and decide whether charges are warranted. It could be weeks before he announces a decision.

A joint statement by the police and the Justice Ministry said there was evidence that the president committed "rape, aggravated sexual assault, indecent acts without permission and offenses under the law to prevent sexual harassment."

According to the police, the inquiry also found evidence that the president had committed fraud and was engaged in illegal wiretapping.

"As far as we're concerned, we've completed the investigation," said Micky Rosenfeld, a police spokesman. "There is hard evidence and hard facts in this case."

Mr. Katsav's lawyer, Zion Amir, said in a statement that Israel's attorney general had in the past dismissed police findings as insufficient and had chosen not to file charges after investigations of senior officials.

Mr. Katsav has been facing calls for his resignation, and Sunday's statement by the police was sure to intensify those demands. Israel's Parliament opens its winter session on Monday, an event Mr. Katsav normally attends. Mr. Katsav's brother, Lior Katsav, told Israeli radio that the president planned to attend but would not address the legislators.

Several female lawmakers have threatened to walk out of the session if Mr. Katsav is present.

"The president must resign," Education Minister Yuli Tamir told Israeli television. "If he doesn't do so, I believe a process will be launched to force him to resign."

Mr. Katsav is immune from standing trial while in office. However, if he resigns or is impeached by Parliament, he would have to face any charges against him, according to legal scholars. Mr. Katsav's seven-year term ends next year.

Although the case has received widespread coverage in Israel, any charges against Mr. Katsav are not likely to have broader political ramifications. Israel's president is expected to serve as a unifying force and set a moral tone, but his position is more symbolic than substantive.

DOJ_NMG_0080776

Still, the controversy surrounding Mr. Katsav comes at a time when the Israeli public has expressed widespread disappointment in the country's leadership. Many Israelis say that the government and the military mismanaged the recent war with Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, a target for much of that criticism, has been under investigation regarding the sale of his Jerusalem home and the purchase of a new one. His critics say he received favored treatment, getting an above-market price for the home he sold and buying the new one at below its true value.

Several other politicians are under investigation or have been charged with wrongdoing, including the former justice minister, Haim Ramon, who quit in August and was subsequently charged with sexual harassment. Mr. Ramon is accused of forcibly kissing a female soldier, a charge he denies.

Mr. Katsav, 60, is married and has five children. He was born in Iran and came to Israel a few years after the country's independence in 1948. When he was 24, he was elected mayor of Kiryat Malachi, a poor town populated by immigrants in southern Israel. He was elected to Parliament in 1977 and served for many years with the right-wing Likud party.

In 2000, the elder statesman Shimon Peres was the heavy favorite to become the president, a position that is filled by a vote in Parliament. However, Mr. Katsav was the surprise winner.

As president, Mr. Katsav has been a low-key figure who frequently attends public ceremonies here and abroad, but has generally steered clear of the frequent controversies and political upheavals in Israel.

The allegations of sexual misconduct against Mr. Katsav first surfaced during the summer, and the formal investigation began in August. The police confiscated a computer and documents from the president's official residence on Aug. 21 and have since questioned him at length on several occasions.

Although his accusers have not been identified, police officials say they are five women who have worked in the president's office.

Israel's previous president, Ezer Weizman, resigned in 2000 amid scandal. During the 1980's, when he was a lawmaker and cabinet minister, he received hundreds of thousands of dollars from a French businessman with interests in Israel. No charges were filed against Mr. Weizman, who died in 2005.

African Union Force Ineffective, Complain Refugees In Darfur (WP/AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

KASSAB, Sudan, Oct. 15 -- Refugees living in camps scattered across this region of western Sudan say an African Union peacekeeping mission has done little to protect them, even as rising violence is driving away crucial humanitarian aid.

"You have been here for three years now, and what have you done for us?" a tribal leader bitterly asked a delegation of African Union soldiers and police that visited the Kassab refugee camp last week.

As they often must, the peacekeepers explained to camp delegates that they were in Darfur only to monitor the violence and had no mandate to fight it.

"You are witnessing what happens, but you aren't helping," said Attaieb Adem, one of the camp delegates.

The Sudanese army, backed by an Arab militia called the Janjaweed, and Darfur rebel groups began fighting in 2003. Since then, as many as 450,000 people have died in violence and from disease, and 2.5 million have been displaced.

The African Union mission came in 2004, but anger over its perceived ineffectiveness is strong.

"If there is nothing you can do, then you might as well go home, so that the United Nations" can come, said Adem, referring to the hope by many in Darfur that a U.N. Security Council resolution to send about 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers to the region will be implemented. The mandate of the African Union force expires at the end of the year.

Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, fiercely opposes the U.N. proposal, saying it would breach the country's sovereignty.

The refugees in Kassab say they do not see how their security could get any worse in their camp, on the front line of a murky war zone.

DOJ_NMG_0080777

The Janjaweed militia has been blamed for much of the bloodshed. But rebel violence and hostility to aid workers has escalated since May, when one rebel faction signed a shaky peace agreement with the government. Humanitarian groups and African Union police say they withdrew from Kassab in September mostly because of the rebel violence.

The camp's clinic closed, so refugees in need of treatment trudge to the nearest town. Women say taking that road, or even collecting firewood around the camp, exposes them to robbery and rape.

"Every day we risk being beaten, or even worse," said Kharidja Ibrahim, some of whose family members had gone wood-gathering that morning. "We're waiting. In a few hours, we'll hear what has happened to them."

Tribal leaders say armed men now plunder the camp at will.

"Four days ago, they came in broad daylight and stole 84 goats," said Abdallah Shariff. He said nights are even worse.

"We can't sleep. We go to bed with our shoes on," he said, in case they have to flee.

Egyptian Maj. Ahmed El Serafy, who commands African Union police in the sector of Darfur that includes Kassab, said improving security in Kassab is an urgent task for what few forces he has -- 82 police officers for an area of 13,000 square miles.

"I knew it was going to be bad, but I never thought it would be this bad," he said.

Serafy said that police would resume day patrols in Kassab next week and that he hoped this show of force would improve security. But the African Union's officers go unarmed, and he said some were afraid to return to the refugee camp.

Even though refugees are frustrated with the A.U. peacekeepers, camp leaders pleaded with the delegation last week to return soon, saying time is running out.

"For now, we're on our own," said Youssouf Aldoun. "He is all we have for protection" he said, pointing his palms toward the sky in a Muslim gesture that signifies God.

Arabs To The Rescue? (WP)

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

A chance to broaden the response in Darfur

FOR THE past three years, the United States and Europe have sent millions of dollars in aid to the Sudanese territory of Darfur. African countries, for their part, have come forward with some 7,000 peacekeepers. Americans, Europeans and Africans have all tried to bring about a political settlement between Sudan's government and Darfur's rebels. These various efforts have combined to slow the killing, though they have failed to halt it. But the Western and African efforts stand in stark contrast to the performance of Sudan's Arab neighbors, which have so far done next to nothing.

Recently the Arab League asserted that this might change. Its members offered to dispatch a force of Arab and Muslim troops as peacekeepers to Darfur, replacing or preferably reinforcing the underpowered African contingent whose mandate is set to expire soon. Under the terms of a Security Council resolution passed in August, the African force is supposed to be replaced by a 20,000-strong United Nations one. But Sudan's government has described a U.N. deployment as a "prelude to an invasion" of an Islamic country. However infuriating this claim, the fact is that the United Nations is not going to fight its way into Darfur. Depending on the details of its design, an Arab force could be an acceptable alternative.

The details matter because an Arab deployment would face credibility problems: It would be identified with Sudan's Arab-led government, which has equipped and supported Darfur's genocidal militia. Moreover, the ineffectiveness of the African Union force proves that peacekeeping in Darfur is no easy task: The Arabs would need to arrive with more troops and better equipment. But if Arab governments did deploy a robust force, they might succeed in quelling militia violence. That would solve the credibility problem.

It's hard to see how Sudan's government could resist an Arab and Muslim peacekeeping force by calling it a threat to Islam. Arab leaders have a good chance of deploying their proposed force if they press for it seriously. So the important question will be: Are the Arabs in fact serious?

Exit Polls Show Magnate Leading Ecuadoran Vote (WSJ)

By Jose DeCordoba

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080778

A banana magnate appears to have squeaked by a charismatic ally of Venezuela president Hugo Chavez to win a plurality of Ecuador's presidential votes, forcing a runoff election next month to determine Ecuador's eighth president in 10 years.

With about 48% of votes counted, billionaire Alvaro Noboa, 55 years old and the richest man in Ecuador, had 27% of the vote. He was leading Rafael Correa, 43, an admirer of Mr. Chavez, with 22% of the vote. Two exit polls said Mr. Noboa had between 29% to 27% of the vote, besting Mr. Correa, who had between 27% to 25% of the vote. The other 11 candidates split the remainder.

The results mark a setback for Mr. Chavez, who was hoping an outright win by his political ally would extend his influence in the Andean region. With a population of about 13 million people, Ecuador is among South America's poorest countries. It is also one of the most unstable. Its last three elected presidents have been forced from office.

But analysts said the results could give the pro-U.S., pro-markets Mr. Noboa, who has run twice before and lost races for the presidency, the edge to win the second round of the vote, scheduled for Nov 26. Michael Shifter, an analyst at the Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington, said a number of the losing candidates may throw their support to Mr. Noboa to stop Mr. Correa, a charismatic, articulate and telegenic campaigner.

At one point, polls showed Mr. Correa -- who has scared markets with talk of debt default -- was within striking distance of winning the election outright. Mr. Correa, who holds a doctorate in economics from the University of Illinois, opposes a free-trade pact with the U.S. He says that while he doesn't approve of using the dollar as Ecuador's currency, he would keep the present system in place since an economic crisis led the government to scrap Ecuador's currency for the U.S. unit in 2000.

During the campaign, Mr. Correa, whose name means "belt" in Spanish, would thrill crowds by cracking his belt in the air, as a symbol of the whipping he would give Ecuador's political class, which is seen as corrupt and inefficient by many Ecuadorians. Like Mr. Chavez, Mr. Correa promised to rewrite the constitution. He also vowed to disband congress, which he called a "sewer." And like Mr. Chavez, Mr. Correa likes to verbally abuse President George W. Bush.

"His positions and his language might have been too radical, even for a very angry electorate," said Mr. Shifter. "They didn't want a rupture with the U.S. or international financial institutions."

In the last week, Mr. Noboa -- fueled by flush funding and generous promises -- overtook Mr. Correa. At campaign events, Mr. Noboa, a Bible in hand, would ask God to help him save Ecuador's poor. Mr. Noboa promised to build cheap housing and create a million jobs, and unashamedly handed out cash, wheelchairs and medicine to potential voters. Mr. Noboa supports a free-trade agreement with the U.S.

"He's a quintessential populist," said Mr. Shifter.

Son of the late billionaire Luis Noboa, Mr. Noboa engaged in a bitter, nine-year legal battle with his father's second wife and his siblings before winning control of Fruit Shippers Ltd., the holding company for the family business, in 2002. Mr. Noboa today controls more than one hundred companies, including a bank and companies involved in real estate and shipping

Early Returns Point To A Presidential Runoff In Ecuador (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Oct. 15 — Ecuador's voters appeared to be split Sunday between Álvaro Noboa, a banana magnate who favors close ties to the United States, and Rafael Correa, a leftist who is an admirer of Venezuela's Hugo Chávez and who, like Mr. Chávez, is known for his anti-American rhetoric.

Based on early election returns, the two men are likely to face a runoff on Nov. 26.

As of 10:50 p.m. local time, with 59 percent of the votes counted, Mr. Noboa was leading with 26.8 percent of the vote to 22.4 percent for Mr. Correa.

To avoid a runoff, one of the candidates needs to win a majority or 40 percent of the vote plus a 10 percentage-point lead over the nearest opponent. There were 13 candidates in the race.

Mr. Noboa's strong showing came as something of a surprise. In the final days of the campaign, Mr. Noboa, 55, a Swiss-educated billionaire scion of an elite family in Guayaquil, said he would limit political ties to Venezuela and fiercely criticized Mr. Correa's positions. He has also said he is strongly in favor of negotiating a trade agreement with the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0080779

Mr. Correa angrily reacted on Sunday to the attacks from Mr. Noboa and said his campaign might have suffered from fraud in the electronic systems used to count votes.

"The irresponsible Noboa says I want to turn this country into a Cuba," he said. "This is not the case."

Mr. Noboa, who ran an unusual campaign combining right-wing ideology and populist promises, has made it to the second round of presidential elections twice before, losing each time. In this campaign, he appeared before audiences grasping a Bible and promising to build cheap housing, attract foreign investment and distribute computers.

In recent weeks, Mr. Correa, 43, had surged in the polls after railing against Ecuador's political establishment and criticizing American influence in the country.

Mr. Correa said he opposed negotiating a free trade treaty with the United States, jolted Wall Street banks by saying he would seek to renegotiate Ecuador's foreign debt and said he would end an arrangement allowing the United States military to use an air base in Manta, on the Pacific Coast, for drug surveillance flights.

"We can negotiate with the U.S. about a base in Manta, and if they let us put a military base in Miami, if there is no problem, we'll accept," Mr. Correa recently told reporters.

Mr. Correa cast himself as an anti-establishment candidate of a different stripe from other leftist populists in the region, who have largely had military or trade union backgrounds. An obscure university professor until briefly serving as economy minister last year, he dresses in well-tailored suits and speaks fluent English and French as well as some Quechua.

He obtained postgraduate degrees in economics from the University of Illinois and Catholic University of Leuven in Belgium.

But despite that background, Mr. Correa, like many of his countrymen, dislikes many of the reforms recommended a decade ago by international lending institutions, including those strongly influenced by the United States. Mr. Correa has taken inspiration from the nationalist policies of Mr. Chávez, supporting greater government control over Ecuador's oil industry and acknowledging warm ties to him.

Those types of nontraditional positions played well with some voters.

"He's going to end the Congress, which is a sewer," Cristina Navas, 37, said of Mr. Correa after voting today.

But others expressed fears. "Venezuela is a petroleum country; Ecuador is a country with petroleum," said Vicente Bustamante, 46, a lawyer. "Venezuela can subsist on its own outside any economic bloc; we are part of the international community."

Mr. Correa met with Mr. Chávez in Venezuela in August, spending the night at the home of Mr. Chávez's parents in Barinas, the provincial cattle-raising region where Mr. Chávez was raised. Still, Mr. Correa denied receiving Venezuelan financing and emphasized a desire to also forge close ties with other leaders in the region.

While his background differs from that of Mr. Chávez, a former army officer, and President Evo Morales of Bolivia, a supporter of energy nationalization who is Mr. Chávez's closest ally in the Andes, Mr. Correa embraced their explicit criticism of the United States. At one point he described President Bush as a "tremendously dimwitted president who has done great damage to his country and to the world."

The rising distaste here for Washington belies economic and social ties to the United States that may be closer than ever. Ecuador uses the United States dollar as its currency, a six-year-old stabilization effort even Mr. Correa said needed to remain in place. More than 1 million Ecuadoreans are estimated to have immigrated to the United States since the 1990's, forming large communities in such states as New York, Florida and Illinois. The money they send home has become a vital source of income here. The United States, meanwhile, relies on Ecuador as its third-largest supplier of oil in South America after Venezuela and Brazil.

The winner of a runoff next month would face a perennial challenge: completing his term. Ecuador, which allows its Congress to remove presidents with ease, has had 7 presidents in the last 10 years.

Much of the next government's fortunes will depend on the price of oil, which is subject to the vagaries of the global energy market. Each $1 decline in oil prices translates into a $200 million decline in national income in Ecuador and a fall of 0.5 percent of gross domestic product, according to Barclays Capital.

DOJ_NMG_0080780

Mr. Correa also showed signs of fatigue in recent days, potentially providing an opening for Mr. Noboa to adroitly appeal to voters in the likely runoff.

Adrián Bonilla, a noted analyst and director of the Latin American Faculty of Social Sciences here, where Mr. Correa once gave classes, said Mr. Correa was not as radical as some say. That may be why some prominent financiers and businessmen have backed him.

“Correa is clearly against the status quo, but that doesn’t make him a Marxist or a messianic leader like Chávez,” said Mr. Bonilla. “He’s not about to turn Ecuador into a client state of Venezuela.”

Mr. Chávez, for his part, has remained uncharacteristically restrained in commenting on the race, perhaps out of concern that he might weaken Mr. Correa’s chances. Opponents of leftist populist presidential candidates in both Peru and Mexico won elections this year after attacking their rivals’ perceived ties to Mr. Chávez.

Presidential Race In Ecuador Heads To Second Round (WP)

By Juan Forero, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Oct. 15 -- A banana magnate who portrays himself as a friend of the poor and a young economist close to Venezuela's mercurial leader, Hugo ChÃ¡vez, will face each other in a presidential election runoff on Nov. 26 after neither obtained enough votes to win in a first round Sunday in this chronically unstable country.

With 51 percent of the vote counted, Alvaro Noboa, 55, one of the wealthiest men in Latin America, had 27 percent of the vote to 22 percent for Rafael Correa, 43, a charismatic former finance minister who has sharply criticized the Bush administration.

The election in this tiny, mountainous country of 13 million has attracted widespread attention beyond its borders because of the rapid rise of Correa, an economist who promises to overturn Ecuador's old economic order and calls for a constitutional assembly that could dissolve the National Congress.

Calling himself a friend of ChÃ¡vez, who has become Washington's leading antagonist in Latin America, Correa says his government would shutter a U.S. military base in Ecuador, crack down on multinational companies and possibly declare a moratorium on payment of the country's $10 billion foreign debt. If he wins next month, he will join a growing list of left-leaning leaders elected in Latin America since 2002.

"He's prepared, and we need someone who knows how to run things," said Fanny Ceron, 38, a nurse, moments after casting her ballot for Correa. "We need someone who comes from the people. The others are just moneyed people. They want power. They have the money, but no ideas."

Correa would face a furious challenge from Noboa, who has spent $2.5 million on his campaign, far more than any other candidate, casting himself as a populist. This is Noboa's third try at the presidency. He lost in 1998 and 2002. At campaign rallies, Noboa gives away T-shirts, wheelchairs and even cash. He also pays for mobile medical clinics run by his wife, Anabella AzÃ-n, a physician who also has political aspirations.

His campaign ads have attacked Correa as a dangerous extremist who would align Ecuador with Venezuela and Fidel Castro's Cuba, bringing more instability to a country that has had seven presidents in 10 years.

"Correa is selling hope," said Blasco PeÃ±aherrera, a businessman and president of the Quito Chamber of Commerce, who does not support Correa. "I'm sure his opponents are going to sell panic."

Support for Noboa surged in the past three weeks. He was a distant fourth as recently as Sept. 20, according to the Cedatos-Gallup polling firm in Quito. But Noboa, who falls to his knees before supporters and invokes God, quickly gained and in recent days surpassed Leon Roldos, a former vice president who had led in the campaign but began a fast slide last month.

On Sunday evening as results began to come in, Noboa charged that Ecuador would become another Cuba under Correa. "Rafael Correa's posture is communist, dictatorial," he said on Ecuadoran television. He also denied that he employs child laborers on his banana farms -- an accusation first made in a 124-page Human Rights Watch report in 2002.

"I don't have child workers in my companies," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0080781

Noboa once made the Forbes 500 list of the world's richest people, and in the past he frequently boasted about his friendship with well-known American luminaries. A slick campaign has side-stepped questions about his businesses and has resonated with people such as Jorge Teran, 46, a technician who is fed up with a lack of progress in Ecuador. He said he likes Noboa's plans to increase the state oil company's production and his promise to build affordable housing and create jobs. Teran also said he feels Noboa may benefit from divine intervention.

"I think he brings up God so often that he must have sensibilities in his soul," Teran said.

Correa, though, has appealed to Ecuadorans who are tired of a chaotic and corruption-riddled political system. Three presidents have been toppled since 1997, the last one, Lucio GutiÃ©rrez, just last year after a bloc of Congress voted him out. Fistfights are not uncommon in Congress, nor is scandal.

And even though Ecuador is the continent's second-largest exporter of oil to the United States, after Venezuela, most of its people are poor and underemployed.

"He's not offering housing, a new health system or education -- he's offering renewal of the political system," said Adrian Bonilla, director of the Ecuador branch of the Latin American Faculty for Social Sciences, a continent-wide university system.

Bonilla argued that, despite Correa's super-heated oratory, he is far from being a knee-jerk radical who would upend Ecuador's economy. Instead, Bonilla said, Correa is influenced by Keynesian thought, which sees a central role for government in managing the economy, and by contemporary economists such as the American Nobel Prize winner Joseph E. Stiglitz, who argues that unchecked globalization harms poor countries.

Still, the rhetoric from Correa's campaign has often touched on the kinds of nationalistic themes espoused by ChÃ¡vez and other populist leaders in Latin America. Two key advisers slated to be named ministers in a Correa government, Augusto Tandazo and Alberto Acosta, told foreign reporters that Ecuador would be tough on transnational companies and multilateral lenders.

"Ecuador is not against foreign investors," said Tandazo, considered a hard-liner on oil issues. "But we want foreign investment that knows how to control its voracious appetite."

Opponents of Correa have cast him as a puppet of ChÃ¡vez, but Acosta said a Correa administration would follow its own path, neither tied to ChÃ¡vez nor following the free-market direction of another leftist leader, Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva.

"We are not copying Lula, ChÃ¡vez or Kirchner," he said, referring to Argentina's president, Nestor Kirchner. "Rafael Correa is Rafael Correa, with all his positive attributes and drawbacks. We are not waiting for a prescription from abroad."

Still, many Ecuadorans have had it with promises and politics. Vladimir PeÃ±a, 33, an accountant, said he would like wholesale change but sees most of the candidates as opportunistic populists. He invalidated his ballot.

"We've had lots of populists here," he said. "And what happens is they last six months, and that's it."

Opposites Qualify For Ecuador Runoff (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador — Banana billionaire Alvaro Noboa edged left-wing economist Rafael Correa in the presidential election's first round Sunday, setting up a runoff between two candidates who are bitter rivals and polar opposites, according to partial results.

With nearly two-thirds of the ballots counted, Noboa had 26.8% of the vote and Correa 22.4%, according to electoral authorities.

Noboa, whose family owns Ecuador's largest banana plantation, closed what many pollsters saw as a 5 or 6 percentage-point deficit to Correa in the campaign's final days.

A loser in two previous runs at the presidency, Noboa, 55, gave a preview of the campaign rhetoric leading up to the Nov. 26 runoff, describing Correa in a TV interview Sunday as a "spoiled child" who is "pro-terrorism, pro-communism and pro-Cuba."

DOJ_NMG_0080782

Correa, a 43-year-old economics professor with a doctorate from the University of Illinois, said if Noboa won, he would turn Ecuador into a private banana plantation. Correa added that his campaign's exit polls showed he won by 5 percentage points, and he called the early results "a fraud foretold by the oligarchy."

Correa had risen in polls from fifth place in July to first early this month. He ran an anti-establishment and anti-U.S. campaign in which he made no effort to conceal his friendship with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, Washington's most outspoken critic in the region.

But Noboa, whose net worth was estimated at more than $1 billion by Forbes magazine in 1997, spent lavishly on his campaign, and there were reports of widespread giveaways, including wheelchairs for the disabled and cash handouts to the poor. Correa also spent large sums in a campaign that many speculated was financed partly by Chavez.

Simon Pachano, a teacher at the Latin American School of Social Sciences in Quito, the capital, said the results reflected widening political polarization.

"Both Noboa and Correa ran anti-party, anti-system campaigns, and there is no middle ground between the two extremes. This sets up a dangerous scenario for Ecuador," Pachano said.

The ideological divide between the two front-runners is wide. Noboa, a proponent of open-market policies, promises housing and health subsidies and the creation of 3 million jobs.

Correa promises a reformist "citizen revolution" modeled in some aspects after the Chavez agenda.

He is a harsh critic of President Bush, opposes unregulated trade and supported the Ecuadorean government's seizure of Occidental Petroleum's Block 15 oil field in May. Occidental has taken the case to international arbitration, and Correa promises to ignore any order to compensate the oil company for the takeover.

Although some observers think Correa would become more moderate as president, others expect him to follow through on the "citizen revolution" he is proposing. He caused tremors on Wall Street by threatening to default on Ecuador's foreign debt, something the government has done three times since the early 1980s.

Nine million Ecuadoreans went to the polls Sunday to choose among 13 candidates vying to become the eighth president this unstable country will have seen in 11 years.

Three presidents have been forced from office since 1996. Since the nation's founding as a republic in 1830, presidents have served an average of 20 months.

Ecuadoreans have rewritten their constitution 19 times, and Correa has proposed a constitutional assembly to draft another and "reinvent Ecuador."

Interviews with voters Sunday indicated that they were torn between the desire to reform their dysfunctional government and a wish to maintain stability and economic well-being.

"We are tired of corrupt politicians who steal all the money they can and leave the country in poverty," said retired customs worker Leon Espinosa, a Correa supporter.

Garbage truck driver Walter Zambrano said he cast a vote for Noboa, saying the candidate's experience in business and in two previous presidential campaigns was a plus. "Correa may speak pretty words, but Noboa is more balanced and cares more for the underprivileged," he said.

Noboa's family-owned Corporacion Noboa operates Clementina, a 25,000-acre plantation 45 miles north of the coastal city of Guayaquil that is one of the world's largest banana producers and exporters. The company also owns auto manufacturing and shipping interests and a Coca-Cola bottling operation.

As much as Correa's proposed "radical transformation" of Ecuador's political system appealed to some voters, it also raised fears of months of chaos and political polarization. His opposition to open-market policies also worried the business community, which relies on the U.S. export market for nearly half of all foreign shipments.

School Aide Swept Up In Britain's Veil Debate (WP/AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080783

LONDON -- A government minister has joined an increasingly bitter debate about the rights of Muslim women to veil their faces, saying a teaching assistant should be fired for insisting on wearing one in school.

Phil Woolas, Britain's race and faith minister, was quoted by the Sunday Mirror newspaper as demanding that Aishah Azmi, a Muslim, be fired for refusing to remove her veil at work.

"She should be sacked. She has put herself in a position where she can't do her job," Woolas said.

Azmi has refused to remove her black veil, which leaves only her eyes visible, in front of male colleagues. She was suspended but has taken her case to a court that handles cases on employment law.

Azmi, who is 24 and has two children, has insisted that she is willing to remove her veil in class, as long as no adult males are present.

"She is denying the right of children to a full education by insisting that she wears the veil," Woolas said. "If she is saying that she won't work with men, she is taking away the right of men to work in school."

The debate on the veils began this month when Jack Straw, the former foreign secretary who now serves as leader of the House of Commons, said Muslim women visiting his office should remove them.

The opposition Conservatives also weighed in, with one of the party's top officials accusing Muslim leaders of encouraging a "voluntary apartheid" that could help spawn homegrown terrorism.

David Davis, a top Conservative Party official, supported Straw. "What Jack touched on was the fundamental issue of whether in Britain we are developing a divided society," Davis told the Sunday Telegraph newspaper. "Whether we are inadvertently encouraging a kind of voluntary apartheid."

Prime Minister Tony Blair praised Straw for raising the issue "in a measured and considered way," and he urged Britons to engage the topic without "becoming hysterical."

Salman Rushdie, whose book "The Satanic Verses" once led to death threats against him by Islamic clerics, said last week that Straw "was expressing an important opinion, which is that veils suck, which they do. I think the veil is a way of taking power away from women."

Nazir Ahmed, the House of Lords' first Muslim legislator, joined the fray by criticizing British politicians and the media for "demonizing" the country's Muslims.

On BBC radio, Ahmed, a moderate lawmaker of the governing Labor Party, said: "The problem is that the politicians and some people in the media have used this for demonization of entire communities."

Video Disputes China's Claim Shooting Was In Self-Defense (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 15 — A Romanian videotape that appears to show Chinese security forces shooting two Tibetan refugees in the Himalayas contradicts Beijing's claim that the refugees were shot when soldiers acted in self-defense.

China acknowledged on Thursday that soldiers killed one refugee and wounded another on Sept. 30. The official New China News Agency said the soldiers acted only after about 70 refugees seeking to enter Nepal illegally from China attacked border troops.

The long-range video shows a slow, single-file line of Tibetan refugees climbing over a snow-covered mountain pass followed by Chinese troops. A rifle shot is heard and the first climber in the pack falls to the ground, followed by the climber at the tail end of the group.

A separate shot shows a uniformed Chinese soldier firing a rifle. It then shows several soldiers examining the shooting victims and escorting some detainees back to a camp.

The video was first shown on Pro TV, a private Romanian network, and was posted on the Internet. It was taken by Sergui Matei, a Romanian cameraman on a climbing expedition on Cho Oyu, a peak near China's border with Nepal.

Tibetans often cross into Nepal, at least partly because their spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, visits there often. He lives in exile in India and is not permitted to visit China.

DOJ_NMG_0080784

The Sept. 30 incident was first reported by mountaineers in Nepal and was circulated by human rights groups, including the International Campaign for Tibet and Human Rights in China.

Witnesses quoted by human rights groups said that those who had been fired upon included monks, women and children and that the person who had been killed was a 25-year-old Tibetan Buddhist nun.

After the accusations, China's Foreign Ministry vowed to investigate. The New China News Agency subsequently issued a report that said the soldiers had fired in self-defense after soldiers had tried to persuade the group to return home. "The stowaways refused and attacked the soldiers," the agency said.

The video does not offer a comprehensive account. It was shot from a long distance — the narrator says the cameraman was more than half a mile away — and only a few faces are clearly identifiable.

But it does suggest that the shootings were not in direct response to an attack on soldiers. The refugees were spaced far apart on an arduous climb over a 19,000-foot-high pass, called Nanpa La, when the two victims fell.

The American ambassador in Beijing, Clark T. Randt Jr., went to the Foreign Ministry on Thursday to protest China's treatment of the refugees, an embassy representative said.

China Charges A Lawyer With Inciting Subversion (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 15 — The Chinese police have charged a prominent human rights lawyer with inciting subversion, part of a crackdown on people who have sought to use China's nascent legal system to limit the power of the state.

The lawyer, Gao Zhisheng, was taken into custody in mid-August and was formally arrested Sept. 21, but the police only recently made clear the nature of the charge, said his lawyer, Mo Shaoping.

If Mr. Gao ends up being indicted and tried on subversion charges, it could be one of the highest-profile prosecutions of an internationally recognized dissident in recent years.

China often uses the legal system to punish people it considers subversive. But in recent years it has mainly sought to prosecute them for violating ordinary criminal laws, like leaking state secrets, violating commercial codes, disrupting traffic or committing fraud.

Mr. Gao, 42, represented displaced homeowners, victims of official corruption and religious rights advocates, including members of the Falun Gong sect, which is banned in China.

He has become one of the most outspoken dissidents within China, writing frequent essays and polemics posted on the Internet that have sharply criticized the authorities and have predicted that the governing Communist Party will collapse because of corruption and abuse of power.

This year he helped organize sympathizers around the country to participate in a rolling hunger strike to protest abuses against members of Falun Gong and other acts of persecution.

His license to practice law was suspended late last year, and he lived under constant surveillance and effective house arrest until the police detained him during a family visit to Shandong Province.

Mr. Gao's wife, Geng He, has come under police pressure since his arrest and has told some longtime friends of Mr. Gao that neither she nor her husband requires legal representation, friends of the family said. Mr. Mo said that he had had no contact with Ms. Geng and that he had been retained by another relative of Mr. Gao.

Mr. Mo said the police had not allowed him to visit Mr. Gao because they said his case involved state secrets. In state secrets cases, the authorities can deny access to a lawyer until a formal indictment has been issued.

The state secrets exception to the visitation rule applies only if the suspect is formally charged with leaking state secrets, which Mr. Gao is not, Mr. Mo said.

"You cannot claim his case involves state secrets unless you charge him with leaking state secrets," he said. "I plan to protest their refusal to allow me to see him."

A spokesman for the Beijing Public Security Bureau did not respond to an inquiry about Mr. Gao's case.

Paulson's China Victory (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0080785

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

Everyone seems to agree that China's leverage will be crucial if the world is going to contain North Korea's nuclear threat. Which is one more reason to congratulate Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, who recently prevented a U.S.-China blowup by persuading Chuck Schumer and Lindsey Graham to drop a Senate vote on their 27.5% tariff bill against China.

But lest this protectionist threat return in another political guise, it's worth recounting why they're so very wrong to consider the trade deficit with China a threat to U.S. prosperity. As the Senators recently argued on these pages, their complaint is that China's "continued [currency] manipulation is a form of protectionism, and it throws the whole global trading system out of balance." The pair have now thrown their support behind a bill sponsored by Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley and ranking Democrat Max Baucus that would empower Treasury to determine whether China has a "misaligned currency."

The $200 billion trade deficit with China is itself a meaningless hobgoblin, mattering far less than the volume of trade. U.S. imports from China have more than doubled (up 155%) since 2000 to $243 billion. But U.S. exports have climbed even faster, tripling since 2000. Through the first half of 2006, the value of U.S. goods shipped to China was up by nearly 40% and on pace to reach nearly $60 billion. (See the nearby table.) So if China is adopting currency policies to repel U.S. goods, they aren't working too well.

This explosion of cross-border commerce has worked to the benefit of both nations. China has had a compounded rate of GDP growth of 10% for the past five years. A report by McKinsey consulting finds that if anywhere near these rates of GDP growth are sustained over the next decade, poverty rates in China -- a nation barely able to maintain subsistence living standards for centuries -- will fall by two-thirds.

What has America gained? A surge in low-priced, high quality consumer products. Apparel, footwear, consumer electronics, computer equipment, and so on -- all of which Americans have bought voluntarily. Arguably the biggest beneficiary of China's emergence on the world trading stage has been America's poor, who have new access to bargain-priced consumer goods. A 27.5% China tariff would be the most regressive tax imposed on low income Americans in decades.

The standard response from the China-bashers (just as the Japan-bashers argued two decades ago) is that America is "exporting" jobs overseas. But over the time period that trade with China has surged, so has the number of new jobs created here. Yes, some U.S. manufacturers have lost market share to lower-cost Chinese competitors, and in recent years U.S. apparel and light manufacturing firms have brought a series of anti-dumping complaints against the Chinese.

But it's a myth that U.S. manufacturing is disappearing. A recent Cato Institute report shows that U.S. manufacturing output is up 50% in the past 12 years along with our expanding trade with China. And the National Association of Manufacturers reports that August was the tenth consecutive month in which U.S. manufactured goods exports rose more than imports. Outsourcing to China has allowed many U.S. companies to remain competitive against foreign producers, and a large chunk of U.S.-China trade is in fact intra-company trade conducted by American firms.

So has China "cheated" in the trade arena by holding the yuan artificially low relative to the dollar? The yuan has been pegged at 7.92 against the dollar since the mid-1990s, and Beijing has begun to allow a modest fluctuation in the last year or so. But this is not a "manipulation" of its exchange rate so much as it is a contracting out of its monetary system to the U.S. Federal Reserve Board. That strategy has allowed China to remove the uncertainty of exchange-rate fluctuations from investment decisions and allowed China to grow rapidly while controlling inflation (so long as the Fed controls it too, which is a separate issue).

The Chinese have thus avoided the bane of most developing nations of inept monetary controls leading to price fluctuations and periods of hyper-inflation. China was one of the few Asian nations that didn't face a crippling currency devaluation during the monetary crisis of the late 1990s.

Nor is it clear that a yuan revaluation of even 10% to 30% would have any meaningful impact on the U.S. trade deficit. China imports some $100 billion a year of raw materials. A stronger yuan would lower the price of those inputs, and thus of production costs, which could largely offset the impact of the stronger currency on export prices. And even if the U.S. were to ban all imports from China, the main effect would be to import those goods and services from elsewhere instead, albeit at higher prices. The U.S. runs a $500 billion a year capital input surplus, and the trade deficit by definition offsets those beneficial inflows.

* * *

DOJ_NMG_0080786

The greatest Chinese danger to the U.S. economy isn't trade but is its undeveloped and politically controlled financial system. An estimated 10% to 25% of all China's bank loans are nonperforming. State ownership of the banks has fostered an unhealthy and destabilizing system of crony capitalism. U.S. policymakers should be urging Beijing to privatize its banking sector, capital markets and state owned enterprises. Rather than press for trade barriers that would raise prices here at home, it would also make more sense to pressure China to enforce U.S. copyrights and patents.

Back in 2001 when China was permitted to join the World Trade Organization, one non-negotiable condition was that China lower its punitive tariffs on imported goods -- which it has done. While China needs more reforms to sustain its growth, the U.S. hasn't helped its own policy credibility by such political stunts as Congress's opposition to the purchase of Unocal by a Chinese company. The U.S. wants and should expect Beijing's cooperation on nuclear proliferation and North Korea; it shouldn't waste its influence on such non-problems as expanding two-way trade.

ChÃ¡vez's U.N. Moment (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Why Do Latin Democrats Support Him?

It's election day for Hugo ChÃ¡vez -- not in Venezuela but at the United Nations General Assembly. Today a vote is due on his government's bid for a nonpermanent seat on the Security Council. ChÃ¡vez has spent most of this year campaigning for the job, traveling the world and promising tens of millions of dollars in aid to poor countries in Asia and Africa whose votes he's counting on. His ambition is a big one: to become the leader of global opposition to the United States, or, as he puts it, to "radically oppose the violent pressure that the empire exercises."

There's a fair chance he'll lose. Most vote counters at the United Nations think Venezuela will fall short of the 122 General Assembly votes it needs on the first ballot, as will its opponent for the seat, Guatemala. One of the two might win on subsequent ballots, but Latin American governments are already anticipating that a third candidate from the region -- such as Uruguay or the Dominican Republic -- will end up getting the job. If so it will be a wounding rebuff for ChÃ¡vez following his Bush-as-devil tirade before the assembly last month, and one that could hurt him in another vote, if it is free and fair: his bid for reelection as president in December. His opponent in that race has been hammering home the point that ChÃ¡vez is squandering the country's oil revenue on foolish foreign adventures.

A ChÃ¡vez defeat would save the Bush administration from embarrassment and spare the Security Council a nuisance factor. Still, there won't be much to celebrate. The fact that a clownish populist who has eagerly embraced the presidents of Iran, Belarus, Zimbabwe and Libya could even come close to getting two-thirds of the votes of the 192 U.N. members is testimony to how low U.S. prestige has sunk around the world. More specifically, it's a measure of how twisted U.S. relations with Latin America have become -- and also, how fragile the appeal of democratic values is in that region.

How twisted? Let's look at Chile, a country that has been convulsed by debate the past two months over whether to vote for or against ChÃ¡vez. Chile's democratic president, Michelle Bachelet, is a moderate leftist; her government has a free-trade agreement with the United States and just took delivery of new F-16s for its air force. Some in her party were sheltered during the Pinochet dictatorship by Venezuela's then-liberal democratic government. ChÃ¡vez has not only dismantled that democracy but has vociferously supported Bolivia's claim to a piece of Chile's coastline. Under a military pact he signed with Bolivia's leftist government, Venezuela is committed to building new military bases on Bolivia's border with Chile.

All this, and yet Bachelet was unable to decide on her government's vote by yesterday. Only strong opposition from the centrist Christian Democratic Party, a member of her coalition, prevented her from backing ChÃ¡vez. Why? A vote for Guatemala, she told Christian Democratic congressmen earlier this month, "would be a signal of little independence from the United States," which has been pressing hard for Guatemala's candidacy, according to an account of the meeting by the newspaper El Mercurio.

In other words, as Chile's president sees it, it's better to support a budding autocrat who promises to defend Iran's nuclear program on the Security Council, and may threaten her own country's security, than to be seen as close to Chile's largest trading partner and strategic arms supplier at a time when it is trying to use the Security Council to stop Iran (and North Korea) from acquiring nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0080787

This certainly says something about Chile, and neighbors Brazil and Argentina, which are also supporting ChÃ¡vez: that they value Venezuela's investment in their economies more than preventing nuclear proliferation (ChÃ¡vez is buying debt from Argentina and aircraft from Brazil); that solidarity with a neighbor matters more than solidarity with other democracies (probably the only votes for Venezuela in the free world will come from Latin America and the Caribbean); that their governments prefer a weaker United States to a chastened Hugo ChÃ¡vez.

But this affair also underlines the continuing fecklessness of the Bush administration's approach to Latin America. There is its overreliance on faithful but small allies in Central America and its inability to come to terms with the region's giant, Brazil. There is its heavy-handed lobbying, which prompted Guatemala's foreign minister to say that he wished Washington "would not promote our cause so much." Most disturbing, there is the inability to win support from a nominally close ally such as Chile, even against an autocratic demagogue. ChÃ¡vez may lose the U.N. vote, but in the contest for Latin America, the United States isn't winning.

Chávez's U.N. Gambit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

To understand why so many Americans dislike the U.N., consider that Venezuela, of all countries, stands a chance today of being elected by a vote of the General Assembly to one of the 10 non-permanent seats on the 15-member Security Council.

This is the same country whose megalomaniac ruler, Hugo Chávez, ranted against the U.S. last month to the laughter and applause of the assembled General Assembly grandees at Turtle Bay. His international initiatives this year have included warmer ties with North Korea and Iran, buying weapons from Russia and sowing revolution throughout Latin America.

Venezuela's competition for the Latin American two-year seat that opens next year is Guatemala, a democracy that has never had a seat on the Security Council and is active in peacekeeping in Haiti and Africa. Guatemala signaled its intention to seek this seat in 2002, only to watch as Mr. Chávez jumped in the race in 2005 to get a larger megaphone for his radical views. The Caracas strongman has since played his oil card around the world to buy support, and he has the backing of the world's club of dictators.

The world's democracies in North and Central America, Europe and Asia are lining up behind Guatemala. In Latin America, Colombia and Mexico are also backing Guatemala, while Argentina and Brazil are supporting Venezuela, perhaps out of misguided leftist solidarity. The left-of-center government in Chile is on the fence, no doubt alarmed by Mr. Chávez but also fearful of crossing him.

With a two-thirds majority required to declare a winner in a secret ballot, more than several rounds of voting are expected. If Mr. Chávez wins, we'll know that most U.N. members prefer anti-American posturing to a credible Security Council.

Orhan Pamuk's Nobel Prize (NYT)

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Orhan Pamuk, the Turkish novelist who has won this year's Nobel Prize in Literature, is not an overtly political writer. But like every serious artist, Mr. Pamuk lives in a world where the freedom to speak the truth has to be reasserted every day against political forces that would rather not hear it.

Mr. Pamuk's prize is richly deserved. It was awarded for a body of work, fiction and nonfiction, that is driven by the conscience of imagination as well as the conscience of memory. In books like "Snow," "My Name Is Red" and "Istanbul," he has made Turkey, past and present, a vital part of the modern reader's literary atlas. And in turn, it is Turkey that has given Mr. Pamuk his political edge.

Islamists and Turkish nationalists tend to think of Mr. Pamuk as a literary provocateur, especially for his brief but candid remarks about the Armenian genocide quoted in a Swiss magazine last year. But we think Mr. Pamuk was speaking the truth. For the sake of art and conscience, he has resisted any effort to quiet his literary voice.

Some of those efforts, like the offer to become a Turkish "state artist," which he declined, were flattering. Others, like the recent prosecution against him, since dropped, for anti-Turkish remarks, were not so flattering.

DOJ_NMG_0080788

Mr. Pamuk's Nobel will be a popular one, except, of course, among people who believe that artists should be allowed to work only under political or religious supervision. His prize is also a reminder of how often the Nobel has been given to a writer whose work exposes the tension between the state and the artist.

We read Mr. Pamuk's books as they should be read — for the imaginative and linguistic pleasure in them — seldom remembering that every artist's freedom to speak is our freedom, too. This prize helps us remember that.

DOJ_NMG_0080789

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, OCTOBER 16, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Lawyer Is Due For Sentencing In Terror Case (NYT) 3
Specter's Role In Passage Of Detainee Bill Disputed (WP)..... 4
The Treason Puzzle (WP)..... 6
Al-Qaeda General 'in The UK' (UKSUN) 6

Homeland Response:

U.S. Firing Plans For Great Lakes Raise Concerns (NYT) 6
Changing Of The Guard (WSJ/WW) 8

War News:

'Stay The Course' In Iraq? No Way, U.S. Panel Says (LAT)..... 8
2 GOP Senators Urge New Iraq Strategy (AP-Y)..... 10
Tennessee Democrat Ford Questions `Sanity' Of U.S. Iraq Policy (BLOOM)..... 11
5 Americans Killed In Iraq, Bringing Month's Toll To 53 (NYT) ... 12
Iraq Delays National Talks Amid Killings (AP-Y) 13
Government Fissures Widening (LAT) 14
Iraq Will Wait To Disarm Militias (USAT)..... 15
Militants Declare Creation Of State (WT/AP)..... 16
Call For Sunni State In Iraq (FT)..... 17
U.S. Helps Rebuild Iraqi Air Force (WT)..... 17
Gen. Peter Pace (CSM)..... 18
Loyal To Country Or Conscience? (LAT)..... 19
A Soldier Comes Home To Alaska, Too Early And Yet Too Late (NYT) 20
British General's Remarks Spur Iraq Debate (CSM)..... 22
No End In Sight (WT)..... 23
The Latest Chapters On The War (WP) 24
Afghan Attack Brings Total Of Canadians Killed To 42 (NYT) 26
Italian Journalist, Afghan Translator Abducted In Southern Province (WSJ/AP)..... 26

Corporate Scandals:

Health Insurer's Chief Is Ousted In Options Inquiry (NYT)..... 27
Health-Care Firm's Chief To Depart Over Stock Options (WP/AP)..... 29
UnitedHealth In Shake-Up Over Options (LAT)..... 29
Embattled CEO To Step Down At UnitedHealth (WSJ) 31
UnitedHealth's Next Challenge Is Uncertainty (WSJ)..... 33
Accounting Firms Ally To Take On The Big 4 (WP) 35
SEC To Ease Margin Rules In Cost-cut Move (FT)..... 35
US Rethink On Hedge Fund Rules (FT)..... 36

Criminal Law:

Feds Search For Causes Of Rise In Violent Crime (USAT)..... 37
Abramoff Associate Met Bush Officials 12 Times (FT)..... 37
Mehlman Denies Role In Ousting Of Official (FT) 38
Mob Trial To Start Today (SPT)..... 38
Mob Racketeering Trial To Start Monday (TAMPTRIB)..... 40
Protecting Children From Cyberspace Invaders (MH)..... 42
Rape Accusation Has Ruined Lives, Students Say (NYT)..... 43
For Violent And Lost Boys, Crime Stories Offer Hope (NYT)..... 44

Civil Rights:

Deaf Advocate Blasts Arrests (WP)..... 45
Home-Business Application Stirs Tensions In Manassas (WP) .. 46

Antitrust:

Consumer Advocates Criticize AT& T Deal (USAT)..... 48
Oshkosh Truck Agrees To JLG Industries Pact (WSJ) 48
VW Would Back MAN's Scania Bid With Restrictions (WSJ)..... 49

Environment:

U.S. Electricity Demand Is Outpacing New Resources, Report Warns (WSJ) 50
Consumers Less Power To The People (WSJ)..... 50
Lax Oversight By BP Is Cited In Texas Fire (WSJ) 55
Inquiry Is Critical Of BP In Refinery Fire (NYT/AP)..... 55
Mexican Bats Find Cross-Border Benefactors (WP) 55
Showcasing The Growth Of The Green Economy (WP)..... 57

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

3 Vice Lords Convicted Of Drug Trafficking On West Side (HM) 58
Oak Park Drug Bust Adds To Busy Summer For D.E.A. (KOVR)59
More Local Rising Cost To Cross Body Uncovered In Starr County Well Valley's Evolution A Hispanic Celebration Olympic Legend Returns To The Valley Two Evade Police By Crossing Border Local For Last Seven Days Today Sunday Saturday Friday Thursday Wednesda (MON) 59
Local Doc Cleared Of Malpractice (STT)..... 60
U.S. Military Pilot Sentenced In Ecstasy Case (AP)..... 60
Pilot Of Ecstasy Plane Sentenced To Federal Prison (MH)..... 61
Forest Pot Farms A Menace To Land (SDUT) 61
Pol Asked Fed Judge To Go Easy On Dealer (BOSH) 63
Colombian Rebel's Trial To Begin In D.C. (AP)..... 63

Immigration:

No Cause For Celebration (USAT) 64

Congress-Administration:

Bush's Press Secretary Is Raising Money, And Some Eyebrows (NYT) 65
Hastert's Team Mentality To Be Tested As Foley Scandal Unfolds (WP) 66
A Secret In The Line Of Succession (WP) 68
How A Blogger Put Himself In The Middle Of Mark Foley Story (WSJ) 69
Foley Loaded (WSJ) 70
Loss Of Personal Data At Federal Agencies Is Widespread (WP) 72
GSA Consolidation Aims For More Transparency, Efficiency In Acquisitions (WP) 72
Bush Niece 'Stands Up' To Poverty (WT) 73
Have Hearings, Will Spend (WSJ) 74

Other News:

OPEC Sets Emergency Meeting On Output Cuts (WSJ) 74
Consumer Unease With U.S. Health Care Grows (USAT) 75
To Predict Losers In A Power Shift, Follow The Money (WP) 77
Down To The Wire (USNEWS) 79
Free Fall? What Free Fall? (USNEWS) 80
Washington Whispers (USNEWS) 81
New Map Out West (USNEWS) 82
One-Letter Politics (NYT) 83
In Final Weeks, G.O.P. Focuses On Best Bets (NYT) 84
Faithful Rally To A Senator In Distress (LAT) 86
Minnesota Senate Candidates Clash On Iraq, Taxes (AP) 88
Sharp Exchanges In National Spotlight (MINNST) 88
Bush, Clinton To Host Rival Va. Fundraisers (WT) 90
Nelson, Ricketts Continue Attacks In Final Debate (LJS) 92
Ricketts Says Nelson Didn't Push Drought Relief (AP) 93
Mich. Senate Candidates Spar On Economy (AP-Y) 93
Senate Candidates Square Off In Debate (DETN) 94
How The Economy Can Define An Election (WSJ) 94
Women Look To Gain More Ground In Senate (USAT) 96
GOP Voters Have Extra Task (USAT/AP) 97
GOP Running Against A Stiff Northern Wind (LAT) 97
Hawaii Governor Leads From The Center (WT) 99
Clinton's Iowa Visit May Serve Wife's Aims (WP) 100
Woo GOP Voters, Clinton Urges Party (WT) 101
Inside Politics (WT) 102
'We Are A Nuclear Power' (NSWK) 103
The Fresh Face (TIME) 107
Kerry Says He Deserves 2nd Chance In '08 (AP-Y) 111
Running With Blinders (NYT) 111
The Center Fails (WP) 112
Why Don't Americans Like To Vote? Politics Are Only One Reason (WSJ) 113
A Tale Of Two GOPs (WSJ) 114
Iraq: A Growing Body Count (NSWK) 115
Great Candidates? That's Debatable (NYT) 116
Left, Right And Religion: A Double Standard (USAT) 116
Faith-Based Profits (NYT) 117
The New Finger On The Nuclear Button (USNEWS) 118
When Outlaws Get The Bomb (TIME) 118
U.S. Expects China To Lead On Sanctions (WT) 121
U.S. Seeks Asian Support On Squeezing Pyongyang (WSJ) ... 122
China Hedges On Enforcing N. Korea Penalties (USAT) 124
US Expects China To Act Against N Korea (FT) 124
U.S. Officials Call On China To Help Enforce U.N. Resolution On N. Korea (WP) 125
Questions Grow Over U.N. Curbs On North Korea (NYT) 126
U.S. Presses China To Influence N. Korea (AP-Y) 128
'North Korea Should Be More Realistic' (WP) 128
U.N. Reforms, Nuke Programs Top Annan Successor's Agenda (USAT) 129
U.S. Uses Korea Sanctions To Warn Iran (AP-Y) 130
U.S. Pursues Tactic Of Financial Isolation (NYT) 131
Ordinary Chinese Angry Over N. Korean Claim Of Nuke Test (USAT) 132
An Offer Kim Can't Refuse (WP) 133
Olmert: Palestinians Holding Up Summit (AP) 134
Rape Charge Advised Vs. Israel President (AP) 136
Israeli Police Recommend Charges Against President (NYT) .. 136
African Union Force Ineffective, Complain Refugees In Darfur (WP/AP) 137
Arabs To The Rescue? (WP) 138
Exit Polls Show Magnate Leading Ecuadoran Vote (WSJ) 138
Early Returns Point To A Presidential Runoff In Ecuador (NYT) 139
Presidential Race In Ecuador Heads To Second Round (WP) . 140
Opposites Qualify For Ecuador Runoff (LAT) 142
School Aide Swept Up In Britain's Veil Debate (WP/AP) 143
Video Disputes China's Claim Shooting Was In Self-Defense (NYT) 143
China Charges A Lawyer With Inciting Subversion (NYT) 144
Paulson's China Victory (WSJ) 144
ChÃ¡vez's U.N. Moment (WP) 145
Chávez's U.N. Gambit (WSJ) 146
Orhan Pamuk's Nobel Prize (NYT) 147

DOJ_NMG_0080791

TERRORISM NEWS:

Lawyer Is Due For Sentencing In Terror Case (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Lynne F. Stewart, the firebrand lawyer known for defending unsavory criminals, now faces the possibility of living out her life like many of them, in maximum-security lockdown in a federal prison.

Today, 20 months after she was convicted on terror charges, Ms. Stewart and two co-defendants who were convicted of conspiring with her will be sentenced in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Prosecutors, arguing that Ms. Stewart repeatedly flouted the law to aid the violent designs of an imprisoned terrorist client, have asked Judge John G. Koeltl to condemn her to 30 years in prison.

That would be a life sentence for Ms. Stewart, who turned 67 last week. Long an abrasive advocate of anti-government causes, these days she is not defiant. She is mournful about what she said were her failures as a lawyer.

Her dread of prison deepened unexpectedly, Ms. Stewart said, during the long period after a jury found her guilty on Feb. 10, 2005, of providing material aid to terrorism. She has recently recovered from breast cancer, but fears it will return in prison.

And if the judge comes down hard, she could be held in solitary confinement with limited visits, the same conditions as Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, the terrorist she was convicted of aiding.

All three defendants have had to wait for sentencing while Ms. Stewart was treated for cancer. She has finished radiation treatments, she said, and her doctors have declared that she is cancer-free. But she worries about the medical care in prison.

"I feel very threatened by it," Ms. Stewart said. "I know too much about the way they deal with you in prison."

Ms. Stewart's sentencing will culminate a case the Bush administration cites as a major counter-terrorism achievement. Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, who brought the indictment, devoted a full chapter to the case in his new memoir.

Ms. Stewart still denies that she acted to further any violent goals of the sheik, a blind Islamic cleric from Egypt who is serving a life sentence for a thwarted 1993 plot to bomb New York City landmarks. Whatever the sentence, her lawyers have said they will appeal the case.

But in documents they submitted to persuade Judge Koeltl to be lenient and give her no prison time, Ms. Stewart is newly remorseful about "ill-advised" moves on behalf of her client.

"I still believe it was justifiable — but perhaps not in the way that I did it," Ms. Stewart said in a sober interview in a borrowed room in the Manhattan offices where she used to practice law. She was speaking of her actions in June 2000 to violate strict prison rules, known as special administrative measures, by publicizing a message from the sheik to his militant followers in Egypt.

The government's call for a 30-year sentence jolted her, she said, into deeper self-criticism.

"Stewart's criminal conduct, which lasted more than two years, was both extremely dangerous and devious," two assistant United States attorneys, Andrew Dember and Robin Baker, wrote in their sentencing motion. Her actions, they said, "should be offensive to those actually zealously defending criminal defendants within the bounds of the law."

There was never any question during the eight-month trial that Ms. Stewart had broken the rules by releasing the sheik's statement, which said he no longer supported a cease-fire by his followers in Egypt. Another defendant, Ahmed Abdel Sattar, 47, a Staten Island postal worker, was convicted of negotiating with the militants by telephone to promote an end to the cease-fire.

The government wants a life sentence for Mr. Sattar. It is seeking 20 years for Mohamed Yousry, the Arabic translator who was convicted of helping Ms. Stewart smuggle Mr. Abdel Rahman's messages out of prison.

These days, Ms. Stewart says, what stings is that she agrees with some of prosecutors' claims about her faulty legal work.

In her trial testimony, she said she believed that she could stretch the prison rules because she regarded them as unconstitutional. But the argument was weak because, as prosecutors noted, she never made a formal legal challenge.

She said that she completely misjudged how prosecutors viewed the sheik and the leeway she could take in defending him, as terrorism became an increasing threat to the United States. "To me, the sheik was part of the demonized other," she said, "part of a continuum" with other violent radicals she had defended more successfully, including members of the Weather Underground and the Black Panthers.

She admits that she became too close to the sheik, insisting it was because of his deteriorating health and sanity after years in solitary confinement, not any affinity with his Islamic fundamentalism.

DOJ_NMG_0080792

"I ignored any warning signs," Ms. Stewart said. "I led with my heart instead of my head and thought it would be all right."

While Ms. Stewart says she regrets some of her actions, one co-defendant, Mr. Yousry, is not offering any apologies to the judge.

"I wish to God I can say I'm sorry," he said in an interview. "But I'm not guilty and I'm not going to say I'm sorry for something that I didn't do."

In the past months, Mr. Yousry, 51, has gone from bewildered to angry, reliving the trial in his mind. He was fired from a teaching job at the City University of New York when he was indicted and can no longer find work as a translator. Out on bail, he spends his time at home in Bridgeport, Conn.

Mr. Yousry said he keeps coming back to the fact that he, unlike Ms. Stewart, never signed an agreement to uphold the rules that restricted communication with the sheik. The evidence confirmed that he acted on specific instructions from Ms. Stewart. Prosecutors acknowledge that Mr. Yousry, who is not a practicing Muslim, did not support the sheik's ideas or violence. They have called him the "least culpable" defendant.

In a letter to the judge, Michael Gasper, a history professor at Yale, said Mr. Yousry had long shown an "obvious and unconcealed distaste for any brand of Islamic activism."

Mr. Yousry has never broken rank with Ms. Stewart. But his voice rose when he discussed how she handled the sheik's case.

"My job wasn't to tell the lawyer what to do," he said. "Lynne is known as an in-your-face kind of lawyer. She lives for the moment when she can stand up to the government and challenge them on issues. That's her thing. That's Lynne Stewart, not Mohamed Yousry."

There was little sympathy for Ms. Stewart among mainstream lawyers during the trial. But more than 400 letters she submitted to Judge Koeltl about her sentence include many from law professors and criminal defense lawyers who said that her actions never caused actual harm and warned of a chilling effect on lawyers who defend terrorists if she receives a long sentence. Her lawyers cite her long service as a government-appointed lawyer for rebels, mobsters and murderers.

Jo Ann Harris, a former assistant attorney general who authorized the 1994 indictment of Mr. Abdel Rahman, wrote that the terrorism counts against Ms. Stewart were "unwarranted overkill."

Ms. Stewart's failing, she wrote, was that she "didn't have a clue that the stick she was poking in the government's eye was going to have consequences beyond her imagination."

The author Gore Vidal wrote to ask the judge to "side with our Bill of Rights" by not imprisoning Ms. Stewart.

Ms. Stewart said that while her radical leftist views have not changed, she will continue to fight within the system. "I really think that my patriotism — if you'll excuse the expression — and my love of this profession demand that I have to stay and fight."

Specter's Role In Passage Of Detainee Bill Disputed (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

The news reached Democrats working on the military commissions bill in the Senate cloakroom the morning of Sept. 27. Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a sponsor of two amendments giving detainees a right to challenge their detention or treatment in federal court, had decided to bring the more extreme amendment to a vote.

Democrats had lined up behind Specter because the Judiciary Committee chairman told them he shared their antipathy to language in the bill stripping detainees of habeas corpus rights. But the amendment Specter put forward was defeated 51 to 48, allowing the bill to win congressional approval without change. It handed the White House an important pre-election victory.

The last-minute maneuvering before the Sept. 28 vote remains a hot topic of debate among lobbyists, lawmakers and staff members. They are wondering if Specter, as several Judiciary Committee staff members privately asserted at the time, was pressured into discarding a less extreme and more politically palatable amendment at the Bush administration's request, in favor of an alternative more likely to be defeated.

Specter says that he was not, and that he has no reason to believe the less extreme alternative he sponsored but withheld from a vote -- allowing detainees limited access to the courts -- might have won. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) backs Specter's account, but some other sources on Capitol Hill dispute it.

The stakes were considerable: The White House had been waging an intense three-month effort, set off by an adverse Supreme Court decision in June, to win explicit congressional support for the right to detain indefinitely, and without guaranteed recourse to the courts, people -- including U.S. citizens -- who are designated as "unlawful enemy combatants."

The White House was keen to secure the bill's speedy passage, because officials were worried that Congress would be more reluctant to strip detainees of their rights after the Nov. 7 midterm elections. Keeping the Senate bill free of amendments was key to avoiding a wrangle with the House, which had passed the administration-backed version and was set to leave for a recess Sept. 29.

DOJ_NMG_0080793

Questions about Specter's role in the last-minute maneuvering arose in part because he had taken a maverick position before -- and then backed President Bush's policy on the floor or in his votes.

Specter said in December, for example, that he had "no doubt" the administration's warrantless surveillance program for terrorism suspects was inappropriate and should not be condoned. This summer, he sponsored a bill to legalize the program by providing for limited judicial review. Since 2001, Specter's support for Bush initiatives in Congress has fluctuated between 85 and 89 percent, according to Congressional Quarterly.

On the detainee bill, Frist had make clear his desire to ensure that no amendment passed, spokeswoman Amy Call said. She said "we were worried about both" of Specter's amendments.

The more extreme version would have deleted the bill's suspension of habeas corpus rights. The less extreme alternative, which Specter co-sponsored with Sens. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and Gordon Smith (R.-N.H.), would have allowed detainees to file a single habeas corpus petition after a year of detention.

"The compromise looked like it had a strong chance of success," and it would have given detainees at least "a one-chance shot to appeal their innocence," said Jennifer Daskal, U.S. advocacy director for Human Rights Watch. "Rather than doing the right thing and allowing the amendment to go forward, the strategy seems to have been to put forward an amendment doomed to defeat," she said.

Frist was so determined to help the White House that on Sept. 26, he told a group of GOP lawmakers at a private meeting, in the presence of White House national security adviser Stephen Hadley, that no amendment that could pass would be allowed to come to a vote, according to one person present. Call declined to comment on a private meeting.

Although Frist did not say so then, staffers told others they were nervous that Maine's two Republican senators, Susan Collins and Olympia J. Snowe, and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) might support Specter's less extreme amendment.

Around the time of the vote, several members of the Judiciary Committee staff circulated reports that Frist and the White House pressured Specter into doing the administration's bidding on the habeas corpus amendment. The staffers said Specter was told that no floor time would be available to debate the milder alternative, according to five legislative aides and lobbyists following the bill, who said in separate interviews that they heard this account directly from the staff.

In a telephone interview, Specter disputed that assertion and said he was unaware that more Republicans might have supported the less extreme amendment. Frist "wanted me to limit it to one amendment . . . he wanted to get the bill finished," Specter said. But "he did not tell me" which bill to bring to the floor.

Specter said the less extreme amendment he sponsored "doesn't appeal to me for many reasons." Some habeas corpus petitions succeed on the second try, he said, an option it would not have allowed. "I know they were very nervous about the one that I offered. . . . I could not have pressed an amendment any more strenuously than I did that one," he said. Call said Frist had not told Specter which amendment to offer.

Would the alternative amendment have attracted more GOP support? A Republican aide directly familiar with Hagel's position confirmed that the senator supported the less extreme alternative.

Specter said he did not speak to Hagel before the vote but telephoned him in Vietnam after being interviewed by The Washington Post. He said Hagel told him otherwise. Asked to clarify the discrepancy, Hagel spokesman Mike Buttry said the senator was "not going to talk about hypotheticals."

Six legislative aides and lobbyists separately quoted an aide to Collins as saying at the time that the senator would have supported the alternative amendment, providing the second vote needed to ensure its success. Asked about the statements, Collins's spokeswoman, Jen Burita, said that "we don't know how she would have voted."

Spokesmen for two other senators who voted with the administration, Snowe and Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), also declined to say if they would have supported the less extreme alternative.

Four Democratic lawmakers put forward amendments of their own that they knew would not attract enough GOP support to win. They would have required periodic reports on detainees held in CIA custody, closed the special military court system in 2011, or required U.S. notification of other countries that their officials would be prosecuted for extreme detainee abuses.

"Sometimes you offer an amendment because that's what you believe in," said an aide to one Democrat.

But for at least some Democrats involved in lobbying on the bill, the defeat of these amendments -- plus Specter's -- was not entirely an unhappy result. Some lawyers representing detainees told lawmakers before the vote that they were convinced the Supreme Court would strike down Bush's version of the bill.

They argued against a compromise -- such as Specter's unoffered amendment -- on grounds that it could make the outcome more difficult for the court to reject, a senior Democratic aide said. "We were hearing from some of the constitutional experts that . . . it is better to leave the pig ugly than put lipstick on it," the aide said, explaining why Democrats did not propose a habeas corpus amendment that might have won.

DOJ_NMG_0080794

Those interviewed said they doubt a challenge to the new law -- once it is signed by Bush -- could be decided by the Supreme Court in less than a year. That leaves hundreds of suspects now incarcerated without legal recourse during that period, and potentially far beyond it.

The Treason Puzzle (WP)

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

WHEN THE Supreme Court considered the case of Yaser Esam Hamdi, an American citizen held as an enemy combatant, Justices Antonin Scalia and John Paul Stevens objected that U.S. citizens could not be held without charge unless Congress acted to permit it in an emergency. If the government wants to lock them up for supporting the enemy, the justices said, the Constitution specifies how it may do so: Charge them with treason or some similar crime.

That is what the Justice Department did last week to Adam Gadahn, an American-born operative who had been making videotapes for al-Qaeda. The first such charge in decades marks a significant change of course. Instead of causing him to disappear into military custody, as it did with Mr. Hamdi, the government is following a road explicitly laid out in the Constitution.

Broadly speaking, this is a constructive development. Unlike the murky terrain governing the holding of American citizens as enemy combatants, treason is defined in the Constitution. So there's no doubt as to the government's authority to pursue its case or the propriety of doing so. Mr. Gadahn, if he's ever captured, will have rights in court, and the government's standard of proof, also specified in the Constitution, is high. The videos cited in the indictment involve threats of terrorist violence made against this country on behalf of a belligerent foreign power. The indictment quotes Mr. Gadahn declaring that he has "joined a movement waging war on America and killing large numbers of Americans."

Yet treason charges could come to pose civil liberties concerns of their own. The Constitution cannot, by definition, be unconstitutional -- yet its definition of treason is so broad and vague that, were it merely written in statute, it would probably be so. It consists of "levying war" against the United States or "adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort" -- language that has been used to convict people of propagandizing on behalf of enemy powers. Where exactly that bleeds into protected speech is no easy question.

Al-Qaeda General 'in The UK' (UKSUN)

The (UK) Sun, October 16, 2006

AN al-Qaeda general believed to be plotting dirty bomb attacks on seven US cities could be in Britain, FBI sources said yesterday.

Adnan El Shukrijumah, who has a £2.5million bounty on his head, is suspected of planning a spectacular attack using bombs that spread radioactive waste.

The FBI are investigating the 31-year-old Saudi-born scientist's UK links, including connections to the Midlands and Birmingham.

A US source said: "He has travelled extensively in the last seven years, and we believe this includes the UK."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. Firing Plans For Great Lakes Raise Concerns (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

GRAND HAVEN, Mich., Oct. 10 — Even in autumn, the cold, silent expanse of Lake Michigan defines this town, where pleasure boats glide into harbor, fishermen wait patiently for salmon and tourists peer up at the lighthouse.

But the United States Coast Guard has a new mission for the waters off of these quiet shores. For the first time, Coast Guard officials want to mount machine guns routinely on their cutters and small boats here and around all five of the Great Lakes as part of a program addressing the threats of terrorism after Sept. 11.

And, for the first time in memory, Coast Guard members plan to use a stretch of water at least five miles off this Michigan shore — and 33 other offshore spots near cities like Cleveland; Rochester; Milwaukee; Duluth, Minn.; and Gary, Ind. — as permanent, live fire shooting zones for training on their new 7.62 mm weapons, which can blast as many as 650 rounds a minute and send fire more than 4,000 yards.

DOJ_NMG_0080795

The notion is so unusual that it prompted United States diplomats to negotiate with Canadian authorities in order to agree that it would not violate a 189-year-old treaty, signed after the War of 1812, limiting arms on the Great Lakes.

Many here in Grand Haven, a town whose history is so lovingly intertwined with the Coast Guard that it holds an annual festival celebrating the service branch, say they think of Coast Guard members mainly as the rugged sailors who race off to search for and save troubled boaters. But even here, in a town that calls itself "Coast Guard City U.S.A.," some say the thought of members firing machine guns anywhere near these waters strikes them as dangerous to ordinary boaters, potentially damaging to the Great Lakes' ecosystem and, frankly, a somewhat surprising place to be bracing for terrorists.

"You know exactly what's going to happen with this," said Bob Foster, 58, who said he spends every chance he gets on the waters here. "Some boater is going to inadvertently drive through the live fire zone and get blown out of the water."

Carole Loftis, the owner of Snug Harbor, a popular restaurant with windows on the water, said that although she certainly carried concerns, like most Americans, about terrorism, drunken boating seemed a more frequent threat around here. "This seems a little like overkill," Ms. Loftis said of the shooting plans.

Despite complaints from some charter boat captains, environmental groups and city leaders around the Great Lakes, the Coast Guard defended the need to mount M-240B machine guns on its boats and to test fire them two or three times a year in "safety zones," about 70 square miles each.

"The Coast Guard has looked at an increased terrorist threat since 2001," Rear Adm. John E. Crowley Jr., commander of the Coast Guard district that oversees the Great Lakes, said in a telephone interview. "I don't know when or if something might happen on the Great Lakes, but I don't want to learn the hard way."

Some members of the Coast Guard assigned to law enforcement duties always carried weapons, but most of those were personal semiautomatic pistols. Since the arrival of the boat-mounted machine guns, the Coast Guard has conducted 24 training sessions on the lakes this year, although it has halted the exercises temporarily after news of the program seeped out last month and, with it, a barrage of objection.

"When I heard, I thought it was something from The Onion newspaper or an Internet hoax," said Mike Bradley, the mayor of Sarnia, Ontario, which sits beside Lake Huron, where 6 of the 34 live fire zones are planned. "This whole thing was done way below the radar."

The Coast Guard's plans for permanent training zones were published in the Federal Register on Aug. 1, along with the promise of a month for public comment, but city leaders and ordinary boaters said that most of them never came across the document and that the authorities failed to provide them with any other notice of live fire plans — a fact that left some saying they felt as though the Coast Guard, now part of the Department of Homeland Security, was trying quietly to slip the whole weapons program past them.

Herb Bergson, the mayor of Duluth, got a telephone call in September from a resident who said she was listening to her marine scanner, heard talk of shooting on Lake Superior and wanted the mayor to explain what was going on.

"I didn't know what to tell her," Mr. Bergson said. "I was caught just flat-footed. No one told me, and they should have."

Coast Guard leaders — who have since announced nine public meetings in Great Lakes cities, starting Monday, and have extended until Nov. 13 the period for people to weigh in on the idea — acknowledge that they initially failed to publicize the weapons training program. "I've got no good answer for that," said Lt. j.g. Ryan Barone, a spokesman.

But the plans themselves, which ultimately would mean machine guns mounted on the vessels of more than 50 Coast Guard units throughout the Great Lakes, were carefully conceived, Lieutenant Barone said. Information about the proposal and scheduled public meetings is at uscgd9safetyzones.com.

All of the proposed firing zones sit at least five nautical miles from shores and from Canadian waters, as well as far from commercial shipping lanes and sensitive marine areas, Lieutenant Barone said. During the training days, when Coast Guard gunners will shoot at floating foam buoys, other boaters will be notified on marine radio frequencies, he said, and every test will include a designated safety observer.

Admiral Crowley said, "I don't feel there's a risk to anyone out there."

Around the Great Lakes, some people said they were supportive of the presence of machine guns and the planned tests. The risks of terrorism, they said, cannot be underestimated — even in small towns, even in the Upper Midwest. And as with extra airport safety measures, they said, the live fire tests may be inconvenient but they are needed.

Several ferry operators in Michigan, who carry cars and passengers across Lake Michigan, said they were satisfied that their customers would be safe. Ken Alvey, president of the Lake Erie Marine Trades Association, which represents some 80 marine businesses, said he was comfortable knowing that the Coast Guard members would practice on their new weapons.

"To say we don't have to worry about our open border with Canada would be foolish," Mr. Alvey said. "You never know what avenue terrorists will take."

DOJ_NMG_0080796

But others, especially recreational boaters and professional fishing guides, said they were worried. Though most emphasized their support and gratitude to the Coast Guard, they said they did not even listen to their radios much anymore (unless a storm is rolling in) and could miss warnings altogether.

Ron Mihevc, who takes customers fishing out of the harbor at Waukegan, Ill., said he feared that the planned firing zone near Waukegan sits "right in the middle" of a prime fishing spot that draws scores of fishermen. Kelly J. Campise, another Waukegan boat captain, said fishermen already were carrying their clients many miles into Lake Michigan in search of salmon and trout at great fuel expense; going still further away to avoid the firing zones would cost still more, he said.

An 89-page environmental study, commissioned by federal authorities, concluded that rounds left in the lakes from the Coast Guard exercises would cause no harm, but Hugh McDiarmid Jr., a spokesman for the Michigan Environmental Council, said a "fuller environmental risk assessment," given the lead content of the rounds in particular, was needed.

For years, Coast Guard boats have been armed, and training has been conducted off of the coasts of this country, said Brad J. Kieserman, chief of the operations law group at Coast Guard headquarters.

On the Great Lakes, weapons training by military branches like the Navy has also occurred in years gone by, dating back to World War I and World War II. But in keeping with a treaty known as Rush-Bagot from 1817, Coast Guard vessels on the Great Lakes have historically not included naval armaments.

But in 2003, federal authorities sought an understanding with their Canadian counterparts about Rush-Bagot in preparation for mounting machine guns on cutters so that the Coast Guard could "prevent terrorists or others engaged in criminal activities from crossing the United States-Canadian boundary by water," according to documents from the exchange between the two countries.

In recent days, though, some Canadian mayors, who said they had not heard of the plans until this fall, have objected vehemently. David Miller, the mayor of Toronto, said he worried about practical, safety aspects of the weapons plan and about the environment, but also about the precedent set for the lakes' more than 94,000 square miles of water.

"Our treaty had always said that the Great Lakes will not be militarized," Mr. Miller said. "And in effect, this remilitarizes them in the name of a threat from 9/11."

Changing Of The Guard (WSJ/WW)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal/WashWire, October 15, 2006

One of the last remaining senior-level political officials left from Tom Ridge's day at the helm of the Department of Homeland Security has stepped down.

Ambassador Cresencio "Cris" Arcos played a key role in helping the fledgling DHS forge partnerships with Canada, Mexico and other nations, negotiating expanded roles for U.S. customs agents based in foreign ports to help inspect U.S.-bound cargo overseas, among other early post 9/11 security measures. His last job before leaving was to help pave the way for stationing DHS intelligence analysts overseas.

His departure comes at a critical time for DHS which is coming under growing criticism for plans to build 700 miles of fencing along the U.S./Mexico border as a way to crack down on illegal immigration. Amb. Arcos is going into semiretirement and will work part time as a consultant.

WAR NEWS:

'Stay The Course' In Iraq? No Way, U.S. Panel Says (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — A commission backed by President Bush that is exploring U.S. options in Iraq intends to propose significant changes in the administration's strategy by early next year, members say.

Two options under consideration would represent reversals of U.S. policy: withdrawing American troops in phases, and bringing neighboring Iran and Syria into a joint effort to stop the fighting.

While it weighs alternatives, the 10-member commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III has agreed on one principle.

"It's not going to be 'stay the course,' " one participant said. "The bottom line is, [current U.S. policy] isn't working.... There's got to be another way."

DOJ_NMG_0080797

If the panel recommends overhauling Bush's approach to Iraq, it could give a boost not only to critics of current policy but also to officials in the administration who have argued for broad changes.

"There'll probably be some things in our report that the administration might not like," Baker said in a television interview last week.

It's unclear how willing Bush is to change his strategy, which focuses on improving security in Baghdad, training Iraqi security forces and pressing the Iraqi government to forge a political agreement among warring factions.

Progress on all those fronts has been slow, and Bush last week said he was open to ideas.

"My attitude is: Don't do what you're doing if it's not working — change," Bush said at a news conference.

When the panel was formed in March, some administration officials hoped it would produce a bipartisan endorsement of existing policy. But as sectarian violence in Iraq has worsened, more Republicans in Congress — and privately some administration officials — have become receptive to alternatives.

The Baker panel, called the Iraq Study Group, was formed in response to a proposal by members of Congress. Nevertheless, Baker sought — and won — Bush's endorsement. Other members include former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), who also served as co-chairman of the commission investigating the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks; retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor; former Rep. Leon E. Panetta, a California Democrat who was President Clinton's chief of staff; and former CIA Director Robert M. Gates.

In its most recent closed-door meetings, the commission focused on two options drafted by experts outside the government.

One, titled "Stability First," calls for continuing to try to stabilize Baghdad, boosting efforts to entice insurgents into politics, and bringing Iran and Syria into plans to end the fighting.

The other, called "Redeploy and Contain," goes further. It calls for a gradual, phased withdrawal of American troops to bases outside Iraq where they would be available for strikes against terrorist organizations anywhere in the region.

The experts also prepared an option called "Stay the Course, Redefine the Mission," and an alternative urging a quick U.S. withdrawal, but the panel appeared less interested in those plans, participants said.

The options were first reported last week by the New York Sun.

Baker and other commission members refused to confirm the substance of the options and emphasized that the panel had made no decisions. But Baker signaled the thrust of the panel's deliberations in several television interviews last week.

"Our commission believes that there are alternatives between the stated alternatives, the ones that are out there in the political debate of 'stay the course' and 'cut and run,' " Baker said.

The former secretary of State, who was a longtime aide to former President George H.W. Bush, also said he favored reaching out to Iran and Syria.

"I personally believe in talking to your enemies," he said. "Neither the Syrians nor the Iranians want a chaotic Iraq ... so maybe there is some potential for getting something other than opposition from those countries."

Bringing Iran and Syria into negotiations would require significant changes in U.S. policy.

"To bring them in, we need to stop emphasizing things like democracy and start emphasizing things like stability and territorial integrity," said James Dobbins of the Rand Corp., a former U.S. envoy to Afghanistan. "We need to stop talking about regime change. It's unreasonable to think you can stabilize Iraq and destabilize Iran and Syria at the same time."

The Iraq Study Group said Dobbins was one of its advisors. Dobbins refused to talk about the panel's work, and said he was giving a personal opinion. Other participants described the commission's discussions on condition they not be identified because Baker had asked them to keep the work confidential.

Baker, promoting a new volume of his memoirs in a recent flurry of television interviews, including an appearance on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart," offered his views on issues under consideration by the panel. He also appeared on ABC's "This Week With George Stephanopoulos," PBS' "The NewsHour With Jim Lehrer" and PBS' "The Charlie Rose Show."

After the publicity blitz drew quiet grumbles from other panel participants, Baker canceled a scheduled breakfast with newspaper reporters and declined a request from The Times for an interview.

In his interviews, Baker said he did not support calls for an early withdrawal of U.S. troops. "I think that if we picked up and left right now that you would see the biggest civil war you've ever seen," he said.

He also said he did not agree with proposals to divide Iraq into three states for Sunni Arabs, Shiites and Kurds. "Most all the experts we've talked with think that might ... trigger a civil war," he said.

And instead of trying to bring democracy to all nations in the Middle East, he said, the United States should define success as achieving "representative government, not necessarily democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0080798

Another participant, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the panel was considering whether the United States should warn the Iraqi government to get its "act together or else," a threat to withdraw troops unless the government's performance improved.

An administration official was skeptical that the panel would uncover new policy options, but said the White House would welcome ideas.

"If an independent group like the Baker panel can come up with some good ideas, we're all for it," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity because his comment had not been approved.

Participants in the Iraq Study Group said an additional goal was to identify options that Republicans and Democrats could endorse.

The commission is scheduled to meet again in mid-November. It hopes to deliver a report to Bush, Congress and the public by early 2007.

Some members of Congress, including Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), asked Baker to provide a report after next month's congressional elections, but Baker reportedly concluded that he would need more time to build a bipartisan consensus on significant recommendations.

Baker and Hamilton noted that the panel had consulted more than 150 experts, including representatives of Iran and Syria, and that its members spent four days in Iraq this year.

Administration officials also have briefed the panel.

"You can't come out of those briefings and not have a sense that things are in real bad shape," one participant said. "The bottom line is, it's not working. They know that. And they know that time is not on their side."

doyle.mcmanus@latimes.com

Times staff writers Paul Richter and Peter Spiegel contributed to this report.

2 GOP Senators Urge New Iraq Strategy (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, October 16, 2006

Two leading Republican senators called Sunday for a new strategy in Iraq, saying the situation in getting worse and leaving the United States with few options.

Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and John Warner of Virginia are part of the growing list of Republicans who are speaking out against President Bush's current plan for Iraq as U.S. casualties rise.

"The American people are not going to continue to support, sustain a policy that puts American troops in the middle of a civil war," Hagel said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Hagel said he agreed with Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who said after a recent visit to Iraq that Iraq was "drifting sideways." Warner has urged consideration of a change of course if the Iraq government fails to restore order over the next two months or three months.

Warner said Sunday he stands by that assessment, and even in the week since his trip to Iraq, there has been an "exponential increase in the killings and the savagery that's going on over there."

"You can see some movement forward, but a lot of movement back," Warner said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "We have to rethink all the options, except any option which says we precipitously pull out, which would let that country fall into a certain civil war at that time, and all of the neighboring countries would be destabilized."

Bush told reporters last week that he invites a change in strategy if the plan isn't working. But he also said the U.S. will not leave until the job is done.

Hagel said it is time to change course, but "our options are limited."

"We need to find a new strategy, a way out of Iraq, because the entire Middle East is more combustible than it's been probably since 1948, and more dangerous," Hagel said. "And we're in the middle of it."

Democrats long have urged a change in Iraq policy. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the leading Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said there is "no military solution to this conflict" and the United States must pressure Iraqis to take over their country.

"If they're going to have a civil war, they're going to have to do it without us," Levin said on CNN. "This is long overdue. We've got to focus Iraqi leadership attention on this by telling them we need to begin a phased redeployment of American troops from Iraq within the next few months."

Also Sunday, Rep. John Murtha, a decorated Marine veteran who favors withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, criticized Republicans for referring to him and other war opponents as "Defeatocrats."

DOJ_NMG_0080799

In an opinion piece for The Washington, Murtha said Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and others in the White House have called Iraq war opponents appeasers and pessimists and labeled Democrats the "cut and run" party.

"It's all baseless name-calling, and it's all wrong," wrote Murtha, D-Pa. "Unless, of course, being a Defeatocrat means taking a good hard look at the administration's Iraq policy and determining that it's a failure.

"In that case, count me in. Because Democrats recognize that we're headed for a far greater disaster in Iraq if we don't change course — and soon. This is not defeatism. This is realism."

Murtha, a military hawk and close confidant of top military officials, surprised Washington last year when he called for pulling all troops out of Iraq within months.

Looking ahead to the Nov. 7 elections, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, Ken Mehlman, said "the American people aren't going to say in the face of war we need to be weaker, and in the face of economic challenge we need higher taxes and more regulations and more lawsuits. The Democrats have promised both."

Tennessee Democrat Ford Questions `Sanity' Of U.S. Iraq Policy (BLOOM)

By Nadine Elsibai

Bloomberg, October 16, 2006

Oct. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Democratic Representative Harold Ford, engaged in a close battle for an open Senate seat in Tennessee, questioned the ``sanity'' of the Bush administration's policy on Iraq.

Asked on ABC's ``This Week'' program about his vote in 2002 to authorize President George W. Bush to use military force, the five-term representative said he wouldn't have backed the war if he knew that Iraq didn't have weapons of mass destruction.

``After hearing Vice President Cheney and others over the last few weeks indicate that they would have gone forward with the war in Iraq even knowing what they know now, it raises serious questions about not only judgment but sanity,'' he said.

Danny Diaz, spokesman for the Republican National Committee called Ford's comments ``outrageous'' and show ``he is an extreme and partisan liberal that does not represent Tennessee values.''

Ford, 36, is running against Republican Bob Corker, the former mayor of Chattanooga, Tennessee, for the seat opened up by the retirement of Senator Bill Frist. Recent polls in the state show the race is a dead heat with a little more than three weeks before the congressional election.

Democrats are attempting to frame the elections, which will decide which party controls Congress, as a referendum on Bush and the war in Iraq.

War Debate

``Why would you go forward with an effort in Iraq knowing that they didn't have weapons of mass destruction, knowing that our focus should have remained on bin Laden?'' Ford said when questioned about his statement.

Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney have called Iraq a central front in the war against terrorism and argued that the world is safer with Saddam Hussein out of power.

``It was the right thing to do, and if we had to do it over again, we'd do exactly the same thing,'' Cheney said Sept. 10 on NBC's ``Meet the Press'' program.

Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride said the vice president's stance reflects the realities of the war against terrorism. ``You have to look at what the terrorists themselves have said,'' she said. ``Bin Laden calls it the third world war. We believe that taking the fight to the enemy, going on the offensive against the terrorists, is the way to defeat them.''

Corker, 53, interviewed separately on the ABC program, declined to say whether going to war in Iraq was the right decision.

``I'm going to focus on where we are going forward,'' he said. ``I don't think it does us any good to focus on that.''

Troop Levels

Corker said the U.S. shouldn't withdraw until the Iraqis are able to secure the country, and that he would back putting more U.S. troops there ``if that's necessary'' for stability.

``We need to do whatever's necessary for the country to be able to secure itself,'' Corker said. ``And when that happens, I do hope that our men and women come quickly home.''

Democrats need a net gain of six seats to get control of the 100-member Senate. With 33 Senate seats being contested on Nov. 7, the Tennessee race is one of those targeted by both parties. Another is the Minnesota seat being vacated by Democratic Senator Mark Dayton, who is retiring.

Republican Representative Mark Kennedy said on NBC's ``Meet the Press'' program that he stands by his vote to authorize the invasion of Iraq, arguing that the U.S. can start withdrawing soldiers only ``after we're sure the terrorists can't win.''

War Opponent

DOJ_NMG_0080800

Amy Klobuchar, Kennedy's opponent and the Democratic-Farm Labor Party candidate, said on the same show that she has opposed the war from the beginning and that the conflict can't be resolved by the military.

Klobuchar, the Hennepin Count attorney, is leading in the race, according to a poll conducted for the Minneapolis Star-Tribune and released today. She had 55 percent support among likely voters to 34 percent for Kennedy, a three term member of the House from suburban Minneapolis-St. Paul.

Klobuchar, 46, said the U.S. needs ``to change course'' in Iraq and the nation's top military commanders should be brought before Congress to discuss the next steps to take in the conflict. Some U.S. troops should be redeployed from Iraq to Afghanistan and Kuwait, she said.

Kennedy, 49, said that progress has been made in Iraq, and the U.S. can't let the country ``become a sanctuary for terrorists.'' Solving the issue of federalism in Iraq as well as letting citizens share in the wealth from oil revenue are among the political solutions that would help quell sectarian violence, he said.

On economics, Kennedy said Klobuchar's proposal to roll back the tax cuts Bush pushed through Congress for those making more than $200,000 a year would put the economy ``on its back.'' He said Bush and Congress could do more to cut spending.

Klobuchar said restoring the income tax rates on high- income individuals to those in place during the Clinton administration would help trim the federal debt and secure Social Security's future.

5 Americans Killed In Iraq, Bringing Month's Toll To 53 (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 15 — Two marines were killed by insurgents in Anbar Province on Sunday, the American military command said, and three American soldiers died a day earlier in a bombing in southern Baghdad, bringing the total of American troop deaths in Iraq this month to at least 53, an extraordinarily high midmonth tally.

At the current rate of American troop deaths, almost four a day, October is on track to be the third-deadliest month of the entire conflict for the military, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent Web site that tracks war-related casualties. The two most deadly months coincided with major American offensives against entrenched guerrilla fighters.

The rise now, in spite of improvements in body and vehicle armor, followed a decision by commanders to increase the number of American troops patrolling Baghdad in an effort to quell the sectarian violence that has engulfed the city.

Attacks continued against government and civilian targets as well on Sunday. A series of seven bombings within a few hours struck in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing at least 17 people and wounding at least 73, according to police officials.

Just last year, commanders began cutting back on American patrols in Baghdad in an effort to give Iraqi forces more responsibility. But the escalating violence forced them to reverse the strategy in late July, and thousands of American troops were shifted to Baghdad. Plans for a major troop withdrawal from the country by the end of the year were canceled.

A cornerstone of the new approach has been house-to-house sweeps of the capital's most troubled areas, intended to ferret out militia networks, fighters and armaments. To date, the Americans, with Iraqi assistance, have swept eight districts.

Simultaneously, the American and Iraqi militaries have more aggressively pursued Shiite death squads, including elements of the Mahdi Army, the militia that loosely answers to the cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Since the neighborhood sweeps started at the beginning of August, guerrilla attacks — against military and civilian targets alike — have risen about 23 percent across the capital, according to American military statistics.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, a senior military spokesman here, directly attributed the rise in American deaths to the new security strategy.

"We are out more aggressively engaged in the city at this point than we were just a month ago," he said at a news conference last Thursday. "Coalition forces are being much more active in going out and looking for these folks, these death squads and elements that are associated with the sectarian violence."

According to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, which collates statistics distributed in Pentagon news releases, the number of American deaths in Baghdad has sharply increased since the American-led crackdown began in early August.

That month, 20 American forces died in or near the capital, up from 12 in July and 15 in June. The number rose again last month, to 29.

The number of troops wounded in action, a figure that usually parallels the number of fatalities, has also increased drastically. From Sept. 28 to Oct. 11, 427 American troops were wounded, one of the worst two-week stretches of the war, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count. In all of September, 776 troops were wounded, the fourth-highest monthly total since the American invasion, according to the Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0080801

As fighting has risen to new levels in Baghdad, the capital, it has also continued unabated in Anbar Province, the stronghold of the Sunni Arab insurgency. At least 21 Americans have died there this month, and 60 over the past two months. At the same time, forces in the region have been stretched as more troops have been sent to Baghdad.

The deadliest months for American troops since the beginning of the war have been associated with major offensives.

Some 137 American troops died in November 2004, the same month as the second siege of Falluja, where the Americans battled Sunni Arab rebels. In April 2004, a bloody month with the first siege of Falluja and pitched battles between the Americans and Mr. Sadr's militia in Najaf, 135 American troops died.

In contrast, the military has not conducted any major operations this month. The military has not initiated a new urban cordon-and-search operation for more than two weeks and has instead focused on patrolling the areas already swept, officials say.

In the multiple car bombings in Kirkuk, a city bitterly contested by several ethnic and religious groups, three suicide car bombers, including one driving a van packed with chickens and explosives, detonated their payloads throughout the city, killing 13 people and wounding at least 34, according to Maj. Gen. Turhan Yusuf, chief of the Kirkuk Police Department. One blew himself up near a girls' academy, killing two students.

Four other bombs, including two unattended car bombs, killed four civilians and wounded at least 19 others, police officials said. Most of the bombs were apparently directed at Iraqi security forces.

In Baghdad on Sunday, the authorities recovered at least 30 bodies dumped around the city, an Interior Ministry official said.

Two bombs exploded near the convoy of the chief of financial affairs for the Interior Ministry, killing seven people, though the administrator escaped unscathed, the ministry official said. Another bomb exploded in the Amel neighborhood in Baghdad, killing one civilian and wounding two others, the official said.

In Tal Afar, near Mosul, a suicide bomber wrapped in explosives walked into a local market and detonated himself near a police checkpoint, killing a child and wounding five other people, including two police officers, hospital and police officials said.

In Mosul, five members of a family were killed when gunmen burst into their home and opened fire, officials said, and gunmen assassinated Raad al-Haiali, a provincial official and a member of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni Arab group.

The tribunal trying Saddam Hussein and his associates said Sunday that it was postponing the date for verdicts from Monday, as originally planned, to Nov. 5, according to a senior court official who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly on the issue.

Other court officials have said in recent days that a major reason for the delay is that after nine months of hearings, the five judges in the case have failed to reach agreement on a sentence for Mr. Hussein and appeared to be undecided between a death sentence for him or a penalty of life imprisonment.

Mr. Hussein, 68, faces a possible sentence of death by hanging for his role in the execution of 148 men and boys from the mostly Shiite town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him in 1982.

Iraq Delays National Talks Amid Killings (AP-Y)

By Christopher Bodeen

AP, October 16, 2006

Iraq's government indefinitely postponed a much-anticipated national reconciliation conference Sunday as a two-day spree of sectarian revenge killings and insurgent bombings left at least 86 Iraqis dead.

Meanwhile, a militant network that includes al-Qaida in Iraq announced in a video that it had established an Islamic state in six provinces, a propaganda push in its drive to force the withdrawal of U.S. forces and topple the American-backed Iraqi government.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council — an umbrella organization of insurgent groups in Iraq — said the new state was made up of six provinces including Baghdad that have large Sunni populations, along with parts of two other central provinces that are predominantly Shiite.

Responding to the statement, the speaker of the Iraqi parliament, Mahmud al-Meshhedani, derided the group's leaders as "vulgar with no religion, who only kill others under the pretext of jihad (holy war)."

"Those who believe in this council are ignorant and those who follow it are foolish," al-Meshhedani said. "This council caused the sectarian conflict as well the displacement of both Shiites and Sunnis."

The militants' announcement appeared mainly symbolic, since no Iraqi insurgent group has the strength or authority to act as a rival government and none controls territory.

It underscored, however, the weakness of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government and its inability to bring Iraq's deeply divided politicians together.

DOJ_NMG_0080802

In announcing postponement of the reconciliation conference, the Ministry of State for National Dialogue said only that the gathering, which was planned for Saturday, had been put off for "emergency reasons out of the control of the ministry." The move reflected the upheaval worsening violence has wrought on efforts to stabilize the government and curb bloodshed.

The postponement could deeply damage the al-Maliki administration, which took office just over four months ago vowing to implement a 24-point National Reconciliation plan to heal the nation's severe political wounds.

Al-Maliki did not comment on the postponement, but issued a message to the Iraqi people Sunday praising them for approving the country's first post-Saddam Hussein constitution exactly one year ago, while acknowledging the document's adoption had intensified the insurgency.

"It is your vote on the constitution that forced the terrorists ... to commit horrific massacres against innocent civilians and violate the sanctity of holy places, destroy infrastructure, obstruct reconstruction and services," he said.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, reported that three Marines and four soldiers were killed in the period from Friday through Sunday.

Weekend revenge killings among Shiites and Sunnis left at least 63 people dead in Balad, a city north of Baghdad, while 11 people died Sunday in a series of apparently coordinated bombings of a girls school and other targets in the northern city of Kirkuk, where Kurds and Arabs are in a tense struggle for control of the oil-rich city.

Extra police flooded into Balad to enforce a curfew and additional security measures were taken in other villages in the region around Kirkuk, 180 miles north of Baghdad, Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf said.

In Baghdad, Interior Ministry undersecretary Hala Shakir Salim survived a roadside bomb attack that killed seven others, police Capt. Mohammed Abdul-Ghani said. The Interior Ministry runs Iraqi police forces.

Three people were killed in a mortar attack on the capital's troubled Dora district, while gunmen killed four members of a family in Mosul, Iraq's third largest city 225 miles northwest of Baghdad.

South of Baghdad, three women and four men were killed in drive-by shootings in the predominantly Shiite village of Wahda on Saturday afternoon, police reported.

Also Saturday, two Egyptians, both small businessmen married to Iraqi women, were slain near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, according to police in surrounding Diyala province. The identities of the gunmen and their motives were not known.

Even by Iraq's bleak standards, October has been an especially bloody month. Hundreds of Iraqis have died in attacks and more than 50 U.S. military personnel have been killed in the first two weeks alone.

Also Sunday, the U.S. military announced Iraq's Central Criminal Court had sentenced an al-Qaida member to death and convicted 64 others on charges of belonging to armed groups and other crimes, the U.S. military command said Sunday.

The military's statement did not name the man condemned to death, but said he was a "known member of the al-Qaida organization." Others sentenced to life in prison included a Saudi Arabian man that the court said had admitted coming to Iraq to fight U.S. and government forces.

Government Fissures Widening (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

Relations between the main Sunni and Shiite political blocs worsen as Iraq takes a step toward federalism and sectarian violence persists.

BAGHDAD — Months of bloodshed have threatened to loosen the bonds holding together Iraq's fractious government, with tensions between political blocs spilling out in recent days in fiery rhetoric as well as fighting that left more than 130 people dead nationwide.

Disagreements over several contentious issues burst into the open with a highly divisive vote on the issue of parceling Iraq into federal districts, finger-pointing over the assassination of a top politician's brother and a series of massacres between rival Shiite Muslims and Sunni Arabs north of the capital.

There, among the lush palm groves and towns along the Tigris River, at least 73 people were killed in sectarian violence over the weekend. Shiite gunmen, seeking revenge for the beheadings of 26 farmers whose bodies were found in Sunni villages, marauded through the farming hub of Balad, about 50 miles north of the capital, officials said.

The assailants randomly killed Sunni men in the market, hospitals and a used-car lot, the officials said, and 12 victims reportedly burned to death. An Iraqi army source said a total of 47 people were killed.

Sunni tribesmen in farms outside Balad lobbed mortar rounds into the Shiite-dominated town and armed themselves for further fighting, said residents of the Sunni village of Duluiya. U.S. forces imposed a curfew on the area.

DOJ_NMG_0080803

Meanwhile, authorities awaited news of the fate of several groups of Shiite men kidnapped from minibuses over the weekend on their way out of the nearby Shiite village of Dujayl.

Also Sunday, six car bomb explosions killed about 10 people and injured dozens around the northern city of Kirkuk, which is claimed by Arabs as well as ethnic Kurds who inhabit a semiautonomous section of northern Iraq.

In the capital, at least 52 Iraqis, including two children, were reported killed in shootings, rocket attacks, bombings and clandestine sectarian slayings.

Three U.S. solders were killed Saturday when their vehicle was caught in the blast of a homemade bomb south of Baghdad, the military said, disclosing no further details. At least 52 U.S. military personnel died in Iraq during the first two weeks of the month, putting October on pace to be the deadliest for U.S. troops in the country since January 2005.

Iraq's Sunni insurgents are fighting a guerrilla war against American forces and the U.S.-backed Shiite- and Kurdish-dominated government. Shiite gunmen, with possible ties to powerful political parties, fight back by killing suspected insurgents and ordinary Sunnis alike. Many Iraqis call the waves of violence a civil war tempered only by the ongoing political process.

But relations between the main Sunni and Shiite political blocs also have worsened over the last week. On Sunday, the government indefinitely postponed a highly publicized conference to discuss reconciliation among Iraq's disparate groups. According to a news release, the conference, scheduled to begin Saturday, was canceled for unspecified "emergency reasons."

Acrimony among the country's major ethnic and religious groups swelled after the Shiite- and Kurdish-dominated parliament passed a law Wednesday allowing for the eventual division of Iraq into federal regions. The vote came despite the strenuous objections of Sunnis, who view the plan as a recipe for carving up Iraq.

Sunni Arabs suspect that Shiites have agreed to cede the northern oil hub of Kirkuk to autonomy-minded Kurds in exchange for support of an oil-rich Shiite southern region. About 500 mostly Sunni Arab tribal leaders attending a summit in northern Iraq on Sunday vowed to fight any federal partitioning of the country, which they fear might further impoverish Sunnis in the resource-poor central and western regions.

"We are demanding that the government and the parliament not force this matter on Iraq and its people," said Sheik Abdul-Rahman Asi. "There are many political forces that reject this matter."

Relations between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite political blocs seem to have reached a nadir.

Earlier in the day, the Iraqi Islamic Party, a major Sunni group, issued a statement all but accusing the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry in the Oct. 9 slaying of Amer Hashimi. He was the brother of Tariq Hashimi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents and the Sunni bloc's leader.

"The cars that broke through the [Iraqi army] checkpoints were new military cars and there were people inside wearing military uniforms," the statement said. "This is available only to the militias that are cooperating with the security apparatuses."

Shiite officials have accused Sunni insurgents in Hashimi's killing, noting that he lived in an area under the control of the Sunni-dominated Defense Ministry. In a televised speech Sunday evening, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, while acknowledging the need to disband unruly militias that support him, blamed Iraq's problems on Sunni "terrorists."

U.S. and Iraqi officials had hoped the ongoing political process in the wake of elections last December would lower tensions and help ease the violence, but some now worry that the political and religious leaders have exacerbated problems.

"There's a sectarian conflict going on now between the Sunnis and Shiites," said Isam Rawi of the Sunni Muslim Scholars Assn., a clerical group. "But the religious and political discourse has a great effect in elevating these fights. It's not easy to target or kill or displace somebody unless somebody tells you those people are infidels or collaborators."

Times special correspondents in Baghdad, Kirkuk, Samarra and Taji contributed to this report.

Iraq Will Wait To Disarm Militias (USAT)

By Rick Jervis, Usa Today

USA Today, October 16, 2006

PM: U.S. taking 'wrong approach'

BAGHDAD — Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said in an interview with USA TODAY that his government will not force militias to disarm until later this year or early next year, despite escalating violence in Baghdad fueled by death squads and religious warfare.

Al-Maliki's remarks point to a growing gap between the U.S. and Iraqi governments over how to handle growing sectarian violence.

U.S. officials have urged the Iraqi government to take immediate action to reduce the violence. On a visit to Baghdad earlier this month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the "security situation is not one that can be tolerated and it's not one helped by political inaction."

DOJ_NMG_0080804

Al-Maliki also predicted a significant U.S. troop withdrawal starting early next year, despite the growing violence. If Iraq's security forces continue to build in strength, U.S. troops could start withdrawing in “a matter of months,” he said. There are currently 141,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

The prime minister criticized the U.S.-led military coalition for an overreliance on force, which he called the “wrong approach.”

“Terrorism and militias — especially militias — cannot be dealt with only by using tanks, guns and aircraft,” he said.

Al-Maliki's Shiite-dominated government depends on some militia leaders for political support.

Al-Maliki said he has rejected U.S. plans to launch large-scale operations into Sadr City, a Baghdad slum and a stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a powerful militia loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Sadr's political organization controls several Cabinet positions and 30 seats in the parliament.

“We have told the Americans that we don't mind targeting a Mahdi Army cell inside Sadr City,” al-Maliki said. “But the way the multinational forces are thinking of confronting this issue will destroy an entire neighborhood. Of course it was rejected.”

There “seems like a disconnect” between U.S. and Iraqi strategies, said Steven Cook, a Middle East analyst at the Council on Foreign Relations.

The prime minister, speaking softly through an interpreter, shared his views during a rare 50-minute interview Friday in his expansive, marble-and-gold-trimmed residence, a former palace of deposed leader Saddam Hussein located inside the tightly guarded Green Zone.

The U.S.-led military command in Iraq declined to address al-Maliki's remarks directly but said the coalition is working with the Iraqi government to disarm militias. “The U.S. and Iraq are working together to find solutions that will demobilize and reintegrate their members into Iraqi society,” Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said.

“The next six months will be critical in terms of reining in the danger of civil war,” Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, said in a June interview with a German magazine.

Al-Maliki said he needs time. “The problem that we face in disbanding militias — and the militias have to be disbanded — is that there are procedures, steps that need to taken, which take time,” he said.

Militants Declare Creation Of State (WT/AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

The Washington Times/AP, October 16, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A militant network that includes al Qaeda in Iraq declared in a video yesterday that it had established an Islamic state in six provinces where Sunni Muslims are dominant.

The government, meanwhile, postponed a much-anticipated national-reconciliation conference yesterday as a two-day spree of sectarian revenge killings and insurgent bombings left at least 86 Iraqis dead.

The video announcement by the Mujahedeen Shura Council -- an umbrella organization of insurgent groups in Iraq -- was seen as a propaganda push in its drive to force the withdrawal of U.S. forces and topple the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.

But it follows parliamentary approval last week of a federalism bill -- opposed by most Sunnis -- that would permit the eventual creation of a semiautonomous Shi'ite region in the oil-rich south, much like the Kurdish region in the north.

The video said the new state was made up of six provinces including Baghdad that have large Sunni populations, along with parts of two other central provinces that are predominantly Shi'ite.

Responding to the statement, the speaker of the Iraqi parliament, Mahmud al-Mashhedani, derided the group's leaders as "vulgar with no religion, who only kill others under the pretext of jihad [holy war]."

"Those who believe in this council are ignorant, and those who follow it are foolish," Mr. al-Mashhedani said. "This council caused the sectarian conflict as well the displacement of both Shi'ites and Sunnis."

The militants' announcement appeared mainly symbolic, since no Iraqi insurgent group has the strength or authority to act as a rival government and none controls territory.

It underscored, however, the weakness of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government and its inability to bring Iraq's deeply divided politicians together.

In announcing a postponement of the reconciliation conference, the Ministry of State for National Dialogue said only that the gathering, which had been planned for Saturday, had been put off for "emergency reasons out of the control of the ministry."

The al-Maliki administration took office just over four months ago, vowing to implement a 24-point national-reconciliation plan to heal the nation's severe political wounds.

Mr. al-Maliki did not comment on the postponement, but issued a message to the Iraqi people yesterday praising them for approving the country's first post-Saddam Hussein constitution exactly one year ago, while acknowledging the document's adoption had intensified the insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0080805

"It is your vote on the constitution that forced the terrorists ... to commit horrific massacres against innocent civilians and violate the sanctity of holy places, destroy infrastructure, obstruct reconstruction and services," he said.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, reported that one Marine and four soldiers were killed Friday and Saturday.

Weekend revenge killings among Shi'ites and Sunnis left at least 63 persons dead in Balad, a city north of Baghdad, while 11 persons died yesterday in a series of apparently coordinated bombings of a school for girls and other targets in the northern city of Kirkuk.

In Baghdad, Interior Ministry Undersecretary Hala Shakir Salim survived a roadside bomb attack that killed seven others, police Capt. Mohammed Abdul-Ghani said. The Interior Ministry runs Iraqi police forces.

Call For Sunni State In Iraq (FT)

By Stephen Negus

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

A video posted on the internet on Sunday in the name of one of Iraq's largest insurgent groups called for the creation of a separate Sunni Islamic state in the country.

If authentic, it could indicate a shift in strategy for parts of the Sunni Arab insurgency. "Your brothers in the Mutayibeen Coalition herald the establishment of the Islamic State of Iraq," said a spokesman, whose face was blotted out.

He said it should encompass the governates of Baghdad, Anbar, Diyala, Kirkuk, Salahedddin, Nineveh and parts of Babel and Wasit – a swathe of central and western Iraq where most Sunni Arabs live.

The Mutayibeen coalition was purportedly set up last week by the Mujahideen Shura Council, an al-Qaeda-dominated umbrella organisation, along with smaller groups and tribal leaders.

It is rarely clear whether internet statements represent a coherent stance by insurgents or a splinter group, or indeed if they are authentic at all.

But if a separate state is really now a goal of radical Sunni Islamist guerillas, it would put them at odds with mainstream Sunni politicians and many other insurgent groups. They tend to look askance at partition, which they claim would deprive their oil-poor central Iraqi heartland of resources.

Sectarian violence flared over the weekend, with police announcing yesterday that suspected Shia militiamen had killed 42 Sunnis in the Balad region, 80 kilometers north of the capital.

The killings were in apparent retaliation for the deaths of 17 Shia, whose bodies were found on the town's outskirts on Friday.

U.S. Helps Rebuild Iraqi Air Force (WT)

By David Axe

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

BASRA AIR STATION -- A team of U.S. Air Force personnel at this sprawling British base in southern Iraq is working to rebuild an air force that the U.S. military spent more than a decade destroying.

Former test pilot Lt. Col. Kelly Latimer and her team of five pilots and maintainers are partnered with 70 Squadron of the reborn Iraqi air force, which three years ago had been grounded by 12 years of attacks and sanctions.

The squadron's 15 Iraqi pilots and 39 other personnel operate four light aircraft donated by coalition countries -- two bulbous Seekers powered by a single pusher propeller and painted bright yellow, as well as two single-prop CH-2000s sporting a more conventional engine-in-front layout and gray paint.

Both types carry infrared and daylight cameras for monitoring power and oil infrastructure and for spotting targets for other branches of the Iraqi military.

This year, the squadron has spent 900 hours in the air, usually flying about five sorties a day. An American pilot rides along on all flights.

The squadron's equipment and missions are basic stuff. The Seeker makes 80 knots and, from the ground, sounds like a motor scooter. "With a bit of a headwind, we get passed by cars on the road," Col. Latimer said.

Many of the unit's Iraqi aviators are former fighter pilots, some having flown the Mach-3 MiG-25.

"I thought coming in that these guys would be disgruntled," Col. Latimer said, "but they're happy to be flying and to have a job."

When the squadron was formed two years ago, most flights were dedicated to training. But now that almost all the Iraqi fliers are checked out on both the Seeker and the CH-2000, the unit can dedicate more efforts to patrolling vital oil and power facilities and supporting the Basra-based Iraqi army's 10th Division and the tiny Iraqi navy based at nearby Umm Qasr.

DOJ_NMG_0080806

On one recent anti-smuggling exercise, 70 Squadron pilots spotted suspect boats with its cameras and used radios to direct Iraqi patrol craft to an intercept.

"We need more exercises," Col. Latimer said, especially to improve the ground and sea forces' procedures for talking to the air force.

Col. Latimer anticipates that the squadron will swap its single-engine aircraft for bigger twin-engine planes that are faster and can carry more equipment, perhaps including advanced sensors that can transmit imagery directly to ground forces.

In the meantime, there are logistical problems to sort out. The CH-2000s need a new support contract, and aviation fuel has been in short supply. And Col. Latimer is hoping to find Iraqis with training experience so the squadron can train pilots on its own.

But there are no plans for the Americans to leave. The next rotation of U.S. advisers will stay a full year, compared with four months for the current team.

Gen. Peter Pace (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, October 16, 2006

With his ramrod-straight Marine bearing, close-cropped hair, and warm smile, Gen. Peter Pace steps out of his armored black SUV looking like he belongs on a recruiting poster.

In the 39 years since he graduated from the US Naval Academy, General Pace has seen it all: from Vietnam, to Korea, to Somalia, to duty now as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

At a Monitor-sponsored lunch with reporters Thursday, Pace offered a passionate argument for the US military's mission in Iraq, stressed the nation's capacity to handle a threat from North Korea, and defended his performance as America's top military officer.

Pace's polished performance was in contrast to the controversy surrounding remarks by Britain's army chief, Gen. Richard Dannatt, who said Thursday that British troops should be withdrawn from Iraq "soon." After triggering a storm of controversy in Britain, Dannatt gave interviews Friday saying that he meant a phased withdrawal over two or three years.

When Pace was asked why Americans should not be dismayed at the results on the ground in Iraq, he said the enemy has "a 100 year plan according to the map they published about a year and half ago. So anybody looking for a quick win in the war on terrorism probably hasn't read the enemy's published intent."

He argued that "if we were not in Iraq right now and if we were in Afghanistan ... the center of gravity would be in Afghanistan. And that is where the fight would be taking place. And I do believe that if we left both Iraq and Afghanistan that the fight would be taking place here in the United States because that is what they have said is their objective.... I believe the American people get the fact that this is fundamentally a threat to the survival of our nation and that we are going to do what we need to do to protect our children and our grandchildren. That does not mean we should not be learning from what we are doing on the battlefield."

The military alone cannot solve the problem of sectarian violence in Iraq, Pace said. "What has been less satisfactory is the difficulty in stopping the sectarian violence. Because fundamentally, you cannot have enough individuals under arms 24/7 on every street corner in Iraq to stop the hatred killings if someone wants to go out and do a hatred killing. And that is where the government's part comes in and where the political dialogue comes in and where the agreements and the guarantees come in amongst the various factions. So there is a lot you can do on the military side. You cannot lose this militarily, but it is not going to be 'won' militarily, either."

While Iraq is placing significant demands on the US military, Pace said that the nation has sufficient resources to fight a war with North Korea in the unlikely event that were to occur. Earlier this week, North Korea exploded what it said was a nuclear device. "We currently have just over 200,000 of our 2.4 million service members engaged in operations in the Gulf," Pace said, "which means just under 2 million are available to handle whatever other problem might come our way. That should not be lost on anybody. ... We have enormous capacity remaining, especially in our air and naval forces, to handle any potential problem."

But the general noted that dealing with North Korea while the US was still fighting in Iraq would not "be as clean as we would like." Various intelligence-collection systems are now devoted to Iraq. "So you wouldn't have the precision in combat going to a second theater of war.... You will end up dropping more bombs, potentially, to get the job done and it will be more brute force in a second [engagement]. But you can certainly get the job done anywhere on the planet with the forces we have available to us right now."

The threat of nuclear proliferation is a key worry, Pace said. "The real concern right now with North Korea is whether or not they would end up providing any weapons they may or may not have to terrorists."

DOJ_NMG_0080807

Pace offered a spirited defense to charges in Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," that top generals had not been blunt enough in presenting their concerns about the war in Iraq to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"You are asking a judge if he runs a fair court when you ask me if I have been blunt enough," Pace said. "My answer is: Yes, I have been very upfront, very straightforward. I have multiple opportunities every day. I am with the secretary of Defense a minimum of 30 minutes a day, more likely three to four hours a day, [and] with the president several times a week."

"I have ample opportunity provided to me by the secretary of Defense and the president to express my views. And, in fact, they have listened to my views and, in fact, have asked me - and invite me - to speak about things that are not just purely military if they in any way impact on the military."

The public climate toward the military now stands in contrast to what Pace and other Vietnam veterans faced. It is "strikingly different, now than 39 years ago," he said. "I think the American people have made a distinction between their support for their military and what they believe personally about any particular fight that is going on. Even those who may be in opposition to things we are doing in the war on terror right now have been extremely warm and welcoming to the troops who are coming home. And that is well understood by the troops."

Loyal To Country Or Conscience? (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

The old veterans gather nearly every morning in Little Tokyo, where an American flag and black granite sculpture rise in honor of 16,000 Japanese Americans who served during World War II.

The idea of anyone tarnishing their war record doesn't sit well, and that's exactly what some think young soldier Ehren Watada is doing.

"He's a bakatare," said George Ishihara, an 85-year-old Santa Monica resident, calling Watada the Japanese word for fool. "He ought to be ashamed of himself."

Across town, another Japanese American World War II veteran sees the young soldier as a hero. "He's following a higher law, and that's your conscience and the Constitution," said Paul Tsuneishi, an 83-year-old Sunland resident.

Watada, 28, is an Army first lieutenant who earlier this year became the first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq, calling the war illegal and immoral. Although other soldiers have refused deployment, his status as an officer sets his case apart. The Honolulu native of Japanese and Chinese descent faces a general court martial and seven years in prison for charges involving his refusal to deploy, criticism of President Bush and "conduct unbecoming an officer."

The soldier, stationed at the U.S. Army's Ft. Lewis base near Seattle, was not available to comment because of ongoing negotiations over his case. But his father, Bob, 66, and stepmother, Rosa Sakanishi, who live in Hawaii, have pressed his case this month in appearances throughout Southern California.

The elder Watada said his son joined the Army to help protect the country after 9/11. But when his superiors told him to study up on the Iraq war, Watada concluded that U.S. officials launched it in violation of U.S. and international laws.

The turning point, the elder Watada said, was in January when Ehren heard the father of an injured soldier lament on a radio show: "Why can't anyone stand up and stop all of this?"

"He thought the guy was talking to him," Watada said of his son. "He thought he was the person who had to stand up."

Watada's case has stirred national debate over the legality of the Iraq war and a soldier's duty versus conscience. But in the Japanese American community, the case has struck a particular nerve, echoing conflicts of another war six decades ago.

"The Watada case has provoked so much emotion because it raises the question of loyalty, and that question severely tested Japanese Americans during World War II," said Lane Hirabayashi of UCLA, the first professor in the nation to hold an academic chair dedicated to the study of the Japanese internment. "It raises a lot of controversies that I don't think have ever been fully resolved."

Debate lingers over how Japanese Americans responded after Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941. Even as the attack prompted the internment of more than 110,000 Japanese Americans and their immigrant parents in remote camps, thousands of young men and women enlisted in the U.S. military, determined to prove their loyalty.

Their service record has made them community icons of mythological proportions. The 442nd Regimental Combat Team and the 100th Battalion, composed mainly of Japanese Americans, became one of the most highly decorated units in U.S. military history.

But a small minority refused to enlist and were harshly ostracized, Hirabayashi said.

They included draft resisters, who refused to serve unless their civil and constitutional rights were restored. They also included those known as "no-no boys," for negatively answering a government loyalty questionnaire asking if they would serve in the U.S. military and renounce allegiance to the emperor of Japan.

DOJ_NMG_0080808

Bitterness between the two sides persists today. Hirabayashi and others, for instance, tell tales of brothers who never spoke again after one resisted and the other served. Ellen Endo, editor of Rafu Shimpo, the Los Angeles Japanese newspaper, calls the Watada debate the most emotional community divide she's seen in four decades.

Nine veterans groups have come out against Watada, while the Asian American Vietnam Veterans Organization backs him. The Japanese American community newspapers are filled with passionate debate over the case.

The community's leading civil rights organization, the Japanese American Citizen's League, is in the hot seat. In July, the league expressed concerns about Watada's free speech rights but said the military issues in the case went beyond its mission as a civil rights group. The statement drew some praise but was also criticized as spineless.

The league's Berkeley chapter and others are urging it to take a stronger stand of support for Watada at its national meeting next month.

"I know a lot of my members will hate my guts for saying this, but I do think he's a hero," the league's executive director, John Tateishi, said of Watada. "There's a point where people have to stand by their personal beliefs."

The elder Watada said he is unfazed by the critics.

"I can only ask them to do a little research," he said during a recent interview. "If they think it's OK to invade another country and kill innocent people, that's up to them, but we strongly disagree."

Watada said his son has always been a straight arrow. The Eagle Scout and near straight-A student, who studied business and graduated from Hawaii Pacific University in 2003, once reluctantly reported high school classmates who were stealing cafeteria funds even though he knew that would label him a snitch, his father said.

After Watada graduated and began seriously considering military service, his father tried to dissuade him. The elder Watada had lost a brother in the Korean War and told his son he didn't want to lose him too.

As terrorist threats dominated the news, however, Ehren told his father he felt he had to serve his country. He received his officer's commission in 2003, served a year in South Korea and was scheduled to deploy to Iraq in June with his Stryker brigade combat team until he began researching the war and developing doubts.

Watada said his son offered to resign or deploy to Afghanistan but was rebuffed.

University of Illinois professor Francis Boyle, an international law expert who testified on behalf of Watada at an Army hearing this year, argued that the soldier was correct to believe the United States illegally launched the Iraq war because it failed to obtain authorization for it from the United Nations Security Council, as required under international law.

Boyle has also argued that the second required authorization — a congressional war resolution — was obtained under false pretenses because the Bush administration erroneously asserted that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and was linked to Al Qaeda. The Nuremberg principles adopted after World War II require soldiers to disobey illegal orders, Boyle said.

But Army spokesman Col. Dan Baggio said political questions over a war's legitimacy were "not the kind of decisions lieutenants and captains make." He said soldiers had a moral obligation to refuse illegal orders in the field — to shoot prisoners of war or innocent civilians, for instance — but they could not pick and choose where to deploy.

"If your nation has made a decision, as a member of the military forces you have an obligation to go," Baggio said. "To me, that's black and white. I would be ashamed if I didn't fulfill the obligation and duty to those troops I serve and the oath I took."

As Ehren's doubts about the war grew, his father who once tried to dissuade him from enlisting was now trying to talk him into deploying. Just go, he told him. Keep your head low.

Watada said he couldn't bear to think of his son locked up for years in the military brig, his once promising career in tatters. But Ehren was adamant about his stand. "How can I lead my men in harm's way for no good reason?" he asked. "Didn't you always tell me to do the right thing?"

Watada had to say yes.

Today, he is his son's biggest booster, tirelessly giving speeches in the hopes that broad public support will help minimize Ehren's sentence. Lt. Gen. James M. Dubik, the Ft. Lewis commander, is expected to decide this month how to proceed in Watada's case.

teresa.watanabe@latimes.com

A Soldier Comes Home To Alaska, Too Early And Yet Too Late (NYT)

By Charlie Leduff

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

BARROW, Alaska — When the soldiers from the frozen tundra shipped out for the burning sands of Iraq, Staff Sgt. Billy Brown promised the women that he'd bring their men back alive.

DOJ_NMG_0080809

But when Sergeant Brown returned just two weeks later, he didn't bring his men at all. He came with a funeral detail. He came cargo, in a silver coffin with wood handles cloaked in an American flag. He is believed to be the first Eskimo killed because of this war. He was 54.

Sergeant Brown, an Alaska national guardsman, never got to a battlefield. He was killed when a tractor-trailer slammed into the back of his Humvee late in July while he was on training maneuvers at Camp Shelby in Mississippi.

His death rattled this town of 4,200, mostly Inupiaq Eskimos, located 500 roadless miles from anywhere and 350 miles north of the Arctic Circle.

Finally, tangibly, the war has reached one of the most isolated corners of the country.

"Until now the war was more like a television show," said Edward S. Itta, mayor of the North Slope Borough, in which Barrow lies, and a friend of Sergeant Brown's. "You don't question the war until it touches you. Only then, when a man like Billy, an important man to us, comes home dead, does the question become clear. We fight. But to what end? What's in it for my grandchildren?"

During the cold war, the battle line was drawn right here on the North Slope, with the Soviets skulking just across the Bering Strait. Most Alaska Guard members stayed in the state, protecting the home front.

But the world has changed. For this war, 670 Guard members have been called up from rural Alaska, its largest foreign deployment ever. The Alaska Guard estimates that one-third of its members are Eskimo, so most likely a third of those deployed are indigenous men, officials say, though the military does not keep official racial records of this type.

Among the most skilled was Staff Sergeant Brown, a 29-year veteran of the Guard and an Arctic survival specialist.

"He could have retired years ago," said his niece Audrey Saganna. But he volunteered for the mission so other soldiers who had served multiple tours in Iraq could get a rest, she said.

The funeral of William Franklin Brown lasted many hours, Eskimo tradition holding that anyone who wanted to speak could do so. It took 20 men an entire day to dig his grave through the permafrost. Tribal leaders decided he should be buried in the Elders Cemetery, a great honor here. His grave is marked like the others, with a simple wooden cross. He is buried next to his father.

Born in the mining town of Lost River on the Seward Peninsula in western Alaska, Sergeant Brown grew up in Barrow, one of 18 brothers and sisters. Whaling is the centerpiece of the culture and Sergeant Brown worked as an oarsman on one crew and was a walrus and polar bear hunter. He worked for a spell at the post office, was elected to the City Council and eventually settled in as the shipping and receiving manager at the local hospital.

By virtue of his hospital job, Sergeant Brown was in attendance when nearly every Barrow child was born. He did not do this out of obligation, his people said, but because he was proud to be Inupiaq.

He never married and fathered no children of his own, but Sergeant Brown was an uncle and a counselor to dozens of struggling young men, and by native tradition, under which age is respected and revered, he was an uncle to hundreds more.

The call-up has affected Eskimo villages all across the state, some of the most remote and rugged corners of this country. The men come from places like Kongiganak, Emmonak and Scammon Bay, where winter survival depends on the summer harvest of otter, moose, geese, fish and whale. With the men gone, the long, brutal winter is expected to be even more bitter for those they've left behind.

Barrow is different from the Eskimo villages. Oil revenues from Prudhoe Bay have made it something of a city. There are flush toilets and smokestacks and a Japanese restaurant. City ways have brought city problems. Methamphetamines and alcohol are afflictions. The native language is spoken less and less. Satellite television is the entertainment of choice, and fewer young people hunt nowadays. Residents increasingly rely on the grocery store freezer rather than the winter larder.

Still, the place is poor. Broken windows are stuffed with newspapers. Houses are weather-beaten affairs of wood on stilts with metal roofs, perpetually heated with natural gas from a field off in the muskeg. Billy Brown's was spare and unpainted, well kept with few adornments. He lived next to his father.

The sun in Barrow disappears from Nov. 18 until Jan. 24, and the temperature can reach 99 below. The roads are gravel, because concrete disintegrates in the cold. The government, financed by oil revenues, is the main industry and because of plentiful natural gas, heating bills are only $200 a month in the dead of winter. Milk is $10 a gallon. Gasoline is $4. "Never Forget" placards are displayed in house windows and on car bumpers, a reference to the 9/11 terrorist attacks. And now, just as much, a reference to Billy Brown.

Sergeant Brown's hometown is not a hissing coal-bed of antiwar activism, yet with his death the doubts began to surface.

"Is it going so badly in the Middle East that the military has to scrape up a few hundred Eskimos and send them to the desert?" asked David Leavitt, a friend, who had butchered caribou hanging from his porch balustrade, drying in the Arctic sun. "I mean he wanted to go, but what's the purpose? We lost Billy for what purpose?"

DOJ_NMG_0080810

The soldiers' wives talk as soldiers' wives do. They talk of pride. They talk about unflinching support for their men. But now that Billy Brown, the leader of their men, has come home in a box, they talk with a slight edge about fear and doubt.

"He signed up for it and it is his duty to go, but I don't like this war at all," said Mia Sanchez, a mother of five whose husband, Jay, enlisted three years ago. "I don't understand it. I thought he'd be protecting Alaska, not Iraq."

Melba Nowpakahok, whose husband, Owen, had Billy Brown for his best man, said that as a military wife it would be counterproductive to question any of it.

"We're just going to go with whatever the higher-ups say," she said. "Whatever the president says. Whatever Rumsfeld says. We're just going to have to go with it."

The eight remaining men from Barrow are to arrive in the Iraqi theater sometime in October, and one company of Arctic soldiers will carry its flag with Billy Brown's name tag sewn to it.

And when the fall whale hunt begins, a new man will be holding the oar that Billy Brown once held.

British General's Remarks Spur Iraq Debate (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley And Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, October 16, 2006

LONDON AND WASHINGTON

A vigorous debate about how quickly Britain can pull out of Iraq has erupted following an unprecedented intervention from the head of the British armed forces, who said troops should leave soon because their presence was doing more harm than good.

In remarks that made leaders on both sides of the Atlantic sit up and take notice, Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt told a newspaper that Britain should get its 7,200 soldiers out of the south of the country "sometime soon" because "our presence exacerbates the security problems."

Though General Dannatt subsequently denied any rift between himself and Prime Minister Tony Blair, his original comments flatly contradicted his political masters, who have stressed they will stay the course in Iraq and insist they are shoring up rather than undermining security there.

Military experts say the general, appointed only in August, was voicing the fears and frustrations of soldiers and officers alike who face an increasingly fraught mission with no end in sight.

"We are in danger of failing in the long term because we don't have enough troops," says former army major Charles Heyman. "There's no doubt that Dannatt is right - he's reflecting what he's being told throughout the Army: that there aren't enough of us there. The British army is fully extended, and there are no more troops to send anywhere."

Although Dannatt rushed to qualify his remarks in a succession of interviews, the impression remained of a general deeply concerned about troop morale, an overstretched army, and the possibility of failure in Iraq.

Tellingly, he added in one radio interview that although he was determined to see the Iraq mission through, he didn't want it to "break" his army. "I want an army in five years time and 10 years time. Don't let's break it on this one. Let's keep an eye on time."

Dannatt's remarks may not have been popular with political leaders, but blogs and Internet postings have found British soldiers overwhelming applauded their commander. One on-line poll found 76 percent thought he had been "absolutely right" to speak out.

"He's looking after concerns of his soldiers," says Amyas Godfrey, a former army captain who served in Iraq in 2003 and 2004.

"In the broad context, the British presence may be fueling the [security] situation," says Godfrey, an associate fellow at the Royal United Services Institute in London, "but a lot of good is being done too." Soldiers are taking on the roles of policemen, civil engineers, construction workers, community officers, and diplomats, he notes.

But while top British and US military officials have - at least in private - voiced concern about the situation in Iraq, Dannatt is the first active-duty general on either side of the Atlantic to go so far publicly.

Privately, senior US military officials admit that the window is closing on the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to rein in paramilitary death squads and sectarian violence. Political leaders have taken up the mantra - notably senior Republicans among them - who say US Iraq policy can no longer be to "stay the course."

Sen. John Warner (R) of Virginia, chairman of the armed services committee, said this month after a trip to Baghdad that "a change of course" would be on the agenda if the rising violence is not quelled soon. Sen. Olympia Snowe (R) of Maine seconded Mr. Warner's concerns, saying that "staying the course is neither an option nor a plan."

On Friday, House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi issued a statement jumping on Dannatt's comments, saying his conclusions mirror those of "many American generals and the partially declassified National Intelligence Estimate on Terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0080811

Ms. Pelosi appeared to be referring to a number of retired generals who recently backed the estimate's findings that the Iraq war is hurting the broader war on terrorism.

An accelerated British withdrawal from Iraq would deprive America of its most steadfast ally on the most perilous frontline in the "war on terror."

But an early pullout remains unlikely, for all Dannatt's misgivings: Tony Blair has pledged to withdraw only when Iraqi forces can handle the wretched security situation, as has Gordon Brown, the man most likely to succeed him when he steps down in the middle of next year.

The official line is that the troops are there under a UN mandate and at the behest of a democratically elected government. Iraqi leaders say the troops are essential to preserve security, and many analysts are skeptical that rapid withdrawal would remove the catalyst for violence.

Michael O'Hanlon, an expert in military affairs at the Brookings Institution in Washington, said that Dannatt's remarks are "at least a small blow to the [Bush] administration's policy," but adds: "I also think there are holes in this argument that if we left, things would get better."

Yet some military experts believe Dannatt's view may ultimately prove too hard to ignore if things go from bad to worse in Iraq.

"If his assessment is right and we are doing more harm than good, then shouldn't we change the policy?" asks Lord Tim Garden, a former assistant chief of the defense staff, adding that the general was giving "a totally accurate reflection of the situation as he sees it."

"Certainly the defense ministry might be relatively relaxed that this will move on the debate about an earlier exit for British troops, because they [ministry officials] are feeling the strain and worried about failure," he adds.

Dannatt's big fear is that the formidable demands on the British army in both Iraq and Afghanistan are stretching the force to its limits. Some military chiefs understood - incorrectly as it turns out - that agreeing to spearhead the fight against the Taliban in Afghanistan, as Britain has done this year, might enable Britain to relinquish some of its duties in Iraq back to the Americans.

Dannatt has been decorated for bravery during a long military career, but even by his standards, his bluntness was courageous. Generals meddling in politics are normally frowned on in mature, sedate democracies.

"I wouldn't be surprised if the prime minister sacks him," says Heyman.

No End In Sight (WT)

By Paul Moorcraft

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

The United Kingdom (U.K.) is facing its biggest crisis in civil-military relations since the Second World War. Six weeks into his new job, the head of the British Army, Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, has broken constitutional protocol by appearing to contradict government policy on Iraq.

On Friday morning a dramatic wide-ranging interview with Gen. Dannatt was published in the London Daily Mail. He warned that the presence of U.K. troops was exacerbating security problems in Iraq and should withdraw "sometime soon." He also said that the planning for post-war occupation was "poor, probably based more on optimism than sound planning."

The original ambition was to install liberal democracy: "Whether that was a sensible or naive hope, history will judge. I don't think we are going to do that...We should aim for a lower ambition." The general also talked of his Christian values, and the moral vacuum that allows radical Islam to flourish in Britain.

This ignited a media frenzy about the general wanting to quit Iraq soon, thus contradicting Prime Minister Tony Blair's statement that it would be "craven surrender" to leave Iraq while it was still in turmoil.

This in turn generated shock waves in the prime minister's office, and allegedly furious phone calls from Washington.

Opposition politicians viewed the general's remarks as "blindingly obvious," but said that saying them publicly was "unprecedented."

Some military commentators were astounded at the "breach of propriety" and wondered if the general had been misquoted and, if not, whether he would be sacked.

No doubt under orders to recant, the general immediately did a round of media interviews to "clarify" his remarks -- despite the fact that the original Daily Mail interview had been authorized.

This "clarification" perhaps made matters worse when the general implied that the army could be "broken" if it is kept too long in Iraq. The prime minister's office rushed to say that Tony Blair "agreed with every word." The Ministry of Defence also issued a further statement that the general was on the record as standing "shoulder to shoulder with the Americans" and that he was planning "force packages in Iraq through 2007 to 2008."

DOJ_NMG_0080812

But the genie was out of the bottle. The British Army is running out of soldiers, equipment and patience, though not fighting spirit. The British military establishment fears it is reinforcing failure in Iraq. The plan to engage in Afghanistan, and so be allowed to leave Iraq, has backfired.

It had been assumed in London that Washington's exit strategy was to be asked to leave by Baghdad. Instead, the beleaguered Iraqi government will cling on to its coalition security blanket as long as possible. Britain's premature departure, however, may prompt U.S. withdrawal.

A prime minister would normally sack a general who publicly undermined the central plank of his premiership, especially as it also threatens the fundamentals of U.S. foreign policy.

The senior professional politicians in the Labor government, unlike some in the Conservative opposition, have no firsthand military experience. And Tony Blair is a lame-duck prime minister. He may be too weak to sack his forthright general.

A behind-the-scenes forced resignation, especially if it were seen to be a result of U.S. pressure, would trigger more unrest in the armed forces, perhaps even a joint demarche by other commanders. Recently retired chiefs of the defense staff have publicly declared their concerns.

The security establishment has long been calling for a service chief to stand up to what it sees as political bungling in the direction of the wars.

Defense chiefs know that Iraq could descend into a maelstrom of total chaos, and they do not want to desert an ally or leave the job unfinished. But no end is in sight, and the British army can only just about cope now, let alone in the future.

The general must have felt that the views of the senior military had too long been ignored. Some top brass had become political ciphers or had been effectively gagged.

But Gen. Dannatt's frankness may be dangerous. Civilian control of the military is a cornerstone of Western democracy. Gen. Douglas MacArthur threatened to use nuclear weapons against the Chinese army in Korea, but he was relieved of his command by President Truman.

Gen. Dannatt's comments might also undermine his own troops fighting in the Middle East -- why should they risk death for a policy which their own top commander has said, in effect, is inflaming the war on terror? But even the Ministry of Defence will privately admit that troops in the field are "cheering him to the rooftops"; nearly all the unofficial army blogs confirm this. British forces can now imagine withdrawal, regardless of the U.S. timetable.

Some British officers say that it is about time senior U.S. generals spoke their mind, rather than wait for retirement before they complain that American forces are also overstretched, and perhaps the U.S. army could not field more than two brigades to operate outside Afghanistan or Iraq. In this context, General Dannatt may have done his American ally a service.

Officers will risk their lives but never their careers. General Dannatt's bravery is beyond doubt: he won the coveted Military Cross when he was 22. Now he is risking the top job for the army he loves.

Paul Moorcraft, the director of the Centre for Foreign Policy Analysis, is a former senior instructor at the Royal Military Academy, Sandhurst and the U.K. Joint Services Command and Staff College.

The Latest Chapters On The War (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

In an age of blogging, podcasting, BlackBerrying and instant messaging, when any thought can be expressed within nanoseconds, an old-fashioned form of technology is making a comeback.

It's called the book, a collection of pages, bound between hard covers, that generally takes at least two years to report, write, edit and publish, using the kind of presses that date to the 15th century.

With striking swiftness, a series of books about the Iraq war has exposed deep flaws in its planning and execution, made the Bush administration appear dysfunctional at times and generated enormous news coverage.

All are by journalists with access to daily or weekly outlets. The bestsellers include "Fiasco" by The Washington Post's Thomas Ricks; "Cobra II" by Michael Gordon of the New York Times and former Timesman Bernard Trainor; "Hubris" by Newsweek's Michael Isikoff and the Nation's David Corn; and now "State of Denial" by The Post's Bob Woodward.

Even President Bush observed last week that "somebody ought to add up the number of pages that have been written about my administration."

The Iraq mess is a large and tempting target. And despite a huge volume of coverage over the last several years, a considerable amount of material remained beneath the surface, awaiting excavation by authors.

Some critics grumble that the journalists should have gone public with their information sooner, rather than saving it for books. But it takes time to build a case and to coax information from people who may have little interest in joining the daily political sniping.

DOJ_NMG_0080813

Isikoff says some sources are more willing to talk candidly for the historical record. Former House majority leader Dick Armey, for example, disclosed how he had expressed doubts about the Iraq venture but was pressed by President Bush and Vice President Cheney to keep quiet.

"A lot of stuff was concealed from the public, especially in the run-up to war," Isikoff says. "It's aggressively reporting events of a couple of years ago instead of what happened yesterday. It's the second draft of history."

The Gordon-Trainor book reveals that Gen. Tommy Franks expected to draw down American forces in Iraq to 30,000 within months. Ricks argues that U.S. military and diplomatic missteps in 2003 inflamed the Iraqi opposition. "There are a lot of people who've served in Iraq who were really upset about it -- guys who commanded divisions, brigades, companies," Ricks says. "They had a lot to say and they wanted to say it." He says his biggest ally was time -- both the year off to work on the book and the passage of time that gave sources a greater comfort level.

One former Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) official in Iraq provided Ricks with every e-mail he had sent to the unit's boss, Paul Bremer. A commander gave Ricks a CD-ROM with every PowerPoint briefing he had received. Sources even gave him the classified plan for invading Iraq. In 2003, he says, "they would have deemed it too sensitive. Two years later, who cares?"

Woodward, who builds narratives by granting many sources anonymity, specializes in going back to his subjects again and again. For "State of Denial," he has said that he interviewed former White House chief of staff Andrew Card for seven hours over five sittings, producing 207 pages of transcripts -- and news that Card had tried to get Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld fired.

In "The One Percent Doctrine," former Wall Street Journal reporter Ron Suskind revealed al-Qaeda planning for a cyanide attack in New York's subways, and reported that some CIA officials regarded Bush as little more than Cheney's puppet.

Suskind says book projects can break through an administration's "message discipline."

"What you can do in a book that gets around the daily battle over news cycles is you can say to subjects that they will be rendered in context," he says. "Sources often say, 'This is a complex situation.' I can say back to them, 'I've got plenty of time.' " In a newspaper, he adds, "you're probably not going to have space to write thousands of words on some philosophical debate or longstanding internecine conflict."

A striking number of these efforts have come from journalists at The Post, which has a lenient policy toward allowing staffers time off to write books. The Post's Rajiv Chandrasekaran, in his best-selling "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," reported that the Coalition Provisional Authority had hired a number of people who had conservative credentials but lacked vital skills and experience. Former secretary of state Colin Powell gave six lengthy interviews to The Post's Karen DeYoung for her biography "Soldier."

Books can also act as a catalyst. New York Times reporter James Risen planned to disclose the administration's domestic eavesdropping program in his book "State of War" after the paper held for a year the article he co-wrote on the subject. As the book neared publication, the Times ran the story after all. Times Executive Editor Bill Keller told New York magazine that the imminent release of the book was a "factor" in the discussions but not the principal reason for his decision.

Once books become fodder for the media machine, the carefully constructed 300-page arguments get boiled down to a handful of scooplets and anecdotes. But it is their accumulated detail and intellectual heft that embosses the books with credibility.

In the 1990s and early 2000s, starting with a slew of anti-Clinton books (against both Bill and Hillary), many of the publishing success stories seemed to be on the right. Ann Coulter's "Slander," Bernard Goldberg's "Bias" and volumes by Bill O'Reilly, Sean Hannity, Rush Limbaugh and Michael Savage often topped the charts.

But now, with Bush struggling in Iraq and mired in low poll numbers, the books packing the greatest political punch seem to be those charging the administration with incompetence. And while they are mostly written by working reporters and editors, not commentators, liberal readers are surely fueling the surge in sales.

In one sign of the times, no fewer than three books ripping Coulter -- "Soulless" by Susan Estrich; "Brainless" by Joe Maguire; and "I Hate Ann Coulter" by "Unanimous" -- are all heading to bookshelves.Tainted Series?

Kentucky's Lexington Herald-Leader yesterday launched an investigative series on Sen. Mitch McConnell pushing legislation for his affluent donors -- an effort originally paid for by a foundation that has financed several liberal groups that oppose the Republican lawmaker.

The paper's parent firm, McClatchy Co., decided last week to repay the $35,000 grant, which underwrote six months of salary and expenses for a Herald-Leader reporter on leave. The grant came from the respected Center for Investigative Reporting, which was passing on money provided by the St. Louis-based Deer Creek Foundation.

Deer Creek has funded a variety of liberal groups, including New York University law school's Brennan Center for Justice, which represented opponents of McConnell in a campaign-finance lawsuit that reached the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0080814

"It's like the NRA funding a report about Sarah Brady," the gun-control advocate, says McConnell spokesman Don Stewart. "You've got to be somewhat leery about the objectivity."

McClatchy Vice President Howard Weaver says his company, which inherited the situation after buying the Herald-Leader, does not believe in such grants. "As a matter of practice, if we want some journalism done in our newsrooms, we pay for it," Weaver says. "But I've heard enough politicians explain why they gave back a campaign contribution to know it's not a perfect remedy."

Dan Noyes, acting director of the reporting center, says he paid for the series because the money went to the reporter, not the newspaper. Noyes sees no conflict because his group has an "arm's length relationship" with Deer Creek, and he says its $300,000 grant will fund campaign finance probes of both Democrats and Republicans.One Really Long Article

Esquire is taking the strange step of making endorsements -- in all 504 congressional and gubernatorial races.

For the just-released issue, the magazine says it weighed such factors as effectiveness and hypocrisy, not Iraq or taxes, in an idiosyncratic process that wound up backing a majority of Democrats for the House and Senate.

"We didn't come at it from any ideological standpoint," says Executive Editor Mark Warren. "We endorsed Ted Kennedy and Trent Lott, because of a combination of how they serve their state and how they function in the Senate."

Afghan Attack Brings Total Of Canadians Killed To 42 (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 15 — Two Canadian soldiers in the NATO force were killed and three were wounded in an ambush in southern Afghanistan on Saturday afternoon, and an Afghan provincial council member was assassinated Sunday on his way to work, officials said.

In other violence, an Italian photojournalist was reported to have been kidnapped by gunmen in southern Afghanistan. Two policemen were killed in a raid on Afghanistan's eastern border with Pakistan, and two civilians died in a roadside bomb explosion that was apparently intended for a Westerner's vehicle that was passing by, news agencies reported.

The Canadians were killed when their convoy came under fire by rocket-propelled grenades and gunfire in Kandahar Province, forcing their unit to call in airstrikes, according to a NATO news release. Forty-two Canadian soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan this year.

Muhammad Younus Hussaini, the Kandahar provincial council member, was shot dead by two men on a motorbike as he was setting off in his car for his office, said the chief of security of police, Abdul Hakim Hangar. Mr. Hussaini's driver was wounded in the attack, he said.

Mr. Hussaini was the second local official to be killed in Kandahar city in three weeks. The head of the women's affairs department was fatally shot as she left her home on foot for work on Sept. 25, in what the police said was part of a campaign by Taliban insurgents to intimidate the population. The police chief in Kandahar, Gen. Esmatullah Alizai, said however that it was too early to say if Mr. Hussaini had been killed by the Taliban or someone else, perhaps because of some personal enmity.

The abducted Italian photojournalist, Gabriele Torsello, and his Afghan interpreter were taken by five armed men on Saturday as they drove from Lashkar Gah, the capital of Helmand Province, to the neighboring province of Kandahar, news agencies reported. The area, where British troops were battling thousands of militants through much of the summer, is prone to ambush and impromptu checkpoints by the Taliban and criminals.

The kidnapping occurred just a week after two German journalists were killed by unknown gunmen in central Afghanistan.

Italian Journalist, Afghan Translator Abducted In Southern Province (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal/AP, October 16, 2006

KANADAHAR, Afghanistan -- An Italian freelance photographer and his assistant were abducted in southern Afghanistan, an official said Sunday.

Gabriele Torsello and his Afghan translator were abducted by armed men on Saturday as they were driving from Lashkar Gah, the capital of the southern Helmand province, toward neighboring Kandahar, an Afghan official in Helmand said.

The two were in their car when they were abducted, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to speak to the media. Mr. Torsello earlier spent time in Musa Qala, another restive area in Helmand province, the official said.

Maj. Luke Knittig, a North Atlantic Treaty Organization spokesman in Kabul, said the organization was informed by another reporter that Mr. Torsello hasn't been in contact for the last three days and that it was trying to locate him. The missing reporter wasn't registered with the NATO media office and wasn't on an alliance sponsored trip, Mr. Knittig said.

DOJ_NMG_0080815

Maso Notarianni, the director of Italian online magazine Peace Reporter, told Italian state TV that Torsello had called a hospital in Lashkar Gah, apparently to let authorities know he was kidnapped. "Until Thursday he was in the deep south of Afghanistan, in Taliban-controlled territory," Mr. Notarianni said.

The southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar have been the scene of the most intense fighting between Taliban and NATO troops this year, the worst upsurge in violence in the country since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 that ousted the Taliban regime from power.

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Health Insurer's Chief Is Ousted In Options Inquiry (NYT)

By Eric Dash And Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Dr. William W. McGuire, a medical entrepreneur who built the UnitedHealth Group into a colossus in its field, was forced to resign from the company yesterday and to give up a portion of the $1.1 billion he holds in harshly criticized stock options.

UnitedHealth, one of the nation's two largest health insurers, also dismissed its general counsel and a member of its board in what amounted to a sweeping overhaul of its governance practices and leadership ranks. The options that Dr. McGuire had been granted over the years have led to criminal and civil investigations and public disapproval.

In a sweeping report released yesterday that was highly critical of management, a law firm hired by UnitedHealth to investigate the timing of stock options concluded that the company was riddled with poor controls and conflicts of interest. The report, which the company posted on its Web site, found that UnitedHealth had backdated options to maximize employees' compensation.

The company said yesterday that the disputed options would be repriced from the lowest share price for the years in question to the highest prices, scaling back the earnings of Dr. McGuire and others. The company did not say precisely how much its executives would give up.

The developments are the most dramatic to date since federal regulators started looking into the widespread practice of backdating stock options. More than 100 companies have come under scrutiny over the unlikely coincidence of stock options being granted again and again to senior executives on dates when the company's share price was low, a tactic that guaranteed the maximum profit when the options were turned into cash.

Executives at several companies have already been forced to resign, and at UnitedHealth Group, it was announced that five other directors would be forced out over the next three years.

At UnitedHealth, there was significant evidence that options were backdated for employees at all levels of the company between 1994 and 2002. But among the most substantial and egregious, according to the law firm's report, were those awarded to Dr. McGuire, the company's longtime chairman and chief executive. Of the 12 options grants issued to Dr. McGuire, three just happened to be priced at the stock's lowest price that year.

The Justice Department, the Minnesota Attorney General's office, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service are all investigating UnitedHealth's options practices.

Most of the companies implicated in backdating controversies so far are Silicon Valley start-ups or firms with technology roots, where options with favorable dates were considered a recruitment tool in the dot-com boom. UnitedHealth, which has a market capitalization of $66 billion, is one of the few large blue-chip companies to stumble over the issue, and its problems underscore how prevalent the practice has been. Scrutiny over backdating also comes at a time of increasingly loud criticism of excesses of executive pay.

At UnitedHealth, even the man named to replace Dr. McGuire as chief executive has been a beneficiary of backdated options: Stephen J. Hemsley, who has been Dr. McGuire's top lieutenant, will lose a sizable portion of his options, the company said.

"Mr. Hemsley has voluntarily agreed to reprice all options awarded through 2002 to the annual high share price for each year, and to take any other appropriate action to eliminate any possible financial benefit from options-related issues," UnitedHealth said. Other senior UnitedHealth executives, including Dr. McGuire and the resigning general counsel, David J. Lubben, will take similar actions, the company said.

In a lengthy and somewhat contrite statement after a board meeting yesterday, UnitedHealth announced that it would take a series of steps recommended by an outside law firm, Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, which had been hired by a special committee of UnitedHealth directors. The seven-month investigation led to a showdown that ended late yesterday after Dr. McGuire and the UnitedHealth board was presented with the findings.

In their report, investigators from Wilmer Cutler found that "most of the 29 stock grants" that accounted for nearly 450 million stock options that the company awarded between 1994 and 2002 "were likely backdated."

The report also found that a grant of one million stock options to Dr. McGuire and 500,000 options awarded to Mr. Hemsley in connection with their 1999 employment contract were probably backdated. But the company's outside investigators appeared to clear Mr. Hemsley, finding that he "had little or no role in the negotiation of, or the process leading up to, the option award" related to the contract.

Investigators, moreover, painted a picture of "inadequate" internal controls and a senior management team that failed to set an appropriate tone at the top. But the report attempted to clear the directors on the compensation committee of any legal wrongdoing. "The directors were entitled to presume that matters brought before them for action were procedurally proper and consistent with applicable legal and accounting standards," the report concludes.

The report also said that the financial relationships between Dr. McGuire and the board member who resigned yesterday, William G. Spears, who headed the board's compensation committee when Dr. McGuire's employment agreement was negotiated in 1999, "created a conflict of interest." Mr. Spears served as a trustee for two trusts for Dr. McGuire's children and managed as much as $55 million of Dr. McGuire's money. He also managed millions of dollars managed for Mr. Hemsley.

Acting on the law firm's recommendations, the board said it would replace, within three years, all of the directors on its compensation committee who had approved the improper options. The company also said it would create new senior executive posts to oversee ethics and compensation.

Dr. McGuire, an internist and lung specialist, will not leave empty-handed: he will still take home hundreds of millions of dollars from stock options. Over his 18 years at UnitedHealth, he banked more than a half billion dollars. UnitedHealth said last night that it was still negotiating whether he would receive a $5.1 million a year pension, which is called for in his employment contract.

Dr. McGuire is by far the best known, most powerful and most richly compensated business leader to be toppled by challenges to pay packages that were inflated by stock options based on favorable, low purchase dates. Options are typically granted at the current market price of the stock, to avoid adverse tax and accounting consequences.

Options-dating issues led to the resignation from the Apple Computer board two weeks ago of Fred D. Anderson of a former chief financial officer of Apple, but the company said that Steven P. Jobs, chief executive of Apple, had not benefited from improper equity awards.

The United Health board faced formidable challenges at its meeting yesterday. Dr. McGuire is a superstar executive with one of the best track records in American business, and losing him could undermine the confidence of Wall Street investors. The statement released by UnitedHealth, which is based in Minneapolis, pointed out that under Dr. McGuire's leadership, the company's stock price had risen by almost 8,500 percent.

But not acting posed considerable legal and financial risks for the company and the directors themselves. For some compensation committee members who remain on the board, ousting Dr. McGuire over stock option improprieties might mean implicating themselves.

Wall Street analysts said investors, who have driven down United's stock price by more than 20 percent this year, are likely to be jolted by the departure of the widely admired Dr. McGuire but may be reassured by the promotion of Mr. Hemsley, "the guy who makes things happen" at the company, said Sheryl Skolnick, a health care analyst at the CRT Capital Group.

The uproar over backdating erupted at a time when dozens of companies were forced to restate earnings to reflect option awards, under new accounting rules. UnitedHealth said in May that restating could cut as much as $286 million from profits for 2003, 2004 and last year.

The Justice Department has brought charges against officers at two companies — Brocade Communications and Comverse Technology — over options backdating, and with dozens of cases under review, more charges could be on the way. Boards, meanwhile, have forced out more than two-dozen executives, including five in the past week. And scores of companies are rushing to restate their results in time for this quarter's earnings, so they do not face legal and financial exposure for additional delays.

In an apparent effort to get ahead of the official investigators, in March, a special committee of UnitedHealth's independent directors began examining the 45,000 separate stock option grants made to company employees. The following month, the committee hired William R. McLucas, a former S.E.C. enforcement director, and his team of investigators, Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, to lead the review.

There are also questions about the an unusual clause woven into Dr. McGuire's 1999 employment contract that allowed him to choose the grant date of his stock options by providing "oral notification" to the human resources or compensation committee chair. While there is nothing illegal about such a provision, compensation specialists say the practice could lead to abuse. The clause was eliminated last year.

Most analysts have continued to recommend the stock during its slide, but Matthew Borsch, who follows UnitedHealth at Goldman Sachs, predicted that United's share price "will fall further now with the certainty of Dr. McGuire's departure."

Ms. Skolnick or CRT Capital Group had other concerns. She said the changes announced yesterday were "good" but added that "the scary thing" was the possibility that past stock-dating practices may still lead to costly penalties. "I worry that something bad must have happened," she said.

Health-Care Firm's Chief To Depart Over Stock Options (WP/AP)

By Joshua Freed

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

UnitedHealth Group Inc., one of the largest managed health-care companies, said yesterday that chairman and chief executive William W. McGuire will step down, after months of questions about the timing behind his stock option grants.

The Minnesota-based company said McGuire will step down immediately as chairman and as a director. It said that McGuire would continue as chief executive until Dec. 1 at the latest and that he would "assist in an orderly transition to new leadership."

The company named Stephen Hemsley, currently president and chief operating officer, to be the new chief executive. It also installed Richard Burke, the founding chief executive of UnitedHealth's predecessor company, as chairman.

UnitedHealth also said that board member William G. Spears was resigning and that General Counsel David J. Lubben would retire.

The overhaul comes after directors received an outside report they commissioned to look at UnitedHealth's options-granting practices. McGuire had been under pressure since the Wall Street Journal reported in March that he received stock options on the days the company's stock price hit yearly lows in 1997, 1999 and 2000. The timing of those options is unlikely to have worked out that way unless the grants were backdated.

Because an option's price is set according to the stock price on the day of the grant, a low stock price makes an option more valuable.

Backdating stock options isn't always illegal, but failing to disclose it can trigger tax and regulatory problems. Indeed, in May, UnitedHealth acknowledged a "significant deficiency" in its handling of stock options and said it may have to restate as much as $286 million in earnings for 2003, 2004 and 2005.

UnitedHealth has disclosed that the Internal Revenue Service asked it for documents dating to 2003 concerning stock options and other compensation for some executives. It has also been subpoenaed by federal prosecutors.

On Sunday, the company released a report by an outside law firm that examined 29 options grants made between 1994 and 2006. The report found that most of those options grants didn't show a written grant date or price until weeks or, in one case, nearly a month after the grant date. The report concluded that "many of the options grants were likely backdated."

The report found eight cases where options were granted on the lowest price of the quarter, all of them before Aug. 29, 2002, when the Sarbanes-Oxley law began requiring quicker disclosures of stock options grants. After that, the number of such well-timed options grants dropped to zero.

McGuire had $1.6 billion in exercisable options at the end of 2005.

UnitedHealth In Shake-Up Over Options (LAT)

By Lisa Girion

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

The chief executive of one of the nation's largest health insurance companies retired under pressure Sunday, the latest executive to fall in an options-based pay scandal that is unfolding at scores of companies nationwide.

UnitedHealth Group Inc. announced that William McGuire, 59, was leaving — along with a director who oversaw executive compensation and the firm's top lawyer.

The announcement came in the wake of a board-commissioned investigation that found that stock option grants were "likely backdated" to allow insiders to maximize financial gains.

President and Chief Operating Officer Stephen Helmsley was tapped to replace McGuire. He said little about the stock options controversy in a statement released Sunday.

"In light of the recently completed investigation, I have determined that it is in the best interests of the company that I assist Steve Helmsley in an orderly transition to succeed me as CEO," McGuire said.

DOJ_NMG_0080818

UnitedHealth doubled its presence in California last year when it bought Cypress-based PacifiCare Health Systems Inc. for $9.2 billion.

During McGuire's 15-year tenure, UnitedHealth's share price increased fiftyfold and he amassed a potential fortune in unexercised stock options. Now, U.S. and state regulators are probing the dating of the stock options.

An investigation by a law firm hired by UnitedHealth's board concluded that 1.5 million options — most of which were granted to McGuire as a part of his 1999 compensation package — were "likely backdated."

The results of that investigation — given to board members last week and made public Sunday — were viewed as creating pressure on McGuire to leave.

Yet, because the investigation had been underway for more than six months, there was a sense among investors until only recently that McGuire would survive the scandal, said Sheryl Skolnick, an analyst at CRT Capital in Stanford, Conn.

"I don't think anybody expected Bill to be forced to retire," she said.

McGuire's departure was announced only days after the leaders of two technology companies stepped down, all signs of the growing scope of a scandal over once-hidden stock option practices designed to pad insiders' compensation packages.

Various government investigators have drawn more than 100 companies into their crosshairs, and analysts said the shake-ups in the executive suites suggested corporate boards were rushing to clean house before potential crackdowns by federal regulators or prosecutors.

"If there's a problem, and it's traced to the CEO, then boards have to take the appropriate action," Skolnick said.

McGuire, who also served as chairman of the Minnetonka, Minn.-based company, relinquished that post as well Sunday. The company said he would remain CEO as late as Dec. 1 to assist in the transition.

The terms of McGuire's parting, "including other options issues and financial benefits," were still under discussion, the company said.

McGuire also agreed to reprice all stock options awarded to him from 1994 through 2002 to the annual high share price for each year to eliminate any financial benefit from backdating.

Before the repricing, McGuire's options were reported to be worth more than $1.6 billion.

Helmsley, who the investigation's report said received 500,000 of the questionably timed options, also agreed to reprice his options.

The scandal was touched off by a Wall Street Journal report in March. It questioned whether UnitedHealth and other companies had dated executives' options, after they were granted, to when the shares dipped particularly low in order to maximize the recipients' gains.

The newspaper reported that McGuire received options on the days UnitedHealth's share price hit annual lows in 1997, 1999 and 2000 — timing that was all but impossible by chance.

The legal and tax problems surrounding backdating involve inadequate disclosure. UnitedHealth said in May that because of a "significant deficiency" in its handling of options, it may have to restate as much as $286 million in earnings for 2003, 2004 and 2005.

In its report, the law firm that investigated the options granting at UnitedHealth found that the board's compensation committee was kept in the dark about details such as the dating of options.

Another problem, it said, was that the board was not informed of the full extent of financial relationships between McGuire and William Spears, who was chairman of the compensation committee at the time the CEO's 1999 compensation package was put together.

"An appropriate tone at the top, adequate controls and discipline over the option granting process, and management transparency with the board and its committees on executive compensation matters are basic and critical to the integrity of option grants," the report said. "There were various failings in these areas."

General counsel David J. Lubben and Spears also are leaving, the company said.

Analysts said investors still had to worry about lawsuits and whether the government probes would find criminal wrongdoing by individuals or the company.

McGuire, a trained physician from Texas who towers over most colleagues, ascended to the helm of what was then a regional healthcare company in 1989.

Through a series of acquisitions, he turned UnitedHealth into an managed-care leader with nearly 30 million enrollees across the country.

In a note to employees, McGuire took pride in his role in UnitedHealth's transformation.

"We have made significant advances in improving access to care, fostering greater affordability and enhancing the quality of healthcare for all individuals," he said. "At the same time, we have built a vital and sustaining company serving a diverse group of customers, healthcare providers, and certainly shareholders."

DOJ_NMG_0080819

One of UnitedHealth's latest acquisitions was last year's purchase of PacifiCare. But the ownership change may have gone largely unnoticed by patients because the company kept the PacifiCare name in the state.

With the acquisition of PacifiCare's Secure Horizons HMOs, UnitedHealth vastly expanded its slice of the rapidly growing Medicare market.

But that government business could be at issue if prosecutors seek criminal charges against the company. In the event of a conviction, the government could move to have UnitedHealth excluded as a Medicare and Medicaid contractor, analysts said.

The board announced a series of operating and governance changes Sunday and installed UnitedHealth founding CEO Richard Burke as chairman.

Options scandals are roiling across the corporate landscape. More than two dozen executives have quit or been fired amid probes over the backdating of stock option grants to enrich corporate insiders.

*

lisa.girion@latimes.com

Embattled CEO To Step Down At UnitedHealth (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

The scandal over backdated stock options claimed one of corporate America's most successful chief executives, William McGuire of UnitedHealth Group Inc., who agreed to leave the giant health insurer after an internal probe concluded that the stock-option grants that have brought him a huge fortune were likely manipulated.

The probe's findings, released yesterday, provided a detailed picture of how stock-option backdating worked at the company, offering glimpses of cronyism and a culture in which vast sums of compensation were handed out with few controls or written records. Among the troublesome option grants detailed in the report was a massive 1999 award to Dr. McGuire that ranks among the most lucrative ever. UnitedHealth said Dr. McGuire would immediately relinquish the chairman's post and step down as CEO by Dec. 1. Also leaving is William G. Spears, a member of the board's compensation committee who had deep financial entanglements with Dr. McGuire, which were undisclosed to investors, and David Lubben, the company's general counsel.

With the UnitedHealth departures, more than 30 top corporate officials will have lost their posts in the wake of the options-manipulation investigations that have engulfed more than 100 U.S. companies over the past several months. Dr. McGuire is the fifth CEO in the past week to depart in the still-burgeoning scandal.

Dr. McGuire will be replaced as chief executive by his longtime lieutenant, Stephen Hemsley. The probe, conducted by the law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, found that Mr. Hemsley received backdated grants, but largely cleared him of a major role in their creation. Richard T. Burke, a director and former UnitedHealth CEO, was named nonexecutive chairman.

At the end of last year, Dr. McGuire's cache of unexercised options was valued at $1.78 billion, a sum far greater than any other U.S. corporate chieftain. Yesterday, UnitedHealth said he agreed to have all of the options issued to him from 1994 through 2002 repriced, likely cutting tens of millions in dollars from their value. But the company left open other financial arrangements with Dr. McGuire, and the exact terms of his departure are likely to be the subject of intense negotiations.

UnitedHealth, which is based in Minnetonka, Minn., and has a market capitalization of $66 billion, also is being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission, by federal prosecutors in New York, and by the Minnesota attorney general. The probe by WilmerHale was headed by William McLucas, a former director of the enforcement division of the SEC. It examined 29 of the largest options grants at UnitedHealth over a 12-year period, and concluded that most likely were backdated to benefit insiders.

Options are designed to give recipients the opportunity to profit if the company's share price rises in the future. Grants typically are structured so that the recipient can buy shares later at the stock's market price on the day the option was granted, or the exercise price. Backdating involves pretending that the grant was awarded on an earlier day, when the share price was particularly low, giving the recipient a chance at extra profit.

Although couched in careful language, the 14-page WilmerHale report suggests that Dr. McGuire misled lawyers conducting the probe of the options grants at issue. To the end, Dr. McGuire insisted that year after year he actually did call or otherwise contact a compensation-committee member to set an options grant in motion on what, in hindsight, turned out to be a wildly favorable day.

"Certain facts run contrary to this assertion," the WilmerHale report says, citing memoranda Dr. McGuire wrote on or after the purported grant dates referring to possible grants in the future tense. The report also takes a skeptical view of the circumstantial evidence presented by Dr. McGuire to document that the compensation-committee notifications did in fact take place.

DOJ_NMG_0080820

Dr. McGuire's lawyer, David M. Brodsky, declined to comment on the WilmerHale report. A spokesman for Mr. Spears also declined to address it, saying only that Mr. Spears was proud of his 15-year service on the UnitedHealth board. Mr. Lubben couldn't be reached for comment.

The lawyers conducting the probe also noted that of the 27 grants between 1994 and August 2002 under review, eight were given at the lowest price of the quarter in which they were dated, and another eight were either at the second-lowest or third-lowest price of the quarter. It was the improbability that such fortunate dates were chosen by chance -- the essence of Dr. McGuire's contention -- that helped persuade the board that he needed to leave the company, according to a person close to the situation.

The 29 grants examined in depth in the report covered 85% of all the options granted in the 12-year period. Of those 29, WilmerHale's Mr. McLucas said there were "relatively few instances in which there is either direct or circumstantial evidence to establish that a grant date was selected on that particular day." The first written evidence of a grant in the company's files often appeared weeks after the grant date, and in at least one case, a month later.

The WilmerHale report prominently cites a March 18 article in The Wall Street Journal that focused on options-grant patterns at UnitedHealth and other companies and suggested that the unusual patterns were indicative of possible backdating. The report says the Journal article prompted an SEC inquiry, and also the hiring of WilmerHale to do the probe. The Journal's analysis found that the odds were infinitesimal -- about 200 million to one -- that Dr. McGuire's grant pattern at UnitedHealth occurred by chance.

In the mid-1980s, Dr. McGuire quit clinical practice as a pulmonologist, or lung specialist, to hitch himself to the health-insurance boom. He presided over stratospheric growth at UnitedHealth -- the company's stock rose some 50-fold during his tenure. He is credited with savvy investments in technology, smart deal making and a visionary strategy that turned the company into a powerful force in American medicine.

Along the way, he appears to have paid close attention to stock options.

Year after year while at the helm of UnitedHealth, Dr. McGuire received giant option grants. In many of those years, the purported dates were suspiciously fortunate. Between 1994 and 2002, he received 12 grants, each dated just before a sharp rise in the company's share price. Three grants -- in 1997, 1999 and 2000 -- were dated on the day of the stock's lowest closing price of the year.

The WilmerHale report, which is far more detailed than disclosures made by other companies embroiled in the stock-option scandal, concludes that Dr. McGuire selected the dates for options awarded to employees below the rank of top executive by signing "CEO certificates." They were "typically executed subsequent to the date on the certificate," the report says.

For grants to top executives, he was "central to the options process," the report says.

The troubles with the 1999 grant, which is dated Oct. 13, the very day of the stock's lowest closing price that year, appear to have been central to Dr. McGuire's ouster. The grant, which was composed of three slices, covered some 1.825 million options; that's the equivalent of 14.6 million options today, taking into account subsequent stock splits. Excluding the small piece he has already cashed out, it is valued at some $600 million at today's prices.

The report says that the grant was likely backdated. A one-million-share slice was issued supposedly in connection with Dr. McGuire's 1999 employment agreement, which the report says wasn't signed until December. Another chunk of the option was referred to by Dr. McGuire in the future tense in a memorandum dated as late as Oct. 22.

The anticipated repricing of the 1999 award from the year's low point to the year's high point -- some 60% higher -- will cost Dr. McGuire about $50 million.

The probe found that the director heading up the negotiations over the 1999 grant, Mr. Spears, had financial entanglements with Dr. McGuire. Starting in 1992, Mr. Spears served as a trustee for two of Dr. McGuire's children's trusts, according to the report. For more than a decade, Mr. Spears also acted as an investment manager for Dr. McGuire and his family, with the amount of McGuire family money under the firm's management hitting $55 million in 2006, the report found. In addition, in June of 1999, Dr. McGuire invested $500,000 in Mr. Spears's money-management firm, it said.

Mr. Spears and Dr. McGuire say they thought the board was aware of the money-management relationship, according to the report. An email uncovered during the investigation that appears to have been sent from the general counsel, Mr. Lubben, to an outside lawyer, outlined the relationship and stated that there had been a disclosure to the full board of the "conflict."

But there is no documentation to confirm that the disclosure took place then, the report says. No director recalled being told about the money-management relationship or the investment in Mr. Spears's firm before the 1999 contract negotiations. And the directors told the WilmerHale lawyers that they first learned of Dr. McGuire's investment in Mr. Spears's firm after they were told of it by investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0080821

As for Mr. Lubben, the report blames the legal department, headed by him, for shoddy record keeping. The report states that most of the compensation committee minutes are either "entirely silent" on the matter of stock-option discussions or make vague, incomplete or misleading references to what happened.

The lack of records may pose a challenge to federal investigators who may seek to rebut Dr. McGuire's claims that actual meetings or conversations occurred when he said they did.

Mr. Hemsley, Dr. McGuire's successor, has also amassed a sizable options-related fortune. Dr. McGuire is far and away No. 1 on a list of executives ranked by outstanding options value, according to the ExecuComp database of more than 1,500 companies; Mr. Hemsley is No. 2, comfortably ahead of the next-ranked executive.

A looming question is what will happen to the valuable grants that Dr. McGuire hasn't yet cashed out. The total is less than $1.78 billion today, in part because of a recent decline in UnitedHealth's share price, and in part because Dr. McGuire cashed out a small fraction of his options in February, reaping $124 million in profit.

The news release issued yesterday by UnitedHealth characterized Dr. McGuire's departure as stepping down. Exactly what that means will be key to determining what he will reap. His employment contract allows him in some cases to maintain at least a portion of his option grants for years after he leaves, depending on how the departure is characterized.

In a statement, Dr. McGuire said he "decided to retire" after 15 years at the insurer's helm. "In light of the recently completed investigation, I have determined that it is in the best interests of the company that I assist Steve Hemsley in an orderly transition to succeed me as CEO," he said.

UnitedHealth said it was "engaged in discussions with Dr. McGuire concerning the terms of his departure from the company, including other options issues and financial benefits." If those discussions aren't amicably concluded, that could set the stage for acrimonious litigation. If Dr. McGuire were allowed to exercise all his outstanding options, UnitedHealth would issue him shares covering about 2% of the company -- a move sure to rankle shareholders. The company faces a litany of litigation already from shareholders.

UnitedHealth's Next Challenge Is Uncertainty (WSJ)

By Vanessa Fuhrmans

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

Sting of Backdating Scandal May Continue to Weigh On Shares; What Does CEO's Exit Mean?

With William McGuire forced out from the helm of UnitedHealth, investors will start sorting out whether the company's management team can get it back on track without the man who built it.

Despite the obvious challenges ahead, some investors and analysts say it can.

Since Dr. McGuire was named chief executive in 1991 and set about transforming the also-ran regional health management organization into a national health-insurance heavyweight, UnitedHealth's stock has soared 50-fold, even after the lumps it has taken lately.

The performance has made heaps of money for many investors, and also for Dr. McGuire. It is now clear Dr. McGuire and other insiders also gained enormously from stock options with grant dates that had been backdated to days with low share prices, potentially increasing their value. The timing of the options led to his troubles with regulators and the company's board , whose meeting yesterday prompted his retirement.

The options scandal also has led to the possible restatement of several hundred million dollars in earnings, potentially hefty tax penalties, shareholder lawsuits and a criminal probe.

The Minnetonka, Minn.-based company is expected to generate 2006 revenue of $72 billion -- compared to just $847 million in 1991 -- largely from selling health-insurance products to employers, individuals and administering private Medicaid and Medicare plans. It has also branched out to other health-services businesses.

UnitedHealth has one critical factor working in its favor: It is known for its deep bench of management talent. It also has a management factor working against it: The man named to replace Dr. McGuire, the company's president and chief operating officer, Stephen Hemsley, has stock-options issues of his own, though UnitedHealth's board generally cleared him of close involvement in the options-granting process.

Against that backdrop, investors need to decide whether to sell the stock because the company could struggle without Dr. McGuire's leadership, or to buy it because the uncertainty about the stock-options scandal is closer to being resolved.

It is the difference between giving UnitedHealth the Fiorina treatment and giving it the Greenberg treatment.

In 2005, the week Maurice "Hank" Greenberg stepped aside as chief executive at AIG, the insurance titan he helped build, its share price fell more than 7%. Though the move helped the company take a step toward resolving an accounting scandal with regulators, Mr. Greenberg was the driving force in AIG's culture.

DOJ_NMG_0080822

On the other hand, Hewlett-Packard shares soared after Carly Fiorina was ousted, also last year, as its CEO, rising 7% the day the news became public, in part because investors had doubts about the merger she helped engineer with Compaq Computer.

Hewlett-Packard's shares have continued to rise since; AIG's shares have barely recovered.

The prospect of Dr. McGuire's departure has already played a role in driving a 23% decline in UnitedHealth's stock since the issue was exposed in The Wall Street Journal in the spring. The decline also reflects expectations of a hit to earnings, as well as the possibility of payouts for shareholder lawsuits.

Matthew Borsch, an analyst at Goldman Sachs who has a sell rating on the stock and says the company still faces tough headwinds despite the resolution of Dr. McGuire's fate, says the restatement itself shouldn't dent the company's enormous earnings power. It registered net income of $3.3 billion last year, and the company said in May it might restate up to $286 million in earnings, though it has suggested since that that figure could be revised.

Some will argue that Dr. McGuire leaves a company that relies far less on his strategic thinking than it did 10 or even five years ago. "It's been remarkable what he's done," says Joseph France, an analyst at Banc of America Securities who rates UnitedHealth shares as "neutral." But "maybe a different skill set is called for now."

A pulmonologist by training, Dr. McGuire resurrected UnitedHealth from a small, financially troubled HMO into a health-care empire valued at more than $60 billion today. He drove UnitedHealth's expansion into businesses beyond commercial health insurance, jumping into growth areas such as elder-care services, private Medicaid plans and banking services around the new field of health savings accounts. He also led the industry in dropping restrictive and much-hated managed-care practices, such as requiring doctors to ask for permission when ordering tests.

In the second quarter, UnitedHealth's earnings climbed 26% to $974 million on a 57% jump in revenue to $17.9 billion. Analysts expect continued growth, with the consensus calling for a 19% increase to $2.95 per share this year and a 16% jump in 2007 to $3.41 per share.

UnitedHealth shares are trading at nearly 18 times estimated 2006 earnings. That makes the company just a little bit more expensive than rivals WellPoint Inc. and Aetna Inc. But UnitedHealth is one of the biggest generators of free-cash flow -- $3.8 billion in 2005 -- and its earnings also are climbing faster than the industry average.

That puts the company in solid shape to deal with the health-insurance industry's shifting landscape today -- and less dependent on a visionary like Dr. McGuire, analysts say. Though it is the second-largest U.S. health insurer in terms of overall health plan members behind WellPoint, UnitedHealth is the leader where the market is growing most: In Medicare and senior-related health-care services, and the burgeoning area of high-deductible and savings account-linked health plans.

It has also acquired technology companies that write software needed by its rivals to measure hospitals and doctors on performance as employers increasingly demand more cost and quality information from them.

Many of the company's biggest operational decisions are made by the chiefs of its four divisions, whose businesses include employer health plans; Medicare and Medicaid products; specialized services such as dental plans; and technology.

The company's raft of acquisitions, including PacifiCare Health Systems, Oxford Health Plans and Definity Health, in recent years also has deepened UnitedHealth's management bench.

The most challenging situation for many investors now may not be Dr. McGuire's status. It might be sizing up Mr. Hemsley, a former chief financial officer at Arthur Anderson recruited by Dr. McGuire in 1997. He has been the key executor of Dr. McGuire's strategy, appreciated by investors for his operational skills and widely seen over the years as his eventual successor. Many will see his appointment to CEO as a continuum of UnitedHealth's current strategy.

"It might be seen as better than the worst-case scenario. If Hemsley had left too, many investors would have seen this as a complete leadership disruption," says Mr. Borsch.

But Mr. Hemsley, who also has amassed a considerable fortune in company stock-options grants, is included as a defendant in several of the options-related shareholder lawsuits against the company, partly because he also received grants on favorable dates. Should those grants produce legal problems for Mr. Hemsley, the problem for UnitedHealth might not go away, analysts say. But the board's decision to elevate him could be seen as a vote of confidence about his own legal questions, and his leadership.

Dr. McGuire and Mr. Hemsley both agreed to have all of their options through 2002 repriced.

The company has other leaders in its ranks to complement Mr. Hemsley, including former Northwest Airlines CEO Richard Anderson, who joined UnitedHealth in November 2004 as an executive vice president.

While Mr. Hemsley gets much of the credit for making UnitedHealth more efficient and for integrating acquisitions into its systems, Mr. Anderson is seen as being more experienced at operating in the public eye. Some analysts say this is exactly what UnitedHealth needs as the health-insurance market gets more competitive, creating tougher demands from hospitals and employers.

DOJ_NMG_0080823

Write to Vanessa Fuhrmans at vanessa.fuhrmans@wsj.com9

Accounting Firms Ally To Take On The Big 4 (WP)

By Kim Hart

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

For more than a decade, many smaller Washington-based accounting and consulting firms have aligned themselves with one of four larger networks that represent mid-size regional firms. Now one of those networks has gone a step further: banding its member firms together to act as one company.

The network, called Baker Tilly USA, opens for business today, combining 22 mid-size accounting firms from around the country, including Beers & Cutler PLLC locally. The alliance plans to offer tax, audit and consulting services to capture more of the accounting market, a strategy other accounting networks plan to adopt over the next year.

"We're coming at a time when the business market is crying out for alternatives to the Big Four, and we believe our structure can fill that void," said Geoff Barnes, chief executive and president of Baker Tilly International, a worldwide consortium of 125 firms.

The dissolution of accounting giant Arthur Andersen in the Enron scandal, and the more stringent internal accounting controls required by the Sarbanes-Oxley law, created more demand for the Big Four -- Deloitte & Touche LLP, Ernst & Young LLP, KPMG LLP and PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP -- particularly from the nation's largest public companies.

Second- and third-tier accounting firms often found it difficult to move up the accounting ranks because larger clients typically require industry-specific skills and global reach, which many regional firms do not have.

"Companies have been gun-shy about leaving the womb of the big firms," said Allan D. Koltin of PDI Global Inc., a marketing consultant for accounting firms. "The idea of the one-firm concept is to bring a unique and distinct brand that CEOs and CFOs can feel more comfortable about because they have the resources of their affiliate firms behind them."

Decreased competition in the accounting industry has sparked concern by industry experts and government agencies. In a 2003 study, the General Accounting Office found that smaller accounting firms faced significant barriers to entry into the large public company audit market.

"There is a name-brand effect in the industry," said James Peters, chairman of the accounting department at the University of Maryland at College Park. "It's still going to be very difficult to capture companies out of the Big Four's key market."

Firms in alliances such as Baker Tilly USA "have a better chance of competing with the second-tier firms," which include RSM McGladrey Inc., Grant Thornton LLP and BDO Seidman LLP, he said.

Beers & Cutler, with a staff of 270, specializes in the government contracting, real estate, law firm and automotive sectors. The firm will share that expertise with other Baker Tilly members, said R. Edwin Offterdinger, managing partner.

Sharing institutional knowledge with other firms under a larger umbrella organization could threaten the identity of individual firms. "But it's a dual branding strategy that, if executed properly, will only enhance the brand," Offterdinger said.

Three other networks of accounting firms are preparing to introduce their alternatives. Moores Rowland North America, the Leading Edge Alliance and Moore Stephens North America also include firms based in the Washington area: Aronson & Co., Argy Wiltse & Robinson PC, and Goodman & Co., respectively.

Those groups, with Baker Tilly, represent about two-thirds of the nation's top 100 accounting firms, Koltin said.

Baker Tilly's total workforce of about 8,000 is far smaller than the staffs of the largest firms. Ernst & Young, for example, has 26,000 U.S. employees, and PriceWaterhouseCoopers has about 30,000. They each have around 140 affiliate offices around the world; Baker Tilly has 93.

But networks like Baker Tilly stand to benefit from the large number of smaller, non-global businesses "left behind" by the Big Four in recent years, Koltin said. According to CCH Inc.'s Public Accountant Report, revenue rose 21.9 percent for firms outside the Big Four in 2005, while the top firms' revenue rose 14.7 percent.

The new alliances "will become four very significant pillars that realize that, if they create depth and resources, they can have tremendous competitive advantage against all other firms in the marketplace," Koltin said.

SEC To Ease Margin Rules In Cost-cut Move (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

The US is set to relax margin rules in force since after the Wall Street crash of 1929 with the approval of a system that will cut securities trading costs and pave the way for “multi-asset” trading across equities, options and futures.

The move removes a key barrier to the competitiveness of the US capital markets as similar margin rules already exist in Europe, attracting increasing numbers of hedge funds to London.

DOJ_NMG_0080824

It comes as many US exchanges are trying to expand the mix of their businesses towards a combination of equities, options and futures.

This is in response to demand from hedge funds and other traders who increasingly prefer to trade such assets simultaneously.

The Securities and Exchange Commission's staff has approved an application by the New York Stock Exchange for a new type of "portfolio margining" account that calculates margin based on the types of assets held in the account and the interplay between them.

It will provide an alternative to the "Reg T" margining system, under which the Federal Reserve and NYSE set margins for stock trading at up to 50 per cent.

Hedge funds complain that this needlessly ties up funds in margin, limiting the funds' leverage.

They also say it arbitrarily sets margin levels regardless of the types of assets and trading strategies being used, as electronic, algorithmic trading makes such trading more complex.

Grace Vogel, executive vice-president of member firm regulation at the NYSE, said the new account would use a margining system developed by the Options Clearing Corporation, a clearing house for the six US options exchanges. It would take into account when an investor's exposure to one asset, such as an IBM stock, was already being offset by a position in another, such as an option on IBM stock.

"The current rule does not recognise enough hedging strategies between options and stocks," Ms Vogel said. "[Reg T] has served us well over the years but I think we're ready to take a step in the direction of having more risk-based margining."

She said that in some cases margin could be reduced to 15 per cent. Bob Colby, deputy director of the SEC's division of market regulation, said the staff's recommendation would be put to the agency's five commissioners "in weeks".

"It's a big change, and that's why we'd like the commission to consider it," he told the Financial Times. The move is expected to be approved by a majority of commissioners.

Gary de Waal, general counsel at broker Fimat, said: "If portfolio margining is approved for the US it is as significant an event as when prime brokerage first became available. It is a major milestone."

US Rethink On Hedge Fund Rules (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

Top US policymakers believe fresh regulation of hedge funds may be needed to avoid a catastrophic hedge fund failure and that relying on banks and other counterparties to manage their exposure to the booming industry may no longer be enough.

The development marks a shift in thinking on hedge fund oversight since a US court in June struck down a rule that hedge fund managers register with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Hedge funds have since been in regulatory limbo.

The $6bn losses at hedge fund Amaranth have thrust into the spotlight concerns over the systemic risks associated with the $1,500bn industry.

Since the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets – made up of the Federal Reserve, Treasury, SEC and Commodity Futures Trading Commission – has believed that counterparty risk management is the best way to guard against risks to the financial system posed by hedge funds.

Ben Bernanke, US Federal Reserve chairman, in May expressed scepticism about giving regulators more oversight over hedge funds, saying that allowing hedge funds and trading partners to manage risk in the sector made "economic sense".

However, one senior official close to the group said the explosive growth of such funds, the leverage available and the increasing exposure of pension fund money to them had cast doubt on that approach.

Speaking on condition of anonymity, he said: "It's an unavoidable question that you ought to look comprehensively at how this framework is working . . . Is counterparty risk management still the right approach?"

A senior SEC official said: "There's an opening to thinking about alternatives."

One focus of concern was that hedge funds had access to financing from multiple prime brokers.

"Several years have passed [since LTCM], hedge funds are bigger and significant developments have taken place not just in the mechanics of the prime brokerage business but also the way in which leverage is provided," the first official said. "The real concern is the transmission mechanism of the failure of a hedge fund into entities of a size that really are of systemic consequence for the [financial] system. You don't want the failure of a hedge fund to bring down a Morgan Stanley or a JPMorgan."

With billions of dollars in pension plan money expected to flow into hedge funds in the next few years, policymakers also needed to consider ways to improve investor protection.

DOJ_NMG_0080825

"One idea would be to say there are certain things that pension plan administrators need to do before you invest into hedge funds," the official said. "You could see an overall package of measures evolving over time."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Feds Search For Causes Of Rise In Violent Crime (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Teams of federal investigators looking to curb increases in murder and robbery will visit several U.S. cities in order to pinpoint the root causes of community violence, the Justice Department is expected to announce today.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales plans to outline the initiative in an appearance at the annual meeting of the nation's police chiefs in Boston, the Justice Department said.

The Justice review comes after the Police Executive Research Forum, a national police advocacy group, reported last week that murder, robbery and assault offenses had increased substantially in a cross-section of cities during the first six months of 2006.

Last month, the FBI's national crime report for 2005 also revealed a nearly 2% increase in the nation's murder rate after a two-decade low in 2004.

The federal program will dispatch investigators to several cities during the next few weeks to look at possible causes of increased violence, according to an outline of the initiative provided by the Justice Department. The department didn't identify the cities.

Teams also are scheduled to visit communities where crime has declined to determine which crime-prevention tactics have been most effective, the Justice Department said.

Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, called the Justice Department review "an unprecedented effort" to assess the level of violence. "It's important for the Justice Department to get into these cities," Wexler said.

The Justice Department has maintained that the crime rate in 2005 was at a "near-record low" level. But the department said it was proceeding with the review "as a proactive measure" because of the surge in homicides and the overall increase in violent crime in 2005 reported last month by the FBI.

Abramoff Associate Met Bush Officials 12 Times (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

A lobbyist associated with Jack Abramoff, the convicted former "superlobbyist", met White House officials on 12 occasions in 2003 and 2004 on behalf of an association that represented PartyGaming and other online gaming websites, according to billing records released by Congress.

White House officials' meetings with Shawn Vasell, a former associate of Mr Abramoff, were documented by the latter's former lobbying firm, Greenberg Traurig. The documents were released following a broader investigation into contacts between Mr Abramoff's team and the Bush administration by the House committee on government reform.

A spokesman for Mr Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges this year, declined to comment. As payment for Mr Abramoff's lobbying effort to scupper anti-gaming legislation, Gibraltar-based International Interactive Association (IIA) spent millions of dollars on fees to Greenberg Traurig.

The effort was largely effective until recently, when Congress passed a bill that, in effect, criminalised gaming.

IIA, represented by James Levy, of Gibraltar-based law firm Hassans, has sought to distance itself from its ties to Mr Abramoff by asserting that, in common with his other clients, it was unaware of the lobbyist's shenanigans. These included the fact that IIA contributed $2m (€1.6m, £1.1m) to charities that Mr Abramoff used to disguise payments to other organisations.

Tax records and the documents released by Congress show that IIA made -donations in 2003 to the National Center for Public Policy Research (NCPPR), a conservative group, and -Capital Athletic Foundation, a charity controlled by Mr Abramoff.

Robert Litt, an attorney at Arnold & Porter, another law firm representing IIA, said the $2m was contributed to the charities without IIA's knowledge, from fees it paid Greenberg Traurig. "IIA retained Greenberg Traurig to do lobbying and, not to put too fine an edge on it, it appears Abramoff stole their money," he said.

But in e-mails released by Congress, Amy Ridenour, the president of NCPPR, told Mr Abramoff in 2004 that she intended to send a letter to IIA to confirm that the $1.5m her organisation had received had, in fact, originated from IIA.

DOJ_NMG_0080826

In an unsigned letter provided to the Financial Times by IIA – that Mr Litt said it sent to Ms Ridenour in August 2004 in response to her query – IIA said it had "no information" about the payments.

Today IIA still uses Greenberg Traurig as its primary lobbying firm in Washington.

Mr Litt said that, after the departure of the person who missapplied IIA's fees, it had no reason to doubt the honesty of Greenberg Traurig.

Mehlman Denies Role In Ousting Of Official (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

Ken Mehlman, the powerful chairman of the Republican National Committee, was on Sunday put on the defensive about his alleged role in the ousting of a State Department official in 2001 who was a political foe of Jack Abramoff, the former "superlobbyist" convicted on corruption charges this year.

Mr Mehlman said he did not recall the specifics of the removal of Allen Stayman, who supported changes to labour laws on the Northern Mariana Islands, an important client of Mr Abramoff, but said it was "not true" he had the authority to fire anyone in his former role as political director at the White House.

With mid-term elections looming on November 7 and the Republican party struggling to hold on to its majority in Congress, questions about Mr Abramoff's ties to the party as well as its response to the Mark Foley congressional sex scandal could not have come at a worse time.

The ties between Mr Mehlman and Mr Abramoff, which were highlighted in a report by the Los Angeles Times on Sunday, follow the release of hundreds of e-mails by a congressional committee investigating the former lobbyists' ties to the Bush administration.

The e-mails shed new light on Mr Abramoff's wheeling and dealing in Washington, including how he allegedly called in favours from a vast network of Republican allies for various political appointments and endorsements – succeeding in some endeavours and failing in others.

In one e-mail, one of Mr Abramoff's associates declared: "Mehlman said he would get him [Mr Stayman] fired."

Mr Mehlman said in an interview on CNN on Sunday that he frequently had people come to see him with political and personnel issues. "I had a way of dealing with all these matters, which is to let the policy-makers or the personnel deciders know exactly what people said. And they made the decisions," he said.

A lobbyist associated with Mr Abramoff met White House officials on 12 occasions in 2003 and 2004 on behalf of an association that represented PartyGaming and other online gaming websites, according to billing records released by Congress.

White House officials' meetings with Shawn Vasell, a former associate of Mr Abramoff, were documented by the latter's former lobbying firm, Greenberg Traurig. The documents were released following a broader investigation into contacts between Mr Abramoff's team and the Bush administration by the House committee on government reform.

Mob Trial To Start Today (SPT)

By Carrie Weimar

St. Petersburg Times, October 16, 2006

The four defendants are said to be members of the Gambino family.

TAMPA — Not so very long ago, Tampa was an underworld hub, a place where mobsters ran illegal gambling operations out of Ybor City coffee shops and killed the people who got in their way.

Those days are over, thanks largely to a crackdown by law enforcement in the 1970s and '80s. But experts say the Mafia never really left Tampa: It just changed form.

Starting today , four men alleged to be members of the Gambino crime family will go on trial in U.S. District Court in Tampa on charges of racketeering and extortion.

Prosecutors said the crew, headed by Ronald "Ronnie One Arm" Trucchio, committed a string of crimes from New York to Miami, including murder, robbery and extortion.

Trucchio, 55, and his band carved out a piece of Tampa's valet parking business and owned a company that parked cars at restaurants, hospitals and nude dance clubs, including Thee Doll House, court records show.

The stakes are high for the defendants, who face potential sentences of 20 years to life.

The trial will also offer a rare glimpse at a seamier side of Tampa.

"Organized crime is alive and well," said Ken Sanz, a special agent for the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, who investigated the Mafia for more than 30 years. "It's probably not comparable to what it was in the '80s, the '70s or the '60s, but it's here."

DOJ_NMG_0080827

For years, organized crime in Tampa was under the control of the Trafficante crime family. But the death of Santo Trafficante Jr. in 1987 brought an end to that era.

Now, mobile groups of crime associates called “crews” migrate to Florida and work independently, making payments to heads of families in New York or New Jersey.

In exchange, the remote operations are granted protection from the families against other organized crime factions, Sanz said.

“It became open territory,” he said. “Any crime family can come down here now and do business.”

That’s how Trucchio and his crew operated, according to federal documents.

Trucchio, who got his colorful nickname because of a deformed arm, started as a soldier in the Gambino crime family, one of the notorious five families that control organized crime in New York.

He was later elevated to captain or “capo” and put in charge of several crews, court records state.

Trucchio, who lived in Queens, N.Y., tapped fellow New Yorker John Alite to head Trucchio’s Tampa crew beginning about 1993, the records state.

By that point, Alite was already well-known to federal authorities. In 1989, he and another man were arrested with John A. Gotti, son of the late mob boss, all accused of beating up two men and a woman in a Long Island night club.

Alite, 43, was arrested in Brazil in November 2004. He is fighting extradition to the United States.

'All about the money’

In the mid ’90s, Alite became involved in a valet company called A&A of Tampa, which later changed its name to Prestige Valet, according to Florida business records.

Prestige had contracts with St. Joseph’s Hospital and the shops in Channelside, according to court documents.

The company also parked cars at restaurants and nude dance clubs.

Valet parking would be an attractive business for the Mafia, said Scott Deitche, the author of Cigar City Mafia.

“It’s all about the money,” Deitche said.

“They’re interested in any way they can make money and run money through. In valet parking, you’re dealing with a whole lot of cash.”

The president of Prestige Valet, Terry Scaglione, 40, was also charged in the case. His father, Nick Scaglione, was a member of the Trafficante crime family, Deitche said.

Terry Scaglione’s attorney, Pat Doherty, said his client ran a legitimate business and didn’t participate in any illegal activity.

The prosecution scored a major victory in August, when one of the defendants pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate with the government.

In a plea agreement unsealed this month, Michael Malone admitted to robbing a Sears cashier of $20,000 in Vineland, N.J., robbing a man at Thee Doll House in Tampa and killing John Gebert in 1996.

Gebert, 30, was at Frankie & Johnnie’s, a popular bar in Queens, when he was fatally shot in the back by two men in ski masks.

Members of the Tampa crew are also accused of roughing up a gambling ring in Port St. Lucie and extorting the owner of a rival valet business, Michael Malatin.

The other defendants are Kevin McMahon and Steven Catalano.

Recalling the old days

The last major Mafia trial in Tampa grew out of the Kings Court bottle club in Holiday, Deitche said. The phony club was set up in 1979 by an undercover FBI agent named Joe Pistone, who used the alias Donnie Brasco. Pistone went on to write a bestselling book about his experiences, which was made into a Hollywood movie.

It was a wild time to be in law enforcement, said Chris Hoyer, a Tampa attorney who served on the U.S. Department of Justice Organized Crime Strike Force and helped oversee the Kings Court sting.

Hoyer watched a high-ranking sheriff’s official accept money from mobsters at the club. He also developed a grudging respect for Trafficante Jr., who developed a slew of ploys to thwart authorities.

“He used to drive 40 mph down the interstate,” Hoyer said. “It’s pretty hard to follow someone if he’s only going 40.”

The latest trial has also seen its share of drama, most of it surrounding Trucchio’s lawyer, Joseph Corozzo Jr.

Corozzo, a New York City lawyer, is the son of Joseph “Jo Jo” Corozzo, believed to be the consigliere, or counselor, to the Gambinos.

The younger Corozzo is under investigation for potential involvement in witness tampering and obstruction of justice. Federal officials said the investigation could cause Corozzo to put his own welfare above his client’s.

In May, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Trezevant requested a hearing to advise Trucchio of the potential conflict. Trucchio chose to remain with Corozzo, calling him his “most valuable asset.”

DOJ_NMG_0080828

But now the trial is scheduled to begin without Corozzo, who is stuck in a New York trial where he is representing another alleged Mafioso.

Instead, Trucchio will be represented by a last-minute replacement, Miami lawyer George Vila, who said he is completely unfamiliar with the case or organized crime in general.

Vila filed an emergency motion asking U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew to delay the trial. But Bucklew refused, saying it would be unfair to the other defendants.

Security will be a concern during the trial, which could last up to two months.

In court documents filed last week, Trezevant refused a defense request to provide a list of witnesses and the order in which they will testify.

His reason: At least two potential witnesses were threatened in the past month.

Times researcher Cathy Wos contributed to this report. Carrie Weimar can be reached at cweimar@sptimes.com or (813) 226-3416.

Mob Racketeering Trial To Start Monday (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini

Tampa Tribune, October 16, 2006

TAMPA - Lorraine Lamendola's terrifying tale of hiding from mobsters by crawling around on the floor of her darkened house is at the heart of what the federal government says was a brutal struggle to control the valet parking business in Tampa.

While members of the Gambino crime family - once headed by the flamboyant "Dapper Don" John Gotti - carried out murders, armed robberies and drug sales in New York, New Jersey and Florida, mobsters used extortion to gain dominance over valet revenue at hospitals, restaurants and nightclubs in the Tampa area, federal authorities allege.

The fight over local parking is but one facet of a wide-ranging racketeering case slated to go to trial Monday in U.S. District Court. It is also at the center of a pending civil case in Hillsborough County Circuit Court.

The two top figures in the federal racketeering trial are Ronald "Ronnie One Arm" Trucchio and John Alite. Authorities allege Trucchio is a capo in the Gambino crime family, heading a crew of soldiers who committed crimes in three states. Alite is accused of helping Trucchio plan and participating in the criminal activity. Alite, according to the indictment, used the influence of the Gambino crime family to "create and instill fears in others," including members and associates of his own crew.

Trucchio, serving 20 years for a South Florida federal conviction, will be among the defendants to go on trial Monday. Alite is in custody in Brazil fighting extradition.

The former owner of Prestige Valet Inc., Alite is accused in court papers of extorting people who tried to compete with his company and refused to pay kickbacks.

The current president of Prestige Valet, Terry Scaglione of Tampa, is also scheduled to go on trial, also on racketeering charges. Scaglione's grandfather was Nick Scaglione, a convicted gambling racketeer who was a member of the Trafficante crime family in Tampa during the 1950s and '60s. Wanting More Money

Documents filed in the federal criminal case and the county civil case paint a picture of a violent struggle over the lucrative business of parking cars in the Tampa Bay area.

One man's struggle with organized crime is vividly described in an affidavit filed by his wife in the civil case.

In 1996, Robert Lamendola of Spring Hill was unhappy working as a plumber at Home Depot.

Thinking he could make more money for his family, he went to work for a childhood acquaintance, Alite, in the valet parking business.

Robert Lamendola became valet manager for Prestige at the Turtle Club in Clearwater.

It wasn't long before Lamendola became involved in criminal activity.

According to a federal court document, that March, Lamendola roughed up an unnamed college student who was running a sports gambling operation. He and another man, acting on orders from Alite, visited the student and took money, telling him at gunpoint he would have to pay money every week for "protection," according to a plea agreement Lamendola signed in 2002 in a deal that would put him in prison.

Lorraine Lamendola's affidavit doesn't mention her husband's crime, but gives the following account:

Robert Lamendola quickly became disenchanted with his work as a valet manager, and wanted more money. With Alite's blessing, he and his wife opened Imperial Valet in St. Petersburg in January 1997, serving mostly businesses in the Pasco County area and eventually Pinellas County. Success Brings Trouble

When Imperial Valet started getting business in Tampa, the couple's trouble with Alite began.

On instructions from Alite, Lorraine Lamendola sent the company's financial statements. In early spring 1997, Alite began demanding payments of $150 a week for each valet account. The payments lasted six or seven weeks.

After learning that Alite was in prison, Robert Lamendola met another man who said he had stronger mob ties and could help Lamendola. Feeling "empowered," Lamendola told his wife to stop sending payments to Alite.

Then the phone calls started from Alite's associates.

Robert Lamendola told his wife to send $75 a week to Louis "Duke" Mendel, president of Prestige Valet. That lasted for six to 10 weeks.

During the early summer of 1997, Robert Lamendola got into a fist fight with Mendel at Revelations, a Tampa nightclub, after Lamendola expressed interest in bidding for the club's business.

Alite then demanded copies of all of Imperial Valet's Tampa contracts. Robert Lamendola notified his Tampa clients that his company was being "muscled out of the business by the Mafia and Prestige Valet."

In 1997 and 1998, Alite would call the house and leave threatening messages on the answering machine. "I know where your kids go to school." "Listen to me and listen good. Just remember this - your [expletive] husband will be the first guy I see when I get out, and I will get out."

Alite was released from prison. The Lamendola phone started ringing. It was Alite's New Jersey cell phone number on the caller ID.

Then the doorbell rang. Robert Lamendola told his wife to look out the front window. There was a white van parked in front and a strange man inside. Lorraine Lamendola couldn't see who was at the door.

Later, they opened the door. There was a note. "Call me, John."

"Fearful of Alite's intentions, we crawled around on the floor and closed all of the blinds and window shades, turned off all of the lights in the house, and sat in the bathroom or the center of the living area, the only areas without windows" Lorraine Lamendola said in her affidavit. "We were forced to stay inside the house for two to three days.

"When the sun went down, we did not cook, open the refrigerator, watch TV, or do anything that would alert the outside world that we were home. During this entire time, our residence phone, as well as Robert's cellular phone, repeatedly rang for hours and hours, back to back, non-stop," first from Alite's cell phone number and then from a private number.

When they looked outside, they saw a man sitting on a lawn chair across from their house. Sometimes the lawn chair was empty.

Finally, Alite called Robert Lamendola's sister, who told him the Lamendolas were in Boston for a doctor's visit. The phone stopped ringing for two days.

Robert Lamendola purchased three guns to protect himself, including a Glock. Later, the Lamendolas' son, Michael, used the Glock to kill himself.

"I believe my son committed suicide because he was traumatized by all of the phone calls and threats to the family and all the [effects] all this activity had on the family, including Robert's transformation to an abusive and violent person," Lorraine Lamendola said in her affidavit.

In 1999, Alite, Lamendola said, threatened a 19-year-old attendant for Imperial Valet at Legend's Steakhouse in Clearwater Beach.

Alite and an associate pinned the attendant against a wall with a black Lincoln Navigator and took the cash proceeds from that night's business.

Alite told the young man he was working for Alite from now on. Prestige then took over that valet account. Civil Lawsuit Draws Attention

Robert Lamendola is in federal prison in Atlanta, serving a sentence of three years and 10 months for roughing up the college student in 1996. His projected release date is next July.

Alite no longer owns Prestige, according to Michael D. LaBarbera, attorney for the valet company.

Lorraine Lamendola's affidavit was filed by the defense in a lawsuit that has drawn the attention of federal authorities. The suit was brought by Prestige against Michael D. Malatin and his company, Healthcare Parking Systems.

Prestige accused Malatin of unfair competition. Malatin formerly worked for Prestige, and the lawsuit alleges he used his contacts there to start Healthcare Parking Systems while he still worked for Prestige.

Defending the lawsuit, Malatin claimed he, too, had been threatened by Alite. In court papers, he said he recorded several conversations with Alite at the request of the FBI.

LaBarbera said the U.S. attorney's office blocked him from investigating Lamendola's claims or even interviewing Lorraine Lamendola. A federal prosecutor argued that the lawsuit was a veiled effort to gain information about the federal investigation.

LaBarbera said his entire civil case file was subpoenaed by a federal grand jury.

The attorney said he was unable to verify any of Lorraine Lamendola's claims. He said he has represented the Scaglione family for 20 years and has never seen any evidence that Terry Scaglione is involved with organized crime.

Protecting Children From Cyberspace Invaders (MH)

By Ana Veciana-suarez

The Miami Herald, October 14, 2006

The news is full of these stories lately: adult men trolling online for young victims to seduce. It's enough to scare families right out of cyberspace.

Yet, away from the headlines, do we really know how common these cases are or how much danger our children really face online? And, do tech-savvy teens understand what they're doing when they post suggestive photos on their websites and exchange provocative messages with online buddies?

Though the Mark Foley scandal has once again focused attention on adults who engage in sexual talk with children online, direct data about Internet danger to our children is hard to come by. The figures that do exist are questioned by a number of experts.

According to the only national study of its kind of children 10 to 17, about 13 percent say they have received an unwanted solicitation to engage in sexual activity or conversation in the previous year. That figure is actually lower than the 19 percent of five years earlier, in 2000.

Those being solicited were mostly teenagers, and the material was coming from both adults and other teens. In fact, solicitations from offline friends and acquaintances grew from 3 percent of all solicitations in 2000 to 14 percent in 2005.

"We think children are going to chat rooms less and talking to strangers less often," explains David Finkelhor, director of the Crimes Against Children Research Center, which conducted the survey. ``They've either gotten the message or they've had personal experiences in these chat rooms and have chosen not to visit."

The good news, however, ends there. Aggressive solicitations -- those in which solicitors try to make offline contact with the minor -- increased among girls, from 4 percent in 2000 to 7 percent in 2005. Only two youths reported actually meeting an adult in person. (Researchers conducted telephone interviews of a statistical sampling of 1,500 young people and reported a possible margin of error of 2.5 percent.)

More young Internet users (34 percent) are also seeing unwanted sexual material online than they did in 2000 (25 percent), despite increased use of filtering, blocking and monitoring software.

Though "one case is one too many," activist Ernie Allen believes ``there is some cause for optimism. I think this is a positive indication that pounding these alerts into the heads of youth and parents is working."

Nonetheless, Allen, president of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children, and other adults who anecdotally track online predators believe these figures don't tell the whole story. "Overwhelmingly," Allen adds, ``kids don't report when something happens to them. They shrug it off."

Xavier Von Erck, founder of Perverted-Justice.com, agrees. Most kids he talks to are either too embarrassed to say they've been solicited or fearful that their computer privileges will be taken away by panicked parents if they sound the alert. What's more, he believes, from his own experience online, that sexual solicitation of minors is relatively common.

"Any chat room we go onto, whether it's on Yahoo, AOL, Teenspot, MySpace, there's never a time we're not solicited," he adds. ``It is bad out there."

Parry Aftab, executive of WiredSafety.org, has had similar experiences. "I talk to 5,000 kids a month and almost all of them have received some kind of inappropriate communication," Aftab said. ``And it's getting worse because of the social networking sites."

CLOAK OF ANONYMITY

While the figures may be in question, experts do agree on one thing: The Internet has made sexual solicitation of minors easier and has allowed men who might not have otherwise acted on their impulses to do so under the cloak of anonymity.

"The Internet is a wonderful thing, but it's both a blessing and a curse," says Allen. ``In the physical world, if you're 40 years old and you want some kind of access, you have to directly approach the child, and then it's tougher to break down inhibitions. The Internet has provided a venue, a way for a lot of these people who have the interest or inclination to do what they want to do without directly risking the social stigma."

It is the same kind of anonymity that allows the predator to disguise not only his own identity but his intentions during the initial contacts, or at least until he has befriended the minor by showing interest and offering a sympathetic virtual ear. This kind of "grooming," says Aftab and others, is found in the released Foley messages as well as exchanges by other men.

"A lot of people will cross the line -- or at least put out feelers -- on the Internet that they wouldn't do in person," Aftab adds.

Most of those arrested are men with no criminal records, people who don't fit society's stereotype of a criminal. Many are middle- and upper middle-class men with respectable jobs and families, says Von Erck. "You can have the short, balding guy with glasses but also the tall good-looking guy," he adds. `There's no real profile."

Law enforcement officials, both nationally and locally, are focusing more resources on investigating computer-related child exploitation.

FBI GOES ONLINE

About 18 months ago, the FBI's Miami division launched a separate Crimes Against Children Squad. The squad includes about 10 undercover investigators who mostly work online. Other local agencies, such as police departments and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, often assist.

Since the squad began, FBI agents have arrested or identified 82 suspects for a range of sex crimes against children, said Judy Orihuela, the FBI's Miami spokeswoman. A breakdown of which crimes involved an online component was not available.

The squad, which serves the Keys through Palm Beach County, also works with public schools to teach children how to stay safe. But police, like other experts, say it's ultimately up to the parents.

"We don't advocate for parents to try to keep their kids offline," said Supervisory Special Agent Terri Patterson. ``That's unhealthy. The kids have to spend time online. Their parents just have to monitor it."

These education campaigns, as well as very public arrests of men who solicit children online, have made parents and youth more aware of the dangers. Perverted Justice, an organization dedicated to outing online predators by using decoys, has teamed up with NBC's Dateline program to lure adult men who expect to rendezvous with a young sex partner. Instead, the men are met by TV cameras and, in some cases, by police.

These shows, however, may not fully address the danger a teen can find online. Reality is, many of the unsolicited comments and solicitations are actually coming from people the children have already met offline.

In the Crimes Against Children's Research Center's study, acquaintances -- mostly other teenagers -- played a growing role in many of the unwanted solicitations and in online harassment. (The study defines harassment as threats or other offensive behavior sent online to the youth or posted online about the youth for others to see.) In fact, 44 percent of online harassers were offline acquaintances, mostly peers, in 2005, compared with 28 percent five years earlier. Unwanted sexual solicitations from acquaintances were also up.

This has lead researchers to suggest that educational efforts include talks about the danger posed from acquaintances. "It's a mistaken idea for parents to think this is only stranger danger," says Finkelhor.

What's more, some youths are using their own sexuality and Internet knowledge to post provocative come-ons in chat rooms and message boards. Critics of social networking sites complain that there is little monitoring and few safeguards to protect young users. In response, MySpace and other sites have launched public service campaigns to promote safety, but it's not uncommon for teens to fib about their age.

A cursory look at online message boards also reveals teenagers posting suggestive invitations, including some with very graphic descriptions.

"It's a good idea for parents to have a frank conversation with their children," Finkelhor says. `At the same time we have to realize that the real danger comes in the way kids think and feel that they're having an adventure by participating in some kind of exchange. They don't think anything can happen to them."

Miami Herald staff writer Steve Rothaus contributed to this report.

Rape Accusation Has Ruined Lives, Students Say (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

In their first news interviews, three former Duke University students told the CBS News program “60 Minutes” that they were falsely accused of raping a woman hired to dance at a lacrosse team party last March.

One of the men has graduated from Duke, while the other two, who were sophomores, have been suspended from the university pending the outcome of the case, they said on the program, which was shown yesterday. They are free on $100,000 bail while awaiting a trial expected to start next spring.

“This woman has destroyed everything I worked for in my life,” said the student who graduated, David F. Evans, 23, of Annapolis, Md. “And, worst of all, she’s split apart a community and a nation on facts that just didn’t happen and a lie that should have never been told.”

Also appearing on the show was James E. Coleman Jr., a professor at Duke’s law school who criticized the prosecutor in the case and accused him of misconduct. Mr. Coleman, who led a university review of the men’s lacrosse program after the party, said of Michael B. Nifong, the Durham County district attorney, “I think in this case, it appears that this prosecutor has set out to develop whatever evidence he could to convict people he already concluded were guilty.”

DOJ_NMG_0080832

In June, Mr. Coleman said Mr. Nifong should ask the state attorney general to appoint a special prosecutor and remove himself from the case. Mr. Coleman said Mr. Nifong "pandered to the community" and set up an improper photo lineup to identify suspects.

In a telephone interview last night, Mr. Coleman said, "He has forgotten about his obligation to protect the innocent, and in my view, that's prosecutorial misconduct."

Mr. Nifong did not return telephone calls and e-mail messages yesterday. The accuser, a student at North Carolina Central University, could not be contacted.

Mr. Nifong has said that he, the police and the woman are determined to take the case to trial despite a tide of criticism. Mr. Nifong has said that there is medical evidence of rape and that the woman made valid identifications of the suspects, both points challenged by "60 Minutes" after what the show said was a review of nearly the entire case file.

Mr. Evans, the team captain, told "60 Minutes" that he regretted his decision to give a party with alcohol and hire strippers.

"I was naïve, I was young, I was sheltered," he said. "And I made a terrible judgment. In five months I've learned more than I did in 22 years about life."

One of the suspended students, Reade W. Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., said the police had never interviewed him about the case. He also said the district attorney did not want to see evidence proving he left the event shortly after the dancing stopped and before the alleged rape could have occurred.

The other suspended student, Collin Finnerty, 20, of Garden City, N.Y., said he also had evidence showing he left the party early, but did not want to reveal it before trial. He said he left the party after the women stopped dancing and never saw them again.

For Violent And Lost Boys, Crime Stories Offer Hope (NYT)

By Dinitia Smith

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla. — On a recent weekday afternoon, Dennis Lehane, the best-selling crime writer, stood in front of 17 imprisoned teenagers, trying to establish his street credentials. He grew up in a violent neighborhood, he told them, Dorchester, in Boston. "One or two made it out of my neighborhood," he said. "Sixteen other guys went down."

Mr. Lehane was on a tour to publicize his new story collection, "Coronado" (HarperCollins), and had made an unusual stop: at the Youthful Offender Program at the Orange County Jail here. The participants had been reading "Coronado" as part of a class called, in an effort to use language familiar to teenagers, "Literature n' Living."

Most of the boys, who are 14 to 17, had been accused of crimes so serious that they were being tried as adults. Some were awaiting trial, others serving sentences of less than a year. Many of the characters in "Coronado," are, like the prisoners, young, lost and violent, and the book had been assigned to them by John Richter, the program's coordinator, in an effort to get them to read — anything.

Mr. Richter had tested the boys to make sure they understood the book, and had them write reports, which they were now delivering to Mr. Lehane, whose 2001 novel, "Mystic River," was made into a movie by Clint Eastwood. In addition to meeting Mr. Lehane, the boys would get another prize: a contact visit with their families (most visits at the jail are conducted by video screen), plus a real dinner: fried chicken, pizza, submarine sandwiches, collard greens.

Brian Mitchell, 17, accused of hiring a hit man to kill a witness in a murder case, focused his book report on a searing story called "Until Gwen." After serving his sentence, a young man is picked up from prison by his father in a stolen truck, with a prostitute in the back. The father wants his son to reveal the whereabouts of a stolen jewel. The story reaches a violent climax and contains a terrible revelation: "He got mean, told you you aren't his anyway, some whore's kid he found in a barrel, decided might come in useful on a missing-baby scam they were running back then."

Brian, an aloof, self-contained boy, read from his report in an assured voice: "I was able to relate this story to many aspects of my own life. I also grew up different from most people, isolated because of my physical handicap." When he was an infant both of his legs were amputated at the knee because of a birth defect.

After the reports were read, there were questions. Dexter Johnson, 17, charged with shooting a man and robbing him of his cellphone, read a question written in advance: "What's helped you drive through the obstacles in your life to achieve your ambition?" he asked, reading intently, his voice halting.

Mr. Lehane was succinct: "No. 1, my parents," he replied. "No. 2, just seeing the waste around me."

In one of the book's stories, "Gone Down to Corpus," the narrator's father is a depressed drunk who sits on his front porch weeping. The boy goes with a group of friends to the house of a rich family, intending to trash it. The story ends with him on a bed with a girl and a gun at his side, waiting for the family to return. "I wonder what I'll do," the character muses. "Make that pudgy man draw. I don't know. I know that at the moment I hate the pudgy man." Tyler Kucera, 16, charged with robbing a man and threatening to blow his leg off with a shotgun, asked Mr. Lehane in a shy voice, strangled in back of his throat, "What happened when the residents of the house came home?"

But Mr. Lehane had ended on that question, and he refused to say what happened.

When Mr. Richter first arrived at the unit in 1992, the youths were fighting among themselves and refusing to attend the jail's high school program. "A lot of them didn't know how to read," he said. They were ashamed, he said, and school was their nemesis, the symbol of all their failures.

Before being imprisoned, he said, more than half the boys had dropped out, been expelled or suspended from their regular schools.

"In order for them to learn to read you have to get them to focus on a piece of writing so they will struggle through it with a teacher," Mr. Richter said. " You have to be motivated," he said. "You can't use 'Dick and Jane.' " He tried a production of "Julius Caesar" with a gang theme, and got only so-so results. Around 1995 he found a book he thought might interest the boys, Walter Mosley's "Devil in a Blue Dress." "It was relatively easy to read, and you have black characters," he said. Most of the prisoners are black or Hispanic. The book worked, and so did the incentives of contact visits with families. "Literature n' Living " was born.

Mr. Richter began sending copies of the teenagers' book reports and photographs of classes to authors, hoping to entice them to visit the jail. Ernest J. Gaines was the first author to come, in 2001, after the group read "A Lesson Before Dying" (Random House), about a black youth sentenced to death. He has visited twice. Brian Jacques, author of the "Redwall" series, about mice who fight off evil rats, foxes and other predators, has also visited twice, on a book tour for his publisher, Penguin, from England. "They'd say, 'Why am I reading about mice?' " Mr. Richter remembered. "I'd say, 'Shuddup and read the book.' Now they love 'em." So far, 12 authors have visited.

Mr. Richter, 56, who has been working in prisons for 33 years, has no statistics testifying to the program's success or its effect on recidivism rates. But, he said: "When we first began there were lots of incidents of violence. It was nothing for somebody to walk into that unit and see three or four kids waiting in shackles to be put in disciplinary lockdown." Nowadays, he said, "we have very few incidents of violence. We may have a fight once every three months."

For Tyler, charged with armed robbery, the program, "brings you into a whole new life for a brief period. Whatever you're facing here, you can put it aside."

The boys stay at the jail for an average of four to eight months. Eighty-five percent are convicted and go to adult prisons where there are few programs like this. What's the point of offering them this brief look at literature? "If there is a salvageable lot, it's these kids," Mr. Richter said. "You can see it after they've been here a while. Their eyes grow a little less hard. They begin to believe there is hope for them."

"They realize they don't have to be dirtbags," he said, "though they might think they have to be."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Deaf Advocate Blasts Arrests (WP)

By Daniel De Vise, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Protests Continue Against Incoming Gallaudet President

The president of the National Association of the Deaf weighed in yesterday on what she called the "totally unnecessary" arrests Friday night of 133 protesters at Gallaudet University in a dispute with campus administrators, and urged the board of trustees to take command of a situation that "is out of control."

Bobbie Beth Scoggins, head of the advocacy group, arrived at the Washington campus yesterday afternoon to cheers from scores of students and alumni, who have taken shifts occupying tents around the campus entrance for the past week. They shut down the campus for three days to protest the selection of former university provost Jane K. Fernandes as the school's next president.

Scoggins's appearance underscored the impact of the confrontation in the international deaf community. She said sympathizers around the world had erected more than 70 "tent cities" in solidarity with the Gallaudet protesters, four of whom launched a hunger strike at the start of the weekend.

"The whole world is with these people here," said Scoggins. "The administration claims this is a local issue. It is not."

Scoggins, who cut short a vacation in Mexico when she learned of the arrests, continued: "The arrests never should have happened. We had other options."

Fernandes said yesterday via e-mail that the arrests, "painful as they were," were necessary to regain control of the campus, which serves the local deaf community well beyond the parameters of university education.

DOJ_NMG_0080834

"The first priority and focus must be that we must re-open our campus so that our children -- infants, toddlers, elementary schoolers, high schoolers and college students -- can continue learning and not fall behind their peers," she wrote.

In an e-mail sent to the campus yesterday, Gallaudet President I. King Jordan defended the arrests and said they resulted from "a complete lack of good faith" on the part of the protesters.

"You have been heard by me. You have been heard by the Board," Jordan wrote. "We have heard you from the beginning of your protest. We have considered and discussed your points of view. We just haven't agreed with you. And we still don't."

Board Chairman Brenda Jo Brueggemann said in an e-mail that her panel had not intervened because it is charged with policy and oversight at Gallaudet, not "the management of its daily matters."

Gallaudet, which had nearly 2,000 students enrolled last year, is the only university for deaf students in the country.

In a letter to the Gallaudet board, leaders of the National Association of the Deaf said the administration had lost control and should be relieved of command over the protest. Board members, the letter stated, "must waste no further time in stepping up to their fiduciary responsibilities and removing the administration's involvement in resolution of this crisis."

The letter cited the arrests as evidence of a "growing chasm between the university administration and the students, faculty, staff and alumni" and faulted university leaders for a lack of "trust and leadership."

Scoggins reiterated that message. "I see very little support for the administration," she said, surveying the crowd behind her. "I see very little."

Administrators had the protesters arrested Friday to end the campus shutdown. Students had been warned repeatedly that they could be arrested if they did not stop blocking the school's entrance. Nearly 1,000 protesters turned out Saturday, galvanized by the arrests.

Protests against Fernandes began with the announcement in May that she would replace Jordan as president in January. Jordan, who became the first deaf president of Gallaudet in 1988, has long been a hero in the deaf community. But his decision to arrest protesters Friday made him a traitor in the minds of some.

"We no longer recognize King Jordan as university president," LaToya Plummer, a Gallaudet junior who was among those arrested, said at a news conference yesterday afternoon. A student perched on the campus wall relayed her signs to the protesters beyond.

"We're looking at the last straw here," said Lois Bragg, vice chair of the faculty senate. "The problems are intense. They have been deep for a long time. The board of trustees is asleep."

Gallaudet faculty planned to meet today to consider several resolutions, Bragg said, including a call for Fernandes to resign and possible confidence votes in the board and Jordan.

The protesters, which include large numbers of alumni and university employees as well as students, say they oppose the incoming president's leadership style and the process that led to her appointment. Fernandes has said she believes the dispute is about identity politics within the deaf community, which is struggling to synthesize technology-driven shifts in what it means to be deaf.

Fernandes angered protesters with a letter to The Washington Post, published Saturday, that suggested she was under attack by deaf-culture preservationists who view her as a threat. Fernandes learned to sign at 23 and embraces, in her words, "many ways of being deaf."

Protesters yesterday accused Fernandes of playing "the deaf card" and said the incoming president was trying to create a false impression that students deem her, in the words of Professor Dirksen Bauman, "not deaf enough."

Home-Business Application Stirs Tensions In Manassas (WP)

By Nick Miroff

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

In the past three years, the Manassas City Council has received two applications for home-based massage therapy businesses, and members have approved both. Then Howard Daniel, who is gay, applied.

The backlash against Daniel's request began last month when nearly two dozen people, many of them members of a local church, spoke in opposition to it at a public hearing. When it came time for the city to decide on Daniel's application the next week, council members balked and voted instead to consider changing the city's zoning laws.

The city's response and the community opposition have blindsided Daniel and his supporters, one of whom had an anti-gay message written on his car.

"This should have been a business issue, and somehow it has become political," said Daniel, 44. "Why?"

Richard Devine, Daniel's partner of 22 years, sees the dispute in less uncertain terms. "I think it's obvious what's going on here," he said. "It walks like a duck."

DOJ_NMG_0080835

Questions of discrimination are already sensitive in Manassas, which is currently under federal investigation for housing policies that allegedly target Hispanic residents, a violation of the Fair Housing Act. Now the city is again facing a land-use decision loaded with political overtones. At least one council member, Andrew L. Harrover (R), said he has received threats that Daniel's home will be picketed if the council approves his application.

"It's going to be terribly challenging for me" to decide, said Harrover, who lives around the corner from Daniel. His wife has signed the petition in support of Daniel's application, but Harrover said he is opposed to home businesses that bring more traffic to residential neighborhoods.

The vast majority of those who have mobilized against Daniel's application do not live on his street or even in his neighborhood. Many are affiliated with Manassas's All Saints Catholic Church, though there is no indication they have organized their opposition through the church.

"This isn't a Catholic thing; it's a city thing," said Amy Bookwalter, who has spoken out against Daniel's application. "This is about keeping a residential area a residential area."

Those claims are growing increasingly hard for Daniel and his supporters to believe. Just one year earlier, they noted, another massage therapist in Manassas applied for a permit, and not one resident voiced opposition. "No one has officially come and said it yet," Daniel said, "but why are all these people concerned about traffic on a street they don't live on?"

Daniel and Devine have lived for 10 years in their Cape Cod-style home on West Street, three blocks from the city's commercial district, in a neighborhood with towering maple trees and an eclectic mix of red-brick single-family homes and Colonials.

A former Marine Corps reservist, Daniel works full time as a database administrator and treats patients on a part-time basis at the local hospital and in their homes. Daniel said he was encouraged to apply for the permit by the city planning office because his proposed client load was a fraction of that of similar businesses already approved by the council.

Daniel then spent more than $800 preparing his application: providing blueprints, inspectors' signatures, a business plan, a petition signed by all of his immediate neighbors supporting his application and a copy of his certification from the Virginia Board of Nursing. Appointments would be scheduled to minimize neighborhood impact, and clients would park in his driveway. On Aug. 16, the planning commission approved Daniel's application and recommended its approval by the council.

Then came the public hearing Sept. 18. Four of Daniel's neighbors spoke on his behalf. A long line of opponents followed.

"And you know what?" said Michael Hudson, Daniel's neighbor. "I started to look at these people, and I realized I didn't know any of them."

Of the 21 residents who publicly opposed Daniel's application, two live on West Street. Many said they were against home businesses on principle, and others expressed concerns about the preservation of "a family-friendly atmosphere" in Old Town, the presence of "unknown" people in the neighborhood and the unfair "competitive advantage" that Daniel could gain by working out of his home.

After the public hearing, Devine approached Daniel's opponents in the parking lot. "I went up to them and said I wanted to understand," he recalled. " 'I don't know who you are or where you live.' And the first person to speak said, 'It's not about your lifestyle.' "

Devine was stunned. "How do people from a different neighborhood know about our lifestyle?" he asked.

The next week, when council member J. Steven Randolph (I) introduced a motion to approve Daniel's application, no one seconded it.

Daniel's application hadn't actually been rejected, because no member was willing to introduce a motion to do so. That led to a 45-minute freewheeling discourse on the city's special-use-permit code, with council members ultimately voting to refer the issue to its Land Use Committee for further study -- leaving Daniel in the lurch. That same night, someone scrawled anti-gay graffiti on the car window of one of Daniel's supportive neighbors, escalating tensions further.

If the council votes on Daniel's application at next Monday's meeting, at least three of the council's six members said they are likely to vote against it. One is Jackson H. Miller, the Republican candidate for the 50th District of the House of Delegates, who introduced the motion to approve another massage therapy business a year earlier.

"I've had a mixed record on home businesses," Miller said. "I'm opposed if neighbors are opposed. That's been my standard," he said, noting that he voted with the council earlier this year to reject an application for a home-based optometry clinic.

But that standard seems like an arbitrary one to Daniel. "If they would have told me from the very beginning, 'We do not allow this,' it would have been fine with me," he said. "I would have never started the process."

DOJ_NMG_0080836

ANTITRUST:

Consumer Advocates Criticize AT& T Deal (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, October 16, 2006

Consumer advocates say the new concessions AT&T has offered to close its $80 billion merger with BellSouth don't go far enough to preserve competition.

"They're a step in the right direction, but they don't resolve the most important competitive problems," says Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union.

He also said AT&T's offer smacks of desperation to win approval.

At the urging of its two Democratic commissioners, the Federal Communications Commission postponed Friday's scheduled vote on the merger until Nov. 3 to allow time for the public to comment on proposed concessions that AT&T filed Friday. The four commissioners available to vote on the merger are split 2-2 along party lines.

AT&T's offer, an attempt to break the stalemate, includes a $10-a-month DSL broadband service for new customers for 30 months. The company also said it would also offer free DSL modems for new broadband subscribers next year.

AT&T's proposal followed a flurry of late-night negotiations Thursday with the FCC's two Democratic commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein. Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has recommended the merger's approval with no conditions. Democratic commissioners Friday indicated AT&T's offer represented progress.

The Justice Department last week cleared the deal with no conditions or divestitures, enraging Democrats, who vowed to press for significant requirements.

The largest-ever telecom deal would forge a giant with 67 million phone lines and 57 million customers of Cingular Wireless, now jointly owned by AT&T and BellSouth. Consumers Union and others say the behemoth could crush rivals, and the deal means AT&T and BellSouth won't compete with each other. AT&T has said it faces new competition from cable companies.

AT&T also proposed to:

·Provide DSL in 85% of the combined company's 22-state region within two years and offer broadband service through satellite or wireless providers to all the rest.

·Freeze wholesale rates the companies charge rivals to lease their networks for business service. Rivals want lower rates or arbitration to settle pricing disputes.

·Assure it won't block consumers' access to any website. Websites such as Google want to prevent AT&T from offering faster downloads only to those sites that pay higher fees.

·Conduct wireless broadband trials using BellSouth spectrum that is not being used now. The Democrats and consumer advocates want the new company to sell the airwaves to a rival that would challenge the new giant.

Jonathan Lee of Comptel, which represents AT&T rivals, called the proposals "completely inadequate."

AT&T's Michael Balmoris says, "The companies are offering a number of pro-consumer conditions."

Oshkosh Truck Agrees To JLG Industries Pact (WSJ)

By Ilan Brat And Joseph T. Hallinan

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

Oshkosh Truck Corp. said it will acquire JLG Industries Inc. for about $3 billion, positioning the Oshkosh, Wis., maker of fire, military, concrete and garbage trucks to take better advantage of the global boom in nonresidential construction.

JLG, of McConnellsburg, Pa., makes aerial-work platforms, booms and related equipment that can lift people and heavy materials several stories. The all-cash deal at $28 per JLG share will create a company with 13,000 employees and $6 billion in annual revenue. Oshkosh will assume about $200 million in debt. Shares of JLG ended unchanged Friday at $20.75 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

While housing construction in the U.S. has slowed, construction of office buildings, warehouses, multistory parking lots and other nonresidential construction has been strong as companies spend cash on expanding factories and offices while interests rates are near historical lows.

The purchase of JLG, which Oshkosh expects to complete in the next 90 days, will be the company's 15th acquisition since 1996. "We respect the companies, we respect their culture, and then we grow the heck out of them," Oshkosh Chairman, President and Chief Executive Robert Bohn said in an interview. Charles Szews, the company's chief financial officer, said, "We're going to have scale that we've never enjoyed."

Bill Lasky, JLG chairman, president and CEO, said the acquisition is a "great combination of two great companies."

DOJ_NMG_0080837

The purchase offers a chance for Oshkosh to balance the cyclicality of its current businesses. Over the past 15 years, generally defense spending has been stronger when nonresidential construction has been weaker, said Patrick Davidson, vice president of investor relations.

JLG's expertise at lifting and moving people and materials could help make Oshkosh's fire trucks with ladders lift firefighters more quickly and safely, said Mr. Davidson. More broadly, Oshkosh officials said the deal would give it greater global purchasing power and help to hold down costs of raw materials and parts. After the acquisition, Oshkosh will spend about $1 billion a year on steel. Oshkosh trucks and JLG telehandlers -- which can lift loads such as bricks 30 to 40 feet in the air -- and aerial platforms have similar engines, transmissions, axles and tires, Mr. Bohn said.

Oshkosh reaped the benefits of big increases in defense spending following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the launch of the Iraq war. The company makes a variety of heavy, severe-duty trucks that haul tanks, missile systems, ammunitions, fuel and cargo for combat units. Analyst Robert F. McCarthy of Robert W. Baird & Co. Inc., who has the company rated "outperform," said in a note to investors last week that Oshkosh had targeted "several opportunities" for its Bushmaster, a mine-blast-resistant armored truck.

Oshkosh's stock has more than quintupled since 2001. Friday, its shares ended at $55.54 in NYSE composite trading.

Oshkosh reported net income of $160.2 million on revenue of $2.96 billion for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30, 2005, while JLG reported net income of $149.3 million on net sales of $2.27 billion for the fiscal year ended July 31.

The acquisition is the latest step in the turnaround of Oshkosh. A decade ago, the company reported an operating loss of $3.1 million, thanks in part to a decline in U.S. defense spending with the end of the Cold War, Mr. Szews said in an interview.

The company replaced much of its top management and decided to shed underperforming businesses. Through acquisitions, Oshkosh began to reposition itself so it wouldn't be so closely tied to defense spending. In 1996 Oshkosh purchased Pierce Manufacturing Inc., a maker of fire trucks. Pierce is expected to contribute about 25% to 30% of Oshkosh's projected $3.4 billion in revenue this year, Mr. Davidson said.

JLG's stock has also enjoyed a strong run, more than quadrupling in the past three years before falling off earlier this year. At a recent investor meeting, the company indicated that it expected to increase revenue to $4 billion by 2011, and that it anticipated growth in Europe from both its own products and those generated by a recent alliance with Caterpillar Inc. Last year, JLG entered into a 20-year strategic alliance with Caterpillar related to the design, manufacture and sale of Caterpillar-branded telehandlers.

Write to Ilan Brat at ilan.brat@wsj.com1 and Joseph T. Hallinan at joe.hallinan@wsj.com2

VW Would Back MAN's Scania Bid With Restrictions (WSJ)

By Christoph Rauwald

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

German car maker Volkswagen AG said it would support MAN AG's attempt to acquire Scania AB for 95.89 billion kronor ($12.93 billion) if the German truck maker manages to acquire shares representing slightly more than 56% voting rights in its Swedish rival.

Volkswagen, Europe's biggest auto maker by sales and the biggest single shareholder in both MAN and Scania, said it would offer its shares -- representing 34% of Scania's voting rights and 18.7% of its equity -- to MAN in that case. Volkswagen said MAN must also win shares representing at least 71.31% of Scania's capital.

Volkswagen's supervisory board, the equivalent of a U.S. board of directors, "is convinced that a solution acceptable to all sides remains the preferred outcome," the company said in a statement following an extraordinary meeting yesterday. Volkswagen added it won't support a counterbid by Scania for MAN at the present time.

MAN said it welcomes "Volkswagen AG's continued support for its concept to combine MAN and Scania AB and its willingness to tender its shares into a successful merger."

Scania and Swedish investment company Investor AB, which owns a significant stake in Scania, have rejected the most recent bid, saying it still "significantly undervalues" the company's prospects. Investor said yesterday it still won't rule out a counterbid by Scania. Scania couldn't be reached.

MAN on Thursday raised its offer for Scania to about 475 kronor a share in cash and stock from about 449 kronor and said it holds 14.27% of the voting share capital in its Swedish rival as pressure to create Europe's biggest-selling truck maker increased. Under Swedish takeover law, its offer for the company is raised to the highest price it has paid for Scania shares.

The move came as a surprise after Volkswagen had rejected MAN's first offer made last month and announced a few days later that it acquired a 15.06% stake in the Munich company to "secure its strategic interest."

Write to Christoph Rauwald at christoph.rauwald@dowjones.com1

DOJ_NMG_0080838

ENVIRONMENT:

U.S. Electricity Demand Is Outpacing New Resources, Report Warns (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

A report by the North American Electric Reliability Council warns demand for electricity is increasing three times as fast as resources are being added in the U.S., a trend that could shake electric-system reliability in the coming decade.

In its first report since the organization's duties were expanded by Congress, the grid organization, known as NERC, said U.S. demand will increase by about 20% from 2006 to 2015, outstripping investment in new electrical supply. The pace of growth in Canada, while slower, also is cause for concern.

NERC counts 67,000 megawatts of resources in the works in the U.S. versus 141,000 megawatts of expected demand growth by 2015, leaving a shortfall of about 81,000 megawatts, an amount equivalent to 160 large power plants. One megawatt can power 500 to 1,000 homes.

Increasingly, it is left to a deregulated market to determine whether and when new resources get built. Available resources are expected to fall below safe levels in many parts of the U.S. and Canada, such as New England, the Rocky Mountain region and Texas, in the next two to three years.

As the system drifts closer to its physical limits, it is even more important that energy regulators and utilities promote conservation and use of the most energy-efficient equipment, said Rick Sergel, chief executive of the grid reliability organization. He added conservation programs will need to at least double their reach and effectiveness to help close the gap between supply and demand.

The report said 50,000 megawatts of generating plants are poorly utilized -- either aged units taken out of service or newer plants that have been unable to line up contracts, making them nearly useless.

"We've got a problem," Mr. Sergel said. "We can't continue this 'just-in-time' planning much longer. It works in manufacturing but it does not work in the power sector."

Mr. Sergel said NERC, a nonprofit industry organization with some powers granted by Congress, is pushing for more-comprehensive resource planning and it is attacking tools that it considers flawed.

For example, grid officials create annual forecasts that are built around "normal weather" patterns. Mr. Sergel said warmer winters and hotter summers are challenging conventional notions of normalcy. This past summer, consumer demand set records in most parts of the U.S., reaching levels not expected for several years and worrying grid officials. The increase came on top of unusual demand during the summer of 2005 that was 6% higher than in 2004, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

NERC intends to develop tools to determine "normal weather" for the eight regional reliability organizations that report to NERC to use when creating their forecasts. Where available resources are thinning, NERC may push state utility regulators to do more to promote investment. If investment isn't sufficient, the federal government could exercise new powers, conferred in the 2005 Energy Policy Act, to site major transmission projects.

Write to Rebecca Smith at rebecca.smith@wsj.com1

Consumers Less Power To The People (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

America is facing a crisis when it comes to electricity. But also a tremendous opportunity.

The forces that put us here look grim. Energy prices are high, supplies are increasingly tight, and anxiety is growing about climate change. But that dark outlook is driving consumers, utilities and public officials to finally take advantage of innovations that could radically reshape the nation's power consumption without lowering the standard of living.

THE JOURNAL REPORT

An influx of hedge funds2 is making energy markets more volatile than ever. And, it's in ethanol, where companies, private-equity firms and hedge funds see enormous opportunities3. · See the complete Energy4 report.

Some are technological fixes, from more-efficient light bulbs to variable-speed motors that use less energy when the load on them isn't as heavy. Others involve public policy. States are rewriting their building codes with an eye on conservation, and Washington is trying to lay down efficiency standards for more household appliances and electronic goods. Utilities are joining the effort as well, offering consumers rebates for buying efficient appliances and urging customers to use electricity more wisely.

DOJ_NMG_0080839

The good news is, "we haven't found a major use of electricity for which there aren't great opportunities for savings," says David B. Goldstein, director of energy programs at the Natural Resources Defense Council and a recipient of a MacArthur Foundation award for his work on appliance-efficiency standards.

Of course, we've all heard revolutionary promises like these before. But the promises seem to fade as each crisis recedes. So what makes this time different? Forces are converging to make the prospect of big change much more achievable.

Most urgent, of course, is the skyrocketing demand for electricity -- and the tightening supply. Many parts of the country set new records for electricity use in July and August, which sent a warning signal to officials that they have little time to act. Conservation seems a much more feasible solution than quickly building dozens of new power plants to add generating capacity -- especially if reducing emissions is a goal. The fact that the nation's energy bill totaled $296 billion last year, up nearly 50% from 1993, also provides impetus.

We've also gotten smarter about saving energy. New technology makes it possible to build more-efficient hardware without breaking the bank. And public officials now have much better data to draw on when they plan conservation efforts. They know what's worked in the past and can build on that success.

BUILDING MORE PLANTS

5

PODCAST:6 Advances in energy efficiency won't be able to answer all the needs of a growing economy and population. WSJ's Rebecca Smith discusses the main sources of electricity in the U.S. and how the mix is changing. Listen Now7

Some experts expect a transformation more profound than any since the 1973-74 Arab oil embargo. As a result of that six-month crisis, U.S. electric utilities largely weaned themselves off oil and shifted to coal and nuclear fuel for their power plants. The federal government set efficiency standards for automobiles and appliances, and building codes were revised. But much is left to be done. After all, 80% of U.S. buildings were built before 1980.

At the very least, the current push should produce considerable savings for consumers and unmistakable environmental benefits. "If you consume a lot less energy, it solves a lot of other problems," says Peter Darbee, chief executive of PG&E Corp., the San Francisco utility that serves one in 20 Americans.

Indeed, James E. Rogers Jr., chief executive of Duke Energy Corp. and president of the utility industry's leading trade group, the Edison Electric Institute, calls energy efficiency the "fifth fuel." By that he means that it's an alternative to coal, natural gas, hydropower and nuclear fuel.

Here's a look at 10 innovations capable of making a big difference immediately and in coming years:

1) LET THE LIGHT SHINE

Lighting was the first market for electricity, and it's still one of the costliest. But because lighting is ubiquitous, it tends to get less attention than other big power burners like air conditioners. And that means some tremendous improvements in lighting have gotten overlooked.

Technology has improved conventional lighting systems, making them much more efficient. Take compact fluorescent bulbs, which have bases so small they can fit inside a standard screw socket. These bulbs can often cut lighting costs by 75%, and they last at least eight times as long as regular incandescent bulbs. Many even offer a soft white light that mimics incandescent light.

The bulbs are readily available in stores, and prices have dropped substantially recently. Sales volume has increased, and many utilities are offering rebates that cut the cost of 24-watt fluorescent bulbs that produce as much light as 100-watt incandescent bulbs to $1 or $2 apiece.

If each U.S. household replaced one regular bulb with a compact fluorescent, according to the Environmental Protection Agency, consumers would collectively save more than $600 million a year. The energy saved, meanwhile, would be enough to light seven million homes, and the greenhouse-gas reductions from power plants would be equivalent to taking one million cars off the road.

Then there's LED, or light-emitting-diode, technology, which is based on semiconductors. This method already has slashed power use dramatically for many cities as a replacement for conventional traffic lights. Typically, an 11-watt LED unit in a traffic light replaces a 140-watt incandescent unit, producing a 92% energy saving.

Now LEDs are poised to sweep into more industrial applications, such as supermarket refrigeration cases. For now, white LED light is more difficult to make, and thus far more costly, than colored LEDs. But lighting experts say they expect the price to drop enough in the next couple of years to permit broader use of white LEDs.

Meanwhile, a host of new methods are being adopted by consumers and companies, such as systems that "harvest" daylight, concentrating it and shooting it indoors so that buildings don't need to use as much artificial light. Nature's Lighting, of Park City, Utah, manufactures solar dishes, lined with mirrors, that sit on flat roofs and project sunlight through skylights into buildings. Diffusers distribute the bright light.

DOJ_NMG_0080840

Mike Basch, a founder of Federal Express who's now chief executive of Nature's Lighting, says warehouses, auto makers and big-box retailers have been especially keen on the systems, which employees like because of the full-spectrum light.

At Wal-Mart Stores Inc., electricity is the leading expense after labor costs, exceeding $1 billion a year. So the retailer has been perfecting harvesting techniques to channel daylight into stores through prismatic skylights that concentrate the light without radiating heat. Sensors automatically adjust the store's fluorescent lights up and down in response to the amount of natural illumination available.

Wal-Mart now uses the system at nearly all of its stores, representing 330 million square feet of floor space. The systems cost about $200,000 per location and pay for themselves in two to three years through reduced electricity and cooling costs. "It's a pretty sophisticated setup," says Charles Zimmerman, Wal-Mart's vice president in charge of the initiative, who adds that Wal-Mart will gladly share its equipment specifications with anyone who wants them.

2) MORE-EFFICIENT HARDWARE

The past few years have seen tremendous advances in the energy efficiency of hardware. For instance, new developments in industrial motors promise huge savings for businesses. Currently, the motors represent 67% of industrial energy use, according to Clark Gellings, vice president of innovation at the Electric Power Research Institute in Palo Alto, Calif. But older motors waste lots of power because they constantly switch on and off.

Now many companies are turning to variable-frequency drives. Instead of constantly turning on and off, the drives "let motors change speed in response to the load on them," says Mr. Gellings.

MGM Mirage, the big casino and hotel operator, is installing 22 of the new variable-speed drives on refrigeration units at its Las Vegas properties. The $4 million retrofit will pay for itself through reduced energy costs in about 2½ years and thereafter will save the company about $1.6 million a year.

Big gains also are being realized in air conditioning. New federal efficiency standards took effect in January for central air-conditioning units used by homes and businesses; the least-efficient units sold must be at least 30% more efficient than last year's least-efficient models. In industry parlance, that's a 13 SEER, short for seasonal energy efficiency rating, versus a 10 SEER, the standard that had been in effect for 14 years.

According to the Department of Energy, the higher standard will save a total of 4.2 quadrillion British thermal units, or "quads," of energy from 2006 through 2030 -- enough of a saving that utilities will be able to forgo building 40 new power plants nationally. Consumers, meanwhile, will save about $1 billion by 2020.

The saving might even be more pronounced than that. Many central-air units can achieve ratings in excess of 14 SEER at only slightly greater expense -- and manufacturers say consumers are very interested. One reason may be utilities like Austin Energy, a city-owned utility in Austin, Texas, which is offering a 20% rebate on air conditioners with SEER ratings of 14 or greater.

3) SMARTER SENSORS

Manufacturers are designing their products to be more intelligent, using advanced sensors to better control energy use and drive down operating costs. Sensors selling for a few dollars can save thousands of dollars over the course of a few years. And more companies are taking advantage of the technology.

For example, custom-sensor maker Kavlico Corp., of Moorpark, Calif., is seeing robust sales for semiconductor-based controllers used in commercial refrigeration equipment. Sensors tell a controller when to begin the defrost cycle in the freezer case, replacing automatic timers that put equipment through unnecessary heat-up-and-cool-down cycles.

The new controllers "result in a 25% to 30% reduction in power use," says Scott Farrenkopf, general manager of Kavlico, a unit of Schneider Electric of France. He says auto makers and equipment makers are ordering more custom-tailored sensors for systems designed to improve fuel economy and energy efficiency.

4) BETTER MEASURES

Consumers, meanwhile, are getting better tools for tracking energy use around the house with tools that are inexpensive and readily available. Eric Bier, a retired group-home administrator in San Diego, got concerned about his rising home utility bill. So he bought a device called a Kill-A-Watt meter, made by P3 International Corp. of New York.

He plugs the gadget, which cost about $40, into a standard wall outlet. Then he plugs various other devices into the meter, and it tells him how much power they're consuming. By multiplying this kilowatt-hour reading by his local utility's rate, he can easily figure out the monthly cost of operating the device in question.

Mr. Bier was surprised at the results of a recent home test. He learned that his new computer and accessories were using 242 kilowatt-hours of electricity a month, costing $48.50, because he never turned them off. Once he began shutting them down at night, the monthly cost dropped to about $18.80 a month for 94 kilowatt-hours of energy. On the other hand, his Roomba vacuum cleaner, from iRobot Corp., provided a pleasant surprise, vacuuming 8,960 square feet of floor space automatically each month for a total of $1.17 in electricity. "Considering how much work it does, it's a baby," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0080841

Tom Lynch, director of sales and marketing for P3 International, says sales of the meters took off last winter. Sales in the first quarter of 2006 exceeded sales for all of 2005, he says, lifted by consumer worries about high utility bills.

5) SETTING STANDARDS

The federal government sets minimum standards for energy efficiency on more than a dozen products, including dishwashers, refrigerators, water heaters, room air conditioners and electric motors. From 1990 to 2000, these standards saved consumers approximately $50 billion in energy costs, according to one federal estimate.

The EPA, meanwhile, puts its own Energy Star labels on about 40 products, generally identifying the 25% of products in each category that are the most energy-efficient. In 2005, consumers with Energy Star products saved an estimated $12 billion, as well as enough electricity to power 11 million homes, according to the EPA.

But there are some glaring omissions in the EPA standards, and closing those gaps will bring more savings in coming years. For instance, television sets. The government doesn't impose an efficiency standard on TVs, and the Energy Star label identifies only TVs with low power consumption in "standby" mode -- in other words, not turned on. (Any device with a remote control is never really shut off, unless you unplug it.)

The call for a standard has grown louder as electricity use by televisions has boomed in recent years. Television screens have exploded in size, and add-on devices have proliferated, from satellite dishes to programmable set-top boxes. Some families now spend more money powering home-entertainment systems than they do refrigerating their food.

The International Electrotechnical Commission, which prepares standards for electrical and electronic technologies that often are adopted by governments, is working on common metrics to measure TV electricity consumption. After the IEC concludes its work, some efficiency information may begin appearing on sets in early 2008, the government says. Meanwhile, the EPA says it's considering Energy Star labels that would look at total power consumption by TVs instead of just power use in standby mode to give consumers a valuable tool to use when buying a new television.

The push for better disclosure is receiving some resistance from the electronics industry. The Consumer Electronics Association encourages voluntary labeling, but opposes mandatory efficiency standards for goods like TVs because "the industry has so many products and they change so fast," says Brian Markwalter, the group's vice president of technology standards.

Activists argue that the speedy evolution of products makes new standards more urgent. "Energy use has changed, and it's time for labeling to catch up," says Chris Calwell, principal in Ecos Consulting in Portland, Ore., a firm that specializes in energy issues.

6) NEW BUILDING CODES

All states have building codes for health, fire and safety. But 40 also have codes for energy efficiency. The rules require, for example, at least minimal amounts of insulation in new buildings. The Department of Energy estimates code changes saved consumers $4.7 billion in lower electric bills between 1991 and 2005.

Now some of the 10 states that don't have statewide energy-efficiency codes, including Mississippi and Alabama, are considering adopting them, in part because they're facing lots of hurricane-related rebuilding. Meanwhile, several states that already have efficiency codes are considering adopting the latest version of a model code, released last winter by the International Code Council, a membership organization that creates the building codes often adopted by governments.

Experts say the latest version is shorter and less complex than the previous one; for instance, it divides the nation into eight climate zones instead of 19. At the same time, the new rules set more-ambitious goals for energy savings. The code hasn't yet been certified by the Department of Energy, but many states are moving ahead to consider it anyway. Energy-efficient building codes are expected to reduce primary energy use in the U.S. enough to save consumers $10 billion annually by 2010.

7) INCENTIVES FOR UTILITIES

Most utilities earn higher profits as energy use rises; that's the way their rates are structured. So conservation efforts undermine their ability to make money and get reimbursed for their costs.

But many states have changed that pricing scheme to remove the disincentive for utilities to sponsor energy-reduction programs. California and some other states assess a larger proportion of a utility's costs in basic service fees, not volumetric charges based on the number of kilowatt-hours of power consumed.

In July, dozens of utilities, big energy users and regulators pledged to attack the rate-structure problem in states where it still exists and promote energy efficiency through resource planning, giving conservation more attention. Rather than build a new 500-megawatt power plant, for example, states would see if they could cut demand by 500 megawatts more cheaply and without environmental harm.

Utility regulators from more than half of these states have endorsed this National Action Plan for Energy Efficiency. The industry is engaged because most state regulators are confronted by "new plant proposals and rising rates" that they would prefer to avoid, says Diane Munns, a utility commissioner from Iowa and a leader of the effort. If the plan were adopted nationally, U.S. energy bills could be reduced by $20 billion annually, according to the EPA, a proponent of the effort.

DOJ_NMG_0080842

Meanwhile, the California Public Utilities Commission is considering creating special monetary incentives for utilities that promote conservation. Says Michael Peevey, president of the commission, "I want to see utilities get a return on energy efficiency comparable to what they'd get for putting steel in the ground."

8) VARIABLE PRICING

One of the more ambitious conservation efforts utilities are trying out -- both on their own and at the urging of regulators -- is a new kind of metering. Sophisticated electric or gas meters monitor how much energy is consumed by individual customers, taking automatic soundings several times a day instead of monthly.

This makes it possible for utilities to charge different prices by time of day or season. Regulators might use higher rates when the electric system is stressed or when fuel prices are especially high to suppress demand so fewer power plants need to run. Mr. Peevey of the California Public Utilities Commission says some consumers balk at the idea, "but when people understand this is the more environmentally sensitive option, they are supportive."

Nationwide, about 6% of electric customers have the meters in place, according to a recent study by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Connecticut, Kansas, Idaho and Maine have the highest usage rates, ranging from 14% to 53%.

California soon will make the list with a massive remetering project expected to cost about $3 billion. Five million customers of Southern California Edison, a unit of Edison International, will receive new meters beginning in 2008, for example. The meters will be two-way communication devices, able to send the utility instantaneous readings as well as talk to other devices like smart thermostats, which allow remote control of temperature settings. This will let consumers better control energy use -- for example, by cutting use at periods of grid stress or especially high prices.

9) REBATES

Many utilities also offer rebates on energy-efficient appliances and equipment, trying to permanently reduce demand by getting obsolete equipment retired. When New York offered a $75 bounty for old air conditioners in 2002, 160,000 units were turned in, saving enough juice over 10 years to equal a full year's output from a large power plant.

California, where consumers pay about $20 billion a year in electricity charges, has committed to spend $2 billion of customer funds on energy-efficiency programs from 2006 through 2008, a record expenditure for any state. Elsewhere, states are considered aggressive if they get utilities to spend the equivalent of 1% to 2% of electricity revenue on energy-efficiency programs.

PG&E's Pacific Gas & Electric utility will spend $974 million and expects to permanently cut demand by 600 megawatts, eliminating the need for one large power plant and 30 to 50 years of fuel. About 250 megawatts of reductions will come from lighting alone.

Some of these efficiency programs involve big rebates. GMH Capital Partners LP, a real-estate investment firm, bought a big apartment complex in Richmond, Calif., last year. It spent $327,428 rejuvenating the nearly 20-year-old structure, installing new lights, water heaters and heat-reflecting roofing materials. The expected annual energy savings: $112,000, most of which will be realized by renters at the 1,008-unit complex.

For its trouble, GMH got a rebate check for the full amount of the equipment and installation. The local utility, PG&E, made the move because most property owners won't do expensive retrofits if renters reap the savings. "It's a tough market to crack," says Beverly Alexander, vice president of customer energy at the utility.

10) CUSTOMER-RESPONSE PROGRAMS

Getting customers to trade up to energy-efficient equipment permanently reduces energy use. But there are ways to temporarily cut consumption, particularly among big energy users. These "demand response" programs will be more visible in coming years, especially in places like New England that are having trouble getting new plants built.

Early programs paid big energy users to reduce energy use, sometimes forcing them to curtail production. One current approach cuts consumption more painlessly, with the help of controls that dim lights or cycle air conditioners and pumps when requested by the utility.

In response to a directive from Congress, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission recently surveyed the electric-power industry and found existing demand-response programs can cut consumption by 37,500 megawatts when activated, equivalent to the output of 75 big power plants.

In July and August, when U.S. electricity markets set new records for energy use, the outfit that runs the high-voltage electric grid in the mid-Atlantic region got big energy users to cut their usage in exchange for payments. This benefited all consumers by cutting wholesale power costs by about $650 million.

Many experts think that well-designed programs, backed by the right technology, can easily cut peak energy use by 5% to 10%. In fact, California did better than that in the 2000-01 energy crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0080843

Jon Wellinghoff, a member of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, says consumers "easily could save billions of dollars annually" with only a modest expansion of existing programs and no impact on productivity. What you need, he says, is "a willingness to try new things."

Some utilities seem willing to go down that road. Rick Green, chief executive of Aquila Inc., a Kansas City, Mo., holding company that owns utilities in five Midwestern states, says utility executives gradually are becoming convinced they can't build their way out of the current situation, as they did in the past.

He says one employee in Colorado recently told him that when he talks to conservationists, "I don't say 'no' anymore. I say, 'Yes, if...' "

Lax Oversight By BP Is Cited In Texas Fire (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

HOUSTON -- A July 2005 fire at BP PLC's Texas City refinery was caused by poor mechanical-integrity oversight, a U.S. safety board said.

The fire occurred four months after an explosion at the refinery killed 15 workers and injured hundreds more. The London company has come under fire from regulators after a series of safety and compliance problems in its U.S. operations.

BP said it agreed with the findings -- disclosed yesterday -- of the Chemical Safety and Hazardous Investigation Board and described a series of steps taken to improve "positive material identification" at the plant, including an increase in the size of the inspection team from 50 people to more than 200.

The July 2005 fire lasted two hours, injured one worker and caused $30 million in property damage, the board said. Although less serious than the earlier incident, The July fire and a subsequent blaze Aug. 10, 2005, rattled regulators and local officials.

In August 2005, the board urged BP to convene an independent panel to review safety at BP's U.S. refinery. That panel, led by former Secretary of State James Baker, is expected to report on its findings in late November.

BP spokesman Neil Chapman said BP was "disturbed" by the operating culture at Texas City. But he described the current safety culture as much improved, saying the company won't run Texas City at full capacity until BP is convinced it can operate safely. The plant, BP's largest U.S. refinery, has been partially offline since it was shut for Hurricane Rita in September 2005.

Inquiry Is Critical Of BP In Refinery Fire (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 15 (AP) — The giant oil company BP did not have procedures in place that could have prevented a fire in July 2005 at its refinery in Texas City after workers installed the wrong type of pipe, federal investigators said Sunday.

The fire at the Resid Hydrotreater Unit, which combines heavy crude oil with hydrogen, caused more than $30 million in damage. One worker suffered minor injuries.

The fire occurred at the same BP plant where 15 people were killed and more than 170 were injured in a March 2005 explosion.

The plant is about 40 miles southeast of Houston.

BP officials said the fire started when an eight-inch section of heavy steel pipe failed between a compressor and heat exchanger.

Mexican Bats Find Cross-Border Benefactors (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Shortly before sundown they make their first foray, cruising up to 5,000 feet aboveground in search of mosquitoes, moths and other tasty treats. A few hours later, they return home to rest and feed their young before heading out again around midnight.

By daybreak, when Mexican free-tailed bats finally return to their cave, named Cueva de la Boca, the colony will have traveled as far as 62 miles and gobbled some 12 tons of bugs out of the skies near the U.S. border. And in cornfields from Texas to Iowa, farmers are giving thanks.

Or at least they should be.

Sure, bats are creepy. They hang upside down, squeal at high decibels and turn up in movies as blood-sucking fiends. Some even spread rabies. But, it turns out, that in the global ecosystem, bats are humanity's allies.

DOJ_NMG_0080844

Every night, all night, as humans sleep, the flying mammals work feverishly. They pollinate plants such as the agave, the source of Mexico's iconic tequila. Their excrement, called guano, is a valuable fertilizer. And bats eat up to one-quarter of their body weight in insects every night, making them one of the simplest, safest, most cost-effective forms of pest control available.

Somehow, that message has not reached most people. For decades, intentionally or otherwise, property owners, hikers and sightseers have trampled habitat, dumped garbage and set fires, decimating the bat populations in many parts of the world.

"We scientists missed a chance to give farmers the right information in the right way at the right time," said A. Nelly Correa, a bat expert at the Center for Environmental Quality at the Monterrey Institute of Technology in Mexico. "Most of us were too busy giving the information to our peers in journals and not to the people who could be our partners."Bat Lovers Take Action

Now, in a unique cross-border alliance, bat lovers have embarked on a multiyear effort to quantify the damage and replenish the bat population of northern Mexico. The project, being spearheaded by the nonprofit Texas-based Bat Conservation International (BCI), includes detailed mapping of hundreds of present and former bat roosts, educational programs for farmers and even purchases of land to protect the most vulnerable colonies.

In late September, armed with BCI data, the Mexican environmental group Pronatura Noreste bought the Cueva de la Boca cave outside Monterrey for about $500,000. It is believed to be the first purchase of a bat cave by Mexican conservationists, said Magdalena Rovalo, a biologist and director of the organization. Access is now limited to researchers, and plans are underway to build an observation tower in the hopes of generating tourism revenue at the cave, which takes its name from the Spanish word for "mouth."

"If we had a healthy population of bats, we would have pest control and healthy crops at no cost to society and no bad effects on health," Correa said. "And it would be a plus for the economy as bats can become a tourist attraction."

Scientists have identified more than 1,000 species of bats worldwide, representing about one-fourth of all mammal types. Latin America is home to 290 species, 140 of them in Mexico, making the region one of the most diverse bat habitats on the globe. Of all those bats, just two species feed on wild bird blood and only one eats cattle blood, said Correa, who tries at every opportunity to disabuse the public of those blood-sucking stereotypes.

"They have given all bats a bad image very unfairly," Correa said. "Bats are really great guys!"

Cueva de la Boca caught the attention of conservationists after researcher Arnulfo Moreno surveyed 10 major publicly accessible caves in northern Mexico and found that the bat population had fallen by 90 percent in five of them.

"They are especially vulnerable when they are concentrated in a single place and only produce one pup a year," said Moreno, who is based at the Technological Institute of Victoria City in Monterrey. In addition, Boca is a "maternity cave," where young pups were being suffocated to death by smoke from the torches that hikers fashioned with halved plastic bottles and old rags.

"If you're an adult bat and you cannot breathe, you just fly away," Correa said. "If you are a newly born baby bat waiting for your mom to feed you, you just fall down and die."A Shrunken Population

At one time, Cueva de la Boca was home to an estimated 20 million Mexican free-tailed bats, known to scientists as Tadarida brasiliensis . By last year, the colony had shrunk to 600,000. Pug-nosed, with a wrinkly lower lip and long, loose tail, the bats prefer warmer climes, choosing to live along the border from April to early November. There is evidence they continue south through the winter, but details of their migratory patterns are not well known.

Three other species live in the cave in smaller numbers, including the ghost-faced bat, which has folds of skin below its chin and eyes that appear to be tucked inside its ears, and the naked-back bat, so named for its smooth, almost rubbery-looking skin.

But Boca became a high priority because of the Mexican free-tailed bat and its proclivity to eat the corn earworm, a vicious moth that devours corn crops as it migrates and lays eggs all the way from Winter Garden, Tex., to the Canadian border. As a pest control, bats are more attractive than chemicals because they cost little, pose almost no risk to human health and target specific bugs, leaving the rest of nature undisturbed, Correa said. And because of their location along the border, Mexican free-tailed bats are well-positioned to eliminate earworms before they strike vital crops.

"These bats are of enormous ecological and economic benefit on both sides of the border," Merlin Tuttle, founder and president of Bat Conservation International, said in an e-mail. BCI and Fondo Mexicano, a private organization focused on biodiversity projects, have commissioned assessments of an additional 150 hard-to-reach caves along the border. The bat population in those has fallen from about 55 million to 15 million, Moreno said.

Though modest in size, the 20-acre Boca property offers conservation opportunities beyond bats. It is home to a pair of endangered peregrine falcons, a threatened cypress species and a few endangered American beaver, according to Pronatura. From a single location, visitors can take in an entire ecosystem -- the insects feeding on the plants, the bats eating the bugs and the falcons feeding on the bats.

DOJ_NMG_0080845

Since Pronatura began informing visitors about the fragile residents of Cueva de la Boca last year, the number of Mexican free-tailed bats has doubled to about 1.2 million, Correa said. It is quite a sight, she marveled, when the colony departs for another night of hunting and dining. When they emerge in one burst, their presence in the skies shows up on Doppler radar.

She can only imagine what 20 million or so would look like.

Showcasing The Growth Of The Green Economy (WP)

By Michael S. Rosenwald

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Keith Ware dressed naturally to set up his booth at the Green Festival. He wore an organic cotton hooded jacket, organic cotton blue jeans and organic hemp work boots, the soles of which are made from recycled surgical gloves. He was not, however, wearing his organic cotton underwear.

"That's not to say I don't own some," he said.

Ware is one of the owners of Eco-Green Living, a Logan Circle store that sells organic and fair-trade products such as teas, hemp boots and even the makeshift floor he was setting up, which was made from Marmoleum -- a combination of linseed oil, wood flour, rosin, jute and limestone. He was an exhibitor over the weekend at the Green Festival, which drew crowds of people to the Washington Convention Center to celebrate light bulbs that last 60,000 hours, investment funds targeting socially responsible companies and paper made from elephant dung by a company called Mr. Ellie Pooh.

The show, the third in the District, grew from 250 exhibitors in the first year to more than 350. Although some exhibitors were selling products, the chief intention of the show was to develop the industry by connecting the principles and products of green businesses with mainstream customers.

By many accounts, the green business movement is taking off, with the marketplace topping more than $228 billion in the United States and with such companies as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. getting into organic food and General Electric Co. plowing into renewable energy. Levi's is introducing organic cotton jeans. Vanity Fair recently published a green issue.

"I think the business has taken off like a rocket," said Kevin Danaher, co-founder of Global Exchange, a San Francisco organization that promotes social, economic and environmental justice around the world. "I think it's left the launching pad."

But as Danaher and others pound away at expanding the green economy, what was long a counterculture movement is now embracing one of its sworn enemies -- big business -- as a key component of the cause. Danaher's organization has railed for years against Nike Inc.'s manufacturing methods, accusing the company of running sweatshops, yet he says the Wal-Marts of the world can help the world go green. Such companies legitimize the movement and can offer a wider market for niche products from smaller companies, he said.

"It's the big guys genuflecting in the reflection of our values," he said. "The previous economy was based on money values. The next economy will be based on life values. You do commerce and make money, but you're making your money by saving nature and protecting human rights."

Danaher acknowledged that embracing big business may seem contradictory, and not all green groups agree with him. Wal-Mart has plenty of critics, who argue that the retailer's drive for low-cost products could degrade organic standards. "It creates confusion," Danaher said. "People have this anti-corporation, anti-big thing, which is understandable. Wal-Mart knocks out small businesses. They keep their wages down." But, he said: "They get it out into the public mind. That's why we do this show. Let's get into the general public. Preaching to the already converted doesn't take you anywhere. It's taking it into the mainstream that does."

Ware's store has been open for about a year. Besides selling to walk-in customers, the store supplies home-building and remodeling contractors with tankless water heaters, solar-powered roof fans, bamboo flooring and nontoxic paints. "We have grown phenomenally," he said. "We've gone from doing a couple hundred dollars a month to several thousand a day."

One of the most common questions Ware gets about his business is about competition, particularly from big companies. Wal-Mart, for example, has invested heavily in its organic business, becoming the world's largest buyer of organic cotton products. Last year, GE said that its Ecomagination program, which it describes as building "innovative technologies that help customers address their environmental and financial needs and help GE grow," generated $10.1 billion in revenue, up from $6.2 billion in 2004. Waste Management Inc., the country's largest waste collector, is turning landfill gases into electricity for 400,000 homes.

"People always ask me about competition," Ware said. "No. No. There is only validation of the industry right now. It hurts the movement if they are doing small things for the publicity. If they are genuinely trying to do the things that they say they are doing for the right reasons, then it helps. I'm sure they are finding that, heck, they are earning more money off it. The idea is to get everybody moving."

Which raises the question: What if Target or Wal-Mart opened a store 10 blocks from him that sold everything he sells?

DOJ_NMG_0080846

Ware doesn't think Wal-Mart would put him out of business. In fact, he thinks if Wal-Mart sells more green products, his business will be enhanced, with even more foot traffic. Ware said that if competitors were legitimately green, "I would be absolutely enthralled with it. . . . I know there will be more and more places coming up where you can buy Marmoleum flooring. Everyone will soon be selling organic cotton shoes and clothing."

And judging by the turnout at this year's show, there will be plenty of customers. The festival drew about 25,000 people, up from 17,000 last year. Fifteen minutes after opening Saturday morning, there were four lines with more than 60 people in each, waiting to get tickets.

The green industry's move toward the middle provided an interesting study in contrasts. While the show offered free valet parking for bicycle riders, high-profile Washington was also represented, and Tim Russert and his wife strolled through the hall.

Liz and Jim Staedler of Summit, N.J., were in town visiting their daughter when they came across a flier for the show. Though they have never been to a green event, their 22-year-old son has been pushing them to incorporate sustainable energy into their Colorado home. They decided to drop by for some ideas.

"I thought it would be hippies and granolas, that type of thing," Jim said. "What I see here is some of that, but it's really more toward the mainstream."

The Staedlers were standing in an aisle with a booth selling politically charged bumper stickers, including one that said "Too Poor To Vote Republican." But nearby, in a booth with an iPod playing the Jackson Five through a speaker, a tall man in a pinstriped suit introduced chic body products from Pangea Organics. Big selling point: The skin lotion boxes are plantable and will grow Genovese sweet basil.

The products displayed varied appreciably: stationery from Mr. Ellie Pooh; organic wine and beer; sustainable men's underwear at $10 a pair. There was wheat litter bedding for pets, organic yerba mate, and information on obtaining an MBA in sustainable management.

Zach Lyman is the managing partner of a District company called Reware, which sells backpacks and messenger bags that have small solar panels on the outside to provide electricity for charging. Connect cellphones, iPods, GPS navigation devices and other gizmos to the bag, and they can be charged in generally the same time it would take plugging them into a wall socket. The bags sell for about $240. Lyman estimated that he has sold about 3,500 of them.

The bags were popular with early adopters and green-product aficionados, but after Hurricane Katrina, when millions of Americans realized that they could be without power for months, Lyman's business expanded into the mainstream, to average consumers as well as disaster workers and utility companies.

"I'm a big mainstream guy," Lyman said. "That's the whole thing with this bag. How do we introduce renewable energy to people who don't think about it in their everyday life?"

Lyman said he was particularly enthusiastic about GE's efforts in green energy.

"My whole goal in life is to bring this stuff into the mainstream," he said. "I look at GE and I'm excited. They are getting the message out, and for us, here you have one of the most successful companies in the world and they are saying that climate change matters, that renewable energy matters. That is so exciting."

Mark Bisbee, the owner of Liberty Carpet One in Fairfax, has created an offshoot called GreenFloors. He sells, among other things, carpet made from recycled soda bottles, which are sorted by color, ground into chips that are turned into fibers, then spun into a carpet.

A curious thing happened in the carpet market. Because nylon carpet needs oil for production, the high price of oil has pushed nylon carpet prices about $3 per square yard above recycled carpet.

Bisbee has customers in 48 states. He is still waiting for Wyoming and Hawaii.

"It was a small niche market and now it's more mainstream," Bisbee said. "Basically it's a question of awareness. Once people are aware they have choices it's easy, especially if it's economically similar. Then there is not really a decision."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

3 Vice Lords Convicted Of Drug Trafficking On West Side (HM)

Hilary Masell, October 13, 2006

Three high-ranking members of a Chicago street gang were convicted Thursday, culminating a massive federal probe into a network of drug trafficking on the city's West Side.

Troy Martin, Eddie Bell and Patrick Bray were each found guilty by a federal jury of running a highly organized drug ring as members of the Mafia Insane Vice Lords.

Share your thoughts

on this story on the ChicagoDefender.com message board.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Pravin Rao said the convictions send a message to other drug traffickers. "They can't . . . victimize the whole community," he said.

According to Rao, the group, led by Martin of Bolingbrook, had between 30 and 50 drug spots across the West Side. The spots operated 24 hours a day, seven days a week, selling cocaine, crack cocaine, heroin and marijuana.

Federal prosecutors called it a "sophisticated operation" with an elaborate infrastructure that earned $4,000 to $5,000 a day at each of the most active locations.

The men were arrested in May 2004 as part of "Operation Day Trader," a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigation. A total of 48 defendants were arrested on federal conspiracy charges, most of whom have been convicted.

Martin, 51; Bell, 45, also of Bolingbrook; and Bray, 34, of Chicago, each face life in prison. They will be sentenced in January.

Oak Park Drug Bust Adds To Busy Summer For D.E.A. (KOVR)

KOVR-TV, October 13, 2006

(CBS 13) SACRAMENTO Five people are under arrest after they were caught growing marijuana in plain view in their backyard, say D.E.A. agents. Federal agents say one of the suspects arrested is a leader of an Asian gang called Little Rascals, a gang the D.E.A. says is the boldest they've arrested all summer.

"It's been a busy season for us. It was pretty much unexpected," said Gordon Taylor, Special Agent, Sacramento D.E.A.

According to an affidavit, the leader lived in Elk Grove but ran the operation out of his mother's house in Oak Park. Inside the home, agents say they found 6,000 ecstasy pills, 39 marijuana plants in the backyard of the residence well as 19 boxes of processed marijuana.

Agents say the gang is not linked to the earlier arrests, where the plants were grown indoors. Despite this, agents say the arrests show a trend.

While were there, two cars pulled up and drove away. One nearby resident says he's had enough.

Agents were tipped off to the operation by neighbors who said they didn't know the leader, but they know he drove an expensive corvette.

If the men arrested in this raid are convicted, they'll face jail time, say agents.

More Local Rising Cost To Cross Body Uncovered In Starr County Well Valley's Evolution A Hispanic Celebration Olympic Legend Returns To The Valley Two Evade Police By Crossing Border Local For Last Seven Days Today Sunday Saturday Friday Thursday Wednesda (MON)

Monitor, October 14, 2006

McALLEN — Six defendants in a high-profile federal drug case have agreed to plead guilty to smuggling charges, opening the way for prosecutors to go after their 10 co-defendants.

The six men who have agreed to plea guilty are Jesus Lorenzo Meza, a former Edinburg police officer; Andres Solis; Ruben Meza; Arturo Javier Hinojosa; Miguel Hernandez-Rojas and Robert Lee Rodriguez, according to court documents. The six faced as many as nine federal counts, including conspiracy to distribute marijuana and cocaine and possession with intent to distribute.

Jesus Meza, Ruben Meza and Hernandez-Rojas are brothers of former McAllen police officer Francisco Meza-Rojas, the man who authorities believe led the escape from the federal prison in La Villa last month. Meza-Rojas was in the prison awaiting trial on charges in connection with this case.

The six men who have agreed to plead guilty could face as much as life in prison and a $4 million fine. The remaining charges against the six have been dropped.

"My understanding is that this was something that happened in the past," said Edinburg Police Chief Quirino Muñoz, Jesus Meza's former boss. "We are disappointed to see anytime a police officer violates the law in such a matter."

The case dates back to December 2005, when the 16 men were indicted after an almost 10-year Drug Enforcement Administration investigation into cocaine and marijuana smuggling near Peñitas.

Meza-Rojas, 41, led the family drug ring, according to court documents. He and the five other prisoners who escaped the prison in La Villa are still on the loose. The six are considered armed and dangerous. The other five men were serving sentences for unrelated charges.

Meza-Rojas and his four brothers were arrested April 19.

DOJ_NMG_0080848

There are still four co-defendants in the drug case whose names have not been released because they have yet to be arrested.

Prosecutors have decided to go forward with the case against Meza-Rojas and the six others in custody who have not agreed to plead guilty.

The Meza family smuggled in drugs through an area between Granjeno and Peñitas for years, according to a DEA agent's testimony in April.

From 1998 until 2006, they would employ as many as 10 people to perform counters-surveillance and move the drugs from Mexico to the United States, according to court documents.

Using codes, cell phones and other technology, they managed to operate seemingly undetected. Based on wire taps of many of the defendants' phones, agents were able to determine that the players in the smuggling had a system to elude law enforcement, which included abandoning a vehicle loaded with drugs when officers were about to make an arrest, the documents show.

Members of the organization would also use their vehicles to block law enforcement from entering certain roads and areas.

The U.S. Attorney's office in Houston and DEA in McAllen declined to comment. Both cited the ongoing investigation into the case.

In fact, U.S. Attorneys and DEA agents haven't shared any details about the case. All information has been gleaned from public records.

Those records and testimony from court appearances show the case against the 16 defendants heavily relies on information gathered from wire taps and confidential informants.

One of the defendants, Solis, filed a motion to have the government disclose the name of the informants. Solis has since agreed to plead guilty. Before his plea agreement, federal prosecutors filed a motion hoping to deny the disclosure of those informants.

Local Doc Cleared Of Malpractice (STT)

Scranton Times-Tribune, October 15, 2006

SCRANTON — A former Honesdale doctor was found not to have committed medical malpractice after a two-week trial in front of Lackawanna County Judge Terrence Nealon.

Lake Ariel resident Beth Batzel sued Dr. David George, who is now practicing medicine in New Mexico, claiming that he was negligent for performing a "cervical manipulation" on her spine in June 1999, five months after she'd undergone a cervical fusion. Dr. George denied he performed any manipulations on her spine and said that even if he had, Ms. Batzel's spine was well-healed by then.

Jurors deliberated about one hour before deciding that Dr. George was not negligent in his care of Ms. Batzel, according to Judge Nealon.

Man sentenced in drug-ring case

SCRANTON — A Kingston man was sentenced to more than eight years in prison for his role in a crack cocaine ring that operated in Luzerne and Lancaster counties.

Anthony Blaso, 54, of Kingston, pleaded guilty to a drug conspiracy count in July, four months after he was indicted in federal court as a result of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Wilkes-Barre Police Department.

U.S. District Judge William J. Nealon sentenced Mr. Blaso to 100 months in federal prison Thursday, followed by five years' supervised probation. The case was prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Francis P. Sempa.

Man turns self in after stabbing

PITTSTON — A 21-year-old man surrendered voluntarily Friday after he stabbed another man in the 200 block of North Main Street, city police said.

Nicholas Bonafede was charged with stabbing Seid Aptiliasimov, 23, in the abdomen at 273 N. Main St. about 8 p.m., police said.

Mr. Aptiliasimov was taken to Community Medical Center for treatment. Hospital officials had no information about his condition late Saturday night.

Mr. Bonafede was charged with aggravated assault, simple assault and recklessly endangering another person. He was committed to Luzerne County Correctional Facility, where he remained Saturday night in lieu of $35,000 bail, prison officials said.

U.S. Military Pilot Sentenced In Ecstasy Case (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080849

NEW YORK A U.S. military pilot who flew a U.S. Air Force jet from New York to Germany to pick up 200,000 pills of Ecstasy was sentenced Friday to 17 1/2 years in prison.

U.S. District Judge John G. Koeltl rejected appeals by defense lawyers for leniency for Capt. Franklin Rodriguez of the U.S. Air National Guard, saying the sentence was appropriate for "a particularly egregious and despicable crime."

"He took these actions while other members of the military are over there bravely fighting for our country," Koeltl said.

Rodriguez, 36, and Master Sgt. John Fong, 37, of the U.S. Air National Guard had pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges, admitting their roles in the April 2005 flight. Fong is awaiting sentencing.

"I'm very sorry," Rodriguez said before he was sentenced. "I just chose the wrong thing and my family suffered. ... I loved my job, that I served my country and I'm sorry for what I've done," he said.

Prosecutors told the judge that Rodriguez had repeatedly flown drugs on military flights, bringing hundreds of thousands of Ecstasy pills into the United States aboard cargo aircraft and that more than $700,000 (€557,768) in cash was found in a safe in his apartment.

The two men were arrested after flying the Air Force plane from Stewart Air National Guard Base in Newburgh, New York, to Germany and returning to Newburgh.

Federal law enforcement agents watched Fong load bags and boxes into a BMW before approaching the two men and asking to inspect their bags, where 28 bags of pills were found, authorities said.

Ecstasy is a synthetic drug considered part hallucinogen, part amphetamine.

Pilot Of Ecstasy Plane Sentenced To Federal Prison (MH)

Mid-Hudson, October 14, 2006

New York – A captain in the New York Air National Guard at Stewart Airport was sentenced Friday to 17_ years in federal prison for transporting ecstasy pills into the United States from Germany aboard a C-5A cargo plane.

Franklin Rodriguez, 36, and his co-defendant Master Sergeant John Fong, pleaded guilty in May to conspiring to import the drug into the country and conspiring to possess and distribute the drug.

The charges were the result of an international investigation into importation of ecstasy on military aircraft and its distribution in the United States.

It was charged that on April 12, 2005, Rodriguez and Fong flew from Germany to Stewart on a C-5A cargo plane on which they had hidden more than 200,000 ecstasy pills. Rodriguez also stored pills and $725,000 in cash in his apartment in the Bronx and the two men stored 60,000 pills in an automobile in Tampa, Florida.

Fong is scheduled to be sentenced next month.

Forest Pot Farms A Menace To Land (SDUT)

By Mike Lee, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 15, 2006

Drug agents sniffed out a major marijuana patch at Palomar Mountain State Park a few months ago in the kind of raid that has become all too common on U.S. public lands.

What officials initially thought might be a few hundred plants ended up being 15,000. Police also found two men and a woman tending the plots, whose yield would have been worth $60 million on the street.

The crop tenders scampered into the woods, leaving behind trash and terraces they had formed on the hillside. Initial repairs to such an area can cost taxpayers $10,000 per acre for staff time and a helicopter to haul away garbage, said the Office of National Drug Control Policy. On average, ten acres are fouled for every acre of marijuana planted in forests and on other public lands, the agency said.

“The whole process of these marijuana plantations brutalizes the landscape,” said David Graber, Pacific West regional science chief for the National Park Service.

The outdoor growing season for marijuana is coming to a close for the year, but some scars left by clandestine pot farms will take months to heal. Anti-drug agencies must deal with tons of trash, human waste, erosion and other forms of soil disturbance, loss of vegetation and chemical pollution that kills marine life.

The illegal plots also increase poaching of wildlife, raise the threat of wildfires started accidentally at campsites and put outdoor enthusiasts in harm's way. For instance, the U.S. Forest Service recently warned deer hunters to avoid two areas in Mendocino and Glenn counties until authorities could evict the marijuana growers.

Marijuana production on public lands in the United States has risen as the nation moves to further secure its borders and slow the movement of marijuana from Mexico. Mexican organized crime is behind the surge in such illegal plantings, according to law enforcement agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0080850

Growers favor public property partly because if their plants are discovered, they can flee without leaving behind traceable evidence. But there are other reasons for the popularity of forests and parks.

"The nation's public lands have become a haven for this illegal activity due to the relatively few law enforcement personnel and the vast and often remote tracks of sparsely or uninhabited lands," said the U.S. Forest Service's 2005 marijuana report.

Authorities – from the White House down to the local level – are paying more attention to the expanding practice of marijuana farming on public lands, especially national forests in California. Federal agents say that about 4.5 million outdoor marijuana plants have been seized nationwide this year, largely from public lands. That pace is well ahead of the 2005 count.

The problem has become so pervasive that President Bush's drug czar visited the Sequoia National Forest in August to discuss why drug cartels are having such success.

"Every American should be outraged that parts of their public lands are being held hostage by illegal drug traffickers," John Walters, director of national drug-control policy, said at the time.

Appealing sites More than half the marijuana plants detected on public lands nationwide are in California, which has eight of the 10 U.S. national forests with the highest number of pot plants confiscated. And 2006 looks to be another record year for seizures.

About 2.8 million marijuana plants were seized from outdoor farms in California through August, records show. About 75 percent of those seizures were on public lands.

The Cleveland National Forest, which cuts through central San Diego County, didn't rank among the national leaders in 2005, but authorities say about 13,000 plants were eradicated there last year.

Those Cleveland plantations caused ecological damage to 33 acres. Nationwide, the total reaches thousands of acres, according to the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

In San Diego County, the multiagency Marijuana Eradication Team removed about 250,000 plants from large-scale outdoor farms so far this year. This is about 30 percent higher than last year but below the average of about 300,000 plants in each of the past five years.

Anti-narcotics experts say the annual seizure totals nationwide vary based on enforcement pressure, weather and planting trends within the multibillion-dollar marijuana industry. In 2005, for example, heavy spring rains likely discouraged some growers and probably accounted for the county's lower eradication totals.

Some authorities say the escalating number of marijuana seizures on public lands in California indicate their enforcement methods are becoming more effective.

Robin Schwanke, spokeswoman for the state Attorney General's Office, credits the rise to better surveillance and increased understanding of what areas the growers prefer.

Others say cash-strapped, thinly staffed enforcement agencies aren't the reason for the rising rate of marijuana busts.

"At a grand scale, I see no solution anytime soon," said Graber of the National Park Service. "At a local scale, the most we can hope for is that we harass (the growers) enough that they go somewhere else."

Relatively few marijuana farms are found on public lands closest to the U.S.-Mexico border because the presence of immigration agents deters many potential growers.

But a few miles to the north, "any place you can think of that there would be water, they are growing it," said Greg Meese, the patrol captain for the Cleveland National Forest.

Lasting degradation To make way for their crops, pot growers routinely use pesticides to remove swaths of native shrubs and grasses. Their plots often spread over dozens of acres. Taller trees are left as cover against aerial checks by police helicopters.

In a forest, the low-level plants keep dirt from washing into streams during rainfall. After the marijuana is harvested and winter rains come, the barren patches are highly susceptible to soil erosion. The result is that waterways in some of California's most pristine watersheds become polluted.

Marijuana growers also dam streams, haul in small pumps and run plastic irrigation lines through the forest to water their crops. The result can be dramatic changes to creeks that native fish rely on.

Often, the marijuana operations are highly sophisticated and may take weeks to set up.

A few years ago, Meese discovered an irrigation system that included pools up to 15 feet wide and just as deep.

"The head pressure in the (marijuana) garden hose was better than what you typically find in your home," he said.

Growers commonly import rat poison to kill the critters that like to eat their profit-generating plants. They also use lots of chemical fertilizers to keep their plants green. These substances can easily contaminate nearby creeks, promoting algae blooms that can use up the oxygen in the water and kill fish.

In one case, Graber said his first clue about the presence of a major marijuana operation was extremely high nitrate levels that were detected during routine water monitoring.

DOJ_NMG_0080851

A pot farm's most visible impact is trash. Marijuana growers commonly live with their plants for weeks or months at a time. At a large farm, the litter can weigh several tons and include miles of irrigation pipe.

"The camps themselves are filthy. There is garbage everywhere – anything you can think of that you would generate in your home . . . including human waste," Meese said.

Threats to wildlife compound the other environmental concerns.

"At almost every (garden) we come across, there is some evidence of poaching, whether it be poaching salmon out of the creeks in Butte County or poaching deer," said Patrick Foy, spokesman for the California Department of Fish and Game.

In one instance, law enforcement agents found a camp where the tenants were making jerky out of three foxes they'd caught.

"These folks already have complete disregard for the law . . . so when anything that would serve as a food source comes by, they often take advantage of that," Foy said.

But perhaps the most serious danger is to unsuspecting hikers, hunters and mountain bikers who cross into marijuana farms, some of which are protected by booby traps and barbed wire. Most farms are well off the beaten path, but reports of run-ins between the public and growers have become routine.

On Sept. 30, for example, a hunter in the Mendocino National Forest said he stumbled onto the edge of a marijuana patch and found four men pointing rifles at him. They started firing but the hunter escaped unharmed, according to a Forest Service report.

Such incidents usually lead to raids by law enforcement teams. Once authorities haul away and destroy the marijuana plants, they remove the leftover garbage and leave the land to repair itself over time.

That was the case this summer on Palomar Mountain, where crews took out the trash and let nature take its course. Within several weeks, the native vegetation was resprouting, said Jim Dice, a senior environmental scientist for California State Parks.

"Any active restoration," he said, "would probably be more damaging than leaving it alone."

Pol Asked Fed Judge To Go Easy On Dealer (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, October 16, 2006

U.S. Rep. James P. McGovern asked a federal judge in Boston to go easy last week when sentencing a now twice-convicted drug dealer who was once moving up to 13 pounds of coke per month.

The Worcester Democrat wrote to U.S. District Court Judge F. Dennis Saylor IV asking leniency for Nicholas Police, 28, even though, McGovern said, "I am not personally familiar with Mr. Police or the specific details surrounding the criminal conduct with which he has been charged."

McGovern, a self-styled champion of human rights and the first pol to pledge his allegiance to Democratic gubernatorial hopeful Deval Patrick, could not be reached for comment last night.

It is unknown if his blind faith did any good. On Thursday, Saylor sentenced Police - an Assumption College graduate who once started his own record label - to the low end of the 8-to-10 years he was facing for pleading guilty to possession of cocaine and marijuana with intent to distribute.

The 8-year federal sentence absorbs the 3-to-5 years Police has been serving since 2004 on state cocaine trafficking charges.

In that case, according to a 2003 internal U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigative report, Police was arrested for trying to buy 40 pounds of pot from an undercover state trooper for $60,000 cash and 4 ounces of cocaine. He pled guilty.

The same DEA memo said Police kept coke in his Worcester apartment and, according to an informant who regularly brought drugs from him, was armed with "three handguns."

Still, McGovern, 46, wrote Saylor in a letter dated Sept. 18, "As a college graduate from a stable home environment with the support of loving parents, Mr. Police stands an excellent chance to be fully rehabilitated."

Acting U.S. Attorney Michael Loucks' office disagreed, arguing in their own written remarks to Saylor, "After his arrest on state drug charges (Police) had an opportunity to turn his life around and instead simply sold more drugs.

"If anything, (Police's) personal history and characteristics cut in favor of a higher sentence in that he grew up in a supportive, middle-class family and had the time and resources to obtain a college degree.

"Drug trafficking is a serious crime," prosecutors stressed. "It is not victimless."

Police's "devastated" parents declined to comment except to say they were "very appreciative of any help" McGovern was able to give their family.

Colombian Rebel's Trial To Begin In D.C. (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0080852

By Hope Yen, The Associated Press

AP, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The politically charged trial of a top Latin American rebel leader is set to begin in a 3-year-old kidnapping case that has the lives of three Americans hanging in the balance.

Opening statements were scheduled for Monday in the U.S. District Court trial of 56-year-old Ricardo Palmera, who is considered the most senior member captured from the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), on charges he provided material support to a terrorist group.

Palmera, better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad, was extradited in late 2004 after his capture in Ecuador. He is accused of conspiring to kidnap three Americans in connection with the February 2003 downing of a small U.S. airplane over a FARC stronghold in southern Colombia.

FARC is demanding that the U.S.-backed Colombian government release all of the group's imprisoned comrades, including Palmera, in exchange for the release of 62 hostages.

The hostages include three Americans on the plane _ Thomas Howes, Keith Stansell and Marc Gonsalves _ who authorities say were defense contractors involved in an intelligence-collecting mission.

Palmera is also charged in the killings of two others on the plane, U.S. pilot Thomas Janis and Sgt. Luis Alcides Cruz, a Colombian soldier, who were found near the crash site apparently shot to death.

The trial is the latest evidence of a stiffening U.S. stance against FARC, which the U.S. government considers a terrorist organization. Since 2000, the U.S. has given more than $4 billion to Colombia to fight the insurgency and the world's largest cocaine industry.

Family members of the hostages say they welcome Palmera's trial, although they acknowledge it could backfire. The three hostages are believed to be alive but haven't been publicly seen since a July 2003 video released by the rebels.

"I worry they may retaliate against the Americans," said Jo Rosano, mother of Marc Gonsalves.

Although Colombian President Alvaro Uribe has indicated an openness to a prisoner swap, he has suggested the release of Palmera and another leading rebel, Nayibe Rojas, is out of his hands because they had been extradited to the U.S. for trial.

A former banker from a wealthy family, the Harvard-educated Palmera says he took up arms to fight social injustice. FARC, along with a smaller leftist rebel group, has battled to topple the Colombian government for 42 years in a conflict that claims more than 3,000 lives every year.

He told The Associated Press in 1999 that he had chosen to "be alongside the progressive people fighting the 10 percent of landowners who are monopolizing 90 percent of Colombia's land."

The group funds itself through drug trafficking, extortion and kidnapping.

IMMIGRATION:

No Cause For Celebration (USAT)

By Dan Stein

USA Today, October 16, 2006

Overcrowded schools, congested highways, environmental stresses: We are a nation paving over its wildernesses while depending on our enemies for vital resources.

Why?

Because Americans have been blindsided by a government-mandated mass immigration program that's fueling this nation's runaway population growth. This growth was neither planned nor expected, but we feel the consequences every day.

The population of the USA will reach 300 million this week on a relentless march to half a billion before 2050. That's because about 80% of the current population growth in the USA is due to immigration policies — immigrants legally admitted, illegal immigrants, and births to immigrants after entering. Only a dramatic rollback in overall immigration can reverse these trends. The time to act is now.

Thirty years ago, the Rockefeller Commission could find no benefit from further increases in the size of the U.S. population. In 2006, it is hard to see how the massive government-mandated population growth of the past 30 years has improved life for most Americans. The addition of a staggering 100 million people since the late 1960s has accelerated virtually every environmental problem, exacerbated resource depletion, contributed to sprawl and congestion, and strained nearly all public services.

Many of our nation's opinion elite now seem intent on further acceleration. The Senate recently approved an illegal alien amnesty and immigration increase that would have resulted in at least 66 million new immigrants arriving in the USA in the next 20 years — and we'd hit a billion people before 2100. This is insane, and only a massive public outcry and strong opposition in the House prevented this from occurring.

DOJ_NMG_0080853

Our population future is entirely within our power to determine. Just as the government has mandated soaring overcrowding and congestion in the past several decades, it has the power to slow population growth by curtailing immigration and enforcing laws against illegal immigration.

It's time to talk about the purposes of immigration and its role in our national future. As responsible stewards for future generations, there is an urgency to consider how our decisions today will affect the nation they will inherit — before it's too late.

Dan Stein is president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR).

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's Press Secretary Is Raising Money, And Some Eyebrows (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

ST. CHARLES, Ill., Oct. 15 — Tony Snow draped his lanky frame across a wooden lectern, leaned forward and gazed out at 850 adoring Republicans who had paid $175 apiece to hear him speak. There was a conspiratorial gleam in his eye, as if he was about to reveal some deep inner secret from his new life as the White House press secretary.

"Yesterday," Mr. Snow declared, "I was in the Oval Office with the president ——"

He cut himself off, took a perfectly calibrated three-second pause and switched into an aw-shucks voice for dramatic effect: "I just looove saying that! Yeaaah, I was in the Oval Office. Just meeee and the president. Noooooobody else." The crowd lapped it up.

Live from the suburbs of Chicago — It's the Tony Snow Outside-the-Beltway Hour! Memo to White House press corps: you can't catch this show in the briefing room.

In the six months since Mr. Bush enlisted him to resuscitate a White House press operation that was barely breathing, Mr. Snow, a former Fox News television and radio host and a conservative commentator, has reinvented the job with his snappy sound bites and knack for deflecting tough questions with a smile. Now, he is reinventing it yet again, by breaking away from the briefing room to raise money for Republicans, as he did here on Saturday night for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert.

Mr. Snow, who will make 16 such appearances before Election Day, acknowledged he had entered "terra incognita"; to his knowledge, no other White House press secretary has raised money for political candidates while in the job. But with his star power from television and his conservative credentials, Mr. Snow, unlike his predecessors, is in hot demand.

His booking agent is the White House political shop, run by Karl Rove, the president's chief strategist. The White House is not keeping track of how much money Mr. Snow raises. His talks — Saturday night's was a cross between a one-man show and a religious revival — have attracted little scrutiny so far, but they are giving a much-needed boost to a party whose midterm fortunes appear increasingly bleak.

Yet even as the Republican establishment revels in his celebrity — "It's like Mick Jagger at a rock concert," Mr. Rove said — Mr. Snow's extracurricular activities are making some veteran Washington hands, including those with strong Republican ties, deeply uneasy.

"The principal job of the press secretary is to present information to reporters, not propaganda," said David R. Gergen, who served in the Nixon, Ford and Reagan administrations and also advised President Bill Clinton. "If he is seen as wearing two hats, reporters as well as the public will inevitably wonder: is he speaking to us now as the traditional press secretary, or is he speaking to us as a political partisan?"

Indeed, Mr. Snow, whose commentary was so sharply critical of Mr. Bush that six months before he was hired, he referred to Mr. Bush as "something of an embarrassment," got the White House job in part because his independence gave him credibility with reporters. Kenneth J. Duberstein, former chief of staff to Ronald Reagan, said Mr. Snow must be careful not to damage that credibility.

"His profile should not be a political profile," Mr. Duberstein said, "but a press profile on behalf of the president."

But of course, press secretaries are naturally partisans; to think otherwise would be naïve. Ari Fleischer, Mr. Bush's first press secretary, said he saw nothing wrong with fund-raising appearances, "so long as you don't make yourself into red meat."

There was, for the record, not a shred of red meat in Mr. Snow's whirlwind performance Saturday night. For 28 minutes, Mr. Snow paced the stage, hands gesticulating, eyebrows arching, voice rising and falling, as he held forth without notes on the greatness of his job, his president and the American people.

DOJ_NMG_0080854

Here was Mr. Snow on working in the White House: "The most exciting, intellectually aerobic job I'm ever going to have." On the nature of the American soul after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11: "There is an ember of greatness burning in every heart." On the intellectual acumen of his boss: "He reminds me of one of those guys at the gym who plays about 40 chessboards at once."

There were no mean words about Democrats. Mr. Snow, aware of his delicate balancing act, has vowed to "stick to factual defenses and advocacy for the president."

But as the keynote speaker, of course, he got to choose which facts to defend. There was no mention of Mark Foley, the Florida congressman who resigned in late September amid revelations he sent sexually explicit e-mail to teenage pages, or Jack Abramoff, the corrupt lobbyist, or anybody else who makes Republicans cringe.

That did not sit well with the local news media, which has been following accusations that Mr. Hastert's aides knew of the Foley scandal several years ago. Just two days earlier, Mr. Bush had been in Chicago to give the speaker his support. After his talk, Mr. Snow gave a mini news conference, and was asked why he failed to raise the Foley issue, "to reassure the people who are paying 175 bucks a plate here tonight."

"Because," Mr. Snow shot back tartly, "last time I checked Mark Foley didn't represent the people of this district."

Back in Washington, Mr. Snow has gained a reputation for such witty, if biting, repartee. Sound bites seem to flow from his tongue like water tumbling downstream.

Once, he accused the veteran White House correspondent Helen Thomas, who is 86 and has been covering presidents since Mr. Snow, 51, was in grade school, of "pestering the teacher." And when Bob Woodward painted a portrait of a dysfunctional Bush White House in his new book, "State of Denial," Mr. Snow dismissed it out of hand. "Sort of like cotton candy — it melts on contact," he said.

Jim Axelrod, chief White House correspondent for CBS News, said of Mr. Snow, "He's velvet glove and iron fist."

But when Mr. Snow missed a day of work to attend a fund-raiser after a leading Republican senator raised questions about the president's Iraq policy, Mr. Axelrod was critical. "This is the kind of thing you would expect the press secretary to be handling square on," he said.

Mr. Snow said his deputy handled the questions just fine.

It is often said that the White House press secretary serves two masters: the president and the press, which relies on the press secretary to advocate for the release of information. Mr. Snow believes that is true — to a point.

"The press secretary serves two masters," he said, "but not all masters are equal."

That gets back to his decision to headline fund-raisers, a decision he says he made only after soliciting the advice of colleagues, including the White House counsel, Harriet E. Miers. Mr. Snow said he set his own ground rules and would quit raising money if it interfered with his day job.

How will he know? "I have the feeling that all of us will know," he said. "You kind of know it when you see it."

Mr. Gergen sees this as the final "blurring of the lines between politics and news and entertainment." Mr. Fleischer says those lines blurred long ago.

"The modern-day briefing is not a briefing but a TV show," he said, "and Tony is the star."

Mr. Snow said his stardom was only "the reflected glory of the president." But on Saturday night, as he basked in the spotlight, his face beaming out at the crowd from six oversize screens, he looked awfully happy when he said, "Let me bring you greetings from the president of the United States."

Hastert's Team Mentality To Be Tested As Foley Scandal Unfolds (WP)

By Michael Grunwald And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

On a table near the desk of the speaker of the House, nine bears sit in a wooden rowboat, eight with oars and one in charge. But the boat can't move unless the oars all row in the same direction. That's why House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) bought it.

Ever since an odd combination of scandal and turmoil catapulted Hastert into the speaker's job in 1999, the beefy former wrestling coach -- who's a bit bearlike himself -- has pushed House Republicans to work as a team. And he's had remarkable success. Largely unknown outside Washington, routinely underestimated as a powerless figurehead inside Washington, the accidental speaker has helped unify his fractious caucus, promote President Bush's agenda and expand the House's GOP majority.

"That rowboat is how he sees his job," said lobbyist David Thompson, a former Hastert aide. "He wakes up every morning thinking about how he can help the Republican team."

But now the Republican rowboat is leaking, and the longest-serving GOP speaker in history is at the center of the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0080855

As investigators probe whether Hastert ignored warnings about former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.), Democrats across the country are portraying him as a symbol of a see-no-evil Republican House. They say Hastert's intense partisanship repeatedly blinded him to GOP misconduct -- not only Foley's inappropriate electronic messages with teenage pages but the corruption of lawmakers such as Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), as well as Bush's missteps in Iraq and New Orleans. Even Hastert's defenders acknowledge that his top priority as speaker has been protecting the GOP majority, not investigating the president or his own caucus.

Hastert doesn't seem capable of intense anything; he has a conservative voting record but a moderate temperament. He looks like a cross between actor Wilford Brimley and Jabba the Hutt, and his unassuming Midwestern public demeanor makes for dull television. He has shown none of the restless intellectual energy of Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), the frenetic revolutionary who preceded him as speaker; and he has often been dismissed as a frontman for former majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), the conservative firebrand who anointed him.

Hastert does not deliver the polished speeches and Sunday-show ripostes that typify leadership in Washington. But he sees himself as a coach, and his overriding goal is to help his team -- the Republican caucus, not the House. That team has enjoyed quite a winning streak over the past seven years. Republicans agree that if good-cop Hastert couldn't have done it without bad-cop DeLay, DeLay couldn't have done it without Hastert, either.

"Denny really smooths out the rough edges in the caucus," said former representative Rob Portman (R-Ohio), who is now Bush's budget director. "He's a kinder, gentler guy, but when he puts that big arm around you and says he needs you, it's hard to say no."

Coach Hastert is still beloved by his players, which is why he's survived the Foley mess so far. They appreciate how he listens to their concerns, shares credit and works overtime to keep the team together. He schlepped to 42 districts in August to try to maintain the GOP majority; it's no coincidence that his political arm is called the Keep Our Majority PAC.

"No one ever thinks he's put himself ahead of the team," said Rep. Adam Putnam (Fla.), a 32-year-old Hastert protÃ©gÃ© who chairs the Republican Policy Committee.

The question is whether Hastert's quiet commitment to winning at almost any cost will taint his legacy. He has always been loyal to team players like Foley, who defied his longtime supporters in the sugar industry last year to help Hastert pass a Central American trade bill. He eviscerated the House ethics committee after it admonished DeLay, and tried to change the House ethics rules to help DeLay stay in power. He didn't pay for a fundraiser he held at disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's restaurant until reporters asked about it two years later; the same month of the fundraiser, he wrote a letter opposing an Indian casino that Abramoff was trying to kill, and received $27,500 from Abramoff and five Indian tribes.

Now Hastert finds himself disputing his leadership team over what he knew about Foley, insisting he did not know about Foley's inappropriate behavior until recently, while others say they warned him last spring. He is also under fire for a multimillion-dollar windfall he earned by buying land and then promoting a federal highway nearby.

Suddenly, Republicans such as Reps. Don Sherwood (Pa.) and Ron Lewis (Ky.) are canceling fundraisers with him, and Democrats are running ads attacking Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (Ind.) and Iowa candidate Mike Whalen for ties to the speaker. Even Hastert's lead over John Laesch, an unknown and under-funded challenger, in his heavily Republican district has shrunk to 10 points, according to a poll last week.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, says Hastert is a perfect symbol of a hypocritical party that always claimed to distrust government power until it discovered it liked the taste.

"When it's come to a choice between the integrity of the House or the Republican majority, he's always put his thumb on the scale to protect the majority," Emanuel said.

Hastert is 64 and diabetic, and many Republican insiders think he'll step down no matter what happens in November. But he's confounded expectations all his life.Focused on Winning

Denny Hastert was an unlikely politician, a mild-mannered country boy whose father owned a feed-supply store. He inherited a stolid Midwestern conservatism from his parents, and accepted Jesus as his savior in high school. His autobiography overflows with 1950s nostalgia, with Denny waking up at 3 a.m. to drive a milk truck, and operating on his own infected shoulder.

"I learned from experience that when bad things happen, don't complain," Hastert wrote. "You play the cards you're dealt and remember there is a way to win."

He became a teacher and coach, then led a charmed life in politics, winning a race for state representative in 1980 after a GOP incumbent got sick, then jumping to Congress in 1986 after another GOP incumbent got sick. (The designer of his first yard sign, Scott Palmer, is still his top aide; and is embroiled in the Foley case.) He was a popular backbencher, and DeLay made him chief deputy whip after the Republicans seized Congress in 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0080856

In 1998, Gingrich was ousted and Rep. Bob Livingston (La.) chosen to replace him. Hastert didn't know Livingston well, so he made a date to see a private-sector headhunter. But the day before the appointment, Livingston suddenly stepped down because of an extramarital affair, and DeLay within hours orchestrated Hastert's ascension to speaker.

In his first speech as speaker, Hastert vowed to reach out to Democrats, declaring that "solutions to problems cannot be found in a pool of bitterness." But Hastert soon concluded there was no point working with Democrats. In his autobiography, he suggests he started to feel this way when he visited the office of House Minority Leader Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) and saw a "Gephardt for Speaker" sign. The relationship fell apart after a controversy over the House chaplain, when a few Democrats accused Hastert of anti-Catholic bias. "I have never seen a more cynical and more destructive political campaign," Hastert declared.

Hastert's team has shut House Democrats out of the governing process, refusing to allow their bills on the floor, limiting debate, calling midnight votes on complex bills that few have read. The Hastert Rule decrees that the House will consider only bills approved by the GOP caucus -- "a majority of the majority" -- and the speaker has enforced it with few exceptions.

"After the chaplain, he focused on winning," said lobbyist John Feehery, another former Hastert aide. "And with such a small majority, winning meant keeping the caucus together."

It was DeLay who spearheaded the K Street Project that made corporate lobbyists and rank-and-file Republicans so dependent on party leaders. And early in Hastert's tenure, DeLay whipped Republicans to defeat a resolution that Hastert supported on the Kosovo war, fueling perceptions that "the Hammer" was the real power in the House. But Hastert and DeLay agreed about almost everything else. And Hastert's influence gradually increased, especially as DeLay became distracted by scandal.

For example, Hastert encouraged an effort to oust Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) as a committee chairman after Smith bucked party leaders on veterans benefits. He angrily chewed out then-Sen. Robert C. Smith (R-N.H.) for holding up a bill full of pork-barrel projects for vulnerable House members before the 2000 election. He held open a 3 a.m. vote in 2003 on the prescription drug bill for three hours until he could round up a majority, and persuaded Rep. Robin Hayes (R-N.C.) to switch his vote to pass the Central American trade bill.

Republicans say Hastert wins by appealing to party loyalty and taking care of members with earmarks, campaign cash and other goodies. Conservatives aren't happy that earmarks have quadrupled under the GOP Congress, but they recognize that the House has passed almost everything Bush has requested, including his efforts to expand executive power.

"He doesn't beat people over the head, but he's kept them in line," said conservative activist Grover Norquist. "Do I wish he made spending restraint a priority? Of course. But everyone knows he represents the caucus agenda, not his own agenda."

It is only recently that GOP oars have started rowing in disparate directions -- not only over Foley, but policy issues such as Social Security and immigration. Some insiders think the loss of DeLay has created a breakdown in discipline. "Everybody in the caucus loves Denny. The problem is that nobody really fears him," said one GOP lobbyist who spoke only on condition of anonymity. "I think he's done."

Hastert aides say he intends to fight to protect his job, and he intends to win. After all, his legacy is at stake on Nov. 7. He'll either be the unbeaten coach, or the coach who lost the big one. Either way, he'll be the speaker who presided over an era of unprecedented partisanship, an era when winning seemed to be the only thing that mattered.

A Secret In The Line Of Succession (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) shows no sign of resigning over the Mark Foley-House page scandal. But the mere suggestion that he might do so raises an intriguing political and constitutional question: Who would replace him while Congress is in recess?

The answer, it appears, is on a piece of paper locked away in the House clerk's office.

In a little-noticed action taken nearly four years ago, the House amended its rules dealing with the "continuity of Congress" in emergencies and the succession of speakers. The rule, cited recently in Roll Call, directs the speaker to "deliver to the Clerk a list of Members in the order in which each shall act as Speaker pro tempore . . . in the case of a vacancy in the office of Speaker."

Normally, "speaker pro tempore" is the title given for a few hours at a time to various members of the majority who preside over House sessions. But the rules revision made in January 2003, in response to worries about terrorist strikes that could wipe out large numbers of elected officials, appears to bestow upon a newly named replacement all the powers enjoyed by a full-time speaker elected by his peers.

DOJ_NMG_0080857

That would include standing behind only the vice president in the line of presidential succession, said Sally Collins, spokeswoman for House administrators. But other House officials said it is extremely unlikely that a speaker pro tempore could assume the presidency before Congress would reconvene and elect a new speaker.

One thing is certain: The identity of the speaker-in-waiting is a closely held secret. Hastert's office declined to discuss the matter, citing security concerns, and the clerk's office confirmed only that Hastert's list is not made public.

Perhaps the biggest question, some lawyers say, is whether a House speaker -- full time or pro tempore -- can assume and keep the presidency under any circumstance. A statute, not the Constitution, lists the speaker's place in the line succession.

A case can be made that no one in Congress qualifies as an "officer" eligible to assume the presidency under Article II of the Constitution, said Neil Kinkopf, a professor of law at Georgia State University. The question may never be settled, he said, because the Supreme Court would take it up only if a speaker became president and someone challenged the action in court.

As for nightmarish constitutional what-ifs, Kinkopf said, "Imagine where the presidency falls not to the speaker, but to somebody on the speaker's secret list."

How A Blogger Put Himself In The Middle Of Mark Foley Story (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

MOORE, Okla. -- For three days, William "Wild Bill" Kerr huddled over an old computer, trying to solve a curious mystery.

He wanted to figure out the identity of the congressional page who received the salacious instant messages that prompted Florida Rep. Mark Foley to resign Sept. 29, triggering the scandal that's rocking the House of Representatives just weeks before the election.

The 32-year-old conservative blogger said he felt the news media were distorting the story, and he suspected, among other things, that the page in question was over the age of consent.

Five days after the Foley news broke, Mr. Kerr thought he had found the former page -- a 21-year-old political operative who, by chance, worked about 10 miles north of Mr. Kerr's two-bedroom apartment here.

Mr. Kerr disclosed the results of his investigation Oct. 4, and gained the sort of instant celebrity made possible by the Internet age. Traffic to his site, Passionate America, shot up from a typical 32 hits a day to more than 40,000, he says. And the national media picked up the story.

Mr. Kerr is just a bit player in the unfolding Foley drama, but his experience shows the rapid-fire and harsh ways a scandal can unfold. Little-known bloggers -- with no inside connections, knowledge, or restraints imposed on mainstream journalists -- can play a big role furthering investigations, and affecting public perceptions of events.

Mr. Kerr drew immediate scorn from some fellow denizens of cyberspace after exposing -- without independent confirmation -- the name of Jordan Edmund. Mr. Edmund, through his lawyer, has neither confirmed nor denied that he was the page who engaged in sexually explicit Internet chats with Mr. Foley. But, as a result of Mr. Kerr's assertions, Mr. Edmund's name has been news on every major television network in America.

Mr. Kerr's own life has come under uncomfortable scrutiny. His 11-year-old son's photo was posted by one blogger in Ohio who hoped to spook Mr. Kerr, whom he believed had acted unethically.

It has been a heady time for the unemployed Mr. Kerr. He says he had been fired from several jobs over the years -- installing car radios, working for a call center -- and was discharged from the Navy in 1993 after faking a suicide attempt. He volunteers that years ago he was arrested for burglary. These days, he is a stay-at-home dad, taking care of his two sons, the younger of whom is 3 years old. Mr. Kerr's wife supports the family with her job at a call center here. Mr. Kerr says he has never met a famous person or a member of Congress. "I need to get out of the house more," he says.

He spends most of his days looking after his kids, working on his blog and doing an online radio show. He hosts it three times a week from his bedroom, hoping to break into conservative talk radio.

Mr. Kerr got into the business in 2003 with an independently published newsletter called the "Passionate Conservative." After a few issues, he concluded that the newsletter was too expensive to print, so he turned his attention to his Web site, where he has expressed the opinion that the Iraq war isn't going as badly as the media claim and that the Dixie Chicks should stop criticizing President Bush.

Shortly after ABC News broke the story on the Foley emails, Mr. Kerr says he felt the mainstream media were doing a poor job of covering the subject. He set out, he says, in hopes of "exposing ABC News as liars" and proving that at least one former page who received inappropriate messages from the Florida congressman was over the age of consent.

"Even if he was 17, he wasn't a victim. ... Was it a joke?" Mr. Kerr asks. And was the alleged transcript of messages a political dirty trick? Though he asked such questions, Mr. Kerr hastens to add, he wasn't defending Mr. Foley, whom he calls a "scumbag."

DOJ_NMG_0080858

Mr. Kerr's investigation began when he found a Web page loaded on ABC's Internet server that wasn't easily accessible by the public. It contained what he believed to be the AOL screen name of a page who received messages from the congressman. He accomplished the feat by typing in variations on the Internet address that linked to the Internet page that featured Mr. Foley's instant messages. By slightly altering the address, he stumbled upon an older version of the exchange, which contained the AOL screen name ABC thought it had deleted from its site.

With the help of another conservative blogger Mr. Kerr had met online who goes by the name MsUnderestimated, Mr. Kerr then found the AOL profile of the page he believes received the instant messages. It said the person's first name was Jordan but didn't list a last name. Searching through congressional-page Internet sites, Mr. Kerr found a photo of a dark-haired page beaming at President Bush. The page was identified as Jordan.

From there, Mr. Kerr and his friend began scouring Internet sites, looking for a surname. They eventually discovered Mr. Edmund's MySpace profile, which contained a photo of the same young man they had found on the congressional page Web site, along with detailed biographical information, such as where he went to school and whom he worked for, that seemed to track some of the information in the Foley instant messages posted by ABC. They also discovered that Mr. Edmund now lived in Oklahoma City and works for the gubernatorial campaign of Ernest Istook, a Republican congressman.

After connecting the dots, Mr. Kerr began emailing newspapers and prominent political bloggers on Oct. 3, hoping to make a big splash. He invited them to check out important news he promised to post the next day on Passionate America at 4 p.m.

He had not, however, contacted Mr. Edmund. Mr. Kerr says he called the Istook campaign, asked to speak to Mr. Edmund but didn't leave a message. He says he was getting ready to leave his apartment around noon on Oct. 4 to drive his rusty, gray Ford Tempo to Mr. Istook's campaign headquarters in downtown Oklahoma City when his laptop PC froze. When he rebooted, he discovered his investigation had been inadvertently published on his blog four hours ahead of time.

Mr. Kerr said it had been his intention to fix spelling errors, try to get comment from Mr. Edmund and add a last paragraph. But there's no taking things back in Internet publishing. Other bloggers had already seen his posting. Soon, other sites, including the widely viewed Drudge Report, linked to his investigation.

After Mr. Kerr's report, ABC News pulled the material off its server and apologized for failing to delete the screen name from the material Mr. Kerr unearthed from the ABC server.

ABC issued the following statement Oct. 5: "On Friday, ABC News published instant messages between a former page and Congressman Foley with the IM screen name of the teenage victim redacted. Immediately, we discovered that in one instance, the screen name of the teen on one IM exchange had not been properly redacted. ABC News immediately took down the posting, redacted the screen name and republished the posting. We certainly believed that we had taken care of the issue quickly. Last evening, after an inquiry from Matt Drudge, it came to our attention that a blogger was able to access our deleted file by typing in a slightly modified Web address. To be clear, no one visiting our Web site would have simply stumbled on the old version. We thank the blogger and Drudge for bringing this to our attention."

The day after Mr. Kerr named Mr. Edmund, Mr. Istook called a news conference on the sidewalk outside his campaign headquarters to defend his aide. He blasted Mr. Kerr, without naming him, as "an irresponsible Internet blogger."

Mr. Kerr was present at the news conference and afterward identified himself to reporters. At least one local TV news reporter put him on the air.

For Mr. Edmund, life hasn't been the same since. He talked to the FBI last week for its investigation of Mr. Foley. He still works for Mr. Istook's campaign but has been on an unofficial leave for a few days. His lawyer, Stephen Jones, who is best known for having represented Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh, complains the former page has been receiving threats. He has also been accused by bloggers of playing a joke on Mr. Foley and jeopardizing the Republicans' House majority in the November elections.

"I think it's disgraceful and clearly opportunistic," Mr. Jones says. Mr. Kerr "had his 3½ minutes of fame at the expense of a number of other people's reputations and careers," he adds.

Mr. Kerr got a letter from Mr. Jones asking him to cease any further efforts to publicize a connection between the former page and the disgraced congressman. Mr. Kerr promptly posted the letter on his blog.

He says he feels he did the right thing all along. His main complaint is that he hasn't been given the credit he deserves for his scoop. Reports usually refer to him only as "a conservative blogger."

Foley Loaded (WSJ)

By Christopher Hitchens

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

When I finally took a look at what we are all now doomed to call the "sexually explicit" emails between Rep. Mark Foley and the young male page, I found that I had an immediate difficulty in following the exchange. The congressman's side of the correspondence was denoted by his online name, while the page's name was asterisked to protect the innocent, but they both seemed to be talking about the same thing, or things. And it read for all the world like a chat between two dirty-minded adolescent boys. How often do you do this or think about that? How long is it? Material of that kind or "stuff like that," as we might say. Perhaps I have become jaded, or perhaps I lack some crucial moral element, but I could not see what was criminal about it, and I laughed when I read the solemn announcement from the FBI, promising to investigate whether an email could possibly have crossed an interstate line and thus aggravated the gravity of the offense. Our guardians never sleep . . . * * *

The case would perhaps be altered somewhat if Mr. Foley had been the boy's teacher, or employer, or even priest. But pages are volunteers who are not on any one person's staff, and cannot be hired or fired by individual politicians. Neither coercion nor bribery was involved, as in the priestly scandals, which were quite often instances of actual rape. And the boy in this case was obviously a very knowing one, whose virginity was somewhere in his past. Indeed, it was Mr. Foley who seemed like the juvenile, or perhaps the case of arrested development. In what sense, then, does this constitute public business?

If there had been a sexual relationship between man and boy, it would almost certainly be illegal (as it would not have been if it were between man and girl) but there is no persuasive evidence that there was any sexual relationship. Indeed, it looks to me as if the email equivalent of phone-sex was the very thing that the wretched congressman was after, and probably the most he was likely to get. The youngster seemed able to look after himself, and to "turn" the conversation whenever it became too needy. It was all a bit sad and a bit sordid, but in the scale of things, no hanging matter or federal case.

I suspect that the hugeness of the current fuss must have something to do with our uneasy and only half-acknowledged awareness that the age of innocence is long over by the time that most of our children have turned 16. And this is why the Foley giveaway was contained in his ostentatious political activity in respect of the protection of minors. Have we not learned by now that the propensity of politicians to rave on about morality is often in direct proportion to their hypocrisy on the point? "Why dost thou lash that whore?" is the pertinent question asked of the lasher in "King Lear," and the answer comes plainly -- he hotly wishes "to use her in that kind" for which he whips her.

Anyone who has studied the fate of leading gay-bashers in American politics will know that the danger-signs are there from the start. Set your watch, and sure enough that fervent campaigner will be arrested kneeling abjectly on the men's-room floor. If the campaigner is an evangelist for purity and abstinence, he is booked to keep an early and certain date in a dreary motel, beseeching a drab hooker with an expired MasterCard.

Another free laugh, therefore, is provided by all the pompous talk about when exactly Mr. Foley's colleagues began to worry that his contents might be under pressure. Never mind the possible earlier emails, or signs of excessive interest in the problems of the pages. They should have known that Mr. Foley was a gay man in the closet, of course. And they should have taken alarm at the very first moment that he began to orate about sex-offenders and children. But the crucial word, here, is "closet." As long as a proper outward show of denial was made, Mr. Foley could as well have been asked to open the House's daily prayer session.

He has of course made himself even more contemptible by emitting easy babble about a hitherto unsuspected battle with "addiction," like a cuttlefish blowing off ink, and by alluding to a possible nasty moment in the woodshed with a man in holy orders. (If he does not come forward and say who that priest was, he is withholding evidence of a crime -- which really is against the law.) But the deafness, as well as the dumbness, of his party leadership is the truly extraordinary thing. It seems that the only offense of which he can possibly be accused, by the speaker of the House, is that of election-season indiscretion. In other words: How inconvenient!

Whether one is a stern defender of the present so-called "age of consent," or inclined to take a more relaxed view of dirty talk among males of all ages, or appalled at double-standards being applied for years to moralizing mediocrities, or merely concerned with that elusive thing the dignity of Congress, one has the right to expect more seriousness from the speaker than that. I am among the vast majority of people who never understood how Dennis Hastert got his job in the first place, or indeed how he has justified hanging onto it, and who would not really notice or care if he resigned it now. However, the speaker does have it in his power to do one decent thing before his term is up -- which is to get out while he can still save a rag of his integrity. There might be a person left in the world who believes that Mr. Hastert would have taken the same lenient or lazy view if Mr. Foley had been a member of the opposite party, but innocence on that level would actually be more sinister than cynicism. To add that the same would be true of Democrats if the situation was reversed is to say no more than we already -- from the forgiveness of numerous past "peccadilloes" -- have come to expect.

For a "peccadillo," Mark Foley is gone from politics already. And a huge public holiday has been taken from the serious matters that confront the electorate. But before the waters close over this scandal, and before the next one surfaces, I would still like to know what crime was committed in this instance, and who if anyone was the victim. We like to think that we "learn" from such episodes, but I cannot think of any lesson that can be derived from this latest spasm of righteous indignation.

Mr. Hitchens is a columnist for Vanity Fair.

DOJ_NMG_0080860

Loss Of Personal Data At Federal Agencies Is Widespread (WP)

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Federal workers at 19 agencies have lost personal information affecting thousands of employees and the public. Most of the data were lost or stolen. In a few cases, it was accessed by computer hackers, according to a report released Friday by the House Government Reform Committee.

In all, the committee reported 788 incidents involving the loss or compromise of sensitive information since Jan. 1, 2003. That was in addition to the "hundreds of security and privacy incidents" at the Department of Veterans Affairs.

"Data loss is a government-wide occurrence," the report said. "The vast majority of data losses arose from physical thefts of portable computers, drives and disks or unauthorized use of data by employees."

The committee asked all Cabinet agencies, the Office of Personnel Management and the Social Security Administration to report all losses of sensitive personal information since January 2003. The request came after a laptop with information for more than 26.5 million military personnel was stolen from a VA employee in May. The laptop was recovered, and the FBI said personal data had not been copied.

In many of the newly reported cases, agencies do not know the extent of the losses, the report said.

The Treasury Department reported the most incidents -- 340 -- including one in 2005 in which an IRS employee reported a missing computer drive a month after he had last seen it.

The Commerce Department reported 297 incidents since January 2003. But in another report in September, the department acknowledged losing 1,137 laptops since 2001; most had been used by the Census Bureau.

Other security breaches cited in the report:

· In August, a laptop containing personal information on 30,000 applicants, prospects and recruiters fell off a motorcycle driven by a Navy recruiter and was picked up by someone.

· In 2004, a federal student-aid contractor used a commercial shipper to send information on 8,290 borrowers. The package was lost in transit.

· A computer hacker used "malicious software" to access files containing personal information on 1,717 employees of the National Nuclear Security Administration in 2005.

· Two employees of a contractor for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services stole records containing information on 1,574 Medicare beneficiaries "for the purpose of identity theft" in 2005.

· A company that issues charge cards for the Interior Department lost data tapes containing information on 61,000 cardholders in 2005.

· In July, six Justice Department employees submitted computerized attendance reports containing Social Security numbers. The reports were downloaded 220 times and viewed 7,772 times.

GSA Consolidation Aims For More Transparency, Efficiency In Acquisitions (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

A major new acquisition division is officially up and running at the General Services Administration, but it remains a work in progress.

The new Federal Acquisition Service combines the Federal Technology Service and the Federal Supply Service, which together handle about $56 billion in annual sales. Officials hope that consolidation will improve financial controls; stem revenue losses in the old technology service and make for more efficient purchasing of services, equipment and supplies for federal agencies.

James A. Williams , the new FAS commissioner, said the acquisition service will roll out in phases, in part to allow time to gather more feedback from members of Congress and GSA employees on how best to serve federal agencies. The GSA has put off restructuring 11 regional offices for at least 30 days.

At a news conference Friday, Williams said the GSA's top priority for the new service is to improve service to federal agencies. That effort will include a review of regional offices to see whether they should be organized by geography, by function or by a combination of the two, he said.

For the long term, the FAS will move to create a strategic plan that fits into the GSA's priorities and gives agencies "a total view of the GSA" that helps them track where their money is going for purchases of technology and other products, Williams said.

DOJ_NMG_0080861

The GSA buys computers, software, telecommunications, cars, property and office supplies from the private sector and resells them to agencies, charging a fee for its management services. It is under pressure from federal agencies to become more competitive in the commercial market and more innovative in helping them find products and solutions.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who helped write the law authorizing the acquisition service, welcomed the reorganization. "These actions constitute the first major GSA reform in more than 20 years and will transform federal purchasing by bringing GSA in line with the commercial market it must capture for its federal agency customers," Davis said.

Larry Allen , executive vice president of the Coalition for Government Procurement, an association of companies that sell products and services to the government, said the FAS could become "a very large force in government acquisition" and "in essence, become a portal for a wide range of commercial item acquisitions."

But the FAS also could face risks when it acts as a buyer and a project manager for an agency, he said. That approach was used by the old technology service, which finished fiscal 2006 in red ink, partly because some agencies had become dissatisfied with GSA practices and partly because the GSA had to write off a contract management system that had not met expectations.

Allen said the procurement coalition hopes the FAS develops a number of options for vendors doing business with the government and maintains the GSA Schedules program. That program provides agencies with a list of approved, government-wide contracts and often permits direct transactions between contractors and agencies.

Williams said the FAS will feature four business operations: the office of general supplies and services, led by Joseph H. Jeu ; the office of travel, motor vehicle and card services, led by Barnaby L. Brasseux ; the office of integrated technology services, led by John C. Johnson , and the office of assisted acquisition services, led by Mary A. Davie .

Gary Feit has been named acting head of the office of strategic business planning and process improvement, Williams said.

Jon A. Jordan will serve as controller and Casey Coleman as chief information officer. Jeffrey A. Koses has been named the acting head of the FAS office of acquisition management.

G. Martin Wagner has been named deputy commissioner, helping Williams oversee the reorganization. Wagner also is serving as the acting head of the office of customer accounts and research.Appointee for MSBP

Chad Bungard , a key aide on the House federal workforce subcommittee, joins the Merit Systems Protection Board today as general counsel.

For the past four years, Bungard has served as chief counsel and deputy staff director for the House Government Reform subcommittee on the federal workforce and agency organization. On the subcommittee, headed by Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.), he helped develop legislative proposals on an array of civil service issues, including law enforcement pay and electronic health records.

The merit board hears appeals from federal employees disputing major disciplinary actions taken by their agencies and conducts studies of the civil service.

Stephen Barr's e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Bush Niece 'Stands Up' To Poverty (WT)

By Michael Hunsberger

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

Lauren Bush -- model, Ivy Leaguer and niece of President Bush -- campaigned yesterday afternoon to help end world hunger at a Georgetown University conference on international development.

In the school's Red Square, she told a gathering of about 70 students from area colleges that rich nations need to help developing countries.

"We are here proudly as a generation that cannot stay seated in the face of poverty," she said.

The "Stand Up Against Poverty" event was part of a two-day campaign to set an official Guinness world record for the largest turnout for one cause, event organizers said.

Students said they wanted to draw attention to the lack of progress of the United Nations Millennium Development Goals to eradicate hunger, educate children, empower women, reduce mortality rates in women and children, deal with AIDS, and tackle debt in developing countries.

Miss Bush, 22, a senior at Princeton University, provided star power as a U.N. World Food Program student ambassador.

She said making it into Guinness World Records is one goal, but "the record we really want to break is the record of breaking promises" to developing countries.

Miss Bush carried a burlap shoulder bag that read "Feed the children of the world." She said the cost of each bag, which will be sold on Amazon.com at a price to be determined, is enough to feed one child for a year.

DOJ_NMG_0080862

Douglas Coutts, a U.N. special adviser, said the first step to meeting the goals is to make sure people have enough food.

"It meets a very basic need," he said at a symposium held before the event. "Unless humans have the very basic elements they need for survival... nothing else matters to them."

Manuel Leon, a junior at Georgetown who helped organize the event, said his faith leads him to a concern for the poor and hungry.

"There is a strong correlation between social justice and justice," he said.

Have Hearings, Will Spend (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

If Republicans lose control of Congress next month, one big reason will be their record of overspending, especially on earmarks. What explains this GOP fiscal performance?

One answer comes from a new analysis by the Cato Institute on the Capitol Hill culture of spending under Republican rule. Examining hearings of 14 Congressional committees, political scientist James Payne found that 1,014 witnesses argued in favor of greater spending while only seven advocated less, an imbalance of 145 to 1. This is worse that a Cuban election.

In the same hearings, federal programs were described as "effective" or "efficient" 50 times more often than they were described as "ineffective" or "inefficient." Federal agencies were praised as "helpful" or "beneficial" in 990 instances, but they were scorned as causing "harm" or "hurt" only a dozen times. These are many of the same federal agencies that the U.S. General Accountability Office has found often can't pass the most basic financial audit.

"The problem is that advocates of spending overwhelm all aspects of Congressional communication," says Mr. Payne. Congressional hearings that are supposed to be impartial assessments of whether taxpayers get their money's worth become instead cheerleading sessions for bigger government. "No one wants to do the honest oversight of taxpayer spending," adds Oklahoma Senator Tom Coburn, a rare Republican exception to that rule.

In sum, Congressional hearings have degenerated into a lobbying process in which advocates sing the praises of the spending that their livelihoods depend on, while stroking the egos of the politicians as constructive philanthropists. Members of Congress begin to believe their own stacked juries. It's amazing they stopped spending at $2.7 trillion this year.

OTHER NEWS:

OPEC Sets Emergency Meeting On Output Cuts (WSJ)

By Ayesha Daya And Michael Williams

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, hoping to forge an elusive deal to cut oil output and halt a slide in crude-oil prices, said it will hold an emergency meeting in Qatar Thursday.

OPEC has grown alarmed in recent weeks over the sharp decline in oil prices, from a high of about $77 a barrel in July to below $60 last week. Oil ministers have declared that OPEC intends to slash output by one million barrels a day, or about 4%, to prop up prices.

Behind the scenes, the oil czars have failed to nail down the all-important issue of how to allocate the cuts among the membership. Thursday's gathering in Doha -- coming during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan -- is a sign the cartel may be getting closer to putting aside its differences.

Still, one important OPEC country signaled there isn't a deal yet. Late Saturday, an official from the United Arab Emirates oil ministry said discussions were continuing ahead of the meeting. "Consultations continue between member countries," the U.A.E. oil official said. "We have not agreed to a cut in our production yet," the official said.

Qatar's oil minister, Abdullah bin Hamad Al-Attiyah, announced the meeting yesterday, saying representatives will discuss "the current market situation."

Many within OPEC, including the cartel's president, openly say the group has agreed it needs to cut one million barrels a day. Members have been debating whether a cut should come from the group's official output target of 28 million barrels a day, or from its actual output, estimated at 27.5 million barrels a day.

At the heart of the disagreement isn't the size of the cut per se but rather who will bear the burden of reducing output and thus forgoing revenue. OPEC effectively suspended its system of output quotas for each member last month to let countries adjust output on their own to more quickly respond to price movements. Now that members agree a sizable cut is needed, the issue of quotas is coming back to haunt OPEC.

DOJ_NMG_0080863

Some members, including Saudi Arabia, Algeria and Libya, have ramped up output in recent years to meet soaring global demand and are producing above old quota levels. If they cut from old quota levels, some would have to make Draconian reductions to output. So, this group wants all members to cut output by a similar percentage from current levels. Others, including Venezuela and Iran, have had their production fall below their old output quotas. They want members who are producing above the old quota levels to cut the most.

Write to Ayesha Daya at ayesha.daya@dowjones.com1 and Michael Williams at michael.williams@wsj.com2

Consumer Unease With U.S. Health Care Grows (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, October 16, 2006

The U.S. health care system — touted as providing the best medical care in the world — is becoming more precarious to most Americans, who are rattled by rising costs, questions about quality and fears about the future.

"If you can afford it, it's the best health care system in the world, but, increasingly, people aren't able to afford it," says Clyde Bishop, a retired research scientist in Wilmington, Del.

He was among those polled about the health care system in a wide-ranging national telephone survey taken in early September by USA TODAY, ABC News and the Kaiser Family Foundation.

POLL: Americans weigh in on health care system, costs

The poll found a growing unease in America about the rising cost of health care, confusion about the causes, and a desire for major reform. But it also found a distaste for giving anything up to achieve sweeping changes.

An overwhelming 80% of respondents said they were dissatisfied with the total tab the nation spends on health care, estimated to hit $2.2 trillion, or $7,129 a person, this year. The survey, based on a national sample of 1,201 adults, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

"Every year, we wind up paying more and getting less coverage," says Tammy Dougherty of El Paso. Dougherty, another poll respondent, has health insurance through her husband's job.

Few, however, correctly singled out the biggest drivers of spending, choosing instead culprits that get a lot of attention — such as profits of medical companies or malpractice lawsuits — but play a lesser role.

Quality was also an issue: Only 44% said they were satisfied with the quality of health care in the USA, although nearly 90% said they were satisfied with their own medical providers.

While solutions to rapidly rising costs remain elusive, some early steps are being taken to try to slow the rise and improve quality. For example, many U.S. hospitals are working to reduce errors and cut complications, steps that not only improve care but can also reduce costs.

A handful of researchers are conducting cost-benefit studies, comparing one type of drug or treatment with another to find which gives the best value. Results may lead some insurers or government programs to limit the use of less-effective treatments or to charge patients more if they choose the less-effective, more-costly option.

Meanwhile, other researchers are pondering the reasons behind the vast differences on what is spent for certain surgeries or end-of-life care from one part of the country to another.

Even with such efforts, most economists predict that health care spending will continue to grow faster than the economy — and far faster than wages.

Already, the average yearly cost of the most popular type of insurance plan offered by employers hit $11,765 this year, with the average employee paying $3,226 of that total, a Kaiser Family Foundation study shows. Average premiums have risen 87% since 2000, while workers' earnings have risen 20%.

The quality movement is still in its early stages.

"It's the beginning of a campaign that looks promising," says Uwe Reinhardt, a professor of economics at Princeton who focuses on health care costs. "In some instances, (the quality movement) will probably reduce costs. But some (quality efforts) will actually cost money."

So what's driving the rapid rise of health care spending ?

Major drivers of medical inflation include how rapidly Americans embrace new drugs and technology, which are often more expensive than older treatments. Public demand is a big factor. Patients generally want the newest treatment, equating new with "better," even before solid proof exists.

Other factors include rising prices for medical services, particularly hospital prices, growing labor costs and waste and inefficiency. America's obesity epidemic is also fueling spending on medical care.

Americans did not always select the same culprits for rising spending as do economists.

DOJ_NMG_0080864

In the survey, only 28% picked new drugs, treatments and technology as among the single biggest factors, while the smallest percentage, 12%, said costs are rising because more people are getting better medical care than ever before.

Half of respondents blamed profits of drug and insurance companies as one of the single biggest factors, while 37% blamed too many medical malpractice lawsuits, and 36% blamed doctors and hospitals making too much money.

"Profits might explain part of why costs are high, but it doesn't explain why costs are rising," says Paul Ginsburg, an economist at the Center for Studying Health System Change. New treatments and increased demand are fueling the rise, he says.

"The thing I find dismaying is the public doesn't recognize that it's the additional medical care they're getting that's driving costs up," Ginsburg says. "They have to come to grips with the fact that we won't be able to slow the rise in costs without making trade-offs."

Misplaced focus

Reinhardt also says the focus on profits is misplaced.

Hospitals typically have margins of 5% or less, insurers range from 5% to 8%, while drug industry profits are higher, in the 15% to 20% range, he says. But, he says, even those profits can't be blamed for rapidly rising health care spending.

"I once calculated that if you rebated all the drug company profits to patients, health spending would only go down by 1.2%," he says.

Poll respondents were closer when it came to fraud and waste, with 37% choosing it as one of the biggest drivers. Reinhardt and others have said that fraud along with overuse and waste are big players in rising costs. Overuse and waste can include unnecessary treatments, tests repeated because original results were misplaced or reliance on ineffective treatments.

"Several credible estimates have come up with around 30% of health care is unnecessary," says Richard Deyo, professor of medicine at the University of Washington in Seattle. "I suspect even an ideal system would have some unnecessary care delivered, but 30% seems a high percentage."

Few saw any consumer responsibility in rising costs, with only 29% citing Americans' unhealthy lifestyles as one of the biggest factors.

The poll results point out the difficulty policymakers will have in trying to slow costs. While medical care has certainly improved over the years, it has also become more expensive. Reinhardt says people can't be blamed for wanting 2006 medicine, rather than 1980s medicine or 1960s medicine, but they have to realize it comes at a cost.

"The overarching theme is that this cost explosion isn't my fault," Reinhardt says. "It's all these other culprits, such as drug company profits or this or that. If we don't really know the right target and shoot at the wrong target, we'll never get where we need to go."

No magic solution

Health policy experts say there is no magic solution to controlling costs.

"The current era of shifting costs to workers has hurt working people but has not had much impact on health care costs," says Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation. "But the American people have little appetite for slowing the spread of new medical technology, which is the biggest driver behind rising health care costs."

Current cost-control efforts include evaluating hospitals and doctors based on their quality and cost, then having insurers channel patients to the most efficient providers. Some insurers are also experimenting with paying hospitals and doctors a premium for providing the best care with the fewest problems.

Another idea now in vogue in political and health policy circles — that patients will be more judicious users of medical care if they have to pay for more of it themselves — is not popular with poll respondents. When asked if they would favor an insurance policy that covered mainly major medical problems, with more routine doctor visits and treatments paid for out of pocket after the patient exhausts a set pool of money, 66% opposed.

Such an idea is one of the cornerstones of the so-called consumer-driven movement in the USA, with proponents touting high-deductible insurance policies that are linked with tax-free savings accounts into which patients and/or their employers could deposit money to be used to meet the policy's deductibles. Money not used each year would roll over into the next.

Supporters say such plans will counter a belief fostered by HMOs — with low or no deductibles and small fees for seeing doctors — that health care was cheap. But critics, such as Consumers Union, say the approach will hurt those who have chronic illnesses and use medical services more than average and would never be able to save.

Only a few million such policies now exist, but benefit experts say they expect more employers to offer them in the coming years.

Among those who favored the idea was poll respondent Heather Jefferson, who says health savings accounts may get people to plan for medical costs.

DOJ_NMG_0080865

"It's along the lines of setting aside for a rainy day," says Jefferson, 34, of Tucson. "A lot of people don't plan ahead and prepare themselves for the car breaking down or getting sick and not being able to work."

Rather than controlling costs, most of the reform ideas under debate in Congress and the states focus more on reducing the number of uninsured, which may or may not reduce total costs. Covering more people with insurance would likely increase spending initially, as more seek medical care. In the long run, the spending growth might slow if more patients receive preventive care or treatment in the early stages of a disease.

One of the longest-running debates is whether the U.S. should adopt some kind of universal coverage, such as those systems in Europe or Canada, where everyone has health care, financed mainly through taxes. Or if it should stick with the current system, which relies on voluntary efforts by employers and a private market.

Most survey respondents, 56%, said they prefer a universal system. But support for changes to the system dropped to about one-third or less when respondents were asked if they would support universal coverage if it included restrictions on the doctors or treatments they could have or if it cost them more than they're now paying in taxes or premiums.

Significant majorities of poll respondents supported ideas for more incremental, but nonetheless controversial, efforts to reduce the number of uninsured:

· 79% support requiring businesses to offer health insurance to full-time employees, and 64% said employers should be required to cover part-timers, as well.

· 65% support requiring all Americans to have health insurance, either from an employer or another source, with tax credits to help low-income people pay for it.

· 82% support expanding other government health programs such as Medicaid or the Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides insurance to nearly 4 million children and some parents, to cover more people.

Fewer employers offer benefits

Most poll respondents recognized that it is better to have insurance than none at all.

About six in 10 told pollsters that they fear rising costs — or a job loss — will someday banish them from the ranks of the insured.

Bishop, 66, who gets health coverage through his wife's employer, says he was forced to retire earlier than he had expected from his research scientist job for a plastics company and is looking for a new job.

While worried about his own opportunities, Bishop says, he also fears for the country in an era that is seeing a shrinking percentage of employers offering insurance and other benefits. Last year, the percentage of people who received health insurance through their jobs was 59.5%, Census Bureau data released in August show. That's the lowest rate since 1993 and below the recent peak of 63.6% coverage in 2000.

While most larger companies offer insurance, smaller companies increasingly do not.

"No one wants to give you pension benefits or health plans or anything else these days," Bishop says. "It's a dissolving of the middle class."

Nationally, nearly 16% of the population, or 46.6 million, are uninsured, according to recent Census estimates.

Slightly more than half of those polled, 52%, say the rising number of uninsured is a "critical problem" for the USA.

"My daughter does not have any health care, and she has four little ones," says Dougherty in Texas. "If it weren't for Planned Parenthood, where she can go and get care, she would not have any medical care at all."

To Predict Losers In A Power Shift, Follow The Money (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Pharmaceutical and oil companies had better beware if Democrats make major gains in the upcoming elections.

If Democrats win control of one or both chambers of Congress as many analysts expect, those and other industries could lose a raft of the legislative goodies they've garnered in recent years and also find themselves under congressional investigation.

Such are the spoils when power shifts in the federal legislature. Some groups that have been getting what they want from Congress for a long time won't anymore. Others that have failed repeatedly to get their agendas passed will succeed more often.

How can we guess the winners and losers? Just follow the money.

The best way to identify Democrats' friends and foes is to examine patterns of campaign contributions. Groups that have given much of their money to Democrats can be considered their true allies and will likely benefit from the items that Democrats push on Capitol Hill. Groups that have been delivering most of their campaign largesse to Republicans will probably see their druthers suffer under a more Democratic-leaning Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0080866

Political scientists debate endlessly whether political money buys congressional action or if organized interests just naturally shower with cash the lawmakers and parties that champion their causes. What isn't in dispute is that fundraising is an excellent guide to who will receive the most attention in Congress -- both good and ill.

Democratic leaders have signaled, in campaign commercials and elsewhere, that they intend to attack pharmaceutical and oil companies in a variety of ways when Congress reconvenes. That isn't a surprise; neither industry has been very supportive of Democrats in recent years. Since 2002, drug firms have given about two-thirds of their donations and energy companies have given roughly three quarters of theirs to Republicans, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics (CRP).

Other industries that would be wise to watch their backs if Democrats take over include insurers, electric utilities, manufacturers, chemical makers, home builders, general contractors, food processors, railroads and building material producers -- all of which gave 60 percent or more of their contributions to Republicans since 2002, according to the CRP's statistics.

Democrats are likely to play favorites as well. If they win, they will almost surely give high priority to the wishes of labor unions and trial lawyers, which have generally been dismissed by Republicans. The CRP classifies the political action committees of both as either solidly or strongly Democratic. Environmental groups, which work closely with Democrats, would also have a leg up.

Each party knows precisely who its strongest backers are and who are its greatest enemies.

That's why both Republicans and Democrats summoned their most reliable financial backers to separate meetings on Capitol Hill at the end of last month. Given the enormous stakes and potential peril of the midterm elections, party leaders pleaded for every spare nickel and by all accounts, donors coughed up plenty.

Before Congress left town, major donors had an absolutely crazed fundraising period. One labor lobbyist I know attended five fundraisers and receptions in a single night. A business lobbyist said he received seven faxed invitations to fundraising events within 20 minutes.

The loyalties of most PACs -- which are pools of money from individuals that are dispersed by companies, labor unions and interest groups -- aren't predictable. Corporate PACs in particular are notoriously fickle. When ranked for their partisan leanings by the CRP, many company-controlled PACs fall in the category of "fence-sitters" -- neither overwhelmingly Republican nor Democratic in their campaign donations. These include some of America's most prominent corporations such as Citigroup, BellSouth and General Electric.

If such companies do give more to the lawmakers of one party, that party is almost always the one in power or the one that's about to be in power. That's why Democrats this year have been getting a bit more money than usual from some PACs. The latest full set of fundraising numbers don't come out until the end of this week. So far, several of the country's largest PACs, such as those of the National Association of Realtors and United Parcel Service Inc., have given a slightly higher percentage of their dough to Democrats than they did two years ago.

The increase is tiny, but if Democrats win a notable number of additional congressional seats, that advantage will grow and become to some extent self-perpetuating. The cause is simple: Company PACs are political investment vehicles. Like any investors, PAC managers don't want to risk too much.

That's why 80 percent of the money donated by PACs to federal candidates go to people who are already in office. They are, after all, the people who can vote in Congress. What's more, they also usually win reelection -- 90 percent of the time or better. Some PACs are actually prohibited from contributing to non-incumbents for these reasons.

"To maximize their dollars, nearly all PACs -- particularly among business groups -- give the overwhelming proportion of their campaign dollars to incumbents," the CRP's Web site says.

Industries and interests will always have their partisans, and therefore some will do better than others depending on which party rules in Congress. But a lot of corporations are opportunists and not ideologues. They will tilt whichever way improves their chances of winning.Lobbying the Statehouse

An increasing number of former members of Congress turn to lobbying for their second careers. Now the Center for Public Integrity says the trend is hitting state capitals as well.

After a six-month study, the nonpartisan research group concluded that more than 1,300 former lawmakers registered to lobby state legislatures last year. Texas and Florida had the most legislators-turned-lobbyists, registering 70 and 60 ex-lawmakers, respectively. Virginia had the smallest number: six.

Just as it is in Washington, the highest-ranking former lawmakers were especially drawn to the lucrative profession. At least 98 former legislators who had been state House speakers, state Senate presidents or presidents protempore worked as lobbyists in 2005.

It's official then: Public service is a steppingstone to private profit.

Jeffrey Birnbaum writes about the intersection of government and business every other Monday. His e-mail address iskstreetconfidential@washpost.com.

DOJ_NMG_0080867

Down To The Wire (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

ELIZABETHTOWN, KY.-The first caller into Rep. Ron Lewis's "tele-town hall meeting" last week neatly captured the grim public mood. "When are you going to bring some of our boys home?" the caller demanded. "That process is not too far into the future," Lewis replied. "The last time I checked there were 250,000 [Iraqi] defense force personnel being trained."

The woman on the line from Owensboro wasn't about to let the six-term Republican congressman off so easy. "We were starting to turn things around, then the Iraqis start killing each other," she said. Lewis agreed, suggesting it was up to Sunnis and Shiites to end the growing sectarian violence. The exchange was nearly as scratchy as the one between Lewis and a caller in the previous week's town hall meeting, who asked what the congressman was doing about the Mark Foley congressional page mess.

Those are the kinds of questions that appear to have turned Lewis's re-election bid in Kentucky's Second District-the most pro-George W. Bush district in this red state in 2004-into a real footrace in just the past couple of weeks. That's partly because Lewis is facing his first well-funded challenger, a retired Army officer who calls himself "The Colonel" and whose campaign slogan is "Faith. Family. Freedom." But with the ongoing investigation into the Foley scandal, continued bloodshed in Iraq, and Bush's approval numbers tumbling back to their basement levels, this central Kentucky race is just one in which a bunch of Republican-held seats have suddenly become competitive less than a month before Election Day. "Normally, as the election moves closer, you have a declining number of battleground districts," says election analyst Rhodes Cook. "To have the field of play expanding is unusual." Whether Democrats wind up winning in these districts will determine whether they can go beyond picking up the 15 seats they need to claim just a bare majority in the House to a landslide victory.

In the past 10 days, the authoritative Cook Political Report has moved six GOP-held House seats into the "competitive" column, bringing the number of vulnerable Republican seats to 43, compared with just nine competitive races in districts held by Democrats. The Rothenberg Political Report, another respected elections newsletter, last week raised the projected number of seats the Democrats will pick up next month from the 15-to-20 range to 18 to 25, its first such recalibration since August.

"Arrogance." In many of the newly competitive House races, and in more than half a dozen already competitive races that have tightened further in recent days, Democratic challengers say the Foley scandal was a turning point. Mike Weaver, challenging Lewis, says the scandal played into his main campaign themes: that Democrats can be just as strong on "values" issues as Republicans-Weaver says he opposes abortion rights and is anti-gay marriage-and that the GOP monopoly in Washington has the party putting its interest ahead of the nation's, demanding a "restoration of balance" that a Democratic-controlled House would provide. In a conversation with farmer Steve Wooden, who has seen crop prices fall as costs for seed, fuel, and health insurance have risen, Weaver says the scandal shows how Republicans have fallen out of touch with ordinary Americans-just as he says they have by getting too cozy with the agricultural, oil, and health insurance companies that Wooden blames for his economic woes. Standing beside his John Deere combine, Wooden, 51, nods in agreement. "To have a congressman send those E-mails illustrates their arrogance," he says. "There's too much of that in Washington." The scandal is taking its biggest toll on GOP incumbents by denying them the chance they'd ordinarily have, with control of the White House, to set the terms of the political debate. "Republicans can't break through to change the conversation," says the Cook Political Report's Amy Walter. "The debate now is over who knew what when about the page scandal, rather than, 'What are the Democrats going to do about immigration, security, taxes?'"

Even for some Republicans, Washington has become toxic. Last week, Lewis canceled an event here with House Speaker Dennis Hastert because of questions concerning what he knew about Foley's behavior. "I'm not accusing the speaker of anything," Lewis says. "But I wanted to ... not be in contact with the speaker until I found out what's going on." Lewis trusts voters to distinguish between the actions of Foley, the GOP leadership, and himself: "To bring every Republican ... into this and allow them to be tainted would be like saying the pope had been tainted by some priests within the Catholic Church."

The National Republican Campaign Committee, meanwhile, notes that most voters continue to express approval of their own representative. A Washington Post/ABC News poll last week found that 64 percent of Americans think Republican leaders tried to cover up the Foley scandal but just 23 percent trusted the Democrats to handle it any better. The NRCC says it is unconvinced that races beyond those involving members of the leadership, like NRCC Chair Tom Reynolds, who according to one poll has fallen behind in his re-election race, will be affected by Foley. Of the race in Kentucky's Second, NRCC spokesman Carl Forti says, "It's not even on our radar screen."

For most of the newly competitive races, the Foley scandal laid bare Republican vulnerabilities that had been there before. Even in seemingly marginal districts, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee recruited candidates early on who had strong fundraising ability and compelling personal stories that made it difficult to peg them as liberal Democrats, including military vets like Weaver and Charlie Brown, whose race against California Rep. John Doolittle was recently declared competitive by the Cook Report.

DOJ_NMG_0080868

"The next layer." In other places, demographic changes have made Republicans vulnerable. In California's 11th District, which encompasses the Central Valley, a stream of independent and moderate voters from the Bay Area and the Silicon Valley have diluted Republican Rep. Richard Pombo's conservative agricultural base. University of California-Berkeley political science Prof. Bruce Cain says that Pombo's fate might be in the hands of those newcomers, concerned about Pombo's conservative environmental policies and his ties to disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Pombo got roughly $43,000 in donations from Abramoff and his associates. Recent press reports have also focused on an oil firm called VECO Corp., which has contributed about $18,000 to Pombo's re-election campaign. The company is named in an FBI investigation into political corruption in Alaska. Pombo challenger Jerry McNerney is concentrating his grass-roots campaign on the district's new housing developments. With California's 11th District race now in the "competitive" column, Democrats are facing tough decisions about where to spend their money. "There's not an unlimited amount," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean tells U.S. News. "And instead of focusing money on fewer races, you're focusing more money on more races." Much of the $630,000 of TV ad time the DCCC had reserved for Democratic challenger Angie Paccione in Colorado's Fourth District was canceled last week, even though the DCCC recently enrolled Paccione in its "Red to Blue" program for the most competitive candidates; a Denver Post poll last week showed a 10-point lead for incumbent Rep. Marilyn Musgrave.

At the same time, more competitive races have forced Republicans to pull money from districts where they hoped to unseat Democratic incumbents. "Because we've looked beyond the races in play to say 'What's the next layer?' ... we are in a position ... to handle the risk of the increasing number of seats," Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman tells U.S. News, "and also ... to say, "Now this seat's safe-we don't have to worry about it.'" Asked to name a Republican-held seat that has gone from competitive to safe, Mehlman declined. But the RNC chair warned incumbents of the difficult political environment early in the election cycle, and many, including Lewis, amassed $1 million-plus war chests.

Indeed, marginal districts like Kentucky's Second are still uphill fights for Democrats, even as they have tightened. "Weaver looks good on paper, but Lewis hasn't done anything particularly wrong," says the Rothenberg Report's Nathan Gonzales. "That's what Democrats are wrestling with nationwide." After Lewis fielded the initial call about Iraq last week in his phone-in town hall meeting, none of the other callers asked him about the war-or about Foley. Most urged him to crack down on illegal immigration, to support the constitutional amendment banning gay marriage, and thanked him for helping them secure disability or veteran benefits. They were asking, in other words, for more of the same.

Free Fall? What Free Fall? (USNEWS)

By Will Sullivan

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

With November 7 on the horizon and polls showing GOP control of the House and Senate in serious jeopardy, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman is racking up the frequent-flier miles. This week alone, the former Bush campaign manager will be in Florida, Georgia, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin, preparing candidates for the sprint to the finish. Coming from Michigan and on his way to Ohio last week, Mehlman sat down with U.S. News to discuss why he's not as pessimistic about Election Day as the latest poll numbers might suggest, as well as his thoughts on North Korea's nuclear test, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential prospects, and his own plans for the future. Excerpts:

After a number of polls this week showed very bad results for Republicans, some analysts said the party is in free fall. Is that accurate?

Let me first say I do think that we are in a very challenging environment. I think that the situation with [Rep. Mark] Foley has made it even more challenging, but ... I have not seen a significant impact in most of the races around the country, and I certainly haven't seen a free fall. In the last 25 years, the electorate has ranged from plus-4 Democrat to plus-2 Republican in '02. Every one of these [new] polls has an electorate that looks more Democratic than any electorate has looked in 25 years. If the American electorate is twice as Democratic as it's been in 25 years, it's going to be a bad day for us, but that's a huge assumption.

What has been the political impact of North Korea's nuclear tests?

It seems to me people who have consistently been on the record against missile defense and whose secretary of state tried to ply the North Korean dictator with a signed basketball by Michael Jordan are not necessarily the best people to be critical of what's happening in North Korea. I think one thing we know was the attempt to appeal to the better side of Kim Jong Il did not work, and so it seems to me that the party ... that said there is an axis of evil, that said we need missile defense, and that said we need to be tough in dealing with this threat is the one that is likely, if you're looking at the issues and looking at the facts, to benefit in terms of the public's focus on this.

DOJ_NMG_0080869

Has the Republican push for stricter immigration alienated Hispanic voters?

Do I believe that being for border security is inherently anti-Hispanic? No, I think that's ridiculous. If you lived in America for five generations or for five months and you were in the World Trade Center, your life was at risk, and the key is to control the border because of the need of protecting our national security. Whether you're Hispanic, whether you're Asian-American, Jewish-American, Anglo-American, you name it, that's in your interest.

How is this election like or unlike 1994, when Democrats lost control of the House?

First of all, in '94 the Democrats were particularly [vulnerable] to a terrible year because they had a lot of open seats and a lot of those open seats were in Republican presidential districts. There are 20 Republican open seats this year; 17 of the 20 Republican seats this year are Bush-leaning seats, meaning Bush won those districts with an average of 61 percent. The second difference from '94 is the people who are in the toughest races; people like [Connecticut Rep.] Nancy Johnson and [New Mexico Rep.] Heather Wilson and others are very battle tested. Important difference No. 3 that I think is going to be relevant this year is that Republicans had a positive agenda they could be for, and voters in '94 embraced many of the concepts behind that positive agenda. You don't see that at all this year.

After Hurricane Katrina, how successful can you be at winning over black voters?

Our ability to target voters differently means there are conversations going on in the black community that maybe didn't go on as aggressively before. In a world where you have a limited budget, if you're targeting entirely by geography, to target a neighborhood where you're able to get 1 in 10 votes or 1 in 5 votes may not have been cost effective. On the other hand, if you're targeting based on lifestyle, which is what we do today, you can be much more effective at reaching out to people.

Do Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani have a chance of winning the 2008 presidential nomination?

As the referee, I don't think it's appropriate to speculate on the quality of the teams, but I will say that I think that we have a lot of potentially very strong candidates running.

What about Sen. Hillary Clinton?

I think that the asset and the liability that Mrs. Clinton brings to the table is the passion she arouses in voters. And she arouses passion in their side; she arouses passion in our side.

Will you run again for chairman?

I'm going to decide in the next few weeks. I'm not going to decide with regard to the election. It'll be as much as anything a personal decision. I mean, I've now traveled over 300,000 miles.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, October 15, 2006

School Boss's Fear: Failing Jeopardy!

When the dream invitation from host Alex Trebek's team came in last spring to play Celebrity Jeopardy! Education Secretary Margaret Spellings was wildly happy-and equally worried. What if she bombed? Worse: What if she failed against the Hollywood stars she'd face? Couldn't happen, she vowed, scrambling to set up Jeopardy! study halls and prepare notebooks the likes of which she hadn't seen since graduating from the University of Houston. Spellings's biggest concern? Music, movies, and TV. "I was a little worried about pop culture categories like TV and movies," she confides to Whispers. "Fortunately, I had two teenage daughters helping me do my homework-a nice change for them!" Good thing: In her taping this month for the show being broadcast in November, Elton John was one of the categories.

More help came from her staff, who looked up past categories for strategy and trivia tips. "We helped her on everything from Shakespeare to Broadway musicals," says one. The chatty Texan took care of the charm, gabbing with Trebek about their shared Ukrainian heritage. Now, Jeopardy!'s rules block us from revealing the results, but rest assured, her charity choice, ProLiteracy Worldwide, got a nice check. That's because she didn't get skunked. "She was happy she didn't come in last," says a pal. Or in Jeopardy! form: What is relief, Alex?

The Newtster's New Friends at 1600

The Newt Gingrich for president buzz is back, and we're hearing it from a rather odd corner of Washington: 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. Top Bushies tell us that they think the former disgraced House speaker would make a great president. Gingrich thinks big, they say, and represents the old Reagan-style of smaller-government conservatism. As for his past marital infidelity, they think it's a nothing-burger, especially if he faces Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, whose hubby had his own problems she'd rather forget.

Now Pinch-Hitting for...Paul Harvey

DOJ_NMG_0080870

Add successful radio host-and Paul Harvey fill-in-to former Sen. Fred Thompson's leading roles. The Watergate investigator turned Hollywood star turned senator and now Law and Order prosecutor turned up on ABC Radio last week during the first of two weeks he's taking over for Harvey. We had to ask: Is it as easy as Harvey makes it sound? "No way," says the folksy Thompson, whose wife is about to deliver their second child, a son, any day now. "He's the master. It's like pinch-hitting for Babe Ruth." Naturally, the news and comments during his two shows daily are laced with politics. But the Tennessee conservative avoids partisanship. "It's not," he says, "like what I say when I go out to raise money for my Republican friends."

For the Record, Dean Hates Fox

Just in case you're wondering if Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean attended the Fox News Channel anniversary party last week, the answer is simple. No way, no how. "I happen to despise Fox News because I think they're nothing but the propaganda arm of the Republican Party," he tells us. But he doesn't hate everybody there, even the Fox News Sunday host who recently grilled Bill Clinton on Iraq. "Let me just go on the record as saying I happen to like Chris Wallace. Let me just do that," he says.

New Map Out West (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

AURORA, COLO.-Sipping hot tea from ceramic cups, Alex and Mirlin Rohr and their friends Betty Williams and Ray Hanson looked up politely when a smiling stranger approached their table at the Golden Shanghai Restaurant. It was Ed Perlmutter, Democratic candidate for Congress in suburban Denver's Seventh House District, trolling for votes amid trays of egg rolls. The affable lawyer apologized for interrupting, then proceeded to give a brief spiel about the need for a "new direction" in Washington.

Perlmutter's message of change and independence is a common one among Democratic candidates out west these days. After years of conservative dominance, this region of majestic mountains, endless plains, and sprawling suburbs seems to be moving to the pragmatic middle. And the longtime "out" party sees an opportunity not only to score big wins on November 7 but also to redefine the battlegrounds for the 2008 presidential race.

There's plenty of work left to do. Back at the Golden Shanghai, the Rohrs, both 61, said the biggest issue by far is illegal immigration. Alex, an accountant, said many illegals will simply have to be deported. The husband and wife are independents who usually vote Republican, and they plan to do so again this year. Williams, 77, a retired rancher, feels no allegiance to either party and said the biggest issue is healthcare. Hanson, 78, a former engineer who said he is nonpartisan, is most concerned about the war in Iraq. He vehemently argued that America's recent military conflicts, all the way back to Korea, have wasted billions of dollars and cost countless lives-and "haven't accomplished anything." He and Williams seem to be likely Democratic voters.

Demographics. With the Democrats trying to pick up 15 seats to take control of the House and six in the Senate, they are looking to the West, where a half-dozen House races and the Montana Senate race could help determine the new lineup. Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, and Nevada are the main flash points. All four states have undergone seismic demographic and political shifts. From 2001 to 2005, Nevada was the nation's fastest-growing state. Arizona was second, Colorado eighth, and New Mexico 16th.

Many of the newcomers are Latinos; they tend to be conservative on social issues such as abortion and school prayer but liberal on economic matters, such as the need for government spending on healthcare and education. This has, on balance, helped the Democrats, but the Hispanic turnout remains a big question mark for November 7.

Overall, service and professional jobs are multiplying throughout the West as farming and mining employment, economic staples for years, have declined. Demand is growing for public services such as mass transit, healthcare, and schools, making the Democrats' pro-government image more appealing and the GOP calls for lower taxes and less government more problematic. Increasingly pragmatic voters also appear less interested in the "values issues" that have tended to help Republicans, such as same-sex marriage, abortion, and gun control.

Add it all up, and Democrats hope a new day is dawning. "We intend to contest Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, and Nevada as a unit next time in the presidential because we think we can win there," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean told U.S. News. Dean's theory is that, with a combined total of 29 electoral votes, those four states would make it unnecessary for the Democrats to win Florida, with 27 electoral votes, which they have lost in the last two down-to-the-wire presidential elections. "Bill Clinton won every single one of those states at one time or another," Dean added.

Big brother. Dean said the key to the Democratic resurgence lies in what he sees as the rightward, interventionist shift of the national GOP. "The Republican Party has become the big-brother party, and this is a very libertarian part of the country. ...

DOJ_NMG_0080871

[Westerners] don't believe it's the government's place to tell them what to do with their personal lives, and this is a government that specializes in telling people what to do in their personal lives."

For his part, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman told U.S. News: "We do need to have aggressive efforts in the West. ... The complexion of the electorate has changed out there. And if we're smart, then we are working to make sure we reach those new voters."

But it is the Democrats who have gotten most of the good news in recent years. In 2002, Democrats won the governorships in Arizona, New Mexico, and Wyoming. In 2004, while President Bush was winning most of the states, Democrats scored in state and local races, even winning the governorship of Montana with tough-talking, horseback-riding rancher Brian Schweitzer, who criticizes free-trade agreements as unfair to American workers and opposes gun control. In Colorado, Democrats won control of the state House and Senate for the first time in more than 40 years. And two Hispanic brothers, Ken and John Salazar, both centrist Democrats, won Republican-held seats in Congress-Ken in the Senate and John in the House.

This year, the GOP is under attack from Helena to Albuquerque. In Montana, buzz-cut farmer Jon Tester, president of the state Senate, is mounting a serious challenge to Republican Sen. Conrad Burns, who had ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. In New Mexico, Democratic Attorney General Patricia Madrid is running even with incumbent GOP Rep. Heather Wilson. In Arizona, former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords, a Democrat, is neck and neck with GOP former state Rep. Randy Graf for the House seat being vacated by Republican Jim Kolbe. In Wyoming, Democrat Gary Trauner is in a surprisingly competitive race with six-term Republican Rep. Barbara Cubin. No Democrat has held that seat since 1979.

In Colorado, former Denver District Attorney Bill Ritter is far ahead of Republican Bob Beauprez-the current Seventh District representative-in the race for the governorship. Even in the conservative Fifth District centered on Colorado Springs, the Republican congressional candidate is in trouble. Doug Lamborn is under attack-from fellow Republicans-for being too negative as he tries to hold off Democrat Jay Fawcett, a small-business man and Air Force veteran.

Nowhere are the trends more clear than in Colorado's Seventh District, which includes the big Denver suburbs of Lakewood, Wheat Ridge, and Aurora. In 2002, Republican Beauprez won with a razor-thin margin of 121 votes. In 2004, Beauprez won narrowly again, but the district-almost evenly divided among Democrats, Republicans, and the unaffiliated-backed John Kerry for president.

Standing clear. Republican congressional candidate Rick O'Donnell, former state higher-education commissioner, has been trying to distance himself from the national GOP and establish an image of independence. On October 6, he told a forum in Wheat Ridge that if elected he would model himself on two liberal Democrats-former Rep. Pat Schroeder of Denver and former Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York. O'Donnell said he disagreed with them on issues but admired their work ethic, accessibility, and willingness to fight for their constituents. For his part, Democratic candidate Perlmutter, a former state senator who leads by double digits in some polls, said O'Donnell was masking his conservatism because his party is so unpopular. But Perlmutter also felt the need to establish his own independence. He told U.S. News he won't be in lock step with national Democrats. Still, his message is strongly anti-GOP. A fiery critic of the Iraq war, he says the Republicans have gotten America bogged down in the Mideast and on many issues at home. More generally, Perlmutter said most Coloradans today reject the extremes in either party. "People in this state are, at a basic level, moderate, independent thinkers," he told U.S. News.

But neither candidate should rest easy. After the Wheat Ridge forum, a waiter at the chicken-and-pasta luncheon was asked his impression of the candidates. He preferred not to give his name but admitted he hadn't paid much attention to what O'Donnell and Perlmutter were saying because he had been too busy serving food and clearing dishes. He will make his decision later. Like many other westerners, he said he usually votes Republican but is open to the other side this year.

One-Letter Politics (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

In a recent interview with The Hartford Courant, Senator Joseph Lieberman said something that wasn't credible. When the newspaper asked him whether America would be better off if the Democrats took control of the House of Representatives next month, he replied, "Uh, I haven't thought about that enough to give an answer."

Why wasn't this a credible answer? Because anyone with the slightest interest in American politics — a group that obviously includes Mr. Lieberman — is waiting with bated breath to see how this election goes, and thinking a lot about the implications. If the Democrats gain control of either house, no matter how narrowly, the American political landscape will be transformed. If they fail, no matter how narrowly, it will be seen, correctly, as a great victory for the hard right.

The fact is that this is a one-letter election. D or R, that's all that matters.

It's hard to think of an election in which the personal qualities of the people running in a given district or state have mattered less. Given the stakes, voters who answer "yes" to the question Mr. Lieberman claims not to have thought about should think hard about voting for any Republican, no matter how appealing. Conversely, those who answer "no" should think hard about supporting any Democrat, no matter how much they like him or her.

DOJ_NMG_0080872

There are two reasons why party control is everything in this election.

The first, lesser reason is the demonstrated ability of Republican Congressional leaders to keep their members in line, even those members who cultivate a reputation as moderates or mavericks. G.O.P. politicians sometimes make a show of independence, as Senator John McCain did in seeming to stand up to President Bush on torture. But in the end, they always give the White House what it wants: after getting a lot of good press for his principled stand, Mr. McCain signed on to a torture bill that in effect gave Mr. Bush a completely free hand.

And if the Republicans retain control of Congress, even if it's by just one seat in each house, Mr. Bush will retain that free hand. If they lose control of either house, the G.O.P. juggernaut will come to a shuddering halt.

Yet that's the less important reason this election is all about party control. The really important reason may be summed up in two words: subpoena power.

Even if the Democrats take both houses, they won't be able to accomplish much in the way of new legislation. They won't have the votes to stop Republican filibusters in the Senate, let alone to override presidential vetoes.

The only types of legislation the Democrats might be able to push through are overwhelmingly popular measures, such as an increase in the minimum wage, that Republicans don't want but probably wouldn't dare oppose in an open vote.

But while the Democrats won't gain the ability to pass laws, if they win they will gain the ability to carry out investigations, and the legal right to compel testimony.

The current Congress has shown no inclination to investigate the Bush administration. Last year The Boston Globe offered an illuminating comparison: when Bill Clinton was president, the House took 140 hours of sworn testimony into whether Mr. Clinton had used the White House Christmas list to identify possible Democratic donors. But in 2004 and 2005, a House committee took only 12 hours of testimony on the abuses at Abu Ghraib.

If the Democrats take control, that will change — and voters should think very hard about whether they want that change. Those who think it's a good idea to investigate, say, allegations of cronyism and corruption in Iraq contracting should be aware that any vote cast for a Republican makes Congressional investigations less likely. Those who believe that the administration should be left alone to do its job should be aware that any vote for a Democrat makes investigations more likely.

O.K., what about the Senate race in Connecticut, where Ned Lamont is the Democratic nominee, and Mr. Lieberman, who lost the Democratic primary, is running as an independent but promising to caucus with the Democrats if he wins? Is this a case where the man, not the party, is what matters? Only if you believe that Mr. Lieberman's promise not to switch parties is 100 percent credible.

In Final Weeks, G.O.P. Focuses On Best Bets (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 15 — Senior Republican leaders have concluded that Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio, a pivotal state in this year's fierce midterm election battles, is likely to be heading for defeat and are moving to reduce financial support for his race and divert party money to other embattled Republican senators, party officials said.

The decision to effectively write off Mr. DeWine's seat, after a series of internal Republican polls showed him falling behind his Democratic challenger, is part of a fluid series of choices by top leaders in both parties as they set the strategic framework of the campaign's final three weeks, signaling, by where they are spending television money and other resources, the Senate and House races where they believe they have the best chances of success.

Republicans are now pinning their hopes of holding the Senate on three states — Missouri, Tennessee and, with Ohio off the table, probably Virginia — while trying to hold on to the House by pouring money into districts where Republicans have a strong historical or registration advantage, party officials said Sunday. Republicans also said they would run advertisements in New Jersey this week to test the vulnerability of Senator Robert Menendez, one of the few Democrats who appear endangered.

Senior national Republican strategists who had been briefed on decisions made during the party's internal deliberations discussed the overall strategic thrusts but declined to provide specific dollar figures, saying that would give too much information to the Democrats.

The decision involving Mr. DeWine offers the most compelling evidence so far that Republicans are circling their wagons around a smaller group of races, effectively conceding some Senate and House seats with the goal of retaining at least a thin margin of control when the 110th Congress is seated next January. Democrats need to win 6 seats to capture the Senate and 15 seats to win the House on Nov. 7.

DOJ_NMG_0080873

Mr. DeWine has proved to be a successful fund-raiser on his own, and, with $4.5 million on hand, already enjoys a large financial advantage over his Democratic opponent, Representative Sherrod Brown; he is not dependent on financial support to keep campaigning. The Republican National Committee and the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee have already spent $4.6 million on his race; party officials said they concluded that there were now simply more opportune races to focus on.

Asked about the decision, a spokesman for Mr. DeWine, Brian Seitchik, said, "We've been pleased with the support we've received from the R.N.C. thus far." Mr. Seitchik declined to comment further.

Republicans noted that Mr. DeWine, in addition to having a sizable financial advantage, was a well-liked figure in Ohio who handily won his first two terms in the Senate and still had enough time to recover, even though recent internal party polls showed him lagging badly.

Brian Nick, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said, "The committee doesn't discuss internal strategy in terms of where financial resources are allocated."

Democratic strategists said Sunday that they were polling in search of other races with vulnerable Republicans, pointing to Representative Richard W. Pombo of California as one incumbent they might take aim at.

Republicans said they remained confident that the party's considerable financial advantage would allow them to hold back a Democratic onslaught over the next three weeks, and they said they were preparing to spend significantly to bulk up any Republican who their polling over the next few days suggested might be faltering.

A critical question in the days ahead is the size of the Republican financial advantage for the final three weeks; the next filing reports are due on Friday.

Still, in interviews, Republican strategists said that the flow of bad news out of Iraq and the resignation of Representative Mark Foley after admitting he had sent sexually suggestive messages to teenage Congressional pages had soured the environment for incumbents and blunted the impact of a long-planned crush of negative advertisements Republicans had prepared to undercut Democratic challengers this month.

In one sign of the shifting political environment, as of this weekend, national Republicans were running advertisements in 29 districts; of those, 26 are held by Republicans and 3 by Democrats, though Republicans plan to begin running advertisements this week against an Illinois Democrat, Representative Melissa Bean. National Democrats are on the air in 30 districts, and defending Democrats in just 3 races.

"For a midterm election in the sixth year, based on historically the number of seats lost, you've got to play defense," said Carl Forti, the communications director for the National Republican Congressional Committee. "We have the luxury of being in the majority, so all we have to do is hold our own."

National Republicans are no longer running advertisements in three districts where they once thought they had a chance to take over Democratic-held seats — in South Carolina, West Virginia and Ohio — as well as a district in Arizona now held by a Republican. The party has not broadcast any advertising in four days on behalf of Representative Chris Chocola, one of three Indiana Republicans who polls suggest are headed for defeat, though Republican officials said that does not mean they have written off Mr. Chocola's seat.

Even before this development, Republicans had been bracing for the defeat of three sitting Republican senators: Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Conrad Burns of Montana and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, based on polling.

At the start of the fall campaign, national Republican leaders developed a strategy to pour most of the national money into three states — Ohio, Tennessee and Missouri — to create a firewall against a Democratic takeover. One Republican Party official said Mr. DeWine's continued problems in Ohio had persuaded them to in effect rebuild a firewall that has now partly collapsed, and to find a state to replace it.

The decision about Mr. DeWine's seat came after recent internal polls showed Mr. DeWine's Democratic challenger, Representative Brown, jumping to a large lead. Mr. Brown's surge came despite a barrage of Republican advertisements intended to portray him as weak on national security — the very line of attack that had given party officials confidence earlier this year that Mr. DeWine would be re-elected.

Normally, a party would be averse to scaling back its help for a senator in a state with as many as five competitive Congressional races also on the ballot. But in this case, Ohio Republicans said, Mr. DeWine and Republican Congressional candidates face the added problem of being dragged down this November by the party's candidate for governor, J. Kenneth Blackwell, who polls show is facing a double-digit loss to the Democrat, Representative Ted Strickland.

The next important decision for Republicans is whether to compete in New Jersey; they plan to spend about $500,000 on advertising this week, followed by polling to see how vulnerable Mr. Menendez is to his Republican challenger, Thomas H. Kean Jr. Going into New Jersey is a costly gamble, because it requires advertising in both the New York City and Philadelphia markets, which party strategists said could easily eat up $2.5 million a week.

DOJ_NMG_0080874

An alternative being strongly considered by some Republican strategists is Virginia, where Senator George Allen, a Republican once viewed as breezing toward re-election, is now struggling. A poll published in The Washington Post on Sunday showed Mr. Allen in a tie with his Democratic challenger, Jim Webb. Virginia is a much more Republican state than New Jersey, not to mention less expensive, and thus might prove an easier place to make a stand.

Some Republican strategists have been pushing the party to go after Senator Debbie Stabenow, a Michigan Democrat, but other party officials said that based on the most recent polling data, Ms. Stabenow seemed assured of re-election. On the other side of the scale, Democrats said they were increasingly skeptical that they would be able to knock out Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican who had been on an early target list.

In the House, the Republican committee has spent $61 million so far, compared with $50 million by Democrats, aides to both parties said Sunday.

For Republicans, the vast majority of that money has gone to protecting incumbents. The party is on the offensive in races for three seats: two held by Democrats, Representatives Leonard L. Boswell of Iowa and Jim Marshall of Georgia, and one being vacated by Representative Bernard Sanders, an independent from Vermont who typically voted with the Democrats.

Mr. Forti said Republicans had now placed $1 million into protecting the Florida district that was represented by Mr. Foley, the Republican who resigned in the page scandal. Party officials had at first written off that seat, because it was too late to replace Mr. Foley's name on the ballot with the name of the Republican who replaced him, State Representative Joe Negron. Party officials said their polling showed that the district was so overwhelmingly Republican — Mr. Foley won 68 percent of the vote in 2004 — that they believed they could succeed again. In any event, they said they were not prepared to write off any seats in this environment.

"When you look at the polling numbers, they don't want to vote for the Democrat," Mr. Forti said. "Believe me, we are not going to waste two million bucks if we don't think we have a shot."

Faithful Rally To A Senator In Distress (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

ROSYLN, Pa. — Keith Hollenberg, a member of the evangelical Assemblies of God church, is worried that one of his political heroes is about to lose his bid for reelection.

So when he saw Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) at a car show here, Hollenberg volunteered to help in what has become an urgent project for social conservatives in Pennsylvania and around the country: keeping Santorum in the Senate.

"I'm a big fan of yours," Hollenberg told him. "Keep on pulling for the right thing."

Santorum, an outspoken advocate of banning same-sex marriage, restricting abortion, and other social conservative causes, is considered this year's most-endangered senator.

It is a four-alarm fire for conservatives, who are bringing water buckets from all corners of the political world. Across Pennsylvania, pastors are preparing to stuff voter guides into their Sunday bulletins. In Washington, D.C., Paul Weyrich, a national conservative leader, hosted a conference call to give a pep talk to Republicans in Pennsylvania. In England, some Santorum fans are planning to cross the Atlantic to help campaign.

"I think it's important for people across the country to recognize how important it is not only to pay attention but to get engaged in this race, whatever way they can," said Colin Hanna, head of Let Freedom Ring, a conservative group based in Pennsylvania. "If Rick Santorum were to lose, it would be cited as a turning point in the social conservative movement."

Santorum is not just a key link between the Republican Party and Christian conservatives. He is also one of President Bush's most unapologetic allies in Congress and a member of the Senate GOP leadership. And he is the apotheosis of a younger generation of Republicans — led by former House speaker Newt Gingrich — that transformed the party in the 1990s into a more confrontational, ideological political force.

If 2006 turns into the electoral romp for Democrats that many analysts now are predicting, a loss by Santorum would be a signifier of the end of that Republican revolution.

If Democrats are unable to defeat Santorum, they are unlikely to win a majority in the Senate, which Republicans control 55-45.

For most of the year, polls have found Santorum trailing his Democratic opponent, state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., by double-digit margins. The senator's backers last week cheered a poll by the Allentown Morning Call showing the gap narrowing to 46% to 41%. They were hoping that a spirited televised debate last week) opened a new chapter of voter education about Casey's liabilities that could work to Santorum's advantage.

DOJ_NMG_0080875

But G. Terry Madonna, a pollster and professor at Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster, Pa., said Santorum was in deep trouble if he was still drawing only 40% support, having already leveled a heavy barrage of campaign ads and attacks on Casey.

Among Santorum's political problems: He is running in a state that went for Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry in the 2004 presidential election. Here in Philadelphia's suburbs, considered crucial to the election's outcome, even fellow Republicans are not as conservative as he is. At a recent GOP meeting in Upper Darby, Santorum sounded less like a champion of social conservatism and instead circulated a flier, "Delivering for Upper Darby," that detailed the federal money he had secured for local sewer repair, garage construction and more.

Even if Santorum gives social issues short shrift on the campaign trail, conservative leaders understand what is at stake. They stand to lose a powerful spokesman for their agenda. Some worry that Santorum's defeat would also be a body blow to the influence of social conservatives within the GOP.

"You would then start to see party apparatuses say things like, 'We're not sure we want to support a candidate whose conservatism is as deeply rooted as Sen. Santorum's,' and they will begin casting about for moderate conservatives," Hanna said.

At age 48, with boyish looks that make him appear a decade younger, Santorum does not look the part of a man who could be near the end of a fast-rising political career. Walking in a parade one rainy Saturday outside Philadelphia, Santorum jogs robustly from one side of the street to the other to greet spectators. Tie-less and in chinos, he wears the unflappable smile of a man who is nowhere near ready to concede defeat. Even when people boo him from curbside, he boldly reaches into the crowd to shake their hands.

Twelve years ago, Santorum was swept into the Senate when his opponent and other Democrats tripped on the coattails of Bill Clinton in the Republican tide of 1994. With a 49% plurality, Santorum beat Democratic Sen. Harris Wofford.

Santorum had already spent four years in the House, where he worked with Gingrich and the "Gang of Seven" conservative rebels who exposed a scandal at the House bank. He was eager to stir the pot even in the more staid Senate, where one of his first acts was to challenge the seniority system.

Nevertheless, Santorum zoomed up the leadership ladder. At 42, in 2001, he was chosen to be Senate Republican conference chairman, the party's No. 3 post, after having won reelection to the Senate with 52% of the vote.

Many more factors are working against Santorum now than in his 2000 campaign — most notably, his link to a president whose approval ratings are below 40% in many polls. Unlike other vulnerable Republicans who have run away from the White House, Santorum continues to embrace Bush's policy in Iraq, his controversial ideas about overhauling Social Security, even his beleaguered secretary of Defense, Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Santorum is not just a victim of political circumstance. Even his admirers say he routinely suffers self-inflicted wounds from his own sharp tongue.

In 2002, he blamed Boston "liberalism" for the Roman Catholic Church's sex abuse scandal. In a 2003 interview, he linked gay consensual sex with bigamy, polygamy, incest and adultery. In a 2005 book, he found fault with two-income families and working women. The ensuing controversies have so engulfed Santorum's image that his campaign website has a long feature, "Myth vs. Fact," to counter what people "hear about the water cooler" about Santorum.

With polls showing Casey consistently in the lead, the son of a popular former governor has run a low-key campaign with a light schedule of public events — a classic front-runner's strategy. Santorum accuses him of hiding from voters, running on his name and refusing to be specific. He ridiculed Casey for refusing to attend a debate last month, bringing an empty chair to dramatize his point.

When the two did meet in a televised debate last week, the exchange was bitter and personal.

"I don't know how you can say so many words and say nothing," Santorum said.

Casey replied, dismissively: "Don't be a desperate campaigner."

If there is one thing voters know about Casey, it is that he opposes abortion rights. That may cut into Santorum's ability to draw support from socially conservative Democrats.

Some conservatives are focusing on differences between the candidates on social issues other than abortion. A voter guide being distributed by the American Family Assn. of Pennsylvania, designed to be slipped into church bulletins, highlights their differences on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage (Santorum supports, Casey opposes), allowing over-the-counter sale of a morning-after pill (Santorum opposes, Casey supports) and expanding federal hate-crime protections to homosexuals (Santorum opposes, Casey supports).

Hanna's group has set up a network of conservative pastors around the state to mobilize churchgoing voters. Although it cannot by law endorse a candidate, the Pastors Network of Pennsylvania has enlisted nearly 1,000 pastors in voter-registration and get-out-the vote drives.

DOJ_NMG_0080876

"I think this race is drawing very, very close," said Hanna. "The deciding factor may be which set of supporters is more motivated to turn out."

Minnesota Senate Candidates Clash On Iraq, Taxes (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, October 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Candidates in Minnesota's closely watched Senate race clashed Sunday on Iraq and tax policy, with the Republican defending his vote to authorize the war in Iraq.

"You can't really play Tivo and rewind," said Rep. Mark Kennedy.

During a debate on NBC's "Meet the Press," he was asked whether he would still vote for the war knowing that Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction. "We acted on the information we knew at the time. I stand by my vote."

Democrat Amy Klobuchar, the Hennepin County attorney, said it was time to have Iraqis take more control of their country and start bringing U.S. troops home.

"You cannot solve a problem that you don't admit exists, and that is what's going on here with the congressman," she said. "This war has basically devolved into a civil war."

The answer, she said, is not more troops on the ground but a diplomatic and political solution.

Kennedy and Klobuchar are seeking to succeed Democratic Sen. Mark Dayton, who did not run for re-election. With about three weeks before the Nov. 7 election, a Star Tribune Minnesota Poll published Sunday showed Klobuchar ahead 55 percent to 34 percent among likely voters, nearly the same margin as it was in September.

Kennedy, a three-term congressman, dismissed that poll in a meeting with reporters after the debate. "This is a single-digit race," he said. Separately, Klobuchar said the "only poll that matters" is on Election Day.

In the debate, Kennedy said Iraq was the top issue in the race and that the war was central to the global fight against terrorism.

He said Klobuchar "has set out a specific timetable for bringing our troops home that would tell the terrorists when they can take over an oil-rich country as a sanctuary for terrorists," Kennedy said.

Klobuchar said she was not pressing for an immediate return of all U.S. troops from Iraq.

"We have to be reasonable," she said. "I have never been one to say 'Bring them all home tomorrow.' I have never subscribed to one of those mandatory dates, because I understand that, despite my opposition to the war from the beginning, that we have to be responsible about how we bring our troops home."

Asked what the U.S. should do if it were to leave Iraq and a full-blown civil war were to erupt, Klobuchar said American troops should be redeployed to surrounding areas so they can return quickly if needed. She also called for bolstering security in the U.S.

On tax policy, Kennedy criticized Klobuchar for calling for a rollback of President Bush's tax cuts for the richest 1 percent.

"We cannot be raising taxes, putting this economy back on its back, and also not growing jobs," Kennedy said. He argued that a line-item veto would help rein in spending, and acknowledged, "I would like the president to take a little bit more leadership on spending."

Klobuchar said that returning tax levels for the richest to what they paid during the Clinton administration, when the economy was doing well, would help lower the federal deficit.

"When a liberal says they're going to soak the rich," quipped Kennedy, "the middle class gets drenched."

With the latest Star Tribune Minnesota Poll showing Bush's disapproval rating at 61 percent, his highest level ever, Kennedy was asked if he was running as a "George Bush Republican."

"I'm running as Mark Kennedy," he responded.

Kennedy, who usually votes with Bush, pointed out several votes where he broke with the president, such as opposing drilling for oil in an Alaskan wildlife refuge and the No Child Left Behind education law.

Klobuchar suggested Kennedy was running away from Bush.

"He spent the last few campaigns bragging about how close he was with President Bush, and now he's spending this campaign bragging about how independent he is from President Bush," she said.

Meanwhile, Klobuchar's campaign announced Sunday it had raised $1.35 million in the five-week period ending Sept. 30, and had just under $2.25 million in the bank. Kennedy's campaign said it raised $975,000 during the period and had just over $2.03 million in cash on hand.

Sharp Exchanges In National Spotlight (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen

DOJ_NMG_0080877

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - "Coffee, water or whiskey?" joked Tim Russert, who seemed to be in a fine mood Sunday morning when his Minnesota guests -- Senate candidates Amy Klobuchar and Mark Kennedy -- showed up for a debate in his NBC television studio in Washington.

As the two sipped their drinks, Russert, a native of Buffalo, N.Y., and a fan of the Buffalo Bills, commiserated with his visitors, both Vikings fans. "You may have lost four Super Bowls, but we lost four in a row," said Russert, host of "Meet the Press."

After the laughs and pleasantries, the hard-nosed Russert got down to business and got Klobuchar and Kennedy to display big differences on some big issues in their network television debate.

As they sparred for nearly 40 minutes, they traded especially sharp barbs on the war in Iraq and tax policy.

Kennedy, a Republican congressman since 2001, said he stood by his vote to authorize the war in 2002 and vigorously defended his party's tax cuts, saying they've helped produce 6 million new jobs. Klobuchar, the DFL candidate and Hennepin County attorney since 1999, said it's time to change course in Iraq and to eliminate tax cuts for the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans.

When Russert asked Kennedy if he would vote today to back the war, even if the CIA told him that former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction, Kennedy replied: "We acted on the information that we knew at the time. ... I stand by my vote. We can't rewind. We acted on the information we knew at the time and acted correctly."

Klobuchar said that the war is now a civil war and that the United States should pursue "a diplomatic and political solution."We cannot, as Congressman Kennedy and the president are talking about, just stay the course indefinitely, with more troops dying, over $300 billion spent," she said.

Kennedy said the war will require the United States "to make adjustments," but he suggested it would be impossible to come up with a diplomatic solution: "You can't negotiate with people that are ruthless and glory in killing innocent women and children."

Klobuchar asked Kennedy to "admit that he was wrong about voting for this war." She told the stories of a mother in Mahnomen, Minn., who can't sleep because her child is going on his second tour of duty in Iraq and of a father in western Minnesota who cries when questions are asked about Iraq because he lost his son. "These are real people in the real world who are looking for solutions," she said.

On tax policy, Kennedy said that the economy "was flat on its back" after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, but that Congress and the president passed tax cuts that helped revive it. "We cannot be raising taxes, putting this economy back on its back, and also not growing jobs," he said.

Klobuchar, who wants to roll back the tax cuts for those who earn more than $336,000 a year, said her plan would save $56 billion a year and is part of her proposal to start reducing the national debt, which is approaching $9 trillion.

"I'm the only candidate in this race that has come out with a plan to balance the budget," she said.

How they see themselves

When Russert asked Kennedy, who has been a close ally of President Bush, if he believes that Bush is a great president, Kennedy said: "I believe history is going to make that decision." And when Russert asked Kennedy whether he's running as "a George Bush Republican" this year. Kennedy replied: "I'm running as Mark Kennedy. I'm running as a guy who believes strongly in values that I was raised with in Minnesota."

Klobuchar billed herself as a tough prosecutor, "someone who puts people in jail for a living." But she also described herself as a mother, a wife and an advocate, and stressed her deep ties to Minnesota: "I'm the granddaughter of a miner. I'm the daughter of a newspaperman and a teacher."

The debate came on the same day that a Star Tribune Minnesota Poll showed Klobuchar with a 21-point lead, favored by 55 percent of likely voters, compared with 34 percent for Kennedy.

In an interview after the debate, Kennedy dismissed the poll, saying voters are focused on issues.

"I'm still waiting for the first person that believes the Minneapolis Star Tribune poll," he said. "I don't think anybody takes it seriously. This is a single-digit race. I know how to win tight races."

Klobuchar said the only poll that matters will be on Nov. 7.

"I don't look at the polls, except I can feel it out there," she said in an interview. "You can feel that the wind's at our back and people want a big change in Washington."

Sunday's debate, the seventh of 10 scheduled, did not include Robert Fitzgerald, the Independence Party candidate.

"There's not much we can do," Fitzgerald said. "I'm not personally disappointed that I'm not invited. It's not a dis on me. I don't think Tim Russert's hating on me or anything. But I am dismayed, I guess, that 'Meet the Press' is not willing to reflect the race as it's happening here in Minnesota. Minnesotans know that they have three major-party candidates that they get to choose from."

DOJ_NMG_0080878

Bush, Clinton To Host Rival Va. Fundraisers (WT)

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

President Bush and former President Bill Clinton will host competing fundraisers in Virginia on Thursday for their favored candidates in the U.S. Senate race.

Mr. Bush will rally Republicans at an event for Sen. George Allen at the Science Museum of Virginia in Richmond. Mr. Clinton will headline a soiree for Democrat-ic challenger James H. Webb Jr. at the McLean home of former Sen. Charles S. Robb. Mr. Allen unseated Mr. Robb in 2000.

The current president remains one of the Republican Party's best fundraisers. This is his second visit to Virginia on behalf of Mr. Allen this year.

The Webb campaign told reporters last week that the Bush visit gives it an opportunity to remind voters that Mr. Allen has voted with the president 97 percent of the time since being elected to the Senate.

Mr. Clinton, who held a fundraiser for Democrat Timothy M. Kaine last year during the gubernatorial race, is expected to bring in a big chunk of cash for Mr. Webb.

Mr. Bush touched down in Air Force One on election eve last year to appear with Mr. Kaine's opponent, Republican Jerry W. Kilgore, a visit many political observers think ultimately hurt Mr. Kilgore at the polls the next day.

Mr. Allen has a narrow lead or is statistically tied with Mr. Webb in most polls.

Meanwhile, Mr. Webb received the endorsement Wednesday of the Richmond Crusade for Voters, a 50-year-old nonpartisan organization that aims to increase the influence of blacks in the political process.

"We are not impressed with Mr. Allen's Johnny-come-lately 'sensitivity' to the plight of minorities and the African-American community," said Crusade President Melvin Law. "We do not appreciate nor admire his record. ... Mr. Allen deserves nothing more than an F for his service."

Mr. Allen, who as governor in the 1990s issued a proclamation in honor of Confederate Heritage Month, has been criticized for once hanging a noose in his law office.

Earlier this year, he lost the support of Southern heritage buffs when he said he realized the Confederate battle flag is seen by some as a symbol of hatred and racism.

·Not-so-nasty ads

Political ads in Maryland this year are using unconventional styles and have been far less negative than those in other states, researchers at the University of Maryland at College Park said.

"We've been closely analyzing political ads in the state, and so far, we haven't seen the level of nastiness you might expect," said Trevor Parry-Giles, a communication professor there.

He said the candidates may be avoiding "a costly backlash if they go too negative."

Mr. Parry-Giles said ads by Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee for U.S. Senate, are "innovative and compelling."

The ads present Mr. Steele talking to the camera in a relaxed and conversational tone. Some feature Mr. Steele holding a puppy or with the puppy standing nearby.

Other props included a row of trash cans, which Mr. Steele indicates as symbols for negative attacks by his opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee for senator.

"The Steele ads are long on atmospherics and symbols apparently designed to sell his brand and to inoculate him from Democratic attacks linking him to President Bush," said Shawn Parry-Giles, a professor of communications and director of the university's Center for Political Communication and Civic Leadership. She is the wife of Mr. Parry-Giles.

"Some of Cardin's ads have been very simple -- the very opposite of slick -- using devices such as a shaky hand-held camera," she said. "This could well be a deliberate attempt to draw a distinction between Cardin and Steele."

The two professors have developed a Web site called "Political Advertising Resource Center" that is devoted to analysis of campaign ads. The site is available at www.umdparc.org.

"There's a certain numbness that sets in as an election approaches, and the ads start to blend in to the wallpaper," Mrs. Parry-Giles said. "Yet, political ads are one of the most important tools in a campaign arsenal. Citizens need to pay close, critical attention."

·Thinking globally

Virginia can thrive in the 21st century's global marketplace with an international airport and a major port, but it will falter if it cannot provide road and rail access to both, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine says.

DOJ_NMG_0080879

Solving the state's transportation difficulties, the governor told industry leaders, will require "some changes in faces" in the Virginia General Assembly.

Mr. Kaine, a Democrat whose efforts to fund transportation in his first year in office have hit roadblocks in the Republican-controlled legislature, said he was not making a partisan statement.

"There are a lot of Republicans who want to solve problems," he said, "and a Democrat or two who don't."

He urged the audience of about 700 at the annual Virginia Transportation Conference in Roanoke last week to support candidates next year who are problem-solvers.

Last month's scheduled four-day special legislative session on transportation funding ended two days early because of philosophical differences between the Senate and House of Delegates leadership -- the same differences that led to this year's unprecedented budget impasse.

Simply put, the Senate wants tax increases, and the House Republican leadership is vehemently opposed. Mr. Kaine, who supports increasing taxes and highway "user fees" to finance transportation, acknowledged that he has had "a very challenging first year."

"I'm not going to give up," he said. "I'm staying at the table on this."

The governor referred to Virginia's listing by Forbes magazine as the most business-friendly state in the nation, but he said the state's ability to compete in a global market-place will be the key to its futur.

The 27 million passenger visits a year at Washington Dulles International Airport could be increased to 50 million, he said, but more roads and rail access are needed in the traffic-clogged region.

The same is true of Hampton Roads, he said, where the port could become the busiest in the nation with dredging to accommodate even bigger ships.

"Are we going to be winners, or are we going to leave these great assets withering and dying?" he said.

·Seeking security

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee for U.S. Senate, is hammering the Bush administration for cutting homeland security funding.

"Terrorism has a price ... and we will either pay that price in dollars or in lives. I'd rather write the check," Mr. Steele said in a keynote luncheon address at the 2006 Mid-Atlantic All Hazards Forum, a regional emergency-management and homeland security symposium last week at the Baltimore Convention Center.

"Any formula in this environment that cuts homeland security funding for Washington, D.C., and New York City, let alone the rest of the nation, is bad public policy," he said.

Mr. Steele addressed the convention in his role as lieutenant governor, but the speech echoed his campaign platform on homeland security.

He also took a swipe at the Washington establishment, which was consistent with his run as a "Washington outsider" and his promise to be a "new kind of senator."

"We can no longer have decisions made in isolated chambers in Washington and then dictated to the states and the local communities without some understanding and appreciation of what [first-responders] do every single day to protect and defend that little patch of ground you call home," he said. "We have to be serious about this business because our enemies are serious about the business of coming after us."

Mr. Steele is running against Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a 10-term Democratic congressman from Baltimore who also has called for more homeland security funding for "jurisdictions with the greatest risks and vulnerability."

Mr. Cardin's campaign strategy includes linking Mr. Steele to President Bush, who is highly unpopular in heavily Democratic Maryland.

In the speech, Mr. Steele did not name the president.

He cited the 40 percent cut in funding to New York and the District and the $6 million in cut in funds to Baltimore that Homeland Security announced in May. The District's homeland security grant was slashed from $77 million to about $46 million, and New York's went from more than $200 million to about $124 million.

The cuts targeted large cities, mostly in the Northeast, and coincided with increased grants to midsized cities, including St. Louis and Jacksonville, Fla.

"Today, we face the unique and ever-changing threat of terrorism that has attacked us before, and most say it is not a question of if it will happen again, but when it will happen," Mr. Steele told the crowd of firefighters, police officers and emergency-management officials. "It is therefore the responsibility of leadership at these times, more than at any other time, to not just identify and confront threats to our national security, but more importantly, to implement smart policies that prevent these threats from ever materializing."

DOJ_NMG_0080880

"This means using the newest and best technologies for securing our infrastructure, our airports, our ports against terror threats," he said.

Nelson, Ricketts Continue Attacks In Final Debate (LJS)

By Don Walton

Lincoln Journal Star NE Senate Debate, October 16, 2006

SCOTTSBLUFF — Sen. Ben Nelson and Republican challenger Pete Ricketts came out swinging Sunday in a debate that attracted an overflow crowd of more than 200 on a sunny afternoon in the Panhandle.

It didn't take long to establish the tenor of their third and final direct confrontation.

In an opening statement, Nelson repeated his claims that Ricketts supports enactment of a national sales tax, an end to farm payments, privatization of Social Security, amnesty for illegal immigrants and opposes an increase in the federal minimum wage.

All those positions may be good for Wall Street, the Democratic senator said, but they're not good for Main Street in Nebraska.

Ricketts' opening remarks took the form of a bare-knuckles response.

Nelson, he said, has benefited from "a revolving door career in the public and private sectors (and) cashed in" on his public service experience as governor by acting as a paid lobbyist for a brief period before he was elected to the Senate.

"He is irresponsible, cannot be trusted and deserves to be fired," Ricketts declared.

Introducing a new allegation into a Senate race that has overflowed with them, Ricketts said Nelson "sits on the board of a company that contaminates groundwater in Nebraska," namely Behlen Manufacturing in Columbus.

"You've seen a preview" of Ricketts' tactics, Nelson said. "It's attack, attack, attack. My opponent has just a little problem with the truth."

Nelson said he is a member of Behlen's board of advisors, after earlier serving as a director, and suggested Ricketts inform the state's environmental quality agency about his concerns since "It's news to me."

But Ricketts said the issue allegedly involving disposal of drums of toxic waste in an area that affected some local landowners and another property owner had been a concern even during Nelson's governorship.

The Senate opponents traded blows on a number of familiar topics during the hourlong debate at the University of Nebraska's Panhandle Research Center.

But the final debate also gave each candidate an opportunity to frame his case.

Ricketts said Nelson has been an ineffective senator whereas he's the candidate of change.

If Nebraskans want change in Washington, he said, "you can't send back the same career politicians." Nebraskans who may want change from the current Republican leadership in Washington "should not give Democrats control of our values or our pocketbook," Ricketts said.

Nelson said Ricketts offers "blind party loyalty and radical bad ideas" whereas he "put(s) people and policy ahead of partisanship and always put(s) Nebraska first."

What Ricketts proposes in policy reforms "might be good for Ameritrade," Nelson said, but is not good for either Main Street or most Nebraskans. Ricketts left his post as chief operating officer of Ameritrade to enter the Senate race.

Nelson and Ricketts parted company on a number of issues.

On agriculture, Ricketts attacked Nelson, a member of the Senate Agriculture Committee, for failing to include drought disaster relief as part of the farm program.

"If your administration would quit fighting drought relief, we'd already have it," Nelson responded.

Nelson said he would "continue to fight for funding for Nebraska" by earmarking appropriations for projects like the Heartland Expressway in the Panhandle. Ricketts opposes the earmarking system and would like to replace it with block grants to states.

Ricketts said Nelson has failed to offer any plan for dealing with the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants already living in the United States. But Nelson said Ricketts' early support for the comprehensive immigration reform bill passed by the Senate represented endorsement of amnesty.

Not true, said Ricketts, who has proposed a compromise plan to require illegal immigrants to return to their home country before they return legally to the United States with work permits.

"Amnesty with a road trip," Nelson said.

Nelson urged direct one-on-one engagement by the United States with North Korea to seek an agreement ending North Korea's development of nuclear weapons. What the United States should offer, he said, is an assurance of no sanctions and no military attack by the United States in exchange for an end to North Korea's nuclear program.

"I oppose unilateral talks with North Korea," Ricketts said. "That would reward them for bad behavior."

Instead, Ricketts said, the United States should focus on current multilateral talks, urge China to apply pressure on North Korea and implement tough sanctions.

Reach Don Walton at 473-7248 or at dwalton@journalstar.com.

Viewer Comments:

Brad wrote on October 15, 2006 10:19 PM:"Is there a 3rd person we can vote for??"

Go away Pete wrote on October 15, 2006 10:15 PM:"Go back to your country club we don't want you in Washington (or should I say Warshington)"

Tom wrote on October 15, 2006 10:08 PM:"It is very difficult to consider voting for either one of these individuals. They are both like pit bulls! I sure wish that Tom Osborne was running in this race for he certainly would get my vote. "

gail wrote on October 15, 2006 9:57 PM:"Ben Nelson is a long-time leader in our state. Pete Ricketts is a bored rich kid. This is an easy call."

Rudy wrote on October 15, 2006 9:51 PM:"I live in Columbus and our water is very fresh and tasty. I don't work at Behlens but they employ plenty of people around here that will be voting Nelson thanks to good ole Pete! Can't wait 'till this one is on the grapevine!"

gloria wrote on October 15, 2006 8:36 PM:"I am sick of pete ricketts' attacks. He is like a spoiled child who has a tantrum when he doesn't get what he wants. "

Career Politician wrote on October 15, 2006 8:03 PM:"Pete says you cant send the same career politicians back to office. But isn't Pete the one using career politicians' support for him in his ads? Pete says you cant have "unilateral" talks with North Korea. He's right, you cant have unilateral talks with anyone, those would be talks where you talk to your self. Bilateral talks is what he must oppose, or not, who knows? Pete says Ben Nelson is at fault for no drought assitance? Its the Bush White House and Chuck Hagel who blocked Nelson's drought bill. Pete, you're desperate, and behind. Your advisors have failed you miserably. you should fire them - ask yourself if you got your $12 million worth from them. "

Ricketts Says Nelson Didn't Push Drought Relief (AP)

AP NE Senate Debate, October 16, 2006

SCOTTSBLUFF, Neb. -- Republican Senate challenger Pete Ricketts said Democratic incumbent Sen. Ben Nelson was remiss by not pushing for drought relief as part of the last Farm Bill.

But Nelson said in Sunday's debate in Scottsbluff that Republicans were the ones stopping the payments. Nelson also said that there needs to be a cap when it comes to crop payments and that there was no way to predict the current drought would have lasted as long as it has.

Ricketts said drought relief must be part of the new Farm Bill and agreed that a cap must be in place. He also suggested crop insurance would help and that a "safety net" needs to be established to help farmers and ranchers.

Ricketts said that entrepreneurship and growing the economy through block grants can help revitalize rural areas. Then he criticized Nelson for not taking measures to improve the last Farm Bill. Ricketts said Nelson needed to be fired.

Nelson said that many of his efforts in the Senate had helped western Nebraska grow.

The two were asked whether they supported transportation earmarks that have been criticized as pork barrel politics.

Nelson said he does support and will continue to support earmarks.

Ricketts suggested the same thing could be accomplished through block grants that would give more control to officials in Lincoln instead of Washington.

Ricketts told the crowd of less than 200 that Nelson can't be trusted and that a change is needed in Washington.

Nelson said he learned his values growing up in McCook, and that he always has been interested in helping people on Main Street rather than those on Wall Street. Nelson said he would like to see an end to partisanship in government.

But Ricketts fired back, saying Nelson is a career politician and can't be trusted.

Nelson countered by saying his opponent has trouble with the truth.

Mich. Senate Candidates Spar On Economy (AP-Y)

By Tim Martin

AP-Yahoo, October 16, 2006

Democratic U.S. Sen. Debbie Stabenow and Republican challenger Mike Bouchard sparred over issues ranging from the economy to the Iraq war on Sunday as they met in their first debate.

Bouchard, the Oakland County sheriff, said Stabenow has been ineffective and has flip-flopped on several issues. "She says one thing here and does another thing in Washington," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0080882

The former state lawmaker also criticized Stabenow's record on the economy, noting that Michigan has lost thousands of jobs in recent years.

Stabenow, seeking a second term, said Bouchard would support the "failed policies" of the Bush administration.

She defended her economic stances, including a plan to have a prosecutor enforce trade agreements with other nations to protect U.S. jobs. She said "nobody in Washington understands better" than she what is at stake for the middle class.

"We are in a fight for our way of life," Stabenow said.

On the Iraq war, Stabenow said it's now time for the Iraqi police and military to "step up so we can transition out." Bouchard said a withdrawal should be "based on when is it more safe and secure, and then as quickly as possible bring our troops home."

The two candidates also sparred over Bouchard's role on the board of a Lansing-based insurance company, Jackson National Life. Bouchard has been paid up to $60,000 a year for his work with the company.

Stabenow said the company has outsourced jobs overseas, but Bouchard said that her claims were "unbelievably untrue" and that the company is held up as a Michigan success story. He said Stabenow has received thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from people associated with the company.

A message was left seeking comment with a Jackson National spokesman Sunday afternoon.

A telephone poll released Sunday of 643 likely voters by Selzer & Co. of Des Moines, Iowa, found Stabenow had a 13-point lead, with 17 percent listed as "other/not sure" and a sampling error margin of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

The poll was conducted for the Detroit Free Press and Detroit television station WDIV, from Oct. 8 through Wednesday.

The debate was recorded at the Public Broadcasting Service studios of WGVU-TV, for broadcast later in the day on PBS stations statewide.

Senate Candidates Square Off In Debate (DETN)

By Gary Heinlein

Detroit News MI Senate Debate, October 16, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS -- U.S. Sen. Debbie Stabenow and challenger Mike Bouchard occasionally exchanged sharp accusations as they sparred on subjects ranging from Iraq to Social Security in a Sunday debate at WGVU-TV.

Bouchard, the Republican sheriff of Oakland County, repeatedly has charged that Stabenow has done little during her first senate term. Stabenow linked him to President Bush, whose approval rating has been plunging and characterized his criticism as "Washington-speak."

"I have a proven record, I get results," said Bouchard, citing bills he helped pass as a member of the state senate and his current membership on a national panel addressing homeland security issues.

Stabenow said that Bouchard "supports the failed policy of the Bush administration," while she has been fighting to protect the middle class way of life.

The debate was recorded in studio on Sunday morning for viewing on public television stations across the state at 8 tonight.

WGVU is affiliated with Grand Valley State University, with campuses in Grand Rapids and Allendale.

The candidates differed over key issues:

Stabenow said she wouldn't support an increase in Social Security tax for those who earn more than $94,000 a year to help shore up the fund. Bouchard said he would set up a bipartisan group "to look at every option," but didn't say whether he would back a higher tax.

Bouchard said the U.S. should move expeditiously to disengage from Iraq but should rely heavily on evaluations for military commanders and not make a hasty decision. Stabenow, who voted against invading Iraq, said the nation's involvement has been "misstep after misstep" and "it's time for Iraqis to step up so we can step back."

Stabenow said she supports the concept of universal health care, but through a public private partnership unlike government run programs in Canada and England. Bouchard said he opposes universal health care and favors such efforts as limiting malpractice lawsuits to help reduce costs.

Roger Moilen, a Grand Valley State University political science professor, said the televised debate helped Bouchard reach viewers who haven't seen his political ads, especially in western Michigan.

"He really needs to cut into her lead right now if he is going to keep national (Republican Party) money coming in," Moilen said. Recent polls have show Stabenow to have a double-digit lead over Bouchard.

Moilen said he thought both candidates did a good job getting out the messages that they wanted to put before voters.

How The Economy Can Define An Election (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

LANSING, Mich. -- Economic anxiety hangs heavy over the midterm elections in this cradle of the American auto industry.

That has meant trouble for the re-election campaign of Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm. Her response: flexing the power of incumbency and mounting a minibailout of the Big Three, along with other companies in the state, as Washington stands by.

1 · Take a closer look at Michigan's economy and auto industry, and see what the gubernatorial candidates have to say.2

She is offering tax incentives and cash loans in return for promises -- which critics describe as vague -- to preserve or create jobs. In April Ms. Granholm gave General Motors Corp. $40 million in tax breaks for a pair of factory retoolings. Last month she attended the ribbon-cutting of a drivetrain plant in Flint, which the company rehabbed in return for $28.2 million in state tax breaks. In August Ms. Granholm offered Ford Motor Co. $151 million for investments she claimed would retain more than 50,000 Michigan jobs.

As economic policy, the value of Ms. Granholm's corporate largess is questionable. The state aid is minuscule compared with losses the auto makers face. GM says the breaks are unlikely to swell its payroll. And even with the $151 million on offer, Ford appears bent on reducing its global work force by 40% within three years -- a move Ms. Granholm's critics say could wipe out 7,000 Michigan jobs.

"A good announcement here, a good announcement there; the fact is that government handouts don't create jobs," state Republican Party Chairman Saul Anuzis says.

But as a political move, the drumbeat of business-subsidy announcements looks to be working for the 47-year-old incumbent. She recently took a 50-45 poll lead against an opponent she trailed in July.

"Good policy is good politics," the governor says, when asked if her tax breaks involved political calculation. "What's good for GM is good for Michigan."

Ms. Granholm's tough race bucks the national trend this campaign season, which appears to favor Democrats over Republicans in congressional and gubernatorial races. Currently, there are 28 Republican governors and 22 Democrats. Polls suggest Democrats could net the four seats required for a majority. In Ohio, Republican Ken Blackwell is nearly 20 points behind challenger Ted Strickland in the race to succeed Republican Gov. Bob Taft, who is retiring. Democrats also expect gains in Arkansas, Colorado, Maryland, and New York.

The Michigan governor's race serves as a reminder that, for all the attention to scandal and Iraq, the economy remains a factor, particularly in the Midwest, that can sting incumbents of both parties.

Tapping into that, Republicans have rallied around gubernatorial candidate Dick DeVos, a conservative billionaire whose family-owned company, Amway Corp., of Ada, Mich., is a household name in the state. Now owned by closely held Alticor Inc., the company, cofounded by Mr. DeVos's father, operates in 80 countries. Mr. DeVos, who turns 51 this week, is the former president of Alticor. The DeVos campaign spent $21 million through early September; $16 million of that was the candidate's own money.

On the stump, Mr. DeVos talks of a "single-state recession," noting that Michigan has lost about 100,000 jobs during Ms. Granholm's tenure. Mr. DeVos, whose company employs 4,000 Michigan residents, casts Ms. Granholm, a Harvard-trained lawyer, as lacking the corporate acumen to steer the economy. "What I'm hearing from people is that they'd like someone with a business background to take a crack at it," he says.

Ms. Granholm isn't considered particularly pro-business, having relied heavily in her first term, as do most Democratic politicians here, on union support. Her campaign against Mr. DeVos has included traditional Democratic business-bashing, with jabs at her opponent for decisions he made at Amway. In the 1990s, Mr. DeVos oversaw the elimination of about 1,400 jobs and turned the company toward the world's biggest potential market: China.

Layoffs, outsourcing, China: "In Michigan, these are fighting words," Ms. Granholm often says.

Mr. DeVos says Ms. Granholm has unfairly conflated two discrete events. "I didn't outsource a single...job and she knows it," he says.

The second leg of Ms. Granholm's re-election strategy is, essentially, turning the state's corporate bosses into re-election proxies. Last fall, she advanced a proposal through the Legislature that allows her to borrow as much as $1 billion against tobacco settlement proceeds to bankroll the "21st Century Economic Fund." The fund, overseen by a governor-controlled panel, distributes cash awards to business start-ups that agree to relocate to Michigan or expand here.

The first tranche of money from the fund -- $101 million to 61 microbusinesses and university research shops -- was distributed early last month. "Stay tuned. Hold on to your hat. We've got a lot more to do," Ms. Granholm said at a news conference here, as the awards were announced. To ensure the news wasn't missed by the electorate, the governor's staff hired a satellite truck to beam the news conference live to every television station in the state.

DOJ_NMG_0080884

While other states dispense incentives to companies, few governors have done as much and as fast as Ms. Granholm -- especially during a re-election campaign. In August and September, Granholm-controlled development boards doled out $315 million in tax breaks and loans.

Ms. Granholm's strategy appears to be working, as company executives applaud the Democrat for helping Michigan's business climate. In early August, Mark Fields, Ford's North American president, shared the stage with Ms. Granholm, to trumpet the state's tax-abatement offer. "Thank you, Gov. Granholm, and thank you to the people of the state of Michigan for your support of the home team," Mr. Fields said.

The mileage Ms. Granholm received from the Ford announcement wasn't lost on the state's Republican Party, which found itself in the delicate position of criticizing major Michigan businesses in a radio ad broadcast shortly after the offer was made public.

In the ad, a man and a woman discuss the news of the day, with the woman's tone growing sharp over what she is apparently reading in the newspaper. "This sounds like a rip-off," the woman says. "With Gov. Granholm's deal, this car company can lay off seven or eight thousand more workers and still get the big tax breaks from the state."

The radio spot was provocative. Within hours of its release, a Ford executive was on the phone with Mr. Anuzis, the Republican Party chairman, whose organization produced the ad. "To say Ford wasn't happy with the ad and asked them to pull it, I think that would be accurate," a company official said.

Mr. Anuzis says, "We're just being honest."

Such criticism of a storied Michigan company puts Mr. DeVos, who also received a call from Ford, in a tight spot. His family's business has received similar state largess, such as in 1992, when it threatened to move a catalog distribution center in West Michigan to Georgia. At the time, Gov. John Engler, a Republican, gave the company $325,000 to retrain employees, and a $640,000 transportation grant to improve its entrance, in a move that was seized on by Mr. Engler's political rivals during his re-election campaign.

"I don't begrudge Ford or the others getting what they can out of this: If you have the political savvy and the scale, you can make a deal with the governor," says Mr. DeVos. "My worry is about the businesses that are being left behind."

Women Look To Gain More Ground In Senate (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The door to the women's club in the traditionally male-dominated Senate appears to be inching wider.

If polls hold true, there will be a record number of women in the Senate next year, up from the current all-time high of 14 — nine Democrats and five Republicans.

Only 33 women have served in the Senate: 20 Democrats and 13 Republicans. Until the late 1990s, there had never been more than 10 female senators at any one time.

“Each one of these steps is a big achievement … but it's a pretty high staircase,” says Ruth Mandel, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University. “This is a Senate that no one had ever seen 20 or 30 years ago.”

Mandel says having more women in the Senate is important because it gets voters more used to seeing women in government leadership roles. That can help change perceptions about whether a woman can be elected president. “Women are now becoming visible,” she says.

Six female incumbents up for re-election Nov. 7 are leading their challengers, according to the most recent polls. Democrats Dianne Feinstein of California, Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, Maria Cantwell of Washington and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York hold double-digit leads, as do Republicans Olympia Snowe of Maine and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas.

Snowe faces a female challenger, Democrat Jean Hay Bright. So does, Hutchison who is up against Democrat Barbara Ann Radnofsky.

Polls also show two more women could join the Senate:

·In Minnesota, Democrat Amy Klobuchar leads Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy 49%-41%, according to a Mason-Dixon poll from late September.

·In Missouri, Democrat Claire McCaskill narrowly leads Republican Sen. James Talent, 44%-41%, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Sept. 27 to Oct. 1.

Dennis Simon, co-author of Breaking the Political Glass Ceiling: Women and Congressional Elections, says the increasing number of women in the Senate reflects the slowly but steadily growing roster of female elected officials at all levels of government.

DOJ_NMG_0080885

He also says this year's emphasis on unethical behavior by members of Congress, such as then-congressman Mark Foley's lewd electronic messages to a teenage congressional page, helps female candidates. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned Sept. 29.

"When ethical issues or what we call 'scandals' are center stage, that advantages female candidates because they are seen as outsiders, not part of the regular power structure," says Simon, a political science professor at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

Among other female Senate candidates facing voters next month, Republican Rep. Katherine Harris in Florida trails Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson by double-digit margins. Harris, who oversaw the 2000 presidential vote recount in Florida, has been dogged by missteps, staff disarray and ties to a corrupt defense contractor. A poll by the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute released last week found Nelson leading 61%-33%.

In Hawaii, there have been no recent polls gauging Republican state Rep. Cynthia Thielen's bid to unseat Democratic Sen. Daniel Akaka. Thielen was named by the state Republican Party to face Akaka when the candidate who won the GOP primary, Jerry Coffee, withdrew from the race for health reasons.

Simon says there is also a chance that the House of Representatives could see its greatest increase in female members since 1992, when the number of women jumped from 23 to 47. There are now 70 women serving in the House: 46 Democrats and 24 Republicans. That includes three non-voting delegates, all Democrats.

Mandel says a large increase in the number of women in the House will be more likely if Democrats see major gains across the nation. She says that of 139 women running for the House, 97 are Democrats and 42 are Republicans.

"First and foremost, women are seen as the candidate of change," says Ellen Malcolm, president of EMILY's List, a political action committee that works to elect Democratic women who support abortion rights. "Voters don't see them as part of the old boys' network that they're so angry about."

GOP Voters Have Extra Task (USAT/AP)

By Joe Stinebaker, The Associated Press

USA Today, October 16, 2006

PEARLAND, Texas — Voting Republican here wasn't difficult when Tom DeLay's name was on the ballot.

With DeLay out of the race and the GOP unable by law to substitute a name on the ballot, voters must write in the Republican candidate, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula Gibbs. That could prove to be such a chore that Democrats might walk away with a seat that has long been in the GOP's hands. President Bush won the district in 2004 with 64% of the vote.

Republican Cynthia Hart said she was unaware she would have to write in the GOP candidate. "I guess I have to be more careful," she said. "But I'm not so sure I would take the time to go through all that."

That would be welcome news to Democrats out to capture the former House majority leader's seat, which could help them wrest control of the House of Representatives from the GOP. Democrats need to gain 15 seats.

The Democratic candidate is Nick Lampson, 61, a former congressman who has outraised, outspent and campaigned longer than the Republicans.

"Some thought that I was nuts, but I guess when you believe strongly enough that something needs to change, you're willing to do extraordinary things to do it," Lampson said.

DeLay resigned in June. He was indicted last year on charges of violating state campaign-finance laws. He denies wrongdoing. The courts refused to allow Republicans to replace him on the ballot.

National Republicans were supposed to invest $3 million to $4 million to help Sekula Gibbs, according to state GOP chairwoman Tina Benkiser. The House GOP campaign committee has donated $134,000. Lampson had $2.2 million to spend as of June 30.

Sekula Gibbs, 53, insists the media attention surrounding the race has helped her overcome any disadvantages. "It was essential to me that we maintain a conservative voice in Washington," she said.

Advertising may help voters gain familiarity with the write-in campaign, but there are other hurdles. Voters will have to highlight and enter the "write-in" entry. They will then turn a small wheel on the voting machine and spell out Sekula Gibbs' name. Errors will be accepted as long as the voter's intent is clear to a panel of Republicans and Democrats.

GOP Running Against A Stiff Northern Wind (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080886

GROTON, Conn. — The political equivalent of a nor'easter is bearing down on Republicans from New England through Pennsylvania.

With President Bush's approval ratings collapsing across the Northeast, the region presents Democrats an unusually rich concentration of opportunities to capture Republican-held House and Senate seats in the November elections.

In this tempest, Democrats are pressing GOP Sens. Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island and Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania, and mounting fierce challenges to pick up about 10 Republican-held House seats in several states. Half a dozen other House Republicans also could be swept away.

The campaign's atmospherics give Democrats the chance to establish in the region an equivalent to what Republicans have built in the South: an overwhelming regional advantage that anchors their bids for House and Senate majorities. Indeed, if Democrats win most of the House races in play in the Northeast, they will be virtually assured of the net gain of 15 seats nationwide that they need to control the chamber.

On the plus side for the GOP, many of the targeted Republicans are strong candidates.

Rep. Rob Simmons, who represents a sprawling district in eastern Connecticut centered around Groton, is an example. He prepared for heavy political weather by diligently promoting local interests, taking generally moderate positions on social issues and seizing chances to show independence from Bush. Simmons and many of the other at-risk Republicans also are fiercely attacking their Democratic opponents.

Still, analysts in both parties agree that even with these efforts, Republicans in the Northeast's Democratic-leaning states remain especially vulnerable because of pervasive voter dissatisfaction with Bush, the Iraq war and scandals in Washington.

The endangered Republicans usually benefit from "some natural insulation because they happen to be fairly good fits for their districts," said Saul Shorr, a Democratic consultant based in Philadelphia. "But when there is a wave … places that weren't on the map [as competitive races] just get sucked in."

For decades, Northeast Republicans have experienced a decline that represents the flip-side of the GOP advances in the South. While the party's national identification with a conservative agenda, especially on social issues, has keyed its gains in Dixie, those issues have weakened it in the region that once produced such icons of political moderation as former Sens. Jacob K. Javits of New York and Lowell P. Weicker Jr. of Connecticut.

This year, the climate for further Democratic gains could hardly be more favorable. In an ABC/Washington Post survey this week, Bush's approval rating in the East stood at 27%, much lower than in any other region.

Joe Courtney, the Democrat running against Simmons, feels that wind at his back. He lost to the incumbent, 54% to 46%, in 2002 when Bush was still riding a wave of public support after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"Running in the wake of 9/11 before the invasion of Iraq was a very tough environment as a challenger with a message of change," Courtney said. "Nothing could be more different than today. People have gotten a very good look at [the GOP] agenda … and I think in a district like this people have really crossed the line as far as wanting out."

That discontent, echoed across the region, has created strong Democratic opportunities in two Senate races. In Pennsylvania, polls have shown Santorum consistently trailing Democrat Bob Casey Jr. In Rhode Island, Chafee is facing a smaller and less settled deficit against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse.

Democratic pickups in these two states, however, could be undercut in New Jersey. There, Sen. Robert Menendez, a Democrat appointed to the seat earlier this year, is locked in a tight contest with Republican Tom Kean Jr.

In the House, top Democratic targets include four GOP-held districts in Pennsylvania, an open seat in central New York being vacated by Republican Sherwood Boehlert and a Buffalo-area district where Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds is vulnerable, in part because of the sex scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

At the apex of the Democratic target list are Simmons and two other House Republicans in Connecticut — Reps. Nancy L. Johnson and Christopher Shays.

Across the region, most Democrats want to nationalize their contests, making them a referendum on the direction Bush and the GOP-led Congress have set for the country. The Republicans want to localize the races, making them a referendum on their personal service to the district — and the personal shortcomings of their opponent.

Courtney, for instance, last week accused Simmons of failing to hold the administration accountable for reversals in Iraq and denounced him for supporting Bush-backed energy and Medicare prescription drug bills. Courtney characterized those measures as giveaways to the oil and drug industries.

Slight in build and contained in manner, Courtney is hardly a dynamic presence as a candidate. But he is firm in labeling Simmons, at every opportunity, "the president's No. 1 supporter in Connecticut."

Simmons, a hyper-kinetic campaigner, is airing ads pounding Courtney for supporting tax increases during his tenure as a state legislator.

DOJ_NMG_0080887

Above all, Simmons focuses on his role in the state's offensive to prevent the closing of the Groton naval base and his efforts to generate contracts for the nearby General Dynamics' Electric Boat submarine shipyard. His campaign website, meanwhile, contains an interactive map that lists, town by town, the federal money he has steered into the district.

"Joe Courtney doesn't know anybody in Washington D.C.; he doesn't have any clout; he doesn't have any experience," Simmons said this week at a fundraiser. Later, he whipped out his cellphone and brandished it before reporters, saying, "He doesn't have [former Veterans Affairs Secretary] Tony Principi's cellphone number. OK?"

With rare exceptions, Republicans across the region are claiming independence from Bush and spotlighting their commitment to working across party lines.

In his latest ad, Shays says, "I've gone against the president and the Republican leadership when I think they're wrong." Democrats counter that even Republicans with moderate voting records bolster Bush and the GOP by providing another vote for the party's congressional majority. In Rhode Island, Whitehouse recently unveiled an ad saying, "Bush needs Chafee to keep Republican control of the Senate. That's how Bush keeps his agenda alive."

When Courtney visited a senior center in Hebron, Conn., Jean Lyman, a retired secretary, said she had voted for Simmons before but would not this year because "he's just too tied to Bush and all his plans and programs."

By contrast, Del Knight, a medical researcher and political independent from Ledyard, Conn., who voted against Bush in 2004, still turned out for a Simmons fundraiser this week. The incumbent, Knight said, is "a good guy, and I think he has gone his own way."

Voters such as Knight have been the life raft for many Northeast Republicans as the region has turned away from the GOP. This year's results will measure whether these Republicans can still find enough support from such voters even as the intensely polarizing disputes of the Bush era have widened the distance between the two parties.

Hawaii Governor Leads From The Center (WT)

By Christopher Pala

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

HONOLULU -- When Gov. Linda Lingle addressed leaders of the state's top 250 corporations during a banquet earlier this month, she might have been expected to brag about the state's booming economy and her promise to cut corporate taxes and government regulations.

After all, Mrs. Lingle, a Republican, is running for re-election next month, and her audience included many potential and current contributors.

Instead, she spoke about her efforts to alleviate homelessness, get welfare recipients back to work and reform the state's troubled public school system, even as she acknowledged that most of those in the audience send their children to private schools.

Hawaii residents readily remark that on the mainland, Mrs. Lingle, who has a 66 percent approval rating, would be a liberal Democrat. But in a state that hadn't elected a Republican governor in 40 years, she is expected to be re-elected by such a wide margin that Hawaii's leading Democrats preferred to campaign for other jobs, leaving the challenge to Randy Iwase, a 58-year-old former state senator.

During the campaign's only televised debate, Mrs. Lingle, 53, promised to serve out another term and is expected to challenge Sen. Daniel K. Inouye in four years, when he is expected to be seeking, at 86, his ninth term. Mr. Inouye, like the rest of Hawaii's congressional delegation, is a liberal Democrat.

"Lingle is the future of the Republican Party," said Ira Rohter, a political science professor at the University of Hawaii. "I think eventually the party will move back to the center, and people like Lingle will take over."

Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, agrees.

"Candidates who succeed despite being from the heavily minority party on average are stronger and with greater talents than those nominated by the majority party," he said. "Lingle is a perfect example. Hawaii is such a Democratic bastion that it's amazing any Republican was ever elected statewide, and that she's a heavy favorite for re-election is even more amazing."

Mrs. Lingle also is an observant Jew in a state with a minuscule Jewish community. She is the first female governor and the first not to be born and raised in Hawaii in 40 years.

Mrs. Lingle is from St. Louis and was educated in California. She came to Hawaii in 1976, first working for a Teamsters boss in Honolulu. She then moved to Molokai Island and edited a community newspaper.

In 1980, she left the newspaper, joined the Republican Party and was elected to the Maui County Council, where she served 10 years. In 1988, she was elected mayor of Maui County, which includes Molokai. She served for another decade and consolidated a reputation for efficiency and merit appointments, denouncing cronyism in the unions and government.

DOJ_NMG_0080888

After winning the 2002 election, in which both houses of the Legislature retained large Democratic majorities, she behaved, said state House Majority Leader Marcus Oshiro, "more like a dictator than a governor."

Democrats dismissed her proposed constitutional amendment to change the school system and, by all accounts, she accomplished little in her first two years except streamlining the executive branch.

But she remained popular because, as Mr. Oshiro put it, "her timing was perfect." The recession that hobbled the previous administration turned into a boom that brought one of the country's lowest unemployment rates and allowed her to turn a budget deficit into a surplus.

Mrs. Lingle backs the Bush administration on the Iraq war. She opposes a withdrawal of U.S. troops because Iraq would "become a sitting target for terrorists" who would "be able to take over this country again and rule it in terror," she told a small group of journalists.

"We need a good strategy to make certain that democracy gets up and running as soon as possible so that they can take care of their own security and we can bring our troops home."

Clinton's Iowa Visit May Serve Wife's Aims (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

DES MOINES, Oct. 15 -- Former president Bill Clinton entered the Hy-Vee Hall here on Saturday night like an aging rock star, striding up a red carpet, wearing a big smile, his arms outstretched to touch the hands of Democratic admirers lined up along his walkway to the stage.

Clinton came to rally Democrats three weeks before critical midterm elections. But his visit may have served another purpose as well. Alone among prospective Democratic presidential candidates for 2008, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) has not set foot in the state all year, and the futures market in Clinton political stock here has been suffering.

Early polls by the Des Moines Register have shown former North Carolina senator John Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice presidential nominee, to be more popular among Democratic activists than the New York senator. A more recent survey of Iowans showed her running weaker than Edwards, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) in a series of hypothetical general election matchups against prospective Republican candidates.

The senator's political advisers dismiss those numbers and perhaps for good reason. Clinton has chosen to focus on her own reelection in New York, they note, and so has not spent time in a state where voters insist on getting to know the candidates before they make a commitment to support them. If she decides to run, say her advisers, attitudes will change.

But Iowa Democrats said Clinton's standing reflects more than her absence. They say there is general unease within the party about her ability to win a general election. Beyond that, some Democrats are troubled by her support for the war in Iraq long after other Democratic politicians such as Kerry and Edwards had renounced their votes for the congressional resolution that authorized President Bush to launch the invasion.

Attitudes in Iowa are important in part because the state holds the opening caucuses of the nomination battle every four years. But Iowa also is a small but significant Midwestern swing state, one that swung to the Republicans in 2004. Any Democrat running for president will need to convince voters that he or she can win Iowa.

"I think Hillary's got a problem with just about everybody with that under-the-radar thing of 'she can't win,' " said Rob Tully, a former Iowa Democratic Party chairman, and as one of Edwards's leading supporters, someone with his own biases. "That's something she's going to have to get over if she gets in. She knows that. She's an articulate, astute politician."

Antiwar sentiment has always run deep among Democratic activists in Iowa, which was why former Vermont governor Howard Dean found traction for his long-shot presidential candidacy in the opening of the 2004 nomination battle before his campaign collapsed in the weeks just before the caucuses.

If she runs, Clinton will meet skepticism or hostility among many of these antiwar Democrats. "The problem I have with Hillary is she voted for the Iraq war and did [support it] until a few months ago," said Bruce Stone, a liberal activist who attended Saturday's dinner.

Ann Selzer, who conducts the Iowa Poll for the Des Moines Register, said Clinton's problems go beyond the fact that she hasn't spent much time here recently. The problem is that many people already have an unfavorable opinion of her. "Her negatives are so negative," Selzer said in a phone interview.

It was Bill Clinton, during his first presidential campaign in 1992, who described the political partnership with his wife to voters as a buy-one, get-one-free deal. That still appears to be the case. He carries obvious political baggage, some of which his wife would inherit if she runs, but he is demonstrating that there are things he can do, small and large, that she cannot do for herself right now that could boost her candidacy.

DOJ_NMG_0080889

The New York senator has avoided New Hampshire this year, like Iowa. Among other things, this has kept her out of the effort among New Hampshire Democrats to preserve their state's first-in-the-nation primary status, which the Democratic National Committee is challenging.

Every likely Democratic candidate save for Clinton has signed a letter to Gov. John Lynch (D) backing the state. But when the former president visited last summer, he offered a ringing endorsement of New Hampshire's traditional status at the front of the calendar and said his wife shared those views.

Many Democrats still look at Clinton as the party's most effective strategist and communicator, and on Saturday night he was applauded just for saying, "Here's what we [Democrats] ought to say," and used part of his 49-minute speech to road-test a message that will resonate long after next month's election.

He advised on how Democratic candidates should talk about national security and Iraq -- robustly but also critically of the administration. He outlined an ambitious domestic agenda: expanded health-care coverage, energy independence, fiscal responsibility, tax cuts for the middle class. He condemned what he described as the giveaways to big corporations, drug companies, corporate executives and the wealthiest Americans.

It was all in the guise of the midterm elections, but it could and likely will be taken right off the shelf with minimal modifications by Hillary Clinton, if she chooses to run. She already has on some of the issues he outlined.

Clinton joked that one of his main jobs these days is as the "chief caseworker for the junior senator of New York." But he is working in her behalf far beyond the borders of the Empire State and is reaching people she is not -- some of them more receptive to him than to her.

Asked before Clinton's speech what he thought of the former president, Stone brightened. "I think he walks on water, and the only way you'd get me to vote for Hillary is to tell me it's a package deal." She will decide how explicitly to make such an offer.

Woo GOP Voters, Clinton Urges Party (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa -- Former President Bill Clinton told Iowa Democrats that they should appeal to disaffected Republican voters in their efforts to win control of Congress.

"We've got a big responsibility. Forget about 2008. Forget about the politics. Just go out and find somebody and look them dead in the eye and say, 'You know, this is not right,' " Mr. Clinton said in a 45-minute speech before 3,500 Democratic Party activists Saturday night at their annual Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner.

Few doubted that the former president was present as a surrogate for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, whose likely run for the White House in 2008 would start in the important caucus state.

Democrats seeking their party's presidential nomination regularly attend the dinner during election years. Most in attendance paid $100 to attend the fundraising event that also included speeches from Iowa Democrats Gov. Tom Vilsack and Sen. Tom Harkin.

Despite his call for focus on this year's midterm elections, Mr. Clinton did work in a joking pitch on behalf of his wife.

"I am under no illusions as to why I'm here," he said. "You were so desperate for a Democrat with any name recognition at all who isn't running for president that you resorted to the chief caseworker to the junior senator from New York."

Mrs. Clinton did not attend the fundraiser and is the only member of the prospective class of 2008 Democrats who has not made a campaign stop in Iowa. In 1992, Mr. Clinton made only one visit during the primaries and lost the state to Mr. Harkin before eventually winning his party's nomination and the White House.

Even though Mrs. Clinton was not in Iowa, an independent organization supporting her likely 2008 campaign had a large presence at the dinner.

"The response has been overwhelming," said Peter Fedde, of VoteHillary.org, based in Chester, Va.

Mr. Fedde said Mrs. Clinton is focused on her Senate re-election, but that Mr. Clinton's speech was "very symbolic" of themes that Mrs. Clinton would tout as a presidential candidate.

"It was the same kind of issues, including working with Republicans," Mr. Fedde said.

Most of Mr. Clinton's speech focused on what he considers the faults of the Bush administration and a Republican-led Congress. Mr. Clinton cited the war in Iraq, the federal budget deficit and increased political polarization.

"You cannot blame the entire Republican Party for this reason," Mr. Clinton said. "The entire government of the United States -- the Congress, the White House and, increasingly, the courts -- for the last six years has been in the total control not of the Republican Party, but of the most ideological, the most right-wing, the most extreme sliver of the Republican Party."

Mr. Clinton said Republicans have three leading principles of governance: concentration of wealth among the nation's wealthiest people, "unlimited and unaccountable executive power" and appealing to an ideologically driven political base.

DOJ_NMG_0080890

"We believe in evidence and argument, not assertions and attack," Mr. Clinton said.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton called Sen. John McCain on Saturday to personally apologize and denounce comments an adviser of hers reportedly made that slammed the Republican senator over his time in captivity in North Vietnam, the New York Post reports.

The move from one potential 2008 presidential candidate to another was sparked by a column in the New York Times in which Maureen Dowd quoted an anonymous adviser talking about Mr. McCain's criticism of the Clintons over their North Korea position.

The adviser said Team Clinton thought Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, was doing the White House's dirty work by criticizing the Clintons and ended up "looking similar to the way he did on those captive tapes from Hanoi, where he recited the names of his crewmates."

That was a reference to an unsubstantiated rumor used to malign Mr. McCain, a Vietnam war hero, as off-kilter during the 2000 Republican presidential primary.

Aides to both senators said Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, reached out to Mr. McCain to denounce the comments.

Mrs. Clinton is said to have a good relationship with Mr. McCain, and her circle clearly wasn't pleased with the remarks.

Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson said, "These comments are reprehensible, and they in no way reflect Senator Clinton's feelings."

McCain spokesman John Weaver replied, "Senator Clinton is correct: The remark was reprehensible."

Last week, Mr. McCain took what many saw as the first shot of the 2008 race, blasting Mrs. Clinton for placing blame for North Korea's recent nuclear test on President Bush -- and pointed to her husband Bill's policies as a "failure."

True believers

"Global warming is a religion, not science. That's why acolytes in the media attack global-warming critics not with scientific arguments, but for their apostasy," San Francisco Chronicle columnist Debra Saunders writes.

"Then they laud global-warming believers not for reducing greenhouse gases, but simply for believing global warming is a coming catastrophe caused by man. The important thing is to have faith in those who warn: The end is near," the columnist said.

"So a New York Times editorial Thursday took after Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., not for being a Doubting Thomas, but as the headline read, a 'Doubting Inhofe.' The brunt of the editorial was not a scientific refutation of Inhofe's arguments against the global-warming craze -- other than to cite a National Academy of Sciences report that warned that the Earth is approaching the warmest temperatures in 12,000 years -- a short blip in time to your average geologist.

"The Times' focus was on Inhofe's refusal to bow to 'the consensus among mainstream scientists and the governments of nearly every industrialized nation concerning manmade climate change.' That is, Inhofe has had the effrontery to challenge elite orthodoxy. Or, as the editorial put it, Inhofe 'has really buttressed himself with the will to disbelieve.'

"Get thee away, Satan.

" 'I see a sense of desperation that I haven't seen before,' Inhofe told me by phone Thursday, 'and frankly I'm enjoying it.' "

Michigan debate

Sen. Debbie Stabenow, Michigan Democrat, and Republican challenger Mike Bouchard sparred over issues ranging from the economy to free-trade agreements yesterday as they met in their first debate.

Mr. Bouchard, the Oakland County sheriff, said Mrs. Stabenow has been ineffective and has flip-flopped on several issues. "She says one thing here and does another thing in Washington," he said.

The former state lawmaker also criticized Mrs. Stabenow's record on the economy, noting that Michigan has lost thousands of jobs in recent years.

Mrs. Stabenow, seeking a second term, said Mr. Bouchard would support the "failed policies" of the Bush administration, the Associated Press reports.

A slim lead

The Democratic candidate running for the House seat once held by Florida's Mark Foley has a slim lead over a Republican rival, according to a newspaper poll published yesterday.

Democrat Tim Mahoney led Republican state Rep. Joe Negron 48 percent to 41 percent, with 11 percent undecided, according to the poll commissioned by the South Florida Sun-Sentinel and Scripps Treasure Coast Newspapers.

Mr. Negron is filling the campaign vacancy left after Mr. Foley, a six-term congressman, resigned amid reports that he exchanged sexually explicit Internet messages with male teenagers who worked on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0080891

Mr. Foley's name will remain on the ballot, with votes cast for him going to Mr. Negron.

The poll also found that many voters in the 16th Congressional District in South Florida say their voting plans will not be influenced by the scandal. The poll has a margin of error of 4 percentage points. Maryland-based Research 2000 conducted the telephone survey of 600 likely voters in District 16 Wednesday through Friday for the newspapers.

Backing Arnold

The Los Angeles Times yesterday endorsed Arnold Schwarzenegger for a second term as governor of California.

After a "disappointing sophomore year," Mr. Schwarzenegger had managed to direct the state on a "moderate course" that deserves another four years, the newspaper said.

"In the last year, the Republican has formed relationships with legislative leaders that focused the usually fractious and often obstructive Democrats on a productive agenda."

Polls show Mr. Schwarzenegger with a sizable lead over Phil Angelides, his Democratic rival in the governor's race.

Kerry's charge

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, yesterday accused the Bush administration of a "cut-and-run policy" in Afghanistan.

Asked on "Fox News Sunday" about the U.N. Security Council resolution against North Korea's nuclear- weapons program, Mr. Kerry instead changed the subject to Iraq and Afghanistan, condemning as "a complete fantasy" the foreign-policy prescriptions offered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who had preceded him as a guest on the Fox News Channel program.

"It's a failure in Afghanistan where they have a sort of cut-and-run policy of not completing the job," said Mr. Kerry, adding that the U.S. has "seven times the troops in Iraq" as in Afghanistan.

"The problem with Iraq is that it has diminished our hand and reduced our ability to be able to deal with Iran and North Korea. They are related," Mr. Kerry said.

'We Are A Nuclear Power' (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh, Melinda Liu And George Wehrfritz

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

Great historical events can spring from small slights. Kaiser Wilhelm never forgave the French for not treating him to a parade in Paris. "The monarchs of Europe have paid no attention to what I have to say," the German emperor whined before setting the Continent aflame in 1914. By many accounts, North Korea's Kim Jong Il also suffers from a tender ego. For one thing the 5-foot-3 dictator is sensitive about his height (hence, one suspects, his bouffant hairstyle and elevator shoes). After ordering the kidnapping of a South Korean actress, Choe Eun Hee, in 1978 to help him start up a national film industry, the first thing the movie-mad Kim jokingly asked her at a welcoming dinner was: "Well, Madame, what do you think of my physique?" More painfully, he fears that in the eyes of his countrymen and allies, he can never match the achievements of his revered father, the "Great Leader" Kim Il Sung (who was close to six feet tall and who led a guerrilla army against the Japanese occupiers in the 1930s). By many accounts, the young Kim is fed up along with his top aides, who often reflect his views. "What I hear is, Big Brother is telling Little Brother, 'Don't do that'," the North Korean vice minister of Foreign Affairs, Kim Gye Gwan, complained when Beijing urged Kim Jong Il to cancel his planned missile tests in July. "But we are not boys. We are a nuclear power."

And so one can understand the reaction at the highest levels of Kim's secretive regime when he learned of George W. Bush's contemptuous comments about him at a meeting of Republican senators in 2002. In a private diatribe that left listeners stunned by its vehemence, the U.S. president called Kim a hateful "pygmy" who behaved like "a spoiled child at a dinner table." Since those remarks and other personal cracks by Bush were reported in NEWSWEEK and other Western publications, North Korean officials have regularly complained about them to Washington-based Korea scholar Selig Harrison, who visits Pyongyang often. "How can we deal with you when your leader doesn't show us even a minimum of respect?" Kim Gye Gwan asked Harrison in 2004.

History is not just about abstract forces like economics or ideology or geography. It is also shaped, often most decisively, by the aims and ambitions of deeply flawed men—men like Kim, his father and generations of North Korean soldiers, scientists and spies who have spent years trying to join the Nuclear Club. Did Kim decide to test a nuclear device last week because the leader of the world's only superpower refuses to talk directly to him? It's more complicated than that, of course, just as World War I had many more causes than Kaiser Wilhelm's Napoleon complex. But the trail of events that led to this perilous moment—making North Korea the first new declared nuclear power in eight years, and undoubtedly the most unstable of the eight (not including Israel) in the world today—had a great deal to do with years of misplaced pride and prejudice between Pyongyang and Washington, of deep misunderstanding and disastrous missed chances. In an Oct. 10 interview with a Seoul newspaper, a North

DOJ_NMG_0080892

Korean diplomat confirmed that Pyongyang was sending a message: "When we declared that we had weapons, the U.S. underestimated our abilities and doubted that we really had them. The nuclear test has proven [our word]."

I. Secrets of the North

No one in Washington has ever known quite how to deal with North Korea. As a lonely Stalinist regime, Kim's nation is a political toxic-waste site that has festered for 50 years amid East Asia's glittering successes. It is also a place of truly Orwellian oddity, where traffic cops in Pyongyang's empty boulevards go through the motions of directing cars when there are none, where thousands of people starve unnoticed and where Kim administers "a gulag the size of Houston," in Bush's words. Bill Clinton likewise despised Kim, and as president, Clinton came much closer than Bush ever has to attacking him. But the incumbent American president is, by many accounts, offended by Kim on a more deeply moral and personal level.

During his first trip to Seoul, soon after his Axis of Evil speech in early 2002, Karen Hughes, then Bush's counselor, told reporters that the president was fascinated by satellite pictures of the Korean Peninsula at night, showing bright lights over the South and darkness over the power-starved North. To Bush, the pictures showed "the light and opportunity that comes with freedom, and the dark that comes with a regime that is oppressive," Hughes said. Just two weeks ago, at a press conference in the Rose Garden days before Kim's test, Bush recalled a meeting he had last April with a Japanese mother who had lost her teenage daughter to a North Korean abduction 29 years ago, possibly to be turned into a prostitute. He said the session—which he has called "one of the most meaningful moments of my presidency"—broke his heart.

While the size of North Korea's new test was unimpressive—at half a kiloton or less, it was little more than a nuclear popgun—Pyongyang continues to be the world's No. 1 missile proliferator. And the regime's long, shady history of secret kidnappings, amphibious commando missions and other spooky operations make American intelligence officials as nervous as they've ever been about what Kim has and what he might do with it. While the North has not yet been caught shipping nuclear materials abroad, it is conceivable that an enraged or cash-strapped Kim Jong Il could someday permit a baseball-size lump of plutonium loaded into a terrorist bomb to make its way to America.

Just as scary is what the North might pass on to other nuclear-minded regimes, especially its Axis of Evil companion, Iran. At the dawn of the Nuclear Age, during World War II, scientists worried that atomic technology could never be fully controlled—that the weapons produced to fight tyranny were demons in thin disguise. A NEWSWEEK investigation traces North Korea's nuclear demons back to their origins, and the story shows that, tragically, what was feared in the middle of the 20th century could become a commonplace of the early 21st.

Last week's half-kiloton explosion was the product of an effort spanning a half century or more. It is difficult to pinpoint the precise moment Kim Il Sung decided he needed the Bomb and a ballistic-missile program to go with it. But the ambition was in keeping with his deep insecurity going back to the dubious origins of his regime.

North Korea, after all, is an invented country, a relic of the cold-war divide. After the World War II defeat of Japan, which had occupied Korea, the regime was created by Stalin in 1945 out of the northern half of the Korean Peninsula, and Moscow propped up Kim Il Sung as a strongman. The Americans, meanwhile, built their client state in the southern half. Both sides never gave up their claims to the whole peninsula, putting them on a permanent war footing. To consolidate power, Kim created a cultlike ideology of self-reliance called juche, a curdled brew of traditional Korean xenophobia and nationalism, Confucian deference to authority and utopian Marxism-Leninism. Some experts argue that Kim decided he needed a nuclear security blanket soon after the 1950-53 Korean War, which he battled to a draw. Then came the early 1970s, when he realized he was losing the economic contest against his blood enemies in Seoul, and after that the Soviet Union disintegrated—a failure that suddenly left Pyongyang without a communist patron or a nuclear umbrella to shield it. An increasingly paranoid Kim Il Sung also sponsored many acts of terrorism against the South, including the alleged sabotaging of a Korean Airlines plane in 1987, killing all 115 passengers and crew, the year before the Seoul Olympic Games. And he taught his son well.

Driven by two men with near-absolute power, North Korea's program was produced by a staggering cast of characters. They included idealistic Korean scientists educated in Imperial Japan and repatriated after World War II, their students educated in the Soviet Union and the thousands of homegrown technicians. Japan, one of the North's hardiest enemies today, gave Pyongyang the man deemed the "first father" of North Korea's nuclear program, the late scientist and inventor Lee Sung Ki, who earned a degree in chemical engineering at Kyoto Imperial University in 1931. In fact, despite its deep isolation, the Hermit Kingdom is known or suspected to have received nuclear assistance from 14 countries: Russia, China, Austria, France, Canada, Romania, Germany, Pakistan, India, Japan, Iran, Ukraine, Kazakhstan and the Democratic Republic of Congo.

There were privateers, too: defectors, Chinese technology firms, Japanese trading houses and front companies scattered from Thailand to Scandinavia—all provided critical technologies, components or know-how by circumventing a global nonproliferation regime designed to thwart such commerce. Even the International Atomic Energy Agency unwittingly helped: analysts say a single North Korean diplomat, Choi Hak Gun, who was posted to IAEA headquarters in Vienna from 1974 to 1978, scoured the agency's library for nuclear know-how.

DOJ_NMG_0080893

The human costs of North Korea's nuclear ambitions on the nation's best and brightest were terrible. Few paid a higher price than Kimchaek University's class of '62, according to a grad who defected from North Korea several years ago and told NEWSWEEK his story. As graduation at the elite college neared more than 40 years ago, the buzz on campus was that Kim Il Sung had ordered construction of an advanced research facility to study atomic energy, and that patriotic young scientists soon would be mobilized to work there. "Our professors really pushed the need for nuclear development," he recalls. "The rumor circulating among students was that those of us sent there wouldn't have long to live."

The defector, spared the fate of those assigned to nuclear labs, spent his adult life watching unlucky classmates grow sick, weak and despondent. On leave, one confided a Confucian desperation to marry and sire children before radiation rendered him sterile. "It was exactly what we feared," the defector says, still saddened by their sacrifice. "These guys went bald. Many of them lost their eyebrows. Some of them had constant nosebleeds. They looked so weak it was hard to even face them. The thinking was, 'If one scientist falls there will always be others to take his place'." That logic not only ravaged a generation of scientists sent like worker bees into toxic nuclear labs. It cost billions in hard currency that might have fed starving people and hobbled the national economy by imposing perpetual austerity under slogans like "Military first."

North Korea was also helped by its participation in the rogues' club of nations that have suffered U.S. sanctions for pursuing nuclear ambitions, led by Pakistan, since the end of the cold war. After Washington shut down exports of military hardware to Pakistan in 1985, none other than Harvard-educated Benazir Bhutto concluded a missile deal with the North. Pakistan's black-marketing lead scientist, AQ Khan, visited North Korea 13 times over the next seven years. Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf has denied he knew anything about this, but according to former senior Pakistani officials those visits occurred with the knowledge and consent of the military leadership. Pakistan agreed to provide second-rate P1 centrifuge technology to North Korea in return for missiles, enabling Pakistan to extend the reach of its nuclear weapon deep inside India, and North Korean scientists received nuclear briefings at KRL (Khan Research Laboratory), Pakistan's main nuclear facility. Even so, the imported uranium enrichment technology has barely gotten off the ground. In the end, it was juche that prevailed.

Despite all this effort, the North Korean program remained a rather ramshackle affair, demonstrating that it's not so easy after all to build nukes. In the early 1990s, after Washington and Pyongyang nearly came to blows over the program, evangelist Billy Graham and Jimmy Carter went on peacemaking visits to the North, leading to Bill Clinton's "Agreed Framework" deal with Pyongyang. Under that 1994 pact, Clinton obtained a commitment to freeze plutonium reprocessing in exchange for aid and a civilian nuclear plant. When American experts were finally allowed in to inspect Yongbyon, the center of North Korea's nuclear programs, that year, they could hardly believe their eyes. Inside, the cooling pond looked like an abandoned swimming pool. Above it, a window was broken; a bird's carcass floated on the water. Below a film of algae, underwater cameras revealed metal receptacles—they looked like milk-bottle baskets—at the bottom of the pool containing spent nuclear fuel rods that could be reprocessed to produce weapons-grade plutonium. Some rods were broken, many mired in sludge. Tree leaves and twigs littered the place. Staring at the debris, inspectors suddenly realized that frogs were living in the water.

But since the breakdown of the Agreed Framework in 2002—the Bush administration discarded it as a flawed Clinton-era policy—Yongbyon has been cleaned up and repaired, says Sig Hecker, a former director of Los Alamos who was invited to inspect it in January 2004. Hecker later said the North Koreans were now "beyond dispute competent" at the chemistry and metallurgy of plutonium reprocessing. Indeed, the history of North Korea's program is evidence that "any country on the map with a population of 20 to 25 million will have the core group of people who can [go nuclear] if they squeeze their economy hard enough," says Daniel Pinkston, a nonproliferation expert at the Monterey Institute for International Studies. And North Korea has long been, to say the least, quite open to squeezing people in pursuit of power—including many along the Potomac River half a world away.

II. Missed Signals

Oct. 17, 2000, was a beautiful moonlit night in Washington. Marshal Cho Myong Rok, second only to Kim in North Korea, stood sipping drinks with Madeleine Albright on the terrace of the State Department's opulent Benjamin Franklin Room. In a meeting earlier that day with President Clinton, Cho had declared that Pyongyang had renounced terrorism, and he delivered Kim Jong Il's personal invitation to the president to visit Pyongyang.

The two sides were tantalizingly near a deal to stop all North Korean missile exports and cease development, testing and deployment of anything other than short-range Scuds. At least so the Clinton team believed. In exchange, the North would get full diplomatic recognition, the promise of billions in aid from Washington and Tokyo, and the stamp of legitimacy and guarantee of security that a Clinton visit would bring, says Albright's former senior aide, Wendy Sherman. According to Yang Sungchul, the South Korean ambassador to Washington who was there that night, Albright and Marshal Cho conversed in one corner, she looking comfortable and the general bolt-upright as if standing at attention. "I'm sure he was overwhelmed" by the culture shock, says Yang: here was Cho, the leading general of a country whose capital features a U.S. war-crimes museum, surrounded by the enemy.

DOJ_NMG_0080894

A week later Albright was in Pyongyang, meeting with what she described as a well-informed and charming Kim, who gave a sophisticated rundown of his security situation and graciously directed his waiters not to give her too much alcohol during toasts. At one point, recalls Sherman, Kim even called for U.S. troops to remain on the Korean Peninsula (to guard against China). Albright was also treated to a show involving tens of thousands of acrobats and dancers at a stadium, intended to impress her with the glorious feats of the North Korean revolution. During the spectacle, a mass of performers flipped colored placards that together depicted Kim's Taepodong I missile taking off for its first test in 1998. Kim turned to Albright at that moment and said, "That was the first launch of that missile, and it will be the last."

In retrospect, that evening was the high point of U.S.-North Korean relations. Since then, GOP hard-liners have gleefully criticized Albright for the visit, and dismissed the North Koreans as blackmailers. But had a lasting settlement been reached, many Asian and U.S. diplomats believe North Korea would likely not have tested a nuclear device, and would not have developed an intercontinental missile, the Taepodong II, with a range that can reach Alaska or Hawaii (though its first test failed).

In the end, Clinton was absorbed by Mideast peace talks, which the White House thought more important than a risky deal many aides doubted. But the incoming secretary of State, Colin Powell, was so impressed with the deal's terms that, when Albright and her aides briefed him and the then national-security adviser Condoleezza Rice, he praised it to the press. On March 6, 2001, Powell declared that the new administration "plan[s] to engage with North Korea, to pick up where President Clinton left off. Some promising elements were left on the table." South Korean President Kim Dae Jung, full of messianic fervor about his new Sunshine Policy of détente with the North, rushed to Washington to make his case as well.

That's when the hammer dropped. Powell, it turned out, had forgotten to check with his boss before spouting off about North Korea. And Kim Dae Jung was stunned when he stepped out for a joint news conference after meeting Bush in March 2001. "He didn't talk about what we had agreed upon but began to criticize North Korea by saying that a regime that couldn't even feed its people was making nuclear weapons," Kim Dae Jung told NEWSWEEK last week. "From that time on, things began to go wrong. I am confident that if President Bush had [pursued] the agreement sought by President Clinton the North Korean issue would have been resolved, and I am very sorry about that."

The Bush team says both Powell and Kim Dae Jung got ahead of themselves, imposing policy on the new president when he'd barely been in office. There was, at the time, a hostile "anything but Clinton" tone in the White House, and Kim Jong Il was also a handy villain to have around to justify the centerpiece of Bush's foreign policy, the expensive missile defense program.

The attacks of September 11 cemented Bush's attitude toward Kim, and shifted him toward regime change. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, especially, was obsessed by the possibility that terrorists might get their hands on a nuclear weapon. He asked his team to review which nations had the capability to produce a nuclear weapon and which had links to terrorist groups. The review came up with a list of a dozen or so nations, including countries like Syria and Libya that might be coerced into abandoning their ambitions, but it concluded that a hard-core trio—Iran, Iraq and North Korea—were probably immune to any peaceful pressures. That, more than any other review by the administration, was what led to Bush's "Axis of Evil" State of the Union speech in January 2002.

While Clinton came very close to traveling to Pyongyang, Bush maintains that he has a much more realistic approach to Kim's perfidies. In fact, Bush himself approved a plan to cut off Kim and the North Korean elite's illegal financing, only days after America, China and other countries announced a new round of talks with North Korea a year ago. Bush's former senior director for Asia, Michael Green, told NEWSWEEK last week: "The president said, 'We apply the law'." Not surprisingly, the talks broke down.

There is some evidence that the Bush administration was seeking to manipulate intelligence on North Korea. During a visit to Pyongyang by lead negotiator James Kelly in October 2002, he presented what U.S. officials described as "proof" that the North had a secret uranium-enrichment program, undercutting Clintonite claims that Kim was adhering to a pledge not to advance his nuclear program. Bush officials later said the North Koreans had confessed. But diplomats now say that was a translation error. (Kelly could not be reached for comment.) While Kim was clearly violating the spirit of his '94 agreement by secretly importing centrifuge equipment, U.S. intelligence sources tell NEWSWEEK that their monitors in the region have never detected telltale emissions from any centrifuges. Earlier in 2002, the then Pacific commander Adm. Dennis Blair told a Pentagon meeting chaired by Under Secretary of Defense Stephen Cambone that Blair's surveillance and monitoring teams had still detected nothing. According to a participant who would speak only if he was not identified, that led Cambone to stalk over to Blair after the meeting, jab his finger into his chest and declare that he expected more out of him.

Things grew so icy between the two countries in recent years that, in what is perhaps one of the more bizarre episodes in the long history of diplomacy, the North Koreans turned to one of their few American friends, the Hackensack, N.J., restaurateur Robert (Bobby) Egan, who heads a trade group promoting business with Pyongyang. For years Egan used to joke that North Korean diplomats at the United Nations frequented his Hackensack restaurant, Cubby's, because they liked feeling "naughty": his place pushed the limit beyond which the foreign diplomats were forbidden to travel without U.S. government permission. As

DOJ_NMG_0080895

Egan tells it, the North Koreans were once again offering to "sell" their nuclear and missile programs to the U.S. government. "They were willing to accept a price, spread over a number of years," Egan says. There were no takers.

South Korean diplomats point out that even Ronald Reagan negotiated with the Soviet Union after calling it an "evil empire." "Having dialogue is not to make friends," Kim Dae Jung says. "You can have dialogue even with the Devil if it is necessary."

III. A Spreading Global Danger

Dealing with the devil is exactly how many U.S. officials would view a pact with Kim Jong Il, now that the work of two dictators, generations of scientists, black marketeers and military officers has apparently catapulted North Korea into the ranks of the nuclear. The administration does have a war plan for Korea. OPPLAN 5027 has long been part of the U.S. Pacific Command's inventory—initially as a plan only for the defense of the South, but since the early 1990s also laying out a follow-up invasion of the North and the toppling of the regime. Washington also has a contingency plan for taking out all known North Korean nuclear facilities—also worked up during the Clinton administration during the 1992-93 crisis. But military officials say the casualties on both sides would be enormous, even in the best case. One reason Bill Clinton decided to cut a deal, in fact, is that on May 19, 1994, Defense Secretary Bill Perry briefed the president on the likely costs of invasion: 52,000 U.S. military and 490,000 South Korean soldiers killed or wounded, and untold numbers of civilian casualties, all in the first 90 days. Perry ultimately was the one who went to Pyongyang to negotiate.

No surprise, then, that Bush has made clear he has no intention of attacking Kim. But there appears to be no easy diplomatic way out, either. Last Saturday the U.N. Security Council unanimously passed a resolution imposing sanctions, but China and Russia are still balking at anything too severe. In an interview with NEWSWEEK, the Treasury Department under secretary in charge of antiterrorism operations, Stuart Levey, said that Bush's decision to sanction the Macau-based bank that laundered money for Kim has had a ripple effect by warning other banks and businesses not to do business with North Korea or companies or financial entities linked to North Korea. The North Koreans are "looking for other access points" to the world financial system, but "they are having trouble finding new ones," he said.

The problem with Bush's approach, say his critics—who include Kim Dae Jung and many Asian diplomats—is that while he waits for regime collapse, bad things can happen. North Korea could be even more dangerous, since the removal of legitimate bank funds means Kim must resort to illicit funds instead—the kind that can come from WMD sales. And in the past six years Bush has permitted the North Korean leader to cross more U.S. "red lines"—by reprocessing spent fuel into plutonium, kicking out inspectors and declaring he has nuclear weapons—than Clinton did.

The gravest danger going forward is proliferation to like-minded regimes, especially to Iran. Despite the lack of any common goal—one regime would like to see the world turn Islamic green, the other wants things juchered—the two countries are closer to being an actual "axis" than they were when Bush launched the phrase in January 2002. And if Pyongyang is seen as getting away with its nuclear test, some Iranian officials indicate they may raise their own demands for a nuclear program. That's partly why Rice is traveling to Asia and Russia in a new diplomatic offensive this week: she will link North Korea and Iran together once again, arguing that as nuclear offenders they should be made outcasts, the new slavers of the 21st century.

For Washington, the greatest hope against Kim lies with China, which controls some 70 percent of the North's fuel supplies. U.S. officials hope that Chinese President Hu Jintao will decide he's finally had enough of his out-of-control former junior partner. Officials close to Vice President Dick Cheney are warning their Chinese counterparts that Japan could be forced to join the Nuclear Club. They are also warning that North Korea may threaten the Beijing Olympics in 2008. The fear? That Kim might resort to terror to make a point. As precedent, they cite the 1987 Korean Air disaster.

Last week, even as North Korea's apparatchiks threatened to fire off another test, its diplomats privately sent wistful messages to American counterparts imploring them to come back and talk. North Korean envoy Han Song Ryol, who was winding up a posting at his country's U.N. Mission in New York, sounded plaintive as he bid goodbye to U.S. friends. Han asked an American acquaintance who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter: "What can we do to get the Americans to talk with us?" Back came the answer: nothing. Still, Rice will tell her counterparts this week that, even after the test, Bush is open to letting the North back into negotiations.

In Bush's Oval Office sits a bronze bust of Winston Churchill, who served both in the government and at the front in the war Kaiser Wilhelm started partly out of pride in 1914. Churchill's was a long life: a veteran of the trenches, in 1955 he spoke to the House of Commons about the hydrogen bomb and arms control. He was worried, he said, about what might happen "if God wearied of mankind," but he would not give in. "Never flinch, never weary, never despair," Churchill said, and took his leave. The Nuclear Age is bleak, but an old man's words might help us see our way forward as we struggle to tame the demons.

The Fresh Face (TIME)

By Joe Klein

DOJ_NMG_0080896

Time, October 16, 2006

It is 9 A.M. on a fresh, sunny Saturday in Rockford, Ill., and nearly a thousand people have gathered in the gymnasium at Rock Valley College to participate in a town meeting with their Senator, Barack Obama. It is an astonishingly large crowd for a beautiful Saturday morning, but Obama--whose new book, The Audacity of Hope, is excerpted starting on page 52--has become an American political phenomenon in what seems about a nanosecond, and the folks are giddy with anticipation. "We know he's got the charisma," says Bertha McEwing, who has lived in Rockford for more than 50 years. "We want to know if he's got the brains." Just then there is a ripple through the crowd, then gasps, cheers and applause as Obama lopes into the gym with a casual, knees-y stride. "Missed ya," he says, moving to the microphone, and he continues greeting people over raucous applause. "Tired of Washington."

There's a sly hipster syncopation to his cadence, "Been stuck there for a while." But the folksiness pretty much disappears when he starts answering questions. Obama's actual speaking style is quietly conversational, low in rhetoric-saturated fat; there is no harrumph to him. About halfway through the hour-long meeting, a middle-aged man stands up and says what seems to be on everyone's mind, with appropriate passion: "Congress hasn't done a damn thing this year. I'm tired of the politicians blaming each other. We should throw them all out and start over!"

"Including me?" the Senator asks.

A chorus of n-o-o-o-s. "Not you," the man says. "You're brand new." Obama wanders into a casual disquisition about the sluggish nature of democracy. The answer is not even remotely a standard, pretaped political response. He moves through some fairly arcane turf, talking about how political gerrymandering has led to a generation of politicians who come from safe districts where they don't have to consider the other side of the debate, which has made compromise--and therefore legislative progress--more difficult. "That's why I favored Arnold Schwarzenegger's proposal last year, a nonpartisan commission to draw the congressional-district maps in California. Too bad it lost." The crowd is keeping up with Obama, listening closely as he segues into a detailed discussion of the federal budget. Eventually, he realizes he has been filibustering and apologizes to the crowd for "making a speech." No one seems to care, since Obama is doing something pretty rare in latter-day American politics: he is respecting their intelligence. He's a liberal, but not a screechy partisan. Indeed, he seems obsessively eager to find common ground with conservatives. "It's such a relief after all the screaming you see on TV," says Chuck Sweeny, political editor of the Rockford Register Star. "Obama is reaching out. He's saying the other side isn't evil. You can't imagine how powerful a message that is for an audience like this."

Obama's personal appeal is made manifest when he steps down from the podium and is swarmed by well-wishers of all ages and hues, although the difference in reaction between whites and blacks is subtly striking. The African Americans tend to be fairly reserved--quiet pride, knowing nods and be-careful-now looks. The white people, by contrast, are out of control. A nurse named Greta, just off a 12-hour shift, tentatively reaches out to touch the Senator's sleeve. "Oh, my God! Oh, my God! I just touched a future President! I can't believe it!" She is literally shaking with delight--her voice is quivering--as she asks Obama for an autograph and then a hug.

Indeed, as we traveled that Saturday through downstate Illinois and then across the Mississippi into the mythic presidential-campaign state of Iowa, Obama seemed the political equivalent of a rainbow--a sudden preternatural event inspiring awe and ecstasy. Bill Gluba, a longtime Democratic activist who sells real estate on both sides of the river in the Quad Cities area, reminisced about driving Bobby Kennedy around Davenport, Iowa, on May 14, 1968. "I was just a teenaged kid," he says. "But I'll never forget the way people reacted to Kennedy. Never seen anything like it since--until this guy." The question of when Obama--who has not yet served two years in the U.S. Senate--will run for President is omnipresent. That he will eventually run, and win, is assumed by almost everyone who comes to watch him speak. In Davenport a local reporter asks the question directly: "Are you running for President in 2008?" Obama surprises me by saying he's just thinking about the 2006 election right now, which, in the semiotic dance of presidential politics, is definitely not a no. A few days later, I ask Obama the obvious follow-up question: Will he think about running for President in 2008 when the congressional election is over? "When the election is over and my book tour is done, I will think about how I can be most useful to the country and how I can reconcile that with being a good dad and a good husband," he says carefully, and then adds, "I haven't completely decided or unraveled that puzzle yet."

Which is even closer to a yes--or, perhaps, it's just a clever strategy to gin up some publicity at the launch of his book tour. The current Obama mania is reminiscent of the Colin Powell mania of September 1995, when the general--another political rainbow--leveraged speculation that he might run for President into book sales of 2.6 million copies for his memoir, My American Journey. Powell and Obama have another thing in common: they are black people who--like Tiger Woods, Oprah Winfrey and Michael Jordan--seem to have an iconic power over the American imagination because they transcend racial stereotypes. "It's all about gratitude," says essayist Shelby Steele, who frequently writes about the psychology of race. "White people are just thrilled when a prominent black person comes along and doesn't rub their noses in racial guilt. White people just go crazy over people like that."

DOJ_NMG_0080897

When I asked Obama about this, he began to answer before I finished the question. "There's a core decency to the American people that doesn't get enough attention," he said, sitting in his downtown Chicago office, casually dressed in jeans and a dark blue shirt. "Figures like Oprah, Tiger, Michael Jordan give people a shortcut to express their better instincts. You can be cynical about this. You can say, It's easy to love Oprah. It's harder to embrace the idea of putting more resources into opportunities for young black men--some of whom aren't so lovable. But I don't feel that way. I think it's healthy, a good instinct. I just don't want it to stop with Oprah. I'd rather say, If you feel good about me, there's a whole lot of young men out there who could be me if given the chance."

But that's not quite true. There aren't very many people--ebony, ivory or other--who have Obama's distinctive portfolio of talents, or what he calls his "exotic" family history. His parentage was the first thing he chose to tell us about himself when he delivered his knockout keynote speech at the Democratic National Convention in 2004: his father was from Kenya and his mother from Kansas. He told the story in brilliant, painful detail in his first book, Dreams from My Father, which may be the best-written memoir ever produced by an American politician. His parents met at the University of Hawaii and stayed together only briefly. His father left when Obama was 2 years old, and Barack was raised in Hawaii by his Kansas grandparents, except for a strange and adventurous four-year interlude when he lived in Indonesia with his mother and her second husband. As a teenager at Hawaii's exclusive Punahou prep school and later as a college student, Obama road tested black rage, but it was never a very good fit. There was none of the crippling psychological legacy of slavery in his family's past. He was African and American, as opposed to African American, although he certainly endured the casual cruelties of everyday life--in the new book, he speaks of white people mistaking him for a valet-parking attendant--that are visited upon nonwhites in America. "I had to reconcile a lot of different threads growing up--race, class," he told me. "For example, I was going to a fancy prep school, and my mother was on food stamps while she was getting her Ph.D." Obama believes his inability to fit neatly into any group or category explains his relentless efforts to understand and reconcile opposing views. But the tendency is so pronounced that it almost seems an obsessive-compulsive tic. I counted no fewer than 50 instances of excruciatingly judicious on-the-one-hand-on-the-other-handedness in The Audacity of Hope. At one point, he considers the historic influence of ideological extremists--that is, people precisely unlike him. "It has not always been the pragmatist, the voice of reason, or the force of compromise, that has created the conditions for liberty," he writes about the antislavery movement of the 19th century. "Knowing this, I can't summarily dismiss those possessed of similar certainty today--the antiabortion activist ... the animal rights activist who raids a laboratory--no matter how deeply I disagree with their views. I am robbed even of the certainty of uncertainty--for sometimes absolute truths may well be absolute."

Yikes. But then Obama is nothing if not candid about his uncertainties and imperfections. In Dreams from My Father, which was written before he became a politician, he admits to cocaine and marijuana use and also to attending socialist meetings. In The Audacity of Hope, I counted 28 impolitic or self-deprecating admissions. Immediately, on page 3, he admits to political "restlessness," which is another way of saying he's ambitious. He flays himself for enjoying private jets, which eliminate the cramped frustrations of commercial flying but--on the other hand!--isolate him from the problems of average folks. He admits that his 2004 Senate opponent, Alan Keyes, got under his skin. He blames himself for "tensions" in his marriage; he doubts his "capacities" as a husband and father. He admits a nonpopulist affinity for Dijon mustard; he cops to being "grumpy" in the morning. He even offers his media consultant David Axelrod's opinions about the best negative TV ads that could have been used against him in the 2004 Senate campaign. (He once--accidentally, he says--voted against a bill to "protect our children from sex offenders.")

There is a method to this anguish. Self-deprecation and empathy are powerful political tools. Obama's candor is reminiscent of John McCain, who once said of his first marriage, "People wouldn't think so highly of me if they knew more about that." Obama's empathy is reminiscent of Bill Clinton, although the Senator's compassion tends to be less damp than Clinton's: it's more about understanding your argument than feeling your pain. Both those qualities have been integral to Obama's charm from the start. His Harvard Law School classmate Michael Froman told me Obama was elected president of the Law Review, the first African American to hold that prestigious position, because of his ability to win over the conservatives in their class. "It came down to Barack and a guy named David Goldberg," Froman recalls. "Most of the class were liberals, but there was a growing conservative Federalist Society presence, and there were real fights between right and left about almost every issue. Barack won the election because the conservatives thought he would take their arguments into account."

After three years as a civil rights lawyer and law professor in Chicago, Obama was elected to the Illinois state senate and quickly established himself as different from most of the other African-American legislators. "He was passionate in his views," says state senator Dave Syverson, a Republican committee chairman who worked on welfare reform with Obama. "We had some pretty fierce arguments. We went round and round about how much to spend on day care, for example. But he was not your typical party-line politician. A lot of Democrats didn't want to have any work requirement at all for people on welfare. Barack was willing to make that deal."

DOJ_NMG_0080898

The raising and dashing of expectations is at the heart of almost every great political drama. In Obama's case, the expectations are ridiculous. He transcends the racial divide so effortlessly that it seems reasonable to expect that he can bridge all the other divisions--and answer all the impossible questions--plaguing American public life. He encourages those expectations by promising great things--at least, in the abstract. "This country is ready for a transformative politics of the sort that John F. Kennedy, Ronald Reagan and Franklin Roosevelt represented," he told me. But those were politicians who had big ideas or were willing to take big risks, and so far, Barack Obama hasn't done much of either. With the exception of a bipartisan effort with ultra-conservative Senator Tom Coburn of Oklahoma to publish every government contract--a matter of some embarrassment to their pork-loving colleagues--his record has been predictably liberal. And the annoying truth is, The Audacity of Hope isn't very audacious.

A few weeks ago, I watched Obama give a speech about alternative energy to an audience gathered by MoveOn.org at Georgetown University. It was supposed to be a big deal, one of three speeches MoveOn had scheduled to lay out its 2008 issues agenda, a chance for the best-known group of activist Democrats to play footsie with the party's most charismatic speaker, and vice versa. But it was a disappointment, the closest I had seen Obama come to seeming a standard-issue pol, one who declares a crisis and answers with Band-Aids. In this case, he produced a few scraggly carrots and sticks to encourage Detroit to produce more fuel-efficient cars. The audience of students and activists sensed the Senator's timidity and became palpably less enthusiastic as Obama went on. Just two days before, Al Gore gave a rousing speech in New York City in which he proposed a far more dramatic alternative energy plan: a hefty tax on fossil fuels that would be used, in turn, to reduce Social Security and Medicare taxes. I asked Obama why he didn't support an energy-tax increase married to tax relief for working Americans in the MoveOn speech or in The Audacity of Hope. "I didn't think of it," he replied, but sensing the disingenuousness of his response--talk of a gas tax is everywhere these days, especially among high-minded policy sorts--he quickly added,"I think it's a really interesting idea."

I pressed him on this. Surely he had thought about it? "Remember, the premise of this book wasn't to lay out my 10-point plan," Obama danced. "My goal was to figure out the common values that can serve as a basis for discussion." Sensing my skepticism, he tried again: "This book doesn't drill that deep in terms of policy ... There are a slew of good ideas out there. Some things end up on the cutting-room floor."

Universal health insurance also found its way to the cutting-room floor. I asked about the universal plan recently passed in Massachusetts, which was a triumph of Obama-style bipartisanship. The plan requires everyone who earns three times the poverty rate to purchase health insurance and subsidizes those who earn less than that. Shouldn't health insurance be mandatory, like auto insurance, for those who can afford it? Obama wouldn't go there. "If there's a way of doing it voluntarily, that's more consonant with the American character," he said. "If you can't solve the problem without the government stepping in, that's when you make it mandatory."

After we jousted over several other issues, Obama felt the need to step back and defend himself. "Look, when I spoke out against going to war in Iraq in 2002, Bush was at 60-65% in the polls. I was putting my viability as a U.S. Senate candidate at risk. It looks now like an easy thing to do, but it wasn't then." He's right about that: more than a few of his potential rivals for the presidency in 2008 voted, as a matter of political expediency, to give Bush the authority to use military force in Iraq. Then Obama returned to the energy issue. "When I call for increased fuel-economy standards, that doesn't sit very well with the [United Auto Workers], and they're big buddies of mine ... Look, it's just not my style to go out of my way to offend people or be controversial just for the sake of being controversial. That's offensive and counterproductive. It makes people feel defensive and more resistant to changes."

Talk about defensive: this was the first time I had ever seen Obama less than perfectly comfortable. And his discomfort exposed the elaborate intellectual balancing mechanism that he applies to every statement and gesture, to every public moment of his life. "He's working a very dangerous high-wire act," Shelby Steele told me. "He's got to keep on pleasing white folks without offending black folks, and vice versa." Indeed, Obama faces a minefield on issues like the racial gerrymandering of congressional districts and affirmative action. "You're asking him to take policy risks? Just being who he is is taking an enormous risk."

There is a certain amount of political as well as psychological wisdom to what Steele says. The most basic rule of presidential politics is that you run against your predecessor. If Obama, 45, chooses to run in 2008, his consensus seeking would stand in stark contrast not only to the hyperpartisan Bush Administration but also to the histrionic, self-important style of baby-boom-generation politicians. Or it could work against him. An old-time Chicago politician told me Obama's thoughtfulness might be a negative in a presidential campaign. "You have to convey strength," he said, "and it's hard to do that when you're giving on-the-other-hand answers."

Meanwhile, back in our interview, I offer a slightly barbed olive branch: Maybe I'm asking for too much when I expect him to be bold on the issues, I suggest. Maybe my expectations for him are too high? "No, no," he says, and returns for a third time to energy policy--to Gore's tax-swap idea. "It's a neat idea. I'm going to call Gore and have a conversation about it. It might be something I'd want to embrace."

DOJ_NMG_0080899

But he's not ready to make that leap just yet. Boldness needs to be planned, not blurted--and there are all sorts of questions to ponder before he takes the next step.Would the arrogance implicit in running now, after less than one term in the Senate, undercut his carefully built reputation for judiciousness? Is the Chicago politician right about the need to be strong and simple in a run for President? Or can Obama overturn all the standard political assumptions simply by being himself? "In setting your expectations for me now, just remember I haven't announced that I'm running in 2008," he concluded. "I would expect that anyone who's running in 2008, you should have very high expectations for them."

Kerry Says He Deserves 2nd Chance In '08 (AP-Y)

AP-Yahoo, October 16, 2006

Sen. John Kerry says he deserves a second chance if he decides to take another crack at becoming president.

The Massachusetts Democrat, who lost to President Bush in 2004, said it is a basic principle that "Americans give people a second chance. And if you learn something and prove you've learned something, maybe even more so. Now, I don't know what I'm going to do yet. We'll make that decision down the road."

Ronald Reagan twice unsuccessfully sought the GOP nomination for president before he got it — and won two elections for the White House.

"John McCain, their leading candidate — didn't he get kicked around South Carolina by the same president because he wasn't patriotic enough as a prisoner of war? He's now their leading candidate for president," Kerry said of the Republican Party. "Richard Nixon seemed to get kicked around pretty badly both running for president and governor, turned around and came back and got elected president."

Kerry faces a major challenge trying to convince Democratic activists that a recently defeated candidate can still carry his party's hopes for recapturing the White House.

If Kerry runs, he would have to overcome other Democratic presidential hopefuls such as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joe Biden of Delaware, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut.

The list of potential opponents also could include New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, former Indiana Gov. Sen. Evan Bayh, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, and even Kerry's ex-running mate in 2004, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

Running With Blinders (NYT)

By Kevin Sweeney

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Berkeley, Calif.

AT this point in the fall campaign, unabashed negativity clogs every media outlet. The stench of foul political advertising is everywhere, and one senses that little will change: Americans once again will hold their noses and vote.

For this round, there really isn't much to be done. But looking to the 2008 presidential race, there is still time to find a new way of campaigning — specifically, for progressive candidates to consider a fresh approach to running for office.

Why progressives? Because it's in their interest: pervasive negativity takes a far greater toll on progressive causes than on conservative ones. Conservatives typically rail against big government and bureaucrats. But by attacking the current administration, progressives unwittingly join the anti-government chorus. The differences between the two — one side making general attacks, the other specific ones — are details. Both project negative messages about government, but the advantage still goes to the conservatives.

To level the playing field, and restore clarity to progressive values, I propose "the forward-looking campaign."

The rules are simple. Never mention the opponent. Don't talk about the opponent's policies. Don't question the opponent's character. Don't talk about votes the opponent may have cast last week, last year or even 10 years ago. Refuse to run against anything or characterize any group; choose instead to run for something. Rather than engaging the opposition, the forward-looking candidate will engage the American people in a conversation about our future, keeping the focus on what we can accomplish as a nation and as individuals.

This is not just a commitment to be positive. Many candidates have tried that and failed. I was one of them. In 1992, I ran what many would consider a positive congressional campaign; my advertising never mentioned my opponent. But during a debate, I read statements she had made about me, noting that they were inaccurate. I made the corrections and moved on, doing so — I thought — without venom.

The next day's newspapers, however, described my actions as a personal assault, suggesting that sparks flew when I "stood up to attack." Any luster I had gained from being positive had been tarnished.

DOJ_NMG_0080900

I should have known then what is now quite obvious: one person's "clarification" is another person's "brutal attack." This is why the forward-looking candidate commits to avoiding any mention of the opposition, focusing instead on those whom he seeks to serve. It is a campaign promise that can be kept before a single vote is cast.

This commitment must be announced at the very outset, and must be the most visible element of the campaign throughout the early months. No matter how negative any other campaign chooses to be, voters must know that there is one candidate who refuses to put a foot on the slippery slope. What matters to the forward-looking candidate is where we can go and how we can get there. There is confidence and power in making that kind of statement.

There are also tactical reasons for the approach. It cuts through the background noise of American politics. It responds to the national disgust with negative campaigning. It gives voters an easy handle on the candidate, distinguishing him or her from others in the race.

And the approach is a natural shield. A forward-looking candidate who emerges from the Iowa caucuses would be difficult to attack; he would have spent much of a year building a case for this new model. He can stay visibly focused on the future, adopting a posture that suggests that anything else — any sideways glance — is a distraction. At last, there would be a penalty for unleashing negative ads, because the mere fact of the ads would be more important than their content. It is political jujitsu.

The first conversation I had along these lines was with Senator Gary Hart, as we considered media strategies for his 1988 presidential campaign. (He was then the Democratic front-runner; I was his press secretary.) We talked of a campaign in which every commercial would feature Mr. Hart looking into the camera, speaking directly to voters. In some of the ads, he would note how attacks by faceless announcers were damaging American politics, and would promise that his campaign would never rely on them.

As we considered various possibilities, we hit on an interesting bonus: Every negative ad, in every race in the country, could serve as a reminder that one candidate was taking a principled approach. We never saw this approach play out, as Mr. Hart's campaign ended abruptly following allegations of an extramarital affair. But the brutal attacks that came to define that election season suggested that we might have been right to consider the strategy.

The forward-looking campaign can help a progressive candidate satisfy America's yearning for moral values in politics. The landscape is crowded with political leaders who talk of morality, and who wear their Christian values on their sleeves. (The religious values of love and forgiveness, of course, are often contradicted or overwhelmed by political tactics evoking hate, fear or vengeance.) Rather than framing divisive issues like abortion and gay marriage to project its values, the forward-looking campaign would let its very conduct do the job. Without mentioning any religion, it could project religious values.

We reap what we sow. Divisive campaigns lead to divided government, a fate the American people can no longer afford. The forward-looking candidate, focused not just on electioneering but on governance, knows we must ultimately join hands — so he stops pointing fingers.

The 2004 election, according to some, was a race between fear and anger. Republicans raised fears; Democrats expressed anger. But it is obvious in the abstract that anger could never defeat fear; the two emotions are too closely linked. A forward-looking campaign offers a better strategy for combating fear. It offers, finally, respect and hope.

The Center Fails (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

With Mark Warner out of the 2008 Demstakes, the chief anti-Hillary centrist is Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana. This is a depressing commentary on the state of the Democratic Party. Bayh may have cleared his schedule to woo Warner supporters on Thursday. But he has yet to prove himself a real contender -- and he may not be a real centrist, either.

Two weeks ago Bayh circulated a preposterous letter to his Senate colleagues. It urged them to oppose what Bayh called "documented unfair trade" in a type of steel that's used in vehicles. It noted the Commerce Department's finding that lifting the tariff on this steel would lead to dumping by foreign producers. That would hurt U.S. steelmakers, the letter continued; so when the fate of the tariff is considered at a sunset review tomorrow, it should on no account be lifted.

This is not a policy that protects workers, as Bayh's letter pretended. It's a sellout to a self-serving lobby. It would help the steel guys at the expense of the car guys, even though the car guys are hurting more and they employ more workers.

The tariff that Bayh wants to preserve is one of more than a hundred that protect the steel industry. These fortifications were erected on the theory that the steel business is inherently unfair because every nation in the world wants its own steelmaker. The creation of these national champions guarantees global oversupply of steel, or so the argument used to go. Therefore the United States had to protect itself from dumpers' unfairly low prices.

This argument was always flawed. If foreigners wanted to sell artificially cheap steel, the United States should have been happy to pocket the subsidy. But the protectionist argument is now worse than flawed, because the steel industry has changed substantially. A wave of mergers has rationalized some of the old national champions, and the alleged oversupply of steel has disappeared in the face of exploding demand from developing countries.

DOJ_NMG_0080901

You can see this transformation in the steel companies' own statements. When they are lobbying senators such as Bayh, the steel guys plead that they are poor and weak and hungry. But when they are addressing investors on Wall Street, they boast that steel is scarce and that they can charge what they want for it.

If there is now a sellers' market in steel, why does the Commerce Department assert that lifting the tariff would trigger dumping? It's nice that you asked, because the answer is hilarious. The department's practice, in sunset reviews such as this one, is to rely on its original analysis -- and never mind that this dates from more than a decade ago, when the steel industry looked utterly different.

Wait, it gets better. The steel lobby has been running newspaper advertisements citing another Commerce finding: that lifting the tariff would allow foreign steel into the country at prices 10 to 36 percent below normal value. But that 36 percent margin is a fraud. The Commerce Department applied it to Nippon Steel because Nippon failed to cooperate with its review, not because Nippon is selling 36 percent below cost. During the previous go-round, when Nippon did cooperate, Commerce found a dumping margin of just 2.5 percent.

Why did Nippon refuse to cooperate with Commerce in the latest review? Nice question again: because Nippon had entered an alliance with one of the top producers in the United States and did not want to compete with its partner. In other words, consolidation generated the fraudulent 36 percent margin, but the margin is nonetheless used by the steel lobby to pretend that it remains as weak as in the pre-consolidation era.

Bayh is not the only senator to take dictation from the steel lobby. When the sunset hearing convenes at the International Trade Commission tomorrow, the steel lobby will present a petition from Sens. Arlen Specter and Jay Rockefeller, co-signed by perhaps 10 others. But Bayh stands out because centrists like him have traditionally been pro-trade and because his sights are set on the White House. Presidential aspirants are supposed to champion the national interest, not special interests.

smallaby@washpost.com

Why Don't Americans Like To Vote? Politics Are Only One Reason (WSJ)

By Cynthia Crossen

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

If you're an American who is not planning to vote Nov. 7, join the crowd. In the past few decades, less than 40% of eligible voters in the U.S. have bothered to cast ballots in midterm elections.

Your forebears would be ashamed. In late-19th-century midterm elections, turnout ranged from 65% to 78%. For presidential elections, almost 80% of the nation's eligible -- rich and poor, educated and illiterate -- voted. In 1888, 10 states had turnouts of more than 90%. Eight years later, Indiana voters set a record with 97% casting ballots.

Then, in the early 20th century, turnout began falling precipitously. By 1920, less than half of the voting-age population made it to the polls on Election Day. "The drop in voting was nationwide, substantial and cumulative," wrote Mark Lawrence Kornbluh, author of "Why America Stopped Voting." It was also unprecedented, both in America and other Western democracies. Americans, it seemed, no longer prized their right to vote.

But the new nonvoters were only partly to blame for their disengagement. A century ago, a raft of new state laws, supported by leaders across the political spectrum from conservatives to progressives, transformed the idea and act of voting so radically that hundreds of thousands of people dropped out of the political system. Many of them -- and their children -- would never return.

A 19th-century man (in most states, women weren't enfranchised until 1920) could decide to vote on the spur of the moment, pick up a simple ballot from party headquarters and drop it at the poll on Election Day, where his like-minded neighbors would give him a cheer and perhaps a beer. No preregistration was required, no taxes, no proof of residency, literacy or even citizenship. If, like most people then, he was a party man, his vote might earn him a reward -- a small cash gift or even better, a job with the post office.

Election day was rowdy and festive, a thrilling climax to a political campaign that featured bonfires, barbecues, parades, torchlight rallies and passionate oratory. Politics were social and recreational at a time when there wasn't much other public entertainment. More than 20% of people were actively involved in campaigning. "Political matters were not complex, intangible and remote, but simple, concrete and directly related to the concerns of daily life," wrote Paul Kleppner in his 1982 book, "Who Voted?"

Newspapers covered little besides politics. The races were often close -- the presidency changed hands in every election between 1876 and 1896 -- and the differences between the two parties seemed enormous. People wore their allegiances proudly. "We love our parties as we love our churches and our families," said a New Hampshire senator in 1885.

DOJ_NMG_0080902

But many people thought the political parties, which basically ran the elections, were too powerful and corrupt -- that the government should administer elections, and ballots should be secret so party leaders couldn't monitor their flocks' choices. Party symbols, like the elephant and donkey, would no longer appear on ballots, creating a de facto literacy test. The practice of rewarding loyal voters with cash on Election Day was widely outlawed. Competitive exams replaced patronage in awarding government jobs.

And citizens would no longer be able to depend on their party officials to vouch for their eligibility. Voters would have to register themselves in person, well ahead of the election, usually during working hours. Some states even required voters to register every year. Preregistration "increased the costs of participation to the individual and priced out of the system... marginally involved citizens," noted Mr. Kleppner. After a registration law was passed, for example, the number of voters in Philadelphia dropped from about 385,000 to about 251,000.

Victor Rosewater, a Republican politician, wrote in 1928, "Much of the seeming lethargy" among voters "is chargeable to the hurdles which, by our registration laws, we put in the way of voting -- absurd laws that make it hard to vote instead of facilitating voting."

Other broad social trends also damped the electoral spirit. Americans were leaving their small towns, where social ties often reinforced their political biases. Candidates for office began using radio, rather than rallies, to spread their messages, making voters more passive. With the proliferation of other recreational activities -- spectator sports, vaudeville, movies -- Americans no longer "needed to look to politics for escape," Mr. Kornbluh said. And when women began voting in national elections, they voted at a lower rate than men.

Many scholars believe that lower voter turnout was an unintended consequence of much-needed electoral reform. Others think it was calculated. "A primary cause of the decline in turnout at the turn of the century was deliberate disenfranchisement," wrote Michael J. Avey in his 1989 study, "The Demobilization of American Voters." "Changes in election laws were clearly focused on particular segments that the political elites wanted out of the political process."

Mr. Kleppner came to a similar conclusion. The goal of election reform was to make it difficult for some citizens to vote. "That objective was cloaked in culturally acceptable rhetoric, emphasizing electoral 'purity' and, above all, progress."

A Tale Of Two GOPs (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

In the Ohio governor's race, Ken Blackwell is trailing his Democratic competitor, Ted Strickland, by double digits. Save a last-minute miracle, Mr. Blackwell will lose the governor's mansion, and so end 16 years of GOP dominance.

In the Florida governor's race, Charlie Crist is leading his Democratic competitor, Jim Davis, by double digits. Save a last-minute misstep, Mr. Crist is set to give the state GOP a third term in the governor's mansion, overseeing a strong Republican legislative majority.

Their respective failure and success is not ideological: Messrs. Blackwell and Crist are both running on the same agenda of tax cuts, fiscal responsibility and broad government reform. This, instead, is a story of the state parties behind them. In Florida, Republicans have spent the past eight years keeping their promises to voters; in Ohio the GOP forgot what "promise" meant somewhere in the '90s. The tale of these two GOPs offers broader lessons for congressional Republicans, who are facing a rout this fall.

That this election is a referendum on the entire Republican philosophy is the standard line so far this year. Democrats from Nancy Pelosi to Chuck Schumer argue that voters who vote blue are sending a message that they are tired of Republicans' "extreme" views on national security, taxes or social policy.

Quite the opposite, really. If voters are unhappy with Republicans, it's because the party hasn't lived up to its own principles. In the Capitol, in Ohio, and in plenty of places between and beyond, the party that promised to reform government has become the party of government.

Take Ohio. Republicans have practiced one-party rule in the state since 1994 -- more than enough time to lose one's principles. Former Gov. George Voinovich set the standard in 1992 by breaking his word and signing tax hikes. His successor, Bob Taft, with the help of the GOP legislature, in 2003 broke pledges not to raise taxes without voter permission. Some $3 billion in tax increases later, Ohio jumped to fourth place in the rankings for state and local tax burdens. (It was 23rd in 1994, when the GOP took over.) Over their first 10 years in power, Republicans increased Ohio's general operating budget by 71% -- the highest increase in the nation.

The Taft and Spend strategy socked it to the Ohio economy. Its gross state product grew a measly 1% between 2004 and 2005, while Ohio lost 150,000 jobs between 2000 and 2005. Unemployment levels have hovered above the national average. If corruption is the product of big, unconstrained government, it was no surprise to watch the GOP engulfed by scandals that swept up everyone from Mr. Taft to Congressman Bob Ney. By November of last year, Mr. Taft's approval rating was 6.5%; if anyone had been keeping track, the legislature may have scored even lower.

DOJ_NMG_0080903

Mr. Blackwell didn't sign onto any of this. While the rest of his party was riding down the big-government river, the secretary of state was pushing a voter initiative to create a constitutional limit on spending. He's been running this year on tax cuts, charter schools and privatizing the Ohio Turnpike. He hasn't been touched by the scandals.

"There hasn't been a bigger critic of the Taft administration than Ken Blackwell," says Ken Blackwell . . . again and again. Voters can't find it in themselves to make the distinction. The Ohio Democratic Party understands that better than anyone, and routinely refers to its opponent as "Ken Taftwell." Mr. Strickland is so good at keeping the focus on the failed GOP, nobody has noticed he's a fan of the very tax-and-spend policies that landed Republicans in trouble in the first place.

But now look to Florida. Jeb Bush came to office in 1999 touting a sweeping reform agenda of the sort that gives Ms. Pelosi the "extremist" fits. More to the point, the governor, with the support of a Republican legislature, has instituted most of it.

Florida Republicans have passed tax cuts every year of the eight Mr. Bush has held office -- a whopping $19 billion, including the elimination of the infamous "intangibles" tax, levied on investments. While Florida's budget has grown at a rapid clip, Mr. Bush vetoed more than $2.1 billion in wasteful spending, earning him the nickname "Veto Corleone" among frustrated state lobbyists. He's trimmed 11,000 state jobs.

Tort reform? Did it. Overhauling the child welfare system? Done. Florida has led the way in greater education accountability and school voucher programs; test scores, especially among minorities, are on the rise. The state won federal permission for the most dramatic Medicaid reforms in the country, the first to inject private competition into the system.

Florida today has the highest rate of job creation in the country, and an unemployment rate of 3.3%. It's bond rating hit triple A. Revenue is pumping into the state coffers, giving Florida $6.4 billion in reserves. Gov. Bush's approval rating stands at 55%. Even the House Democratic leader, Dan Gelber, admitted his chief nemesis was a "rock star."

Mr. Crist, the state attorney general, promises more of the same, and voters have no reason to doubt him. He's already demonstrated reform bona fides as the state education commissioner who helped push through the governor's school reforms. He's promised further tax cuts, and is zeroing in on voter anger over double-digit property tax hikes. Mr. Crist has been blowing past Mr. Davis in fundraising and in opinion polls.

If congressional Republicans are facing a rout come November, it's in no small part because they've been headed down the Ohio highway. A few Supreme Court appointments and tax cuts aside, Republicans have largely abandoned the reform agenda that swept them to power in 1994. Their zeal has instead been directed at retaining power, which explains the earmarking epidemic and the Abramoff corruption that followed. Reform of Medicare and Social Security, the death tax, immigration, health care -- all fell off the map.

Democrats would certainly call this agenda extreme, but it was never the existence of the platform that angered voters. It was Republicans' failure to act on it.

Ms. Strassel is a member of the Journal's editorial board based in Washington.

Iraq: A Growing Body Count (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron

Newsweek, October 16, 2006

Iraqi doctors who helped compile the latest survey on civilian fatalities since 2003 came close to becoming statistics themselves. The survey, conducted jointly by Johns Hopkins, MIT and Baghdad's Al Mustansiriya University, said 600,000 Iraqis have died violently since just before the U.S. invasion (31 percent killed by Coalition troops; the rest in sectarian violence). President George W. Bush recently put the figure at 30,000; other estimates have ranged up to 300,000. The actual number is impossible to fix; estimates are just that—estimates.

Dr. Gilbert Burnham, of the Center for Refugee and Disaster Response at Johns Hopkins, says the methodology of the study he oversaw is standard practice. It involved teams of Iraqi doctors visiting more than 1,800 households to ask about fatalities and view death certificates. Surveying became dangerous. "On several occasions, members of our teams were grabbed by militias and taken to their commanders," Burnham told NEWSWEEK. "Coalition checkpoints, because of the rules of engagement, were also dicey affairs." The doctors wore white robes, and some draped stethoscopes over the necks to stand out as medical personnel.

The figure, disputed by some researchers as too high (the Iraqi Health Ministry itself cites 150,000 dead), represents about 2.5 percent of Iraq's population—more than 15,000 fatalities a month. By comparison, 10 percent of Vietnam's population was killed during America's decadelong war there. Administration officials said the study, published in the medical journal The Lancet, was timed to hurt the GOP in the midterm election. "There's no political motivation in this," says Burnham. "I feel very confident in the numbers."

DOJ_NMG_0080904

Great Candidates? That's Debatable (NYT)

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

This year in New York, when it comes to debates, the magic number seems to be two. Senator Hillary Clinton, who refused to debate her primary opponent at all, has agreed to two debates with John Spencer, the Republican former mayor of Yonkers. The Democratic front-runner for governor, Eliot Spitzer, agreed to two debates with the Republican candidate, John Faso. The Democratic candidate to succeed Mr. Spitzer as attorney general, Andrew Cuomo, agreed to appear at two debates with Jeanine Pirro, the Republican former Westchester County district attorney, but seems likely to sit out a third already agreed to by Ms. Pirro.

We'd like to see more. Candidates for statewide office should face each other in different parts of the state, in debates centering on different topics. It's not as if the other demands on their time — fund-raising, handshaking and giving the same speech over and over to friendly audiences — were too important to be infringed upon.

The real disappointment this year, however, is the Democratic state comptroller, Alan Hevesi, who is refusing debates altogether. Mr. Hevesi did not even budge after his Republican opponent, Christopher Callaghan, uncovered misuse of government resources that required Mr. Hevesi to repay the state more than $80,000. Mr. Hevesi is way ahead of Mr. Callaghan, but we can't help wondering if his reluctance to face the opposition is more a reflection of weakness than strength.

Left, Right And Religion: A Double Standard (USAT)

By Patrick Hynes And Jeremy Lott

USA Today, October 16, 2006

Should our laws be based on the Ten Commandments? How much religion in government is too much? When does legitimate participation by the pious in civic life take on troubling theocratic overtones? These are questions that conservative religious leaders wish the press would put to them.

In our political tradition, most evangelicals and other conservative Christians today are really moderates. They want a government that is non-sectarian without being hostile to organized religion and people of faith. That's a whole lot closer to what the Founders had in mind than the officially godless public square advocated by the American Civil Liberties Union.

What's more, the creation of the religious right was largely a function of the courts and politicians pushing the boundaries the other way. Evangelicals were moved to civic activism because the IRS threatened to revoke the tax-exempt status of private Christian schools; because the U.S. Supreme Court removed abortion from the political process; because mentions of the Almighty began to be scrubbed from valedictory addresses for fear that someone, somewhere might take offense. Today, the term "goddamn" is treated as protected speech, but remove the "damn" and watch the lawsuits roll in.

So evangelicals did the only responsible thing they could in a democracy. They organized and reached out. They found allies in churchgoing Roman Catholics, mainline Protestants, Jews and even some agnostics who believed that religion plays a vital role in holding society together. In this they were not so different from the civil rights leaders of the past, whose rallying cry was the God-given dignity of every American. The new coalition grew over time to the point that the religious right (or "values voters," if you prefer) became the single largest voting bloc in American politics.

That fact is intolerable to many intellectuals.

After the 2004 election, historian Garry Wills compared conservative Christians to jihadists on the op-ed page of The New York Times.

In a recent monograph, former senator and Democratic presidential candidate Gary Hart claimed to know exactly what "today's religious right has in mind." They want to "return America to a pre-Enlightenment age, an age in which the church, in this case in the form of one wing of evangelical Protestantism, dictates terms to the political process and sets the boundaries of what can and cannot be legislated and regulated by the state."

This sort of suspicion and insinuation makes it all the more difficult for the pious to participate in politics. Worse, critics such as Dartmouth College's Lucas Swaine, an assistant professor of government, have demanded that Christians not frame their arguments with reference to the Bible, a book that millions of Americans believe to be the inspired word of God, because that wouldn't square with "public reason." And any pronouncements on "values" are treated with scorn, at best.

It must be rough. Even so, we think Christian conservatives should take solace in the fact that most of their critics don't mean a word of it.

As proof, we offer Exhibit A: the religious left. No comparable group of political activists has received as much news media attention since the last election.

According to the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life, religious lefties are about 7% of the electorate. They are called on regularly by Democratic politicians seeking to win over values voters.

DOJ_NMG_0080905

What's interesting is that leaders of the religious left have not been hit with a similar and constant charge of "theocracy." This despite the fact that religious lefties articulate public policy positions in the context of the Bible and frame their political entreaties in the moral "values" language we are accustomed to hearing from Christian conservatives.

Think back to 2002, when the Evangelical Environmental Network launched the "What Would Jesus Drive?" campaign. It wasn't a joke. It was an attempt by the religious left to convince Christian voters that "transportation is a moral issue" and that they should therefore "advocate for government policies," including higher fuel economy standards and more public transportation. As with cars, so with a whole lot of other things. This small but loud minority wants to remake America with its own interpretation of Christ's teachings.

The Rev. Jim Wallis, author of the bestselling God's Politics: Why the Right Gets It Wrong and the Left Doesn't Get It, insists that federal and state budgets are "moral documents." He argues that national and state legislative priorities ought to comport with "God's vision of a good society offered to us by the prophet Isaiah." For you sleep-in-on-Sunday types, he means Robin Hood-like government policies that shake down the wealthy and fete the poor.

In fact, one initiative that was championed by Wallis and his fellow (oh, let's call them) Leftwing Theocrats might help to explain how misunderstood and close to the mainstream the religious right actually is. In 2003, Alabama Gov. Bob Riley decided his state's tax and education systems were decidedly un-Christian. He wanted to cut income taxes for the poor, hike the top marginal rates for the well-off, raise property and luxury taxes, and use the estimated $1.2 billion in additional revenue to boost teacher salaries and scholarships to state schools. Riley tried to convince voters to go along with these changes by saying Jesus would vote for "the least among us." He campaigned for his plan by appealing to churches and church leaders, many of whom decided to campaign for the governor's initiative. The people who normally fret about mixing church and state were beside themselves … with glee. Maybe Riley could finally draft the Bible Belt into the service of enlightened public policy. Then-New Republic editor Peter Beinart called him "that rarest of creatures: A genuinely inspiring politician."

Most churchgoing Alabamians didn't see it that way. Their rejection of Jesus-flavored progressivism at the ballot box was in keeping with how a majority of Americans think through these issues. Americans have proved willing to grant some authority to religious leaders in matters of faith and morals, and rightly so. But they are more skeptical when it comes to ceding control of the economy to people who draw paychecks from the not-for-profit sector.

The religious left is usually given a respectful hearing. That's a good thing. After all, this is a democracy in which people can make up their own minds about such things. But the same deference should be given to the arguments and ideas of religious conservatives.

Critics are out of line for lambasting the religious right for advocating their beliefs, and they'd be just as wrong blasting the religious left. Yet for liberal and secular pundits, this has been a one-way street.

It's time to give the "Theocracy!" catcalls a rest.

Faith-Based Profits (NYT)

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Mary Rosati, a novice training to be a nun in Toledo, Ohio, says that after she received a diagnosis of breast cancer, her mother superior dismissed her. If Ms. Rosati had had a nonreligious job, she might have won a lawsuit against her diocese (which denies the charge). But a federal judge dismissed her suit under the Americans With Disabilities Act, declining to second-guess the church's "ecclesiastical decision."

Ms. Rosati's story is one of many that Diana Henriques told in a recent Times series examining the fast-changing legal status of churches and religious-affiliated institutions. The series showed that the wall between church and state is being replaced by a platform that raises religious organizations to a higher legal plane than their secular counterparts.

Day care centers with religious affiliations are exempted in some states from licensing requirements. Churches can expand in ways that would violate zoning ordinances if a nonreligious builder did the same thing, and they are permitted, in some localities, to operate lavish facilities, like state-of-the-art gyms, without paying property taxes.

Some of the most disturbing stories, like Ms. Rosati's, involve employment discrimination. Ms. Henriques told of a New Mexico rabbi who was dismissed after developing Parkinson's disease and found himself blocked from suing, and of nurses in a 44,000-employee health care system operated by the Seventh Day Adventists barred from joining unions.

Religious institutions should be protected from excessive intrusion by government. Judges should not tell churches who they have to hire as ministers, or meddle in doctrinal disputes. But under pressure from politically influential religious groups, Congress, the White House, and federal and state courts have expanded this principle beyond all reason. It is increasingly being applied to people, buildings and programs only tangentially related to religion.

In its expanded form, this principle amounts to an enormous subsidy for religion, in some cases violating the establishment clause of the First Amendment. It also undermines core American values, like the right to be free from job discrimination. It puts secular entrepreneurs at an unfair competitive disadvantage. And it deprives states and localities of much-needed tax revenues, putting a heavier burden on ordinary taxpayers.

DOJ_NMG_0080906

Like most special-interest handouts, these privileges exist in large part because the majority is not aware, or is not being heard. With property taxes growing ever more burdensome, it is likely that localities will start to give religious exemptions closer scrutiny. People who care about discrimination-free workplaces, the right to unionize and children's safety should also start to push back.

In a few places, at least, that has started. After Texas exempted religious day care centers and drug-treatment programs from state licensing, a study found that the "alternatively accredited" facilities had 10 times the rate of abuse and neglect of the others, and several were investigated. In 2001, the Texas Legislature, no enemy of organized religion, did the right thing and ended the exemption.

The New Finger On The Nuclear Button (USNEWS)

By Thomas Omestad

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

North Korea proclaimed it part of a "great leap forward." But to most, it looked like a huge step back. Last week's announced test explosion of an atomic bomb deep inside a North Korean mountain tunnel heralds an ominous new era in northeast Asia. It also, arguably, marks a historic policy failure-one decades in the making-that risks tragic consequences far beyond the Korean peninsula.

If the seismic event detected around the world is confirmed as a nuclear blast-and so far it has not been-the impoverished, hunger-ridden North will have managed to join the elite global club of declared nuclear powers. In the amoral logic of nuclear weapons, that may well confer more staying power to the hard-line regime. And it will put more pressure on its neighbors-especially Japan and South Korea-to eventually consider going nuclear. The problem of separating North Korea from its nuclear arms and ambitions, in other words, has just gotten a lot more difficult. "This is a whole new world," worries Michael Green, a former Bush administration national security official now with Georgetown University and the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "There is no example of rolling back a rogue state to rid it of nuclear weapons."

Sanctions. North Korea's latest move triggered uncommonly swift action at the United Nations Security Council, which plans to castigate the North and last week debated how far to go with sanctions. The toughest measures advocated by the Bush administration-to curtail suspect financial transactions with North Korea and force inspections of cargo heading into and out of the country-are opposed by China and Russia. Their argument: Pyongyang would see such interdictions as an act of war.

Hanging over these developments is some uncertainty about just what, exactly, North Korea did. U.S. spy planes last week cruised over the Sea of Japan, armed with sensors to detect radiation and other signatures of an atomic explosion. More will follow. Seismic sensors indicated a subkiloton explosion-unexpectedly small and possibly indicative of a faulty test or design. Or even of a massive conventional bomb portrayed as atomic. Another explanation: that the mountain cavern muffled the blast. The working assumption, an intelligence official tells U.S. News, is that it was a nuclear test, albeit "more a fizzle than a pop."

The explosion, in any event, has sparked an election-year scrap over President Bush's policy on North Korea-a policy reflecting a precarious balance between hawks who promote regime change and others who favor engagement. Some administration hard-liners contend that a nuclear test would be a "clarifying" event, affirming North Korea's status as an international outlaw and bringing countries like China and Russia closer to Bush's preference for pressuring Pyongyang. But, as it has before, Pyongyang seemed almost driven to defy Washington's warnings. Not surprisingly, as a senior U.S. official noted, "we're not fond of using the words red line."

"Stalker state." Democrats charge that Bush's approach has been a strategic blunder, with North Korea having expanded its plutonium stash from enough for one or two bombs at the start of his administration to enough for about a dozen now-all while refusing to allow direct talks with the North outside of six-nation nuclear negotiations. Bush blamed Kim's "intransigence" for the collapse of those negotiations, denying any failure of U.S. policy. Administration officials said that the test had deepened suspicion among advisers that North Korea-which has pursued nuclear technology for decades-intends to keep an arsenal regardless of what inducements are dangled. For its part, the North claims that it still wants a denuclearized Korean peninsula.

When Outlaws Get The Bomb (TIME)

By Bill Powell

Time, October 16, 2006

The tremor out of the far north of the People's Democratic Republic of Korea was unremarkable. It registered a magnitude 4.2, a light earthquake. Its significance had to be declared by its perpetrator, the unpredictable regime of Kim Jong Il. North Korea, one of the poorest and most hermetic nations on earth, was claiming a successful underground nuclear bomb test and entry into the once exclusive club of nuclear powers as member No. 9. "More fizzle than pop," said a U.S. intelligence source dismissively, though he conceded the blast was likely to have been nuclear. A sniffer plane would later pick up hints of radiation in the atmosphere. Days of diplomatic consternation ensued at Pyongyang's announcement, and after stops and starts, the U.N. Security Council imposed sanctions on North Korea, demanding that it dismantle its nuclear-arms program. It also banned the sale of conventional weaponry and luxury goods to the country. Pointing at Washington as its nemesis, Pyongyang said any increased American military pressure would be deemed a declaration of war.

DOJ_NMG_0080907

Welcome to the bad new world. As crude as the North Korean blast was, it punctuated a scary fact: the rules that governed the nuclear road during the cold war and its immediate aftermath have become irrelevant, replaced by the law of the jungle--every state, rogue or otherwise, for itself. The risk now, says former Clinton Administration Defense Department official Graham Allison, is the emergence of a more dangerous nuclear age. Pyongyang's test, says Allison, threatens to set off a "cascade" of nations seeking the ultimate weapon. "The North Korean test blew a hole in the nonproliferation regime of Northeast Asia," says Allison. "I think this is bad news for the country, bad news for the region, bad news for the world."

What we have now is not a tight club of nuclear powers with interlocking interests and an appreciation for the brutal doctrine of "mutually assured destruction" but an unpredictable host of potential Bomb throwers: a Stalinist Bomb out of unstable North Korea; a Shi'ite Bomb out of Iran; a Sunni Bomb out of Pakistan; and, down the road, possibly out of Egypt and Saudi Arabia as well; and, of course, an al-Qaeda Bomb out of nowhere. Israel is a nuclear power already. And Turkey may just decide it had better be too. Even Japan and South Korea could eventually move toward the Bomb, if they feel the U.S. nuclear umbrella begins to fray in East Asia. What are the consequences for the U.S. and the rest of the world? Are we in an era of barely controlled proliferation, in which countless nations must at least consider the possibility of going nuclear? Or are those fears, in the wake of the North Korean test, overblown? Is there still time to manage the situation?

THE CASCADE STARTS HERE

The North Korean incident impetus to what appears to be a determined push by Iran to acquire the capability to produce its own nuclear bomb. Tehran insists it is interested only in a civilian nuclear program for energy purposes. The main outside players--the U.S., the European Union, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)--are increasingly skeptical about those claims but thus far have been powerless to do much about it. Western intelligence agencies assume Iran could become the next nuclear power if it proceeds undeterred with its clandestine program. Like North Korea, Iran is a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT), the diplomatic edifice erected in 1970 precisely to deter countries from going nuclear. (Pyongyang formally withdrew from the NPT in 2003.) The North Korean test, says General Giora Eiland, Israel's former National Security Adviser, means "Iran will reach the obvious conclusion--that nobody will stop them."

"If Iran goes nuclear militarily," says an Egyptian official, "others will not sit idly by." The official says Turkey would think seriously about going nuclear, and if "Iran, Israel and Turkey are all nuclear, the Arab states would feel they have no choice but to follow. Forget about eradicating poverty, all efforts will go into acquiring nuclear technology." In a private memo he wrote on May 1, which was reported in a Bob Woodward article in the Washington Post on Oct. 8, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld noted that at least two Middle Eastern states--which he did not name--have been thinking about developing nuclear weapons. In all likelihood, he was referring to Egypt--which has a civilian nuclear program for its energy needs--and Saudi Arabia. The leaders in the Arab world have made due note of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's success in using the pursuit of nuclear power as a way to rally popular support.

When Pyongyang declared the success of its test, Japan swore it would continue to abjure nuclear arms. At a minimum, however, the incident will surely spur Japan's efforts to develop a missile-defense system in cooperation with the U.S. That, in turn, is bound to anger China and could push Beijing to spend more on nuclear weapons to ensure that Japan doesn't feel invulnerable. An icy East Asian cold war and a very hot arms race between Japan and China are a greater prospect now than they were a week ago.

And while Tokyo seems sincere about not going nuclear now--the antinuclear sentiment in that country, for obvious reasons, runs strong and deep--there are limits to how secure Japan may come to feel under the U.S. nuclear umbrella. If North Korea proves capable of putting a nuclear warhead on a missile that can reach the U.S.--it already has short-range missiles capable of reaching Tokyo--the strategic game changes. If North Korea could nuke Japan, or blackmail it, while credibly threatening to strike the U.S. with a nuclear warhead, would Japanese officials truly believe the U.S. would retaliate against Pyongyang--and risk a North Korean nuke landing in Honolulu? The day may come when Tokyo will have to make that precise calculation.

WHAT ABOUT AL-QAEDA?

Ashton Carter, a counterproliferation expert at Harvard, believes the risk of nuclear proliferation out the back door of a rogue state is increasing. North Korea or Iran could conceivably sell a bomb to a terrorist group, and Osama bin Laden is unlikely to be put off by traditional methods of deterring a nuclear attack. That means plugging the source. Says Derek D. Smith, author of Deterring America: Rogue States and the Proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction: "If you can't deter the terrorist organizations, you'd better be sure to deter whoever is supplying them."

DOJ_NMG_0080908

Reacting to the blast, President Bush said, "The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action." That was an explicit embrace of Graham Allison's concept of "nuclear accountability." Thus, according to Allison, if Kim Jong Il were to sell a weapon to bin Laden and that weapon were used against the U.S. or one of its allies, then the principle would require the U.S. to "treat this precisely like a nuclear-tipped-missile attack" and retaliate against Pyongyang. "That danger [of North Korean proliferation] has always been there," says Michael Green, until last year a senior staff member on the National Security Council. "But North Korea has a mailing address, and they know it. If there was a nuclear explosion somewhere, it would probably be traced back to them, and their country would be destroyed. That's a deterrent."

The Pentagon and the IAEA both devote considerable resources to the task of identifying the source of any bomb that is tested. Still, tracking the source of nuclear material is a complex, difficult endeavor--one that is hardly guaranteed success. To this day, there are questions about the origins of the material that Pakistani nuclear scientist A.Q. Khan sold to Libya. Among the material that Libya turned over after it abandoned its program was a precursor to highly enriched uranium--uranium hexafluoride. U.S. intelligence agencies believed it came from North Korea but spent months trying to prove it. They still haven't.

THE CASE FOR STAYING CALM

It is perhaps surprising at a moment when one of the world's most isolated and despotic regimes says it has gone nuclear that some current and former security strategists view Kim Jong Il's move as far less than a disaster. No one, to be sure, regards it as a good thing. But it is possible to view the test--and the state of play in the nuclear world more broadly--in more apocalyptic terms than is warranted. Many question, for example, Allison's argument that North Korea will unleash a sort of nuclear domino effect--with one country after another scrambling to get nukes. Take, for example, the nonnuclear countries in East Asia closest to North Korea: South Korea, Japan and Taiwan. All are wealthy, technologically sophisticated countries that could go nuclear in a heartbeat. (South Korea had a clandestine nuclear-arms program in the mid-1970s.) But all reside snugly under the so-called U.S. nuclear umbrella--any attack by Pyongyang would bring the full destructive force of the U.S. military in response. And last week all swore off any notion that North Korea's test would make them rethink their policy of eschewing nukes.

Indeed, since the end of the cold war in 1991, not all the news on the nuclear front has been bad. South Africa, Ukraine and, more recently, Libya all willingly gave up nuclear weapons or the pursuit of them. Brazil and Argentina formally abandoned any thought of going nuclear. "I would also disagree with the basic premise that the pressure is all in the direction of going nuclear," says Mark Fitzpatrick, a proliferation expert at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. The North Korea test, he says, will have only marginal effects on how other countries view their own security and the role nukes should play in them.

And some are dusting off the cold war theory that nukes are inherently stabilizing. "Nuclear weapons increase the international responsibility of every state that has acquired them," says a British general. Even Pakistan, roundly condemned as a rogue for its nuclear test in 1998 (conducted in response to India's tests held a couple of weeks earlier), is now viewed, as Fitzpatrick puts it, as a "responsible" nuclear state. It has not gone to war with India, its archrival, and--precisely because war now brings risk of nuclear annihilation on both sides--that prospect is less likely than it was before Pakistan joined India. Deterrence worked during the cold war, and it can work now.

MANAGING THE NEW RISK

What, then, can be done to rein in countries like North Korea? Pyongyang is especially prickly and dangerous, and already holds 10 million residents in the South Korean capital as virtual hostages. Seoul is only 30 miles from the border and has always lived under the threat of immediate destruction from North Korean firepower. Says a senior U.S. military officer: "[It is] within easy and rapid range of perhaps 10,000 artillery tubes with a 57-second flight time. That can cause World War II--size casualties." And that's without nuclear weapons. Now, unless the U.S. goes back to the bargaining table and somehow entices North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons--something most experts believe is unlikely--deterrence and containment become even more important. "The tactical game with North Korea--trying to get them to stand down their nuclear program--is now pretty much over," says Henry Sokolski, a former Defense Department nonproliferation expert in George H.W. Bush's Administration. "Now it's a strategic game, containing them and waiting for the regime to collapse."

The international community can also make it difficult for rogue nuclear states to make a buck off their new technology. To its credit, the Bush Administration has implemented the Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI), a program now involving about 80 countries. They work to interdict material and equipment they believe is headed for use in the production of weapons of mass destruction. The U.S. and its allies credit improved intelligence sharing and cooperation for successes like the October 2003 interdiction of the German-owned ship BBC China, which was intercepted carrying centrifuge components to Libya. But there are still huge gaps. The PSI relies on "actionable" intelligence, and Representative Pete Hoekstra, chairman of the House

DOJ_NMG_0080909

Intelligence Committee, acknowledges that U.S. human-intelligence assets in "hard targets" like North Korea are sorely lacking. Says Derek Smith: "It really comes down to having the intelligence capability to be able to determine which modes of transferral are going to be used, so you know which ship to go after. Certainly, we're not going to be able to put a blockade in place on air, sea and land all around North Korea."

China, which has not signed on to the PSI, has been a valuable partner. This summer North Korea conducted conventional- missile tests--in defiance of its chief patron Beijing and the rest of the world. And now China, which has sold conventional missiles to Iran in the past, is stepping up efforts to deter Pyongyang from moving missile and missile-related technology to Iran. A high-ranking diplomat in East Asia tells TIME that China has denied overflight rights to North Korean aircraft bound for Tehran.

Overshadowing everything is the reality that this is a different world from the one that existed during the cold war--and the established powers are at sea in trying to cope with it. Defense intellectuals like Thérèse Delpech, director of strategic affairs at the Atomic Energy Commission in France, reject classic deterrence theory as a model for today's nuclear age. "The new actors, such as Ahmadinejad or Kim, are much more prone to act [impulsively] rather than like the United States or the Soviet Union" during the cold war, she asserts. And even if that's not true--Iran's Ayatullahs and Kim may want nukes primarily to secure their hold on power--there is little question that the world faces big problems dealing with the new nuclear challenges. "The United Nations keeps pushing back deadlines, and the matters at hand get more and more serious," says Delpech. "There has to be the will among the principle powers to recognize that proliferation has to be viewed in a way that goes beyond parochial national interests."

Is there that will? The Bush Administration insists there is, and that cooperation among the Western allies will ultimately rein in North Korea and deter future nuclear wannabes like Iran. Yet that may be more hope than reality. Says Delpech: "We're now facing two very grave cases of proliferation at the same time, and we have to use this moment of condemnation to pull the [established world] powers together." But considering how long it took for the Security Council to ban the sale of luxury goods to Pyongyang, time does not appear to be on our side. [This article contains a diagram. Please see hardcopy or pdf.] NUCLEAR WORLD

North Korea is defiantly rushing to become the ninth country on earth to have the Bomb. President Bush has said the U.S. "will not tolerate" a nuclear North Korea, but containment may be the only viable option remaining

·Countries with nuclear weapons; Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) signatories

·Countries with the ability to develop nuclear weapons

·Countries with nuclear weapons; not NPT signatories ·Argentina, Brazil, Chile

·South Africa

France

Britain Israel Unconfirmed arsenal Iran Suspected program Pakistan Russia

China

North Korea Testing weapons

India

·Indonesia, Australia The U.S. and Russia control most of the world's nuclear warheads. Those stockpiles are shrinking, but other countries are pursuing nuclear weapons Deployed nuclear weapons, in thousands 1950-2000 U.S. U.S.S.R/Russia Others

Estimated nuclear stockpiles, 2005

Russia 8,800 inactive 7,200 deployed U.S. 10,315

Est. warheads

China 410 France 350 Britain 200 Israel 100-170 India 75-110 Pakistan 50-110 North Korea Unknown

Russia has about 8,800 warheads in reserve or awaiting dismantling

In addition to the known nuclear powers, North Korea says it has nuclear weapons. Iran could be next

Sources: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; Natural Resources Defense Council

U.S. Expects China To Lead On Sanctions (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, October 16, 2006

Top U.S. diplomats yesterday said they expected China to enforce sanctions unanimously passed by the U.N. Security Council to curtail North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0080910

In an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said China, which shares an 880-mile border with North Korea and is Pyongyang's principal trading partner, would shoulder the major responsibility of stopping trade with the isolated communist state. Without China's cooperation on enforcement, sanctions likely would be ineffective.

"North Korea has a long border, as you say, with China. It also has very close relations with China, but China has come a very long way in being willing to sign on to a resolution that makes China now responsible to make certain that North Korea's not trading," said Miss Rice, who leaves tomorrow for a diplomatic trip to Asia, including a stop in Beijing.

"I'm quite certain that China is going to live up to its responsibilities," she said.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, made similar comments yesterday, saying that North Korea's apparent nuclear test "had to have been humiliating to China," which had been protecting Pyongyang from international sanctions for years.

China's cutting its support "would be powerfully persuasive in Pyongyang," he said. "They've not yet been willing to do it. I think that China has a heavy responsibility here."

The final resolution passed by the Security Council on Saturday demands that North Korea scrap its nuclear-weapons program but rules out military action against the country, on the demand of the Russians and Chinese. It also orders countries to prevent North Korea from importing or exporting any material for ballistic missiles and to freeze the assets and restrict the travel of people or businesses connected to the country's nuclear and missile programs.

That resolution passed by the Security Council is weaker than an earlier version that called for mandatory searches of ships entering and leaving North Korean waters and seizures of any weapons or goods that could be used to create a nuclear weapon. China, rejected that version along with Russia.

"Let's remember, the inspections are a tool to effectuate the sanctions themselves. China voted in favor of the resolution. They eventually agreed to even broader sanctions," said Mr. Bolton on ABC's "This Week."

"This means China itself now has an obligation to make sure it complies with the resolution, and it has full national authority on its side of the border to conduct any inspections it wants," he said.

But China urged caution in a statement posted yesterday on its Foreign Ministry Web site.

"We call for relevant parties to be restrained and calm, adopt a cautious and responsible attitude to prevent the situation from worsening and break the stalemate as soon as possible so that process of the six-party talks can resume," ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said.

Miss Rice said she would discuss with China's leaders the best methods and procedures for enforcing the sanctions, adding that forcible searches on the high seas might not be the best way to handle the situation.

"I think that we don't want to get out ahead of ourselves. ... But we'll want to use [sanctions] in a way that does not enhance the possibility for open conflict," she said.

In an appearance on CNN's "Late Edition," Mr. Bolton said the U.S. "had not proposed" a blockade of North Korea.

"The overwhelming predominance of the inspections would take place in ports and at land crossings," he said.

North Korea immediately denounced the resolution, and its U.N. ambassador walked out of the council chamber after accusing its members of a "gangsterlike" action that neglects the threat that Pyongyang says is posed by the U.S.

Japan and Australia have pledged immediate enforcement of the penalties, including sending their warships, and said they were considering harsher measures on their own.

South Korea, which has taken a conciliatory approach to Pyongyang and has provided its neighbor with aid, said it would abide by the resolution's terms but did not say how. Its Unification Ministry, which handles dealings with the North, indicated that the sanctions would not affect a tourism venture and a joint industrial complex in the North, saying the "projects have nothing to do with the weapons of mass destruction program."

In Seoul last night, Russian and South Korean diplomats agreed to try to restart the six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program.

"The North Korean side several times returned to the point that the six-sided process should continue," Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Alexeyev said about his meetings Friday in Pyongyang.

But Chun Yung-woo, South Korea's main nuclear negotiator, said, "We have to see how North Korea will respond to the sanctions. After then, we can confidently talk about the diplomatic process."

The six-party talks involve the U.S., Russia, China, Japan, North Korea and South Korea.

·This article is based in part on wire service reports.

U.S. Seeks Asian Support On Squeezing Pyongyang (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080911

Armed with a United Nations resolution condemning North Korea for its apparent test of a nuclear weapon, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will head to Asia tomorrow to try to enlist Chinese and South Korean help in further isolating the North, while reassuring Japan that its alliance with the U.S. is stronger than ever.

On Saturday, the U.N. Security Council voted to ban trade with North Korea of most weapons and all luxury goods, condemning Pyongyang for last Monday's detonation, which mounting evidence suggests was a nuclear test. But, having decided on penalties, the U.S. and others must now figure out how to impose that punishment.

A fundamental disagreement remains between China, Russia and South Korea and other countries, such as the U.S. and Japan, over how tough to be on the North and its leader, Kim Jong Il. For one thing, neighbors such as South Korea and China worry they'll pay the price of a refugee crisis if the Kim regime collapses.

Some are already resisting key terms of the U.N. sanction. For example, although China voted for the penalties, its U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said afterward that Beijing found the provision allowing the boarding of ships to inspect cargo unacceptable. In South Korea, the chairman of the ruling Uri Party urged the country's leaders not to go along with cargo inspections.

China's Mr. Wang also questioned the ban on luxury goods, noting that the sanction didn't define them. "Luxury goods can mean many things for different people...if they don't have [them]," he said. For years, the North's leader, Mr. Kim, has rewarded the country's elite and military for their loyalty by providing them with cars, food and TVs, even as millions of ordinary North Koreans have lived with little food or electricity.

As it was, the resolution, which the Security Council passed in a rare Saturday meeting after days of negotiations, had already been weakened during the course of various drafts. China and Russia had objected to earlier U.S. proposals that they feared would endorse a full-blown military embargo on North Korea and serve as a pretext for potential military action.

The resolution passed Saturday demands that North Korea get rid of its nuclear weapons but bars military action against the country and limits a military embargo to heavy equipment such as ballistic missiles, aircraft, tanks and ships. As North Korea's closest ally, China also objected to language that would have authorized the U.S. and others to stop North Korean ships to search for banned products. The Security Council instead settled for less-formal language calling for "cooperative action" on cargo inspection.

The resolution does tighten restrictions on military sales to North Korea and requires states to seize funds and ban travel for officials involved in North Korea's nuclear program. And the measure increases the ability of states to inspect cargo going to and from North Korea.

Despite the watering down of Washington's original proposals, U.S. officials cheered the resolution passed Saturday, with President George W. Bush praising the "swift and tough" penalties, and repeating the longstanding U.S. offer of economic assistance for the North if it verifiably ends its nuclear-weapons program.

North Korea's U.N. representative, Pak Gil Yon, strongly protested the U.N. sanctions and repeated his country's desire for two-way discussions with the U.S. He said North Korea "would feel no need to possess even a single nuke when it is no longer exposed to the United States' threat, after it has dropped its hostile policy towards [the North], and confidences have been built between the two countries." The U.S. has rebuffed Pyongyang's calls for bilateral talks, and Saturday's resolution calls on North Korea to re-enter six-way talks with the two parties, plus China, Russia, Japan and South Korea.

U.S. officials say that a top objective of Ms. Rice's trip will be to encourage both China and South Korea to cooperate with Japan and the U.S. on monitoring cargo flows to and from the isolated communist state. The U.S. wants both countries to participate in an antiproliferation initiative that Washington launched in 2003 to crack down on the flow of nuclear materials and missile technology to countries such as North Korea and Iran.

U.S. officials now say they have picked up evidence of radioactive debris that appears to confirm that North Korea did test a nuclear device, though a final determination has yet to be made.

Ms. Rice will stop first in Japan, where the government has moved rapidly to impose its own restrictions on trade with North Korea. While there, Ms. Rice will seek to ease jitters in Tokyo over North Korea's nuclear advances and to reaffirm that the U.S. is prepared to help defend Japan from any outside attacks. The U.S. is concerned that saber-rattling in North Korea could lead Japan and others in Asia to pursue their own nuclear weapons, further destabilizing the region.

Ms. Rice will then travel to Seoul and Beijing, and possibly to Moscow on the way home. Rice aides say one theme throughout the trip will be U.S. hopes that North Korea's recent action will spur moves toward greater security cooperation in Asia, where bitter divisions, going back decades, have prevented the region from developing anything like what the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is for Europe.

"There are no existing...pan-Northeast Asian security structures there," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack. "Those are discussions that are worth having."

DOJ_NMG_0080912

While no regional gathering is planned for this trip, Ms. Rice may push for a meeting next month of Asia's major powers, plus the U.S., perhaps on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Hanoi in mid-November. The point of such a gathering would be to talk about strengthening the regional security architecture to meet the North Korean challenge, U.S. officials said.

Diplomats began talking yesterday about how to resolve the differences over the U.N. resolution's provisions and about options for carrying out the order. Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Alexeyev, t he first foreign official to visit Pyongyang after the test, arrived in South Korea yesterday to discuss what he had learned there. Meanwhile, the chief U.S. diplomat for Asia, Christopher Hill, left Washington for Japan, to be followed by Ms. Rice.

Before the vote, Chinese leaders had hosted South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun for a summit meeting on Friday. In a statement issued after the summit, the two countries said it is an "absolute necessity" to resolve the North Korean nuclear issue "through dialogue while putting the highest priority on a stable denuclearization of the Korean peninsula."

China Hedges On Enforcing N. Korea Penalties (USAT)

USA Today, October 16, 2006

The Bush administration pressed China on Sunday to help enforce sanctions that the United Nations imposed on North Korea after that country announced it had tested a nuclear weapon.

China joined the rest of the U.N. Security Council in voting 15-0 Saturday for a range of sanctions against North Korea. The impact of the vote was undercut immediately by suggestions from China that it might not help carry out inspections of ships and cargo entering and leaving North Korea.

Chinese cooperation on enforcement will be on the agenda when U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visits China, Japan and South Korea this week.

“I'm quite certain that China will live up to its responsibilities,” Rice told Fox News Sunday. “I'm quite certain that China has no interest in seeing the proliferation of dangerous materials from North Korea.”

Much of the cargo in and out of North Korea passes through China.

Rice said the sanctions might not be strong enough to persuade North Korea to return to negotiations on halting its nuclear program. “There may be other steps that will be necessary, given North Korea's behavior,” she said.

The U.N. sanctions were not tough enough for Japan. It imposed penalties of its own, including a ban on all North Korean imports. Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Japan could take further action.

John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the U.N., emphasized the importance of North Korea's traditional allies Russia and China in persuading the communist regime in Pyongyang to return to negotiations. “The pressure we hope they will apply on Pyongyang, together with these very significant sanctions … could have an impact.”

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, questioned the effectiveness of sanctions.

“The Chinese already said that they're not going to enforce inspections against goods going into North Korea,” Levin said on CNN's Late Edition. “There's no way a sanctions regime can work.”

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee told CNN, “We're not going to resolve the issue … through a sanction.”

Jack Pritchard, former U.S. envoy in talks with North Korea during President Bush's first term, said the U.N. resolution is “clearly less than what the U.S. would have liked but about the best it could hope to get.”

China and other countries want to signal North Korea that “it's not business as usual” after last week's claim of a nuclear test, Pritchard said. North Korea's closest neighbors, however, are reluctant to endorse steps that could lead to armed conflict or bring down the North Korean regime, he said.

A collapse of the regime could lead to a flood of refugees into South Korea, China and Russia, the nations that border North Korea.

Others were more upbeat about the resolution's chances of slowing North Korea's ability to amass nuclear weaponry.

Michael Green, who handled Asia matters on the White House National Security Council from 2001 to 2005, said the resolution's provisions regarding North Korean financial assets “will completely clog up North Korean bank accounts” abroad and hurt its ability to buy weapons materials.

“What the resolution will not do,” Green said, is “cause the regime to collapse or cry uncle anytime soon.”

US Expects China To Act Against N Korea (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner And Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080913

The US said on Sunday it expected China to play a decisive role in enforcing sanctions against North Korea, brushing aside suggestions that Beijing was not committed to a United Nations resolution against its reclusive ally.

The message comes just days before Condoleezza Rice, Secretary of State, heads to Japan, South Korea and China on a diplomatic mission to negotiate how Saturday's UN resolution should be enforced.

Ms Rice told Fox News Sunday on Sunday: "This is the toughest action that China has ever signed on to vis-à-vis North Korea."

Her remarks that she was "quite certain" China would live up to its responsibilities countered an earlier statement by Wang Guangya, Chinese ambassador to the UN, who said China did not approve of inspecting cargo to and from North Korea and urged restraint from "provocative steps".

John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, emphasised that China had a "heavy responsibility" to influence Pyongyang. In response to a question about China's trade with North Korea, Mr Bolton said it would be "powerfully persuasive" if China moved to cut off food and energy supplies to its neighbour.

Mr Bolton also said on ABC's This Week that the supposed nuclear test performed by North Korea last week "had to have been humiliating to China".

"After all of the efforts they've made over the years to protect North Korea, for the North Koreans in the face of all that to test had to get quite a reaction in Beijing. And I think we're still seeing that play out."

North Korea on Saturday accused the UN of acting in a "gangster-like" way in imposing the sanctions, declaring that it would not give in to the US and might even detonate another device.

The UN resolution labelled the test a "clear threat to international peace and security". It will allow countries to stop cargo going to and from North Korea to check for weapons of mass destruction (WMD) or related supplies. The resolution also bans trade in heavy conventional weapons and luxury goods and urges countries to freeze funds connected with North Korea's non-conventional arms programmes.

The South Korean government, which has traditionally been reluctant to take tough action against its neighbour for fear of antagonising or destabilising the regime of Kim Jong-il, vowed to support the resolution and urged a return to six-party talks to resolve the stand-off.

Seoul is also warming to the idea of joining, or at least supporting, the proliferation security initiative, a scheme to stop the proliferation of WMD by interdicting ships or aircraft suspected of carrying them.

Taro Aso, Japan's foreign minister, said on Fuji TV that his country was considering passing a new law to make it easier to participate in UN-led inspections on cargo moving in and out of North Korea. Japan might also use an emergency law for the first time that would allow it to provide support to US forces in areas surrounding Japan, he said.

Separately, Shinzo Abe, Japan's prime minister, said the government was considering additional unilateral sanctions should Pyongyang carry out a second nuclear test. This came as Alexander Alexeyev, Russia's deputy foreign minister and its chief negotiator in the six-party talks involving North Korea, returned from Pyongyang.

"They said that only after analysing the UN resolution would they plan the subsequent character of their actions . . . including in relation to the resumption of the six party process," he told the RIA-Novosti news agency.

U.S. Officials Call On China To Help Enforce U.N. Resolution On N. Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

One day after passage of a U.N. Security Council resolution punishing North Korea for its apparent test of a nuclear weapon, senior U.S. diplomats said yesterday that China must help enforce it and use economic leverage to compel Pyongyang to return to disarmament talks.

The resolution, passed unanimously, calls on states to prevent North Korea from selling or buying certain banned weapons and technology. But China said Saturday that Beijing would not inspect cargo entering or leaving North Korea, for fear of raising tensions in the region.

China's unwillingness to act against its longtime ally raises the stakes for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's diplomatic mission to Northeast Asia later this week. Ever since the current nuclear crisis with North Korea began in 2002, the Bush administration has relied heavily on China to use its influence with North Korea's leaders. But Beijing's caution has frequently disappointed U.S. officials.

U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John R. Bolton said on ABC's "This Week" that China had a "heavy responsibility" now that Pyongyang has detonated a nuclear device. "This test by the North Koreans had to have been humiliating to China," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0080914

Rice, who along with Bolton made the rounds of the Sunday talk shows, said on CBS's "Face the Nation," "You're going to find China carrying out its responsibilities, undoubtedly carrying it out in a way that it believes will not enhance conflict. None of us want to enhance conflict with these measures. We just want to keep North Korea from trading in dangerous materials."

U.S. officials said yesterday that they were pleased with the terms of Resolution 1718, which bans North Korean trade in materials linked to its weapons of mass destruction program, ballistic missiles, high-end conventional weapons -- including warplanes and battle tanks -- and luxury goods. It will create a U.N. committee to monitor the sanctions' effectiveness and to draw up a list of individuals and institutions linked to North Korea's weapons programs. They will be prohibited from traveling abroad, and most of their financial assets will be frozen.

China, which shares an 880-mile border with North Korea, has generally argued that pressure on its neighbor would be counterproductive. It frequently lured North Korea back to six-nation negotiations on Pyongyang's nuclear programs with tens of millions of dollars in payments -- in one case, China even provided North Korea with a glass factory.

In April 2005, when North Korea was boycotting an earlier round of the talks, China rejected a U.S. suggestion of a "technical" interruption in the supply of oil to North Korea, which imports all the oil it consumes.

U.S. officials continue to believe a fuel cutoff would be devastating to the North Korean government. Bolton said yesterday that if China were to interrupt energy supplies or other aid to North Korea, "it would be powerfully persuasive in Pyongyang."

Rice stressed on "Fox News Sunday" that the U.N. resolution passed very quickly, even though it required China to vote against its communist neighbor.

"This is the toughest action that China has ever signed onto vis-Ã -vis North Korea," she said. "It sends a very strong signal to North Korea that it is now completely isolated. You cannot underestimate how big a blow it is."

Questions Grow Over U.N. Curbs On North Korea (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

TOKYO, Monday, Oct. 16 — Questions over the effectiveness of the Security Council's punitive sanctions on North Korea for its claimed nuclear test grew Sunday, as both South Korea and China — the North's two most important trading partners — indicated that business and economic relations would be largely unaffected.

A day after the Council unanimously passed the resolution, following nearly a week of intensive diplomatic negotiations, the South Korean government said it would still pursue economic projects with North Korea, including an industrial zone and tourist resort in the North. Those projects are not explicitly covered by the Security Council resolution, but they are an important source of hard currency for the North.

China, which shares a 870-mile porous border with North Korea and is perhaps its most critical economic gateway to the outside world, said Saturday that it had no intention of stopping and inspecting cross-border shipments, as called for, but not specifically required, in the resolution. The Chinese government said nothing on Sunday about how it intended to carry out the sanctions, and American officials said they would be focused on whether the normal trade flow across the border was slowed.

The relative silence on Sunday about how the resolution would be enforced, coupled with the vagaries of the resolution itself, raised concerns that the Security Council action would not have much of an impact for the foreseeable future.

"We're in the situation where everyone is saying what they won't do, but no one has yet said what exactly they will do," said Jonathan D. Pollack, a North Korea expert at the Naval War College in Newport, R.I. "The question for the next few days is what this all means, because there is a lack of specificity in the resolution."

North Korea, which announced last Monday that it had successfully detonated a nuclear device, has denounced the resolution, accused the Security Council of gangsterism and warned that any American pressure on the North Korean government would be regarded as an act of war. But North Korea has not specified what it may do next in response.

In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that China was part of "a Security Council resolution that demands very clear cooperation of member states to make certain that dangerous goods are not getting in and out of North Korea," and added that she expected cooperation.

But in interviews on two Sunday television programs she acknowledged that exactly how China would cooperate remained unclear, and she hinted that the United States would not rush to interdict North Korean ships at sea, at least initially. Instead, she expects most searches to take place at ports, she said.

"This is a powerful tool, but it's also a tool that needs to be used carefully," she said, adding, "I don't think I want to speculate about how it's going to be used." Responding to statements by the Chinese ambassador at the United Nations that China would not interdict shipments at its border with North Korea, Ms. Rice said on "Fox News Sunday" that China's support of the resolution was effectively a pledge of "cooperation in stopping the proliferation trade with North Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0080915

She said she was “quite certain” that China would act in accordance with this objective, but she declined to offer details. The resolution approved Saturday condemning North Korea and calling for sanctions against it “came about more rapidly, perhaps, than any in recent memory of this magnitude,” Ms. Rice said on “Face the Nation” on CBS. “So there will be some matters to be worked out.”

In fact, under a loose coalition with other countries around the world known as the Proliferation Security Initiative, a few countries have already boarded ships to and from North Korea in ports throughout Asia. These countries have carried out naval exercises to practice for such interdictions. But their powers to intercept ships in international waters — except when they have permission of the owners, the captain or the country whose flag the ship is flying — have been murky, and remain so under the new Security Council resolution.

The resolution, drafted by the United States, bans trade with North Korea in materials linked with unconventional weapons, and authorizes countries to inspect cargo going into and out of the North. This last measure was diluted, however, by China’s insistence that the resolution state that countries be requested, not required, to do so.

In Japan, however, enthusiasm for the new resolution was greater. Hawkish politicians close to Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said the Japanese were prepared to assist the American military in inspecting North Korean ships despite Japan’s pacifist Constitution, and called for a debate on whether Japan should possess nuclear arms. Mr. Abe himself has said he has no intention of changing the government’s longtime ban on the weapons.

Like China, South Korea fears that inspecting North Korean ships by force could lead to a military confrontation. As a result, despite pressure from Washington, Seoul has not joined the three-year-old American-led Proliferation Security Initiative, concerned that intercepting North Korean weapons could begin such an encounter.

“We judged that the contents of the resolution of the U.N. Security Council do not directly affect the economic cooperation programs between the two Koreas, including Kaesong and Kumgang Mountain,” Choo Kyu-ho, the spokesman for the Foreign Ministry, said Sunday, referring to an industrial park and a tourist resort. “We will go ahead with the economic cooperation programs in harmony with the resolution.” Mr. Choo declined to say whether South Korea planned to proceed with long-held plans to expand the Kaesong industrial zone.

Such comments are bound to worry the Bush administration, however, because President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea told President Bush in Washington last month that a North Korean nuclear test would drastically change the South’s policy, away from engagement and toward punishment.

Some Korea experts said that with the reluctance of China and South Korea to crack down on North Korea, as well as Russia’s initial unwillingness to take a hard line against the North, it was unclear how effective the sanctions would be.

“Limited sanctions and cooperation will continue, so we’re basically in the same boat as before,” said David C. Kang, a Korea expert at Dartmouth College who is visiting Seoul. “It’s untenable globally to oppose sanctions right now. So South Korea will go along with them for a while, put some projects on hold, but resume them in a year or sooner.”

Mr. Kang added: “The sanctions are at best kabuki theater. They’re not going to have much effect on North Korea’s behavior.”

China is opposed to restricting the flow of nonmilitary goods to North Korea, which remains one of the most impoverished and isolated countries and depends on that commerce for its economic survival. Chinese border cities like Dandong and Yanji are significant trading posts where North Korean trucks line up daily, stocking up on Chinese food and consumer goods.

China is also North Korea’s biggest supplier of oil, most of it shipped by rail. While the vehicles have to pass customs inspections on both sides, there is no indication that the Chinese strictly control what is sold to North Korea.

As North Korea’s largest trading partner, China accounts for nearly 39 percent of its imports and exports, followed by South Korea, which has a 26 percent share, according to the South Korean government.

Thailand, Russia, and Japan are the North’s other significant trading partners.

Most of the China-North Korea border is demarcated by the Yalu River. While troops patrol the border on both sides, it is widely considered porous, especially in the winter months when the Yalu freezes and people on both sides can cross without fear of detection.

China’s opposition to restricting the flow of nonmilitary goods to North Korea, and what appears to be its reluctance to inspect cargo shipments in or out of the country for materials banned by the United Nations sanctions, could sharply limit their effectiveness.

The utility of seaborne inspections of North Korea cargo ships by the United States or Japan could be undermined if the North Korean government determines that it can import or export goods covered by the sanctions through Chinese ports.

Even so, Beijing agreed to punitive sanctions on North Korea for the first time, and the details of their enforcement may take longer to negotiate. Whether they will be made public remains unclear. Government officials in China typically do not provide detailed information about policies relating to North Korea or other delicate matters.

DOJ_NMG_0080916

The resolution came as somewhat of a relief in South Korea, which is caught between its fear of destabilizing the North and its need to show solidarity with its American ally.

The South Korean government's engagement policy toward the North has been fiercely attacked by the political opposition in the last week. But experts said that the government's decision to press ahead with cross-border economic projects indicated that the South would stick to its engagement policy.

"The feeling is that the engagement policy itself was not to blame for the nuclear test," said Kim Sung-han, a senior analyst at the government-financed Institute for Foreign Affairs and National Security in Seoul. "The issue is how to implement it. Should there be more elements of dialogue or reciprocity? There is the feeling that implementation was not balanced enough. From now on, the government will be more realistic in implementing the engagement policy instead of giving it up altogether."

U.S. Presses China To Influence N. Korea (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug

AP-Yahoo, October 16, 2006

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations said Sunday that China had a "heavy responsibility" to influence North Korea's behavior and urged Beijing to heed a U.N. resolution intended to punish the North for its claimed nuclear test.

John Bolton also said North Korea's Oct. 9 detonation amounted to a public humiliation for China, the North's major ally and supplier of crucial shipments of food and energy aid.

If China were to cut that support, Bolton said, it "would be powerfully persuasive in Pyongyang," the North's capital. "They've not yet been willing to do it. I think that China has a heavy responsibility here."

Bolton and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice played down suggestions that Beijing would balk at parts of Saturday's U.N. resolution against North Korea.

It demands that North Korea abandon its nuclear weapons program and orders all countries to prevent the reclusive nation from importing or exporting any material for weapons of mass destruction or ballistic missiles.

But China, which shares a long border with North Korea, said it would not go along with a call to inspect cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea to prevent any illegal trafficking in weapons.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, noting that China signed on to and voted for the resolution, said, "I'm quite certain that China is going to live up to its responsibilities."

Added Bolton: "China itself now has an obligation to make sure it complies with the resolution. We'll see what actually comes out of Beijing."

Bolton said that if North Korea continues along the path of building a nuclear arsenal, the United States will "ratchet up the pressure, make it clear that their international isolation is only going to increase, and we're going to make it, to the extent we can, impossible for them to continue the program."

President Bush is sending Rice to Asia this week on a diplomatic mission to consult with allies in the region. Rice said she will try to negotiate differences over how the resolution should be put in place.

"I understand that people are concerned about how it might work so it doesn't enhance tensions in the region, and we're perfectly willing to have those conversations," Rice said.

The North's apparent nuclear test, Bolton said, "had to have been humiliating to China. After all of the efforts they've made over the years to protect North Korea from international approbation, for the North Koreans in the face of all that to test had to get quite a reaction in Beijing. And I think we're still seeing that play out."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said Rice's comments show how the Bush administration is "living in a world of make-believe" because their foreign policy is a failure. He said U.S. involvement in Iraq has diminished America's credibility to deal with nuclear threats in North Korea and Iran.

Bolton appeared on NBC's "Meet the Press" and ABC's "This Week," while Rice and Kerry spoke on "Fox News Sunday."

'North Korea Should Be More Realistic' (WP)

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Last week the members of the United Nations selected a new secretary general -- the foreign minister of South Korea, Ban Ki Moon, 62. On Saturday in New York, Ban discussed his new role with Newsweek-Washington Post's Lally Weymouth. Excerpts:

Q: The Security Council is voting on sanctions that will include some kind of blockade and inspection of certain goods entering North Korea. How will North Korea respond?

A: North Korea has declared very defiantly that if the Security Council adopts any sanctions, they will regard this as a declaration of war. This is very worrisome and shows total disrespect of the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0080917

What role do you see for yourself as secretary general in this dispute?

I think that I would be in a much better position than any other previous secretary general -- as I come from Korea and have experience. I will try to coordinate with the concerned parties. If necessary, I will take my own initiative, which will include visiting North Korea and meeting with North Korean leaders.

Will you meet with President Kim Jong Il?

I hope so. When the secretary general of the United Nations visits [a country], normally the secretary general deals with the leaders of the member states.

People say that Kim Jong Il is not so normal.

But he has met many leaders of the world.

Some argue that the recent test is a reaction by North Korea to the economic sanctions imposed by the U.S. on the Macao-based Banco Delta Asia in 2005 right after North Korea and the U.S. appeared to have arrived at a political deal.

First of all, the financial measures imposed on the North Korean accounts in Banco Delta Asia were because of the suspicion of North Korean illicit activities, including counterfeiting [of U.S. currency]. It's wrong that North Korea has linked this issue to the six-party process.

[Recently] the American government has said that if and when North Korea returns to the six-party talks, they will be prepared to have bilateral discussions . . . on all pending measures, including these financial restrictions.

Shouldn't the U.S. have had bilateral talks with North Korea previously?

The South Korean government has been asking the U.S. to engage in bilateral talks with the North. The U.S. government's position is not to directly engage with North Korea on bilateral issues except within the framework of the six-party talks.

Isn't this a mistake?

I would not characterize it. That's American policy.

Do you see a way to go back to negotiations and to stop North Korea from conducting further tests, or will North Korea test again in reaction to the U.N. sanctions?

I think North Korea should be more realistic. Considering the economic and political difficulty they are facing, they should have taken a wiser path.

Is there hope that you can deal with a regime like North Korea's?

The Security Council resolution is primarily [focused] on taking sanctions against North Korea, [but] in the resolution there is a paragraph leaving the door open for North Korea to come to the dialogue table. We need a two-pronged approach. While we take a very strong and stern message and deliver it to North Korea, at the same time we need to leave some room for negotiations so as not to escalate the situation.

Do you worry that North Korea may feel so isolated that they'll pursue a closer alliance with Iran and Pakistan?

There is a concern about the proliferation of materials relating to weapons of mass destruction and nuclear materials and missiles. . . . There were some dealings and cooperation between A.Q. Khan of Pakistan and North Korea. It's my understanding that at this time they don't have such close cooperation.

Do you regard the "sunshine policy" as a failure?

I don't think it's a total failure. The philosophy and objective of engagement is a good one. If we have to blame someone, it's North Korea. We have been trying to help North Korea in humanitarian matters and exchanges and cooperation. . . . But the testing of nuclear weapons was a total display of disrespect to our goodwill.

Hard-liners argue that the North Korean regime has never changed its behavior.

You should sympathize and appreciate how difficult it is for the South Korean government and people to deal with the North. Peace and prosperity come when we have a good and solid relationship with the North. When there is a crisis like this, the South Korean people are affected in a very negative way.

What do you want to accomplish as secretary general?

Development is the key issue. Without the eradication of poverty, you will always see conflicts.

What do you plan to do about U.N. reform?

U.N. reform is my top priority. The United Nations should be reborn to be able to address all the challenges more objectively and efficiently. It's frustrating that people talk about the irrelevance of the United Nations. . . . We should change the culture by making the secretariat more professional, more accountable, more transparent, with a higher level of ethics.

So no more oil-for-food scandals?

That's right. I'll try to lead by example.

U.N. Reforms, Nuke Programs Top Annan Successor's Agenda (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

DOJ_NMG_0080918

USA Today, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The South Korean diplomat set to become the next United Nations chief brings insight — and possibly baggage — to one of its most pressing problems: the North Korean crisis.

Last week, the 192-member United Nations chose Ban Ki Moon, South Korea's foreign minister, to succeed Kofi Annan as its secretary-general.

Since 2004, Ban, 62, has steered the South Korean team taking part in six-nation talks with North Korea. Those discussions, aimed at halting North Korea's nuclear program, also involve the United States, China, Russia and Japan. The talks have stalled since North Korea walked away from the negotiating table in November.

Before the talks collapsed, Ban worked on a proposal to give North Korea civilian nuclear reactors and security assurances in return for halting its weapons program. North Korea initially agreed, then balked when the Bush administration said it must disarm first.

Ban's selection as U.N. chief poses a potential problem: The Pyongyang regime might refuse to deal with him, says David Straub, a former State Department official who dealt with Korean issues.

"To have a South Korean as head of the United Nations is a terrific embarrassment for the North Koreans," Straub says. "On the other hand, being so knowledgeable about the issue, he could play a very useful role."

The two Koreas, separated by the world's most heavily armed border, remain bitter rivals 53 years after their war ended in a truce rather than a peace treaty. About 28,000 U.S. troops are in South Korea.

Attempts to reach Ban were unsuccessful. In an interview Sunday on ABC, he said he was confident sanctions against North Korea would be enforced, despite expressions of reluctance by China and Russia. At the same time, he urged other countries to talk to the isolated regime headed by North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

Kim "is in control of all of North Korean society," Ban said on Good Morning America Weekend Edition. "The problem is that we have to talk to him."

Charles Kartman, a former U.S. negotiator in talks with North Korea, says Ban believes the South Korean government has been too conciliatory toward North Korea.

Ban has also been unhappy with Bush administration policy, which rejects one-on-one talks with North Korea. Two years ago, standing next to then-secretary of State Colin Powell, Ban chided the United States for failing to offer enough to North Korea to convince it to halt its nuclear program. The United States "must come up with a more creative and realistic proposal," Ban said at a news conference in Seoul.

Ban won the U.N. job over candidates from Latvia, Jordan, Thailand, India, Afghanistan and Sri Lanka. A diplomat for four decades, he is the second Asian to hold the job — Burma's U Thant served from 1961-71.

Any of the five veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council — the United States, Russia, France, China and Britain — could have killed Ban's candidacy.

Respected for his negotiating skills, Ban drew no opposition because he "is a very non-threatening character," says Edward Luck, a U.N. expert at Columbia University.

Ban will need both finesse and steel to perform three big jobs as secretary-general, Luck says:

·Public spokesman for the concerns of the world.

·Manager of an unwieldy and abuse-ridden U.N. bureaucracy.

·Mediator on difficult issues including rolling back the nuclear programs of North Korea and Iran.

Luck says Ban may have greater success than Annan in trimming the U.N. secretariat's 10,000-person payroll and establishing ethical standards.

Management reform has been a key issue for the United States, which contributes 22% of the organization's $3.8 billion annual budget. Reform efforts have been resisted by many developing nations among the U.N. members.

U.S. Uses Korea Sanctions To Warn Iran (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 16, 2006

The United States on Sunday used new U.N. sanctions against North Korea to warn Iran, another country with nuclear ambitions.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said Iran should pay attention to Saturday's U.N. resolution against North Korea for its claimed nuclear test last week.

"I hope the lesson they learn is that if they continue to pursue nuclear weapons, they will face the same kind of isolation and restrictions that we have just imposed on the North Koreans," Bolton told CNN's "Late Edition."

DOJ_NMG_0080919

Repeated attempts by the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members and Germany to entice Iran into negotiations on its nuclear program foundered earlier this month over Tehran's refusal to give up uranium enrichment, which can be used to develop nuclear weapons.

The six powers have agreed to start working on U.N. sanctions against Iran next week, officials have said, but they still have to bridge differences on how harsh the penalties should be.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday that, just as with North Korea, efforts against Iran are "a multilateral effort, not just a U.S. effort, and that is extremely important because the United States doesn't need to do this alone and can't do it alone."

Rice told "Fox News Sunday" that "the United States is much better off working with its allies than trying to do this bilaterally and being isolated itself."

Bolton said the Iranians "could enjoy a completely different relationship with the United States if they would suspend their uranium enrichment activities."

Iran, he said, "seemed to be obsessed with the idea of getting nuclear weapons. And as long as they pursue that course, we will have to respond accordingly."

Saturday's U.N. resolution against North Korea demands that Pyongyang abandon its nuclear weapons program and orders all countries to prevent the reclusive nation from importing or exporting any material for weapons of mass destruction or ballistic missiles.

Iran on Saturday called threats of sanctions "psychological warfare" and said it would not be intimidated.

Iran contends its nuclear program is for generating electricity; the U.S. and some of its allies allege Tehran is trying to develop atomic weapons.

In Jerusalem, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told Israeli Cabinet ministers Sunday that Iran remained the greatest threat to Israel and he was concerned about the precedent set by the nuclear test conducted last week by North Korea.

"Whoever takes the Korean matter lightly will soon find a nuclear weapon in Iran and ultimately a nuclear weapon in al-Qaida," he said, according to an official who attended the meeting and spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to discuss the matter on the record.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., told Fox that U.S. failures in Iraq have "diminished our hand and reduced our ability to be able to deal with Iran and North Korea."

Kerry said the Bush administration "has lost credibility in the world. And that's why Iran is emboldened, and that's why North Korea is emboldened."

U.S. Pursues Tactic Of Financial Isolation (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 15 — As debate swirls about whether new international sanctions against North Korea will be effective, the Bush administration appears to have made some headway in using new American legal tools to cut off both North Korea and Iran from the international financial system.

The American campaign to use its own financial regulations to put pressure on North Korea and Iran has been a mix of implicit threats backed by explicit action, American officials and banking experts say.

Over the last year, American officials have met with many private banks overseas to warn them of the risk of doing business with certain Iranian and North Korean trading companies and businesses that the United States says have been tied to terrorist groups or to the spread of nuclear materials.

One of the main unspoken messages of the visits, experts say, is that the United States government may eventually bar American banks from working with financial institutions doing business with groups tied to terrorism.

This campaign of pressure has been backed up by specific actions. The most notable was when the United States last month barred American banks from facilitating certain transactions, including the sale of oil, for a leading Iranian bank with reputed ties to terrorist groups.

As a result of the American campaign, banking officials and experts say that some foreign banks are cutting ties with North Korea and Iran.

But while achieving some unilateral success in economically punishing North Korea and Iran for their nuclear ambitions, some experts say the moves against Iran, at least, could damage American economic interests if that country switched to currencies other than the dollar for its large oil trades.

DOJ_NMG_0080920

The United States had turned to unilateral action in part out of frustration that its efforts to mobilize international sanctions had run into trouble. That frustration might remain if the United Nations sanctions against North Korea, passed Saturday, prove not to be as effective as the United States hopes.

Most experts acknowledge that a globally cooperative effort would be much more effective than the American unilateral efforts, but that the United States can inflict some pain with the creative use of the reach of its own laws and pressure.

The ban on American transactions with the Iranian bank, Bank Saderat, means that it will no longer be able to obtain American dollars for its dealings with any other bank in the world. Bank Saderat is one of Iran's half-dozen largest banks.

The technical term for the banned activity is a "U-turn transaction." Such a transaction permits, for example, Iran to sell oil to a German customer, who in turn directs a European bank to deposit dollars obtained from an American bank into an Iranian bank account located in Europe. The phrase "U-turn" applies because the funds are transferred to a United States bank and instantly turned back as dollars to a European bank.

Many American banking officials predict that, in coming months, the United States will ban American bank involvement in transactions involving the other leading banks in Iran. That is because there is a widespread assumption among bankers that all of Iran's state-owned banks engage in the same activities as Bank Saderat. The likely result is that Iran will have difficulty selling its oil for dollars, the international medium of exchange for all oil sales.

"This is a pretty dramatic uptick of pressure from the United States," said Judith A. Lee, a law partner specializing in economic sanctions at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Washington. "It is going to create significant difficulties for European banks and European countries."

American officials decline to say whether the move against Bank Saderat would apply to other Iranian banks.

Stuart Levey, under secretary of the Treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence, said recently that in the last two years the United States had "learned a number of lessons about how best to use financial tools to apply financial pressure" on countries like Iran and North Korea.

In the last year, Mr. Levey has traveled to several countries in Europe to exert pressure on Iran and to Singapore, China, Macao, Hong Kong, Vietnam and South Korea to press banks to break their ties with North Korea.

The message was reinforced a year ago when the United States barred financial transactions with a bank in Macao, Banco Delta Asia, which officials said was involved in North Korean nuclear dealings, money laundering and counterfeiting.

Last month, citing news media reports, Mr. Levey said that at least two dozen financial institutions overseas had curtailed or suspended business with North Korea.

China, for instance, froze the accounts of North Korea in a Macao branch of the Bank of China and also cracked down on the circulation of counterfeit American dollars in China near the North Korean border.

The administration hopes that could set a pattern for the future, American officials said. "We have no reason to believe that China will not continue to protect their financial system from abuse," a Treasury official said Sunday.

As for Iran, several European banks, including Credit Suisse and UBS in Switzerland, HSBC in Britain and ABN Amro in the Netherlands, have announced curbs on dealings with Iranian banks and businesses.

"We are seeing a whole series of banks not doing business with Iran, restricting the flow of funds into Iran significantly," said Edward Morse, chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers.

Last month, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. suggested at an international meeting in Singapore that banks around the world should stop doing business with more than 30 Iranian companies and government enterprises that American intelligence had linked to various illicit activities.

Evidence that American moves against Iran might be having an effect came at the same meeting, when Ebrahim Sheibany, the Iranian central bank governor, told a local paper at an international financial meeting that Iran would have "no choice" but to shift its sale of oil away from the dollar and to the euro or Asian currencies.

Whether that shift away from dollars could have the unintended effect of hurting the United States is a matter of debate. Some experts say there is a danger that if Iran does shift currencies, it could weaken the standing of the dollar as a reserve currency, forcing the United States to raise interest rates to attract dollar purchasers.

"This is a step where the end result could clearly weaken the dollar," said John G. Heimann, an investment banker and former comptroller of the currency in the Carter administration. "What has to be considered is whether or not we are shooting ourselves in the foot."

Ordinary Chinese Angry Over N. Korean Claim Of Nuke Test (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080921

BEIJING — By claiming to test a nuclear device, North Korea has set off a wave of anger among ordinary Chinese, who appear split about whether blame lies with North Korea or the United States.

In the streets and online, Chinese responded to last week's announcement out of Pyongyang with fear.

Many said a nuclear-armed North Korea meant less security for China and East Asia. They called into question China's historic role as North Korea's ally and patron. Others suggested North Korea is right to arm itself in response to U.S. and Japanese threats against it.

Pyongyang's nuclear bombshell left Zhai Huixia, 24, "shocked and furious." The Beijing graduate school student said North Korea's move "seems very selfish, intruding on Chinese interests, and aggravating turbulence in the region."

For Korean War veteran Zhang Zeshi, North Korea's claim was a bitter betrayal by an "evil" regime. "We have given them so much food, fuel and support, but they don't listen to us," he said.

Zhang, 77, was among more than a million Chinese soldiers sent by Mao Zedong to fight with North Korea in the 1950-53 Korean War. He spent two years in a South Korean POW camp. He was imprisoned again when he returned home, disgraced along with other former POWs for failing to die in battle against American "aggressors."

"We spilled our blood in vain," Zhang said. "It kept alive (North Korea's) feudal dictatorship."

Other Chinese saw North Korea's decision to go nuclear as a response to pressure by the United States, which has tried to isolate the regime headed by Kim Jong Il.

"Maybe the North Korean government would already have collapsed if the U.S. adopted an enlightened policy towards it," said Wang Miao, 25, an electrical engineer in the eastern city of Nanjing. He blamed America's "high-pressure … Cold War strategy" for forcing Pyongyang's hand.

On Saturday, Beijing joined other United Nations Security Council members in approving sanctions against North Korea. Afterward, though, Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said China would not help conduct inspections of ships leaving and entering North Korean ports.

China is North Korea's biggest trading partner and supplier of food and energy. It could see a flood of Korean refugees to northeast China if the secretive regime in Pyongyang collapses.

In China's swelling cyberspace, North Korea has provoked debate. On the forum at beelinkclub.com, based in eastern Shandong province, moderator Xiaocao Qiqiang called the United States and Japan warmongers. He argued that a nuclear North Korea would guarantee peace by forcing the United States and Japan to ease up.

There was no way to verify the identity of the bloggers on beelinkclub.com or other sites where North Korea dominated conversation. But such sentiment was consistent with other postings and online discussions in Chinese chat rooms monitored by Yawei Liu, a China specialist at Georgia Perimeter College.

Liu said much of the debate is colored by a "strong anti-American sentiment among many of the most informed Chinese citizens." Liu said many of those commenting "are sympathetic to North Koreans and see a vast U.S. conspiracy to undermine China."

In another online debate, one blogger, identified as Wang Jinggu, saw Pyongyang as the villain. North Korea is too much of a liability for China and too backward to be worth the trouble, Wang wrote, adding that its people are not even allowed to use mobile phones.

The outpouring of anger — against both North Korea and the United States — is no accident, said Shen Dingli, a foreign policy specialist at Shanghai's Fudan University. The Chinese government "has the ability to censor opinion, but it has intentionally allowed public debate to let the both the U.S. and North Korea know we are unhappy," Shen said. "When the criticism is against Chinese foreign policy, the freedom will be less."

A majority of Chinese believe "we should abandon" North Korea, though their view is unlikely to sway decision-makers in Beijing, Shen said. North Korea "may no longer be our friend," he said. But its strategic value to China as a counterweight to U.S. and Japanese interests means "we must never build it into our enemy."

An Offer Kim Can't Refuse (WP)

By Aaron L. Friedberg

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Though the hour is late and the odds long, there is still a chance that North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il can be persuaded to give up his nuclear arsenal.

Despite what many have suggested, this cannot be achieved simply through face-to-face negotiations or by offering security guarantees and economic aid. Kim is a cynical realist and will not exchange his nuclear capabilities for empty acts of diplomatic deference or what he would doubtless regard as mere scraps of paper. The hope that he might be tempted to ease the suffering of his people is also sadly misplaced. Kim has been described by psychological profilers as a "malignant narcissist"; he cares only for himself and is indifferent to the pain of others.

DOJ_NMG_0080922

Whatever his quirks, Kim is also a cunning and rational strategist with one overriding objective: ensuring his own survival by maintaining an absolute grip on power. The only way to move him is by confronting him with a stark choice -- turn over existing nuclear weapons, dismantle production facilities and submit to rigorous international inspections, or face a steadily rising risk of overthrow and untimely death. This demand can be sweetened with promises of aid and peace pacts, but in the end Kim needs to be presented with an offer he cannot refuse.

North Korea is an impoverished nation with virtually no legitimate exports. Most of its citizens scratch out a meager subsistence. Yet Kim and those around him enjoy a life of comfort, driving powerful foreign cars, drinking expensive imported whiskey, watching bootlegged DVDs and treating their ailments with the best Western medicines.

The hard currency needed to pay for these luxuries, as well as imports essential to the North's programs for weapons of mass destruction, is generated through a variety of illicit activities: counterfeiting U.S. and other currencies, manufacturing and exporting narcotics and phony name-brand cigarettes, and selling weapons from small arms to ballistic missiles to any customer with cash.

Choking off the flow of dollars to Pyongyang would do more than cramp Kim's lavish lifestyle; it would threaten his grip on power. Like other crime bosses, Kim rewards his underlings and ensures their loyalty by letting them share the loot. Kim's extended family, the top echelons of the Communist Party, and the upper ranks of the military and security services all benefit from this arrangement.

For his part, Kim is able to sleep at night because he knows that those on whom his safety depends have a stake in his well-being. If times get tough and money grows tight, however, those people will begin to feel the pinch, the circle of beneficiaries in the spoils system will become smaller and Kim will steadily grow less secure. What Kim has to fear is not a popular uprising but a palace coup. The North's people are too beaten down and weak to stage a revolution, but Kim knows that a handful of disgruntled generals or disaffected party leaders could bring a sudden end to his brutal reign.

With the help of allies such as Japan and Australia, Washington has already taken steps to disrupt North Korean arms sales, counterfeiting and drug smuggling. Last year the United States also began to go after the network of financial institutions through which dollars flow back to Pyongyang. These initiatives need to be greatly intensified and coupled with other measures to constrict Kim's dollar lifeline.

Recently announced U.N. sanctions are a step in the right direction, but they are not enough. China must take responsibility for preventing illicit activities on or through its territory, and both China and South Korea need to ensure that whatever assistance they provide the North's people cannot readily be converted to cash by Kim and his cronies.

Seoul and Beijing have thus far been reluctant to take such steps for fear that they might provoke Kim or cause the North to collapse. The time for hesitation has long since passed. Kim may test more nuclear devices and ballistic missiles, but he is not about to attack the South or make other moves that would bring crushing retaliation. As for the danger of regime collapse, the "Dear Leader" has even more reason to fear it than do his neighbors. It should be made clear to all, including Kim, that the objective of ratcheting up financial pressure is not to topple him but to squeeze him until he chooses to abandon his nuclear ambitions.

Getting China and South Korea on board will not be easy. Both may prefer feeble gestures and empty rhetoric to tough, united action. If Seoul and Beijing remain reluctant, however, they must be made to understand that they are endangering not only the security and stability of Northeast Asia but also their future relations with the United States. The weapons Kim is perfecting could one day lay waste to an American or Asian city. Passivity in the face of this threat will lead to sharp questions from Congress and the public about the continuing value of the U.S. alliance with South Korea, to say nothing of China's supposed status as a "responsible stakeholder" in the international system.

Absent sufficient cooperation, Washington will have to weigh other risky measures. Among these are a stop-and-search blockade of North Korea's ports, secondary sanctions against companies that continue to trade with it, and aggressive criminal proceedings that could entangle individuals and institutions in other countries, including China, with unforeseeable but potentially far-reaching diplomatic and economic consequences.

The writer is a professor at Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School and a former deputy assistant for national security affairs to Vice President Cheney.

Olmert: Palestinians Holding Up Summit (AP)

By Mark Lavie, Associated Press Writer
AP, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080923

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Sunday said a planned summit with Mahmoud Abbas has been put on hold because of the Palestinian president's insistence that Israel release large numbers of Palestinian prisoners — the latest setback for U.S.-led efforts to restart peace talks.

Abbas has denied demanding a prisoner release as a condition for a summit. Israel insists that before it frees any of the estimated 8,000 Palestinians it is holding, a soldier captured in June by Hamas-linked militants in a cross-border raid must be returned.

Olmert announced late last month that he soon hoped to hold a meeting with Abbas, but the preparations bogged down over the prisoners. The two have met only once since Olmert took office in March, an informal chat in Jordan.

"We offered to meet with Abu Mazen, but apparently he is not interested," Olmert was quoted as telling a Sunday meeting of lawmakers from his Kadima party. Abbas is also known as Abu Mazen.

"He is conditioning a meeting on the release of prisoners and we will not release any prisoners until (captured soldier) Gilad Shalit is released."

An official who attended the meeting spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter with reporters.

Saeb Erekat, a Palestinian lawmaker who is close to Abbas, said preparations remain on track. "The efforts to schedule a meeting are still ongoing, and both sides are determined to ensure a successful meeting," he said.

Still, the disagreements over prisoners and a summit are not the main impediments to diplomatic progress.

Internal Palestinian and Israeli political turmoil and control of the Palestinian government by the extremist Islamic group Hamas are larger obstacles in the way of U.S. efforts toward peace talks, which have been stalled for six years.

Hamas won Palestinian parliamentary elections in January. Israel has boycotted the militant group, which is committed to the destruction of the Jewish state, but considers Abbas an acceptable negotiating alternative.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in the region this month to try to prop up Abbas, leader of the moderate Fatah Party that was ousted by Hamas in the January elections. Abbas was elected separately a year earlier and remains in office, but his power and influence have been severely curtailed.

Olmert also rejected Sunday the possibility of talks with Syrian President Bashar Assad, saying Assad was responsible for harboring terrorists and was attempting to destabilize the entire region, according to the official who attended the meeting.

Israel has accused Syria of providing weapons to Hezbollah guerrillas before and during the recent war in Lebanon. Olmert said that since an Aug. 14 cease-fire went into effect, Syria has continued to meddle in Lebanese affairs and tried to undermine the country's pro-Western leader.

Assad told the German magazine Der Spiegel last month "we want to make peace — peace with Israel." In an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp. broadcast last week, Assad said it remained to be seen whether Israel had the will to make peace.

Israel has been carrying out a widespread offensive in Gaza since Cpl. Gilad Shalit was captured. Israeli forces have killed 21 Palestinians in fighting since Thursday. Most of the dead were militants, but two minors, ages 10 and 14, and a 29-year-old woman also were killed.

Israel says the latest raid is aimed at targeting the repeated fire of homemade rockets from the northern Gaza Strip. "We cannot allow ourselves to accept this pace of rocket fire," Olmert said in Sunday's Cabinet meeting. Several rockets have landed in southern Israel; no serious injuries have been reported.

During the Cabinet meeting, senior military officials said they believe Hamas has smuggled anti-aircraft weapons into Gaza for the first time, participants said. If true, this could pose a serious challenge to Israel, which relies heavily on its air force to attack militants in Gaza.

Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisen said the weapons are coming from Iran and "other countries that sell them." She was concerned that Palestinian militants are learning "how to use the new weapons, and especially how the Palestinians can fight against Israel the way that Hezbollah fought in Lebanon."

Abbas has been trying to pressure Hamas to moderate its views, but efforts to form a national unity government — which could lead to new peace talks — have stalled. The militants have demanded the release of hundreds of Palestinians jailed by Israel.

Nevertheless, Olmert said he hoped a summit would lead to broader peace talks. Negotiations have been frozen for years, with both sides refusing to carry out their initial obligations under the internationally backed "road map" peace plan.

During Rice's visit early this month, Olmert reportedly promised to "create a better environment" and return to peacemaking.

Associated Press Writer Aron Heller contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0080924

Rape Charge Advised Vs. Israel President (AP)

By Josef Federman, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 16, 2006

Police recommended Sunday that Israeli President Moshe Katsav be charged with rape, sexual assault and fraud, the most serious charges ever to face an Israeli leader.

The recommendation came at a meeting between police investigators and Attorney General Meni Mazuz. The final decision on whether to put the president on trial is up to Mazuz.

He does not have a deadline for making his decision and is expected to take several weeks to study the evidence.

Katsav has denied all wrongdoing. In a statement released by his office, his lawyer, Zion Amir, said police are not authorized to bring charges, noting that in the past, when police have recommended putting senior officials on trial, the attorney general has dismissed most of the cases.

Katsav asserted in a recent Israel radio interview that the complaints against him were staged by political enemies.

A police statement issued Sunday said the complaints were filed by "women who worked under his (Katsav's) authority." It said there was evidence he committed crimes of "rape, aggravated sexual assault, indecent acts without permission and offenses under the law to prevent sexual harassment."

The statement also said police found basis for charges of illegal wiretapping, and fraud and malfeasance in office in the case of pardons granted by the president.

Investigations into allegations of disrupting a police investigation and harassing a witness were still in progress, police said.

The investigation began earlier this year after a former employee alleged Katsav forced her to have sex under the threat of dismissal. Police repeatedly questioned Katsav at his official residence and seized personal documents.

Israel Radio and Channel 2 TV have said the case against Katsav is based on complaints by five women who allege he made unwanted sexual advances toward them during his tenure as president and before that, as a government minister.

Complaints by five other women are not being pursued because the statute of limitations has run out, the reports said.

If indicted, Katsav would likely have to step aside. In Israel, the president holds a largely ceremonial role with little authority, but is considered a unifying force in a fractured society.

Israeli Police Recommend Charges Against President (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 15 — The Israeli police recommended on Sunday that President Moshe Katsav face charges of rape and sexual assault allegedly committed against several women in his office. Israel's attorney general must now decide whether to file such charges.

Mr. Katsav, who has held the mostly ceremonial post since 2000, has denied any wrongdoing. He has said that at least one of his accusers was trying to extort money and that his political enemies were behind the investigation.

After an inquiry that lasted nearly two months, the police on Sunday handed their findings to the attorney general, Menachem Mazuz. He will review the material and decide whether charges are warranted. It could be weeks before he announces a decision.

A joint statement by the police and the Justice Ministry said there was evidence that the president committed "rape, aggravated sexual assault, indecent acts without permission and offenses under the law to prevent sexual harassment."

According to the police, the inquiry also found evidence that the president had committed fraud and was engaged in illegal wiretapping.

"As far as we're concerned, we've completed the investigation," said Micky Rosenfeld, a police spokesman. "There is hard evidence and hard facts in this case."

Mr. Katsav's lawyer, Zion Amir, said in a statement that Israel's attorney general had in the past dismissed police findings as insufficient and had chosen not to file charges after investigations of senior officials.

Mr. Katsav has been facing calls for his resignation, and Sunday's statement by the police was sure to intensify those demands. Israel's Parliament opens its winter session on Monday, an event Mr. Katsav normally attends. Mr. Katsav's brother, Lior Katsav, told Israeli radio that the president planned to attend but would not address the legislators.

Several female lawmakers have threatened to walk out of the session if Mr. Katsav is present.

"The president must resign," Education Minister Yuli Tamir told Israeli television. "If he doesn't do so, I believe a process will be launched to force him to resign."

DOJ_NMG_0080925

Mr. Katsav is immune from standing trial while in office. However, if he resigns or is impeached by Parliament, he would have to face any charges against him, according to legal scholars. Mr. Katsav's seven-year term ends next year.

Although the case has received widespread coverage in Israel, any charges against Mr. Katsav are not likely to have broader political ramifications. Israel's president is expected to serve as a unifying force and set a moral tone, but his position is more symbolic than substantive.

Still, the controversy surrounding Mr. Katsav comes at a time when the Israeli public has expressed widespread disappointment in the country's leadership. Many Israelis say that the government and the military mismanaged the recent war with Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, a target for much of that criticism, has been under investigation regarding the sale of his Jerusalem home and the purchase of a new one. His critics say he received favored treatment, getting an above-market price for the home he sold and buying the new one at below its true value.

Several other politicians are under investigation or have been charged with wrongdoing, including the former justice minister, Haim Ramon, who quit in August and was subsequently charged with sexual harassment. Mr. Ramon is accused of forcibly kissing a female soldier, a charge he denies.

Mr. Katsav, 60, is married and has five children. He was born in Iran and came to Israel a few years after the country's independence in 1948. When he was 24, he was elected mayor of Kiryat Malachi, a poor town populated by immigrants in southern Israel. He was elected to Parliament in 1977 and served for many years with the right-wing Likud party.

In 2000, the elder statesman Shimon Peres was the heavy favorite to become the president, a position that is filled by a vote in Parliament. However, Mr. Katsav was the surprise winner.

As president, Mr. Katsav has been a low-key figure who frequently attends public ceremonies here and abroad, but has generally steered clear of the frequent controversies and political upheavals in Israel.

The allegations of sexual misconduct against Mr. Katsav first surfaced during the summer, and the formal investigation began in August. The police confiscated a computer and documents from the president's official residence on Aug. 21 and have since questioned him at length on several occasions.

Although his accusers have not been identified, police officials say they are five women who have worked in the president's office.

Israel's previous president, Ezer Weizman, resigned in 2000 amid scandal. During the 1980's, when he was a lawmaker and cabinet minister, he received hundreds of thousands of dollars from a French businessman with interests in Israel. No charges were filed against Mr. Weizman, who died in 2005.

African Union Force Ineffective, Complain Refugees In Darfur (WP/AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

KASSAB, Sudan, Oct. 15 -- Refugees living in camps scattered across this region of western Sudan say an African Union peacekeeping mission has done little to protect them, even as rising violence is driving away crucial humanitarian aid.

"You have been here for three years now, and what have you done for us?" a tribal leader bitterly asked a delegation of African Union soldiers and police that visited the Kassab refugee camp last week.

As they often must, the peacekeepers explained to camp delegates that they were in Darfur only to monitor the violence and had no mandate to fight it.

"You are witnessing what happens, but you aren't helping," said Attaieb Adem, one of the camp delegates.

The Sudanese army, backed by an Arab militia called the Janjaweed, and Darfur rebel groups began fighting in 2003. Since then, as many as 450,000 people have died in violence and from disease, and 2.5 million have been displaced.

The African Union mission came in 2004, but anger over its perceived ineffectiveness is strong.

"If there is nothing you can do, then you might as well go home, so that the United Nations" can come, said Adem, referring to the hope by many in Darfur that a U.N. Security Council resolution to send about 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers to the region will be implemented. The mandate of the African Union force expires at the end of the year.

Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, fiercely opposes the U.N. proposal, saying it would breach the country's sovereignty.

The refugees in Kassab say they do not see how their security could get any worse in their camp, on the front line of a murky war zone.

The Janjaweed militia has been blamed for much of the bloodshed. But rebel violence and hostility to aid workers has escalated since May, when one rebel faction signed a shaky peace agreement with the government. Humanitarian groups and African Union police say they withdrew from Kassab in September mostly because of the rebel violence.

DOJ_NMG_0080926

The camp's clinic closed, so refugees in need of treatment trudge to the nearest town. Women say taking that road, or even collecting firewood around the camp, exposes them to robbery and rape.

"Every day we risk being beaten, or even worse," said Kharidja Ibrahim, some of whose family members had gone wood-gathering that morning. "We're waiting. In a few hours, we'll hear what has happened to them."

Tribal leaders say armed men now plunder the camp at will.

"Four days ago, they came in broad daylight and stole 84 goats," said Abdallah Shariff. He said nights are even worse.

"We can't sleep. We go to bed with our shoes on," he said, in case they have to flee.

Egyptian Maj. Ahmed El Serafy, who commands African Union police in the sector of Darfur that includes Kassab, said improving security in Kassab is an urgent task for what few forces he has -- 82 police officers for an area of 13,000 square miles.

"I knew it was going to be bad, but I never thought it would be this bad," he said.

Serafy said that police would resume day patrols in Kassab next week and that he hoped this show of force would improve security. But the African Union's officers go unarmed, and he said some were afraid to return to the refugee camp.

Even though refugees are frustrated with the A.U. peacekeepers, camp leaders pleaded with the delegation last week to return soon, saying time is running out.

"For now, we're on our own," said Youssouf Aldoun. "He is all we have for protection" he said, pointing his palms toward the sky in a Muslim gesture that signifies God.

Arabs To The Rescue? (WP)

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

A chance to broaden the response in Darfur

FOR THE past three years, the United States and Europe have sent millions of dollars in aid to the Sudanese territory of Darfur. African countries, for their part, have come forward with some 7,000 peacekeepers. Americans, Europeans and Africans have all tried to bring about a political settlement between Sudan's government and Darfur's rebels. These various efforts have combined to slow the killing, though they have failed to halt it. But the Western and African efforts stand in stark contrast to the performance of Sudan's Arab neighbors, which have so far done next to nothing.

Recently the Arab League asserted that this might change. Its members offered to dispatch a force of Arab and Muslim troops as peacekeepers to Darfur, replacing or preferably reinforcing the underpowered African contingent whose mandate is set to expire soon. Under the terms of a Security Council resolution passed in August, the African force is supposed to be replaced by a 20,000-strong United Nations one. But Sudan's government has described a U.N. deployment as a "prelude to an invasion" of an Islamic country. However infuriating this claim, the fact is that the United Nations is not going to fight its way into Darfur. Depending on the details of its design, an Arab force could be an acceptable alternative.

The details matter because an Arab deployment would face credibility problems: It would be identified with Sudan's Arab-led government, which has equipped and supported Darfur's genocidal militia. Moreover, the ineffectiveness of the African Union force proves that peacekeeping in Darfur is no easy task: The Arabs would need to arrive with more troops and better equipment. But if Arab governments did deploy a robust force, they might succeed in quelling militia violence. That would solve the credibility problem.

It's hard to see how Sudan's government could resist an Arab and Muslim peacekeeping force by calling it a threat to Islam. Arab leaders have a good chance of deploying their proposed force if they press for it seriously. So the important question will be: Are the Arabs in fact serious?

Exit Polls Show Magnate Leading Ecuadoran Vote (WSJ)

By Jose DeCordoba

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

A banana magnate appears to have squeaked by a charismatic ally of Venezuela president Hugo Chavez to win a plurality of Ecuador's presidential votes, forcing a runoff election next month to determine Ecuador's eighth president in 10 years.

With about 48% of votes counted, billionaire Alvaro Noboa, 55 years old and the richest man in Ecuador, had 27% of the vote. He was leading Rafael Correa, 43, an admirer of Mr. Chavez, with 22% of the vote. Two exit polls said Mr. Noboa had between 29% to 27% of the vote, besting Mr. Correa, who had between 27% to 25% of the vote. The other 11 candidates split the remainder.

The results mark a setback for Mr. Chavez, who was hoping an outright win by his political ally would extend his influence in the Andean region. With a population of about 13 million people, Ecuador is among South America's poorest countries. It is also one of the most unstable. Its last three elected presidents have been forced from office.

DOJ_NMG_0080927

But analysts said the results could give the pro-U.S., pro-markets Mr. Noboa, who has run twice before and lost races for the presidency, the edge to win the second round of the vote, scheduled for Nov 26. Michael Shifter, an analyst at the Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington, said a number of the losing candidates may throw their support to Mr. Noboa to stop Mr. Correa, a charismatic, articulate and telegenic campaigner.

At one point, polls showed Mr. Correa -- who has scared markets with talk of debt default -- was within striking distance of winning the election outright. Mr. Correa, who holds a doctorate in economics from the University of Illinois, opposes a free-trade pact with the U.S. He says that while he doesn't approve of using the dollar as Ecuador's currency, he would keep the present system in place since an economic crisis led the government to scrap Ecuador's currency for the U.S. unit in 2000.

During the campaign, Mr. Correa, whose name means "belt" in Spanish, would thrill crowds by cracking his belt in the air, as a symbol of the whipping he would give Ecuador's political class, which is seen as corrupt and inefficient by many Ecuadorians. Like Mr. Chavez, Mr. Correa promised to rewrite the constitution. He also vowed to disband congress, which he called a "sewer." And like Mr. Chavez, Mr. Correa likes to verbally abuse President George W. Bush.

"His positions and his language might have been too radical, even for a very angry electorate," said Mr. Shifter. "They didn't want a rupture with the U.S. or international financial institutions."

In the last week, Mr. Noboa -- fueled by flush funding and generous promises -- overtook Mr. Correa. At campaign events, Mr. Noboa, a Bible in hand, would ask God to help him save Ecuador's poor. Mr. Noboa promised to build cheap housing and create a million jobs, and unashamedly handed out cash, wheelchairs and medicine to potential voters. Mr. Noboa supports a free-trade agreement with the U.S.

"He's a quintessential populist," said Mr. Shifter.

Son of the late billionaire Luis Noboa, Mr. Noboa engaged in a bitter, nine-year legal battle with his father's second wife and his siblings before winning control of Fruit Shippers Ltd., the holding company for the family business, in 2002. Mr. Noboa today controls more than one hundred companies, including a bank and companies involved in real estate and shipping

Early Returns Point To A Presidential Runoff In Ecuador (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Oct. 15 — Ecuador's voters appeared to be split Sunday between Álvaro Noboa, a banana magnate who favors close ties to the United States, and Rafael Correa, a leftist who is an admirer of Venezuela's Hugo Chávez and who, like Mr. Chávez, is known for his anti-American rhetoric.

Based on early election returns, the two men are likely to face a runoff on Nov. 26.

As of 10:50 p.m. local time, with 59 percent of the votes counted, Mr. Noboa was leading with 26.8 percent of the vote to 22.4 percent for Mr. Correa.

To avoid a runoff, one of the candidates needs to win a majority or 40 percent of the vote plus a 10 percentage-point lead over the nearest opponent. There were 13 candidates in the race.

Mr. Noboa's strong showing came as something of a surprise. In the final days of the campaign, Mr. Noboa, 55, a Swiss-educated billionaire scion of an elite family in Guayaquil, said he would limit political ties to Venezuela and fiercely criticized Mr. Correa's positions. He has also said he is strongly in favor of negotiating a trade agreement with the United States.

Mr. Correa angrily reacted on Sunday to the attacks from Mr. Noboa and said his campaign might have suffered from fraud in the electronic systems used to count votes.

"The irresponsible Noboa says I want to turn this country into a Cuba," he said. "This is not the case."

Mr. Noboa, who ran an unusual campaign combining right-wing ideology and populist promises, has made it to the second round of presidential elections twice before, losing each time. In this campaign, he appeared before audiences grasping a Bible and promising to build cheap housing, attract foreign investment and distribute computers.

In recent weeks, Mr. Correa, 43, had surged in the polls after railing against Ecuador's political establishment and criticizing American influence in the country.

Mr. Correa said he opposed negotiating a free trade treaty with the United States, jolted Wall Street banks by saying he would seek to renegotiate Ecuador's foreign debt and said he would end an arrangement allowing the United States military to use an air base in Manta, on the Pacific Coast, for drug surveillance flights.

"We can negotiate with the U.S. about a base in Manta, and if they let us put a military base in Miami, if there is no problem, we'll accept," Mr. Correa recently told reporters.

Mr. Correa cast himself as an anti-establishment candidate of a different stripe from other leftist populists in the region, who have largely had military or trade union backgrounds. An obscure university professor until briefly serving as economy minister last year, he dresses in well-tailored suits and speaks fluent English and French as well as some Quechua.

DOJ_NMG_0080928

He obtained postgraduate degrees in economics from the University of Illinois and Catholic University of Leuven in Belgium.

But despite that background, Mr. Correa, like many of his countrymen, dislikes many of the reforms recommended a decade ago by international lending institutions, including those strongly influenced by the United States. Mr. Correa has taken inspiration from the nationalist policies of Mr. Chávez, supporting greater government control over Ecuador's oil industry and acknowledging warm ties to him.

Those types of nontraditional positions played well with some voters.

"He's going to end the Congress, which is a sewer," Cristina Navas, 37, said of Mr. Correa after voting today.

But others expressed fears. "Venezuela is a petroleum country; Ecuador is a country with petroleum," said Vicente Bustamante, 46, a lawyer. "Venezuela can subsist on its own outside any economic bloc; we are part of the international community."

Mr. Correa met with Mr. Chávez in Venezuela in August, spending the night at the home of Mr. Chávez's parents in Barinas, the provincial cattle-raising region where Mr. Chávez was raised. Still, Mr. Correa denied receiving Venezuelan financing and emphasized a desire to also forge close ties with other leaders in the region.

While his background differs from that of Mr. Chávez, a former army officer, and President Evo Morales of Bolivia, a supporter of energy nationalization who is Mr. Chávez's closest ally in the Andes, Mr. Correa embraced their explicit criticism of the United States. At one point he described President Bush as a "tremendously dimwitted president who has done great damage to his country and to the world."

The rising distaste here for Washington belies economic and social ties to the United States that may be closer than ever. Ecuador uses the United States dollar as its currency, a six-year-old stabilization effort even Mr. Correa said needed to remain in place. More than 1 million Ecuadoreans are estimated to have immigrated to the United States since the 1990's, forming large communities in such states as New York, Florida and Illinois. The money they send home has become a vital source of income here. The United States, meanwhile, relies on Ecuador as its third-largest supplier of oil in South America after Venezuela and Brazil.

The winner of a runoff next month would face a perennial challenge: completing his term. Ecuador, which allows its Congress to remove presidents with ease, has had 7 presidents in the last 10 years.

Much of the next government's fortunes will depend on the price of oil, which is subject to the vagaries of the global energy market. Each $1 decline in oil prices translates into a $200 million decline in national income in Ecuador and a fall of 0.5 percent of gross domestic product, according to Barclays Capital.

Mr. Correa also showed signs of fatigue in recent days, potentially providing an opening for Mr. Noboa to adroitly appeal to voters in the likely runoff.

Adrián Bonilla, a noted analyst and director of the Latin American Faculty of Social Sciences here, where Mr. Correa once gave classes, said Mr. Correa was not as radical as some say. That may be why some prominent financiers and businessmen have backed him.

"Correa is clearly against the status quo, but that doesn't make him a Marxist or a messianic leader like Chávez," said Mr. Bonilla. "He's not about to turn Ecuador into a client state of Venezuela."

Mr. Chávez, for his part, has remained uncharacteristically restrained in commenting on the race, perhaps out of concern that he might weaken Mr. Correa's chances. Opponents of leftist populist presidential candidates in both Peru and Mexico won elections this year after attacking their rivals' perceived ties to Mr. Chávez.

Presidential Race In Ecuador Heads To Second Round (WP)

By Juan Forero, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Oct. 15 -- A banana magnate who portrays himself as a friend of the poor and a young economist close to Venezuela's mercurial leader, Hugo ChÃ¡vez, will face each other in a presidential election runoff on Nov. 26 after neither obtained enough votes to win in a first round Sunday in this chronically unstable country.

With 51 percent of the vote counted, Alvaro Noboa, 55, one of the wealthiest men in Latin America, had 27 percent of the vote to 22 percent for Rafael Correa, 43, a charismatic former finance minister who has sharply criticized the Bush administration.

The election in this tiny, mountainous country of 13 million has attracted widespread attention beyond its borders because of the rapid rise of Correa, an economist who promises to overturn Ecuador's old economic order and calls for a constitutional assembly that could dissolve the National Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0080929

Calling himself a friend of ChÃ¡vez, who has become Washington's leading antagonist in Latin America, Correa says his government would shutter a U.S. military base in Ecuador, crack down on multinational companies and possibly declare a moratorium on payment of the country's $10 billion foreign debt. If he wins next month, he will join a growing list of left-leaning leaders elected in Latin America since 2002.

"He's prepared, and we need someone who knows how to run things," said Fanny Ceron, 38, a nurse, moments after casting her ballot for Correa. "We need someone who comes from the people. The others are just moneyed people. They want power. They have the money, but no ideas."

Correa would face a furious challenge from Noboa, who has spent $2.5 million on his campaign, far more than any other candidate, casting himself as a populist. This is Noboa's third try at the presidency. He lost in 1998 and 2002. At campaign rallies, Noboa gives away T-shirts, wheelchairs and even cash. He also pays for mobile medical clinics run by his wife, Anabella AzÃ-n, a physician who also has political aspirations.

His campaign ads have attacked Correa as a dangerous extremist who would align Ecuador with Venezuela and Fidel Castro's Cuba, bringing more instability to a country that has had seven presidents in 10 years.

"Correa is selling hope," said Blasco PeÃ±aherrera, a businessman and president of the Quito Chamber of Commerce, who does not support Correa. "I'm sure his opponents are going to sell panic."

Support for Noboa surged in the past three weeks. He was a distant fourth as recently as Sept. 20, according to the Cedatos-Gallup polling firm in Quito. But Noboa, who falls to his knees before supporters and invokes God, quickly gained and in recent days surpassed Leon Roldos, a former vice president who had led in the campaign but began a fast slide last month.

On Sunday evening as results began to come in, Noboa charged that Ecuador would become another Cuba under Correa. "Rafael Correa's posture is communist, dictatorial," he said on Ecuadoran television. He also denied that he employs child laborers on his banana farms -- an accusation first made in a 124-page Human Rights Watch report in 2002.

"I don't have child workers in my companies," he said.

Noboa once made the Forbes 500 list of the world's richest people, and in the past he frequently boasted about his friendship with well-known American luminaries. A slick campaign has side-stepped questions about his businesses and has resonated with people such as Jorge Teran, 46, a technician who is fed up with a lack of progress in Ecuador. He said he likes Noboa's plans to increase the state oil company's production and his promise to build affordable housing and create jobs. Teran also said he feels Noboa may benefit from divine intervention.

"I think he brings up God so often that he must have sensibilities in his soul," Teran said.

Correa, though, has appealed to Ecuadorans who are tired of a chaotic and corruption-riddled political system. Three presidents have been toppled since 1997, the last one, Lucio GutiÃ©rrez, just last year after a bloc of Congress voted him out. Fistfights are not uncommon in Congress, nor is scandal.

And even though Ecuador is the continent's second-largest exporter of oil to the United States, after Venezuela, most of its people are poor and underemployed.

"He's not offering housing, a new health system or education -- he's offering renewal of the political system," said Adrian Bonilla, director of the Ecuador branch of the Latin American Faculty for Social Sciences, a continent-wide university system.

Bonilla argued that, despite Correa's super-heated oratory, he is far from being a knee-jerk radical who would upend Ecuador's economy. Instead, Bonilla said, Correa is influenced by Keynesian thought, which sees a central role for government in managing the economy, and by contemporary economists such as the American Nobel Prize winner Joseph E. Stiglitz, who argues that unchecked globalization harms poor countries.

Still, the rhetoric from Correa's campaign has often touched on the kinds of nationalistic themes espoused by ChÃ¡vez and other populist leaders in Latin America. Two key advisers slated to be named ministers in a Correa government, Augusto Tandazo and Alberto Acosta, told foreign reporters that Ecuador would be tough on transnational companies and multilateral lenders.

"Ecuador is not against foreign investors," said Tandazo, considered a hard-liner on oil issues. "But we want foreign investment that knows how to control its voracious appetite."

Opponents of Correa have cast him as a puppet of ChÃ¡vez, but Acosta said a Correa administration would follow its own path, neither tied to ChÃ¡vez nor following the free-market direction of another leftist leader, Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva.

"We are not copying Lula, ChÃ¡vez or Kirchner," he said, referring to Argentina's president, Nestor Kirchner. "Rafael Correa is Rafael Correa, with all his positive attributes and drawbacks. We are not waiting for a prescription from abroad."

Still, many Ecuadorans have had it with promises and politics. Vladimir PeÃ±a, 33, an accountant, said he would like wholesale change but sees most of the candidates as opportunistic populists. He invalidated his ballot.

"We've had lots of populists here," he said. "And what happens is they last six months, and that's it."

DOJ_NMG_0080930

Opposites Qualify For Ecuador Runoff (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, October 16, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador — Banana billionaire Alvaro Noboa edged left-wing economist Rafael Correa in the presidential election's first round Sunday, setting up a runoff between two candidates who are bitter rivals and polar opposites, according to partial results.

With nearly two-thirds of the ballots counted, Noboa had 26.8% of the vote and Correa 22.4%, according to electoral authorities.

Noboa, whose family owns Ecuador's largest banana plantation, closed what many pollsters saw as a 5 or 6 percentage-point deficit to Correa in the campaign's final days.

A loser in two previous runs at the presidency, Noboa, 55, gave a preview of the campaign rhetoric leading up to the Nov. 26 runoff, describing Correa in a TV interview Sunday as a "spoiled child" who is "pro-terrorism, pro-communism and pro-Cuba."

Correa, a 43-year-old economics professor with a doctorate from the University of Illinois, said if Noboa won, he would turn Ecuador into a private banana plantation. Correa added that his campaign's exit polls showed he won by 5 percentage points, and he called the early results "a fraud foretold by the oligarchy."

Correa had risen in polls from fifth place in July to first early this month. He ran an anti-establishment and anti-U.S. campaign in which he made no effort to conceal his friendship with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, Washington's most outspoken critic in the region.

But Noboa, whose net worth was estimated at more than $1 billion by Forbes magazine in 1997, spent lavishly on his campaign, and there were reports of widespread giveaways, including wheelchairs for the disabled and cash handouts to the poor. Correa also spent large sums in a campaign that many speculated was financed partly by Chavez.

Simon Pachano, a teacher at the Latin American School of Social Sciences in Quito, the capital, said the results reflected widening political polarization.

"Both Noboa and Correa ran anti-party, anti-system campaigns, and there is no middle ground between the two extremes. This sets up a dangerous scenario for Ecuador," Pachano said.

The ideological divide between the two front-runners is wide. Noboa, a proponent of open-market policies, promises housing and health subsidies and the creation of 3 million jobs.

Correa promises a reformist "citizen revolution" modeled in some aspects after the Chavez agenda.

He is a harsh critic of President Bush, opposes unregulated trade and supported the Ecuadorean government's seizure of Occidental Petroleum's Block 15 oil field in May. Occidental has taken the case to international arbitration, and Correa promises to ignore any order to compensate the oil company for the takeover.

Although some observers think Correa would become more moderate as president, others expect him to follow through on the "citizen revolution" he is proposing. He caused tremors on Wall Street by threatening to default on Ecuador's foreign debt, something the government has done three times since the early 1980s.

Nine million Ecuadoreans went to the polls Sunday to choose among 13 candidates vying to become the eighth president this unstable country will have seen in 11 years.

Three presidents have been forced from office since 1996. Since the nation's founding as a republic in 1830, presidents have served an average of 20 months.

Ecuadoreans have rewritten their constitution 19 times, and Correa has proposed a constitutional assembly to draft another and "reinvent Ecuador."

Interviews with voters Sunday indicated that they were torn between the desire to reform their dysfunctional government and a wish to maintain stability and economic well-being.

"We are tired of corrupt politicians who steal all the money they can and leave the country in poverty," said retired customs worker Leon Espinosa, a Correa supporter.

Garbage truck driver Walter Zambrano said he cast a vote for Noboa, saying the candidate's experience in business and in two previous presidential campaigns was a plus. "Correa may speak pretty words, but Noboa is more balanced and cares more for the underprivileged," he said.

Noboa's family-owned Corporacion Noboa operates Clementina, a 25,000-acre plantation 45 miles north of the coastal city of Guayaquil that is one of the world's largest banana producers and exporters. The company also owns auto manufacturing and shipping interests and a Coca-Cola bottling operation.

DOJ_NMG_0080931

As much as Correa's proposed "radical transformation" of Ecuador's political system appealed to some voters, it also raised fears of months of chaos and political polarization. His opposition to open-market policies also worried the business community, which relies on the U.S. export market for nearly half of all foreign shipments.

School Aide Swept Up In Britain's Veil Debate (WP/AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

LONDON -- A government minister has joined an increasingly bitter debate about the rights of Muslim women to veil their faces, saying a teaching assistant should be fired for insisting on wearing one in school.

Phil Woolas, Britain's race and faith minister, was quoted by the Sunday Mirror newspaper as demanding that Aishah Azmi, a Muslim, be fired for refusing to remove her veil at work.

"She should be sacked. She has put herself in a position where she can't do her job," Woolas said.

Azmi has refused to remove her black veil, which leaves only her eyes visible, in front of male colleagues. She was suspended but has taken her case to a court that handles cases on employment law.

Azmi, who is 24 and has two children, has insisted that she is willing to remove her veil in class, as long as no adult males are present.

"She is denying the right of children to a full education by insisting that she wears the veil," Woolas said. "If she is saying that she won't work with men, she is taking away the right of men to work in school."

The debate on the veils began this month when Jack Straw, the former foreign secretary who now serves as leader of the House of Commons, said Muslim women visiting his office should remove them.

The opposition Conservatives also weighed in, with one of the party's top officials accusing Muslim leaders of encouraging a "voluntary apartheid" that could help spawn homegrown terrorism.

David Davis, a top Conservative Party official, supported Straw. "What Jack touched on was the fundamental issue of whether in Britain we are developing a divided society," Davis told the Sunday Telegraph newspaper. "Whether we are inadvertently encouraging a kind of voluntary apartheid."

Prime Minister Tony Blair praised Straw for raising the issue "in a measured and considered way," and he urged Britons to engage the topic without "becoming hysterical."

Salman Rushdie, whose book "The Satanic Verses" once led to death threats against him by Islamic clerics, said last week that Straw "was expressing an important opinion, which is that veils suck, which they do. I think the veil is a way of taking power away from women."

Nazir Ahmed, the House of Lords' first Muslim legislator, joined the fray by criticizing British politicians and the media for "demonizing" the country's Muslims.

On BBC radio, Ahmed, a moderate lawmaker of the governing Labor Party, said: "The problem is that the politicians and some people in the media have used this for demonization of entire communities."

Video Disputes China's Claim Shooting Was In Self-Defense (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 15 — A Romanian videotape that appears to show Chinese security forces shooting two Tibetan refugees in the Himalayas contradicts Beijing's claim that the refugees were shot when soldiers acted in self-defense.

China acknowledged on Thursday that soldiers killed one refugee and wounded another on Sept. 30. The official New China News Agency said the soldiers acted only after about 70 refugees seeking to enter Nepal illegally from China attacked border troops.

The long-range video shows a slow, single-file line of Tibetan refugees climbing over a snow-covered mountain pass followed by Chinese troops. A rifle shot is heard and the first climber in the pack falls to the ground, followed by the climber at the tail end of the group.

A separate shot shows a uniformed Chinese soldier firing a rifle. It then shows several soldiers examining the shooting victims and escorting some detainees back to a camp.

The video was first shown on Pro TV, a private Romanian network, and was posted on the Internet. It was taken by Sergui Matei, a Romanian cameraman on a climbing expedition on Cho Oyu, a peak near China's border with Nepal.

Tibetans often cross into Nepal, at least partly because their spiritual leader, the Dalai Lama, visits there often. He lives in exile in India and is not permitted to visit China.

DOJ_NMG_0080932

The Sept. 30 incident was first reported by mountaineers in Nepal and was circulated by human rights groups, including the International Campaign for Tibet and Human Rights in China.

Witnesses quoted by human rights groups said that those who had been fired upon included monks, women and children and that the person who had been killed was a 25-year-old Tibetan Buddhist nun.

After the accusations, China's Foreign Ministry vowed to investigate. The New China News Agency subsequently issued a report that said the soldiers had fired in self-defense after soldiers had tried to persuade the group to return home. "The stowaways refused and attacked the soldiers," the agency said.

The video does not offer a comprehensive account. It was shot from a long distance — the narrator says the cameraman was more than half a mile away — and only a few faces are clearly identifiable.

But it does suggest that the shootings were not in direct response to an attack on soldiers. The refugees were spaced far apart on an arduous climb over a 19,000-foot-high pass, called Nanpa La, when the two victims fell.

The American ambassador in Beijing, Clark T. Randt Jr., went to the Foreign Ministry on Thursday to protest China's treatment of the refugees, an embassy representative said.

China Charges A Lawyer With Inciting Subversion (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 15 — The Chinese police have charged a prominent human rights lawyer with inciting subversion, part of a crackdown on people who have sought to use China's nascent legal system to limit the power of the state.

The lawyer, Gao Zhisheng, was taken into custody in mid-August and was formally arrested Sept. 21, but the police only recently made clear the nature of the charge, said his lawyer, Mo Shaoping.

If Mr. Gao ends up being indicted and tried on subversion charges, it could be one of the highest-profile prosecutions of an internationally recognized dissident in recent years.

China often uses the legal system to punish people it considers subversive. But in recent years it has mainly sought to prosecute them for violating ordinary criminal laws, like leaking state secrets, violating commercial codes, disrupting traffic or committing fraud.

Mr. Gao, 42, represented displaced homeowners, victims of official corruption and religious rights advocates, including members of the Falun Gong sect, which is banned in China.

He has become one of the most outspoken dissidents within China, writing frequent essays and polemics posted on the Internet that have sharply criticized the authorities and have predicted that the governing Communist Party will collapse because of corruption and abuse of power.

This year he helped organize sympathizers around the country to participate in a rolling hunger strike to protest abuses against members of Falun Gong and other acts of persecution.

His license to practice law was suspended late last year, and he lived under constant surveillance and effective house arrest until the police detained him during a family visit to Shandong Province.

Mr. Gao's wife, Geng He, has come under police pressure since his arrest and has told some longtime friends of Mr. Gao that neither she nor her husband requires legal representation, friends of the family said. Mr. Mo said that he had had no contact with Ms. Geng and that he had been retained by another relative of Mr. Gao.

Mr. Mo said the police had not allowed him to visit Mr. Gao because they said his case involved state secrets. In state secrets cases, the authorities can deny access to a lawyer until a formal indictment has been issued.

The state secrets exception to the visitation rule applies only if the suspect is formally charged with leaking state secrets, which Mr. Gao is not, Mr. Mo said.

"You cannot claim his case involves state secrets unless you charge him with leaking state secrets," he said. "I plan to protest their refusal to allow me to see him."

A spokesman for the Beijing Public Security Bureau did not respond to an inquiry about Mr. Gao's case.

Paulson's China Victory (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

Everyone seems to agree that China's leverage will be crucial if the world is going to contain North Korea's nuclear threat. Which is one more reason to congratulate Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, who recently prevented a U.S.-China blowup by persuading Chuck Schumer and Lindsey Graham to drop a Senate vote on their 27.5% tariff bill against China.

But lest this protectionist threat return in another political guise, it's worth recounting why they're so very wrong to consider the trade deficit with China a threat to U.S. prosperity. As the Senators recently argued on these pages, their complaint is that

DOJ_NMG_0080933

China's "continued [currency] manipulation is a form of protectionism, and it throws the whole global trading system out of balance." The pair have now thrown their support behind a bill sponsored by Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley and ranking Democrat Max Baucus that would empower Treasury to determine whether China has a "misaligned currency."

The $200 billion trade deficit with China is itself a meaningless hobgoblin, mattering far less than the volume of trade. U.S. imports from China have more than doubled (up 155%) since 2000 to $243 billion. But U.S. exports have climbed even faster, tripling since 2000. Through the first half of 2006, the value of U.S. goods shipped to China was up by nearly 40% and on pace to reach nearly $60 billion. (See the nearby table.) So if China is adopting currency policies to repel U.S. goods, they aren't working too well.

This explosion of cross-border commerce has worked to the benefit of both nations. China has had a compounded rate of GDP growth of 10% for the past five years. A report by McKinsey consulting finds that if anywhere near these rates of GDP growth are sustained over the next decade, poverty rates in China -- a nation barely able to maintain subsistence living standards for centuries -- will fall by two-thirds.

What has America gained? A surge in low-priced, high quality consumer products. Apparel, footwear, consumer electronics, computer equipment, and so on -- all of which Americans have bought voluntarily. Arguably the biggest beneficiary of China's emergence on the world trading stage has been America's poor, who have new access to bargain-priced consumer goods. A 27.5% China tariff would be the most regressive tax imposed on low income Americans in decades.

The standard response from the China-bashers (just as the Japan-bashers argued two decades ago) is that America is "exporting" jobs overseas. But over the time period that trade with China has surged, so has the number of new jobs created here. Yes, some U.S. manufacturers have lost market share to lower-cost Chinese competitors, and in recent years U.S. apparel and light manufacturing firms have brought a series of anti-dumping complaints against the Chinese.

But it's a myth that U.S. manufacturing is disappearing. A recent Cato Institute report shows that U.S. manufacturing output is up 50% in the past 12 years along with our expanding trade with China. And the National Association of Manufacturers reports that August was the tenth consecutive month in which U.S. manufactured goods exports rose more than imports. Outsourcing to China has allowed many U.S. companies to remain competitive against foreign producers, and a large chunk of U.S.-China trade is in fact intra-company trade conducted by American firms.

So has China "cheated" in the trade arena by holding the yuan artificially low relative to the dollar? The yuan has been pegged at 7.92 against the dollar since the mid-1990s, and Beijing has begun to allow a modest fluctuation in the last year or so. But this is not a "manipulation" of its exchange rate so much as it is a contracting out of its monetary system to the U.S. Federal Reserve Board. That strategy has allowed China to remove the uncertainty of exchange-rate fluctuations from investment decisions and allowed China to grow rapidly while controlling inflation (so long as the Fed controls it too, which is a separate issue).

The Chinese have thus avoided the bane of most developing nations of inept monetary controls leading to price fluctuations and periods of hyper-inflation. China was one of the few Asian nations that didn't face a crippling currency devaluation during the monetary crisis of the late 1990s.

Nor is it clear that a yuan revaluation of even 10% to 30% would have any meaningful impact on the U.S. trade deficit. China imports some $100 billion a year of raw materials. A stronger yuan would lower the price of those inputs, and thus of production costs, which could largely offset the impact of the stronger currency on export prices. And even if the U.S. were to ban all imports from China, the main effect would be to import those goods and services from elsewhere instead, albeit at higher prices. The U.S. runs a $500 billion a year capital input surplus, and the trade deficit by definition offsets those beneficial inflows.

* * *

The greatest Chinese danger to the U.S. economy isn't trade but is its undeveloped and politically controlled financial system. An estimated 10% to 25% of all China's bank loans are nonperforming. State ownership of the banks has fostered an unhealthy and destabilizing system of crony capitalism. U.S. policymakers should be urging Beijing to privatize its banking sector, capital markets and state owned enterprises. Rather than press for trade barriers that would raise prices here at home, it would also make more sense to pressure China to enforce U.S. copyrights and patents.

Back in 2001 when China was permitted to join the World Trade Organization, one non-negotiable condition was that China lower its punitive tariffs on imported goods -- which it has done. While China needs more reforms to sustain its growth, the U.S. hasn't helped its own policy credibility by such political stunts as Congress's opposition to the purchase of Unocal by a Chinese company. The U.S. wants and should expect Beijing's cooperation on nuclear proliferation and North Korea; it shouldn't waste its influence on such non-problems as expanding two-way trade.

ChÃ¡vez's U.N. Moment (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

DOJ_NMG_0080934

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

Why Do Latin Democrats Support Him?

It's election day for Hugo ChÃ¡vez -- not in Venezuela but at the United Nations General Assembly. Today a vote is due on his government's bid for a nonpermanent seat on the Security Council. ChÃ¡vez has spent most of this year campaigning for the job, traveling the world and promising tens of millions of dollars in aid to poor countries in Asia and Africa whose votes he's counting on. His ambition is a big one: to become the leader of global opposition to the United States, or, as he puts it, to "radically oppose the violent pressure that the empire exercises."

There's a fair chance he'll lose. Most vote counters at the United Nations think Venezuela will fall short of the 122 General Assembly votes it needs on the first ballot, as will its opponent for the seat, Guatemala. One of the two might win on subsequent ballots, but Latin American governments are already anticipating that a third candidate from the region -- such as Uruguay or the Dominican Republic -- will end up getting the job. If so it will be a wounding rebuff for ChÃ¡vez following his Bush-as-devil tirade before the assembly last month, and one that could hurt him in another vote, if it is free and fair: his bid for reelection as president in December. His opponent in that race has been hammering home the point that ChÃ¡vez is squandering the country's oil revenue on foolish foreign adventures.

A ChÃ¡vez defeat would save the Bush administration from embarrassment and spare the Security Council a nuisance factor. Still, there won't be much to celebrate. The fact that a clownish populist who has eagerly embraced the presidents of Iran, Belarus, Zimbabwe and Libya could even come close to getting two-thirds of the votes of the 192 U.N. members is testimony to how low U.S. prestige has sunk around the world. More specifically, it's a measure of how twisted U.S. relations with Latin America have become -- and also, how fragile the appeal of democratic values is in that region.

How twisted? Let's look at Chile, a country that has been convulsed by debate the past two months over whether to vote for or against ChÃ¡vez. Chile's democratic president, Michelle Bachelet, is a moderate leftist; her government has a free-trade agreement with the United States and just took delivery of new F-16s for its air force. Some in her party were sheltered during the Pinochet dictatorship by Venezuela's then-liberal democratic government. ChÃ¡vez has not only dismantled that democracy but has vociferously supported Bolivia's claim to a piece of Chile's coastline. Under a military pact he signed with Bolivia's leftist government, Venezuela is committed to building new military bases on Bolivia's border with Chile.

All this, and yet Bachelet was unable to decide on her government's vote by yesterday. Only strong opposition from the centrist Christian Democratic Party, a member of her coalition, prevented her from backing ChÃ¡vez. Why? A vote for Guatemala, she told Christian Democratic congressmen earlier this month, "would be a signal of little independence from the United States," which has been pressing hard for Guatemala's candidacy, according to an account of the meeting by the newspaper El Mercurio.

In other words, as Chile's president sees it, it's better to support a budding autocrat who promises to defend Iran's nuclear program on the Security Council, and may threaten her own country's security, than to be seen as close to Chile's largest trading partner and strategic arms supplier at a time when it is trying to use the Security Council to stop Iran (and North Korea) from acquiring nuclear weapons.

This certainly says something about Chile, and neighbors Brazil and Argentina, which are also supporting ChÃ¡vez: that they value Venezuela's investment in their economies more than preventing nuclear proliferation (ChÃ¡vez is buying debt from Argentina and aircraft from Brazil); that solidarity with a neighbor matters more than solidarity with other democracies (probably the only votes for Venezuela in the free world will come from Latin America and the Caribbean); that their governments prefer a weaker United States to a chastened Hugo ChÃ¡vez.

But this affair also underlines the continuing fecklessness of the Bush administration's approach to Latin America. There is its overreliance on faithful but small allies in Central America and its inability to come to terms with the region's giant, Brazil. There is its heavy-handed lobbying, which prompted Guatemala's foreign minister to say that he wished Washington "would not promote our cause so much." Most disturbing, there is the inability to win support from a nominally close ally such as Chile, even against an autocratic demagogue. ChÃ¡vez may lose the U.N. vote, but in the contest for Latin America, the United States isn't winning.

Chávez's U.N. Gambit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 16, 2006

To understand why so many Americans dislike the U.N., consider that Venezuela, of all countries, stands a chance today of being elected by a vote of the General Assembly to one of the 10 non-permanent seats on the 15-member Security Council.

This is the same country whose megalomaniac ruler, Hugo Chávez, ranted against the U.S. last month to the laughter and applause of the assembled General Assembly grandees at Turtle Bay. His international initiatives this year have included warmer ties with North Korea and Iran, buying weapons from Russia and sowing revolution throughout Latin America.

DOJ_NMG_0080935

Venezuela's competition for the Latin American two-year seat that opens next year is Guatemala, a democracy that has never had a seat on the Security Council and is active in peacekeeping in Haiti and Africa. Guatemala signaled its intention to seek this seat in 2002, only to watch as Mr. Chávez jumped in the race in 2005 to get a larger megaphone for his radical views. The Caracas strongman has since played his oil card around the world to buy support, and he has the backing of the world's club of dictators.

The world's democracies in North and Central America, Europe and Asia are lining up behind Guatemala. In Latin America, Colombia and Mexico are also backing Guatemala, while Argentina and Brazil are supporting Venezuela, perhaps out of misguided leftist solidarity. The left-of-center government in Chile is on the fence, no doubt alarmed by Mr. Chávez but also fearful of crossing him.

With a two-thirds majority required to declare a winner in a secret ballot, more than several rounds of voting are expected. If Mr. Chávez wins, we'll know that most U.N. members prefer anti-American posturing to a credible Security Council.

Orhan Pamuk's Nobel Prize (NYT)

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Orhan Pamuk, the Turkish novelist who has won this year's Nobel Prize in Literature, is not an overtly political writer. But like every serious artist, Mr. Pamuk lives in a world where the freedom to speak the truth has to be reasserted every day against political forces that would rather not hear it.

Mr. Pamuk's prize is richly deserved. It was awarded for a body of work, fiction and nonfiction, that is driven by the conscience of imagination as well as the conscience of memory. In books like "Snow," "My Name Is Red" and "Istanbul," he has made Turkey, past and present, a vital part of the modern reader's literary atlas. And in turn, it is Turkey that has given Mr. Pamuk his political edge.

Islamists and Turkish nationalists tend to think of Mr. Pamuk as a literary provocateur, especially for his brief but candid remarks about the Armenian genocide quoted in a Swiss magazine last year. But we think Mr. Pamuk was speaking the truth. For the sake of art and conscience, he has resisted any effort to quiet his literary voice.

Some of those efforts, like the offer to become a Turkish "state artist," which he declined, were flattering. Others, like the recent prosecution against him, since dropped, for anti-Turkish remarks, were not so flattering.

Mr. Pamuk's Nobel will be a popular one, except, of course, among people who believe that artists should be allowed to work only under political or religious supervision. His prize is also a reminder of how often the Nobel has been given to a writer whose work exposes the tension between the state and the artist.

We read Mr. Pamuk's books as they should be read — for the imaginative and linguistic pleasure in them — seldom remembering that every artist's freedom to speak is our freedom, too. This prize helps us remember that.

DOJ_NMG_0080936

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, October 16, 2006 8:23 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, October 14, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061014.pdf; agnb061014.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

US Appeals Warrantless Surveillance Ruling To 6th Circuit.....3
SouthCom Investigates Guantanamo Abuse Charges.....3
Swiss Say Banks Broke Law By Giving Data To US.....3
Georgia Imam Pleads Guilty To Providing Material Support For Hamas.....4

Homeland Response:

Bush Signs Bill To Increase Port Security.....4
TSA Seeks To Boost Attendance For Flight Attendant Counterterror Training.....5
FAA Bans General Aviation Along East River.....5
Many Immigrant Office Cleaners In Manhattan Fell Ill After 9/11.....5
Cruise Ship Industry Returns To Boost New Orleans.....5

War News:

US, UK Downplay British General's Assessment Of Iraq.....6
Bush Seen As Open To Policy Shift On Troop Withdrawal.....7
Experts Offer Iraq Policy Options Contrasting With Administration's.....7
Army Campaigns "Hard" For More Funding.....7
Doubts About Maliki Government Grow.....8
Al Sistani's Influence Is Declining.....8
Interior Minister Blames Iraqi Bloodshed On Facilities Protection Service.....8
Respected Iraqi Colonel Is Killed.....9
15 Killed Across Iraq.....9
SEAL Falls On Grenade To Save Comrades.....9
UK Coroner Says US Military Killed UK Journalist.....9
US Citizen Sentenced To Death In Iraq.....9
Shays Suggests Abu Ghraib Abuses Were "More About Pornography Than Torture."..... 10
Afghan Suicide Bombing Kills Eight..... 10
Illinois Town Mourns Two Casualties..... 10
NYTimes Review Of "Hubris" Harshly Critical Of Administration.....10

Criminal Law:

Ney Pleads Guilty To Corruption Involving Abramoff.....11
Shimkus Testifies About His Handling Of Foley Allegations...12
Kolbe's Camping Trip With Minors Is Subject Of Federal Investigation.....12
Weldon Reportedly Subject Of FBI Corruption Probe.....12
Judge Rejects Ryan Bid To Remain Free Pending Appeal...13
Unrepentant Tennessee Lawmaker Sentenced To Five Years In Prison.....13
Former NYPD Detective Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison.....13
Body Of Missing Vermont Student Found In Gorge Near Campus.....14
9th Circuit Upholds "Absurd" Sentence.....14
Gonzales, Mueller To Speak At Boston Law Enforcement Conference.....14

Civil Law:

California Man Pursues Claim That Los Angeles Port Misused Funds.....15
Bankruptcy Filings Down Sharply.....15
Air America Declares Bankruptcy.....15

Civil Rights:

DOJ Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Bias.....15
DOJ Assists Clarksville, TN, With Police Department Woes...16
DOJ Settles Redlining Allegations With Indiana Bank.....16
DOJ Asked To Probe Florida Beating Death.....16
Judge Orders Mississippi County To Explain Jail Hiring Practices.....17
Gallaudet Has Protesters Arrested.....17
Opposition To Gay Marriage Seen As Losing Steam.....17

Antitrust:

FCC Delays Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Merger.....18

Microsoft Agrees To Vista Changes 19

Environment:

Bush Signs Bill Reauthorizing $80 Million For Great Lakes Restoration 20
Concerns Raised About Environmental Impact of US Population Growth 20
NYT Accuses EPA Of Ignoring Science On Air Quality 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Indicts Medical Marijuana Advocate On New Charges 20
Cali Drug Cartel Pleas Were 15 Years In The Making 21
Colorado Man Pleads Guilty In Bomb Case 21

Immigration:

Judge Allows Lawsuit To Proceed Against Tyson's For Hiring Illegal Aliens 21

Congress-Administration:

House Government Reform Committee Finds Data Breaches Across Government 22
McClellan Cites Cost Savings Of Medicare Rx Drug Benefit 22
White House Rejects Allegations In Kuo Book 22
Air Force Memorial To Be Unveiled 23
Rep. Charles Taylor Demands WSJournal Retract Allegations 23
NYT Book Review Questions Rove's Success In Making Progress On Agenda 23

Other News:

Lower Gas Prices Spur Consumer Spending 24
Dow Sets New Record By Slight Margin 25
GE Report Suggests US, Global Economy Performing Well 25
Courts See Upswing In Cases Regarding Long-Term Care Health Insurance 25
Spotlight On Gay Republicans Seen As Threatening GOP Base 26
McClatchy Reimburses Nonprofit For McConnell Investigation 26
Bush To Campaign For Sherwood And Allen This Week 26
Some GOP Insiders Claim Bush Is Unprepared For Midterm Losses 27
GOP Unable To Fully Fund Candidates In Several Tight Senate Races 27
Kerry Blasts Republicans Over "Lies" About Iraq, North Korea And Foley 27
Allen's Cash On Hand Total More Than Double Webb's 27
Menendez Leads Kean In Cash On Hand $5.5 Million To $3.2 Million 28
Steele Angered By Cardin's Attempts To Tie Him To Bush 28
Harris Said To Have "Squandered" GOP's Chance To Defeat Nelson 28
Bay Area Liberals Mobilize Opposition To Doolittle And Pombo 28
Three Southern California GOP House Seats Safe Despite Corruption Allegations 29
Democrats Work To Block Notices For Ballots Cast For Foley 29
Several Other Once-Safe GOP Seats In Florida Considered Vulnerable 29
Immigration Key In Hayworth House Race 29
Anti-GOP Sentiment, Strong Challenger Present Hurdles For Wolf 30
Democrats Find Success Recruiting Physically Attractive Candidates 30
Political Candidates Find MySpace Useful In Communicating Message 30
Ehrlich And O'Malley To Engage In Two Debates Saturday 30
Dowd Warns McCain Against Attacking Hillary 30
UN Considers "Significant" Sanctions On North Korea 31
Rice Trip To Asia Expected To Focus On Nonproliferation 33
Iran Said To Be Watching How North Korea Is Handled 33
Ban Appointed Secretary General Of UN 34
Violence Continues In Gaza 34
Bush Expands Sudan Sanctions 34
Incentives Said To Favor Russian, Georgian Escalations 35
Britain, Ireland Offer New North Ireland Agreement 35
Unlike Neighbors, Chile Embraces Trade With China 35
Book Examines Spy That Betrayed US Intelligence Secrets To Cuba 35
Founder Of Micro-Loan Program Awarded Nobel Peace Prize 36

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 36

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 37
Other 37

DOJ_NMG_0080939

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Appeals Warrantless Surveillance Ruling To 6th Circuit. The AP (10/14, Irwin) reports, "The Justice Department on Friday asked a federal appeals court to throw out a lower court decision that said the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program is unconstitutional." The AP continues, "The president has said the program is needed in the war on terrorism. U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit agreed with the program's opponents when she ruled Aug. 17 that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers." The AP adds, 'Government lawyers said in pleadings filed Friday with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the surveillance program 'is necessary to protect the nation from an ongoing national security threat of the highest order and is vital to waging and winning the ongoing armed conflict.' … Taylor's injunction 'dismantles a vital tool that already has helped detect and disrupt al-Qaida plots,' the Justice Department attorneys argued. They also said Taylor's order barring use of the program 'in any way' showed the judge dealt with sensitive national security issues in a 'blunderbuss manner.'" The AP notes, "A three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based appeals court ruled Oct. 4 that the administration could keep the program in place while it appeals Taylor's decision. The judges said their ruling considered the likelihood an appeal would succeed, the potential damage to both sides, and the public interest. … The appeal is likely to take months."

SouthCom Investigates Guantanamo Abuse Charges. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 4, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Some barroom bragging has prompted an investigation into whether terror suspects at Guantanamo Bay were abused. A U.S. Marine sergeant says she blew the whistle after hearing guards boasting at a bar about beating prisoners. Today the Pentagon told the U.S. Southern Command to look into it. Meanwhile, the Red Cross just wrapped up a visit to Guantanamo, meeting with 14 new prisoners there, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the 9/11 mastermind."

The AP (10/13, Selsky) reports, "The U.S. Southern Command on Friday launched an investigation into 'credible allegations' that guards at Guantanamo Bay abused detainees, and appointed an Army colonel to head the probe. … Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, who represents a detainee at the U.S. naval base in eastern Cuba, filed the 'hotline' complaint last week. Vokey attached a sworn statement from his paralegal, Sgt. Heather Cerveny, 23."

Red Cross Will Give US Confidential Suggestions. The AP (10/13, Selsky) reports, "The Red Cross will make confidential recommendations to the U.S. government after meeting at Guantanamo Bay with 14 new detainees, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks … The encounters apparently mark the first time the 14 detainees have spoken with anyone other than their captors since they were arrested." A Red Cross spokesman "said there were now 454 detainees at Guantanamo and the Red Cross has private access to all of them."

Lawyer Says Gitmo Detainee's Confession Was Coerced. The Washington Post (10/14, Leonnig, 748K) reports on Abdul Rahim, a 22-year-old who claims that he "endured cigarette burns, electric shocks and repeated beatings at the hands of Taliban soldiers who captured him in 2000, he said -- all because he refused to fight for al-Qaeda." Ironically, the US now holds him allegedly because of "the false confession Rahim gave to placate his Taliban torturers." His "account of being imprisoned and tortured by the Taliban is supported by newspaper accounts about Rahim and fellow prisoners whom the Taliban abandoned when U.S. forces began bombing Afghanistan in the fall of 2001. It is also supported by documents from impartial agencies that had contact with Rahim, notably the International Committee of the Red Cross."

Swiss Say Banks Broke Law By Giving Data To US. The New York Times (10/14, Bilefsky, Lichtblau, 1.21M) reports, "Swiss banks broke their nation's laws by providing banking information to American counterterrorism officials, Switzerland's top data-protection official said Friday. The banks, known for safeguarding privacy, should have informed customers using the Swift money-transfer service that their data could be passed on to third parties, the Swiss official, Hanspeter Thür, said." His opinion differed from "the views of the Swiss finance minister, Hans-Rudolf Merz, who said last month that giving the Central Intelligence Agency such access did not infringe on the country's banking secrecy rules." The AP (10/14) briefly reports the same story.

DOJ_NMG_0080940

Georgia Imam Pleads Guilty To Providing Material Support For Hamas. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/14, Rankin) reported, "The prayer leader of a North Georgia mosque has pleaded guilty to federal charges of providing material support to the Islamic militant group Hamas." Mohamed Shorbagi, "who lived near Rome, entered his guilty plea on Aug. 28, federal authorities said Friday. Shorbagi's court documents were unsealed in U.S. District Court in Atlanta Friday morning. … Said FBI Special Agent in Charge Gregory Jones, 'It is very disturbing to see people in the United States who are so willing to offer their assistance to known terrorist organizations, and this case should remind us all of the continued need to be vigilant.'" US Attorney David Nahmias said that "Shorbagi was a Georgia representative for the Holy Land Foundation and attended foundation meetings at which high-level Hamas officials made presentations condemning Israel." The Journal-Constitution noted, "Shorbagi's plea agreement states he is to be sentenced to 15 years in prison, the maximum allowed under federal sentencing guidelines."

The New York Times (10/14, Goodman, 1.21M) reports, "In a case kept secret for nearly two months, the religious leader of a mosque in Rome, Ga., has pleaded guilty to providing financial support to the militant Palestinian organization Hamas...the 42-year-old defendant, Mohamed Shorbagi, a citizen of the Palestinian territories who is living legally in the United States with his wife and young children, was charged on Aug. 28 with providing aid to Hamas through donations he made to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an Islamic charity shut down by federal authorities in 2001." The Washington Post/AP (10/14, Bluestein) also reports the story.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Signs Bill To Increase Port Security. President Bush's signing of a bill to increase port security was primarily covered by the Washington Times and the wire services. The Washington Times (10/14, Curl, 88K) reports, "President Bush yesterday signed a law to protect U.S. ports from terrorists smuggling weapons into the United States hidden within the 11 million containers that enter the country each year." It "authorizes $3.4 billion over five years for safety measures, including the installation of radiation detectors at the 22 largest U.S. ports by the end of next year. More inspectors will be hired to increase the number of random searches of containers." In response, Rep. Edward Markey "called the new law a 'sham port bill' and complained it did not go far enough by authorizing only a pilot program to study scanning of cargo containers headed for the United States from three ports."

The wire services highlighted the political angle of the issue as the midterm elections approach. The AP (10/14, Loven) reports Bush "used the bill-signing ceremony to assert that Republicans are tough on terror, a key issue in congressional elections just less than four weeks away." But Bush "didn't mention an unrelated provision that seeks to put teeth into laws that forbid most online gambling. Instead, Bush focused on the multiple ways the legislation tightens security and closes a loophole in anti-terror defenses, especially at ports."

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, 918K) publishes a similar version of the AP article adding that while Democrats supported the bill, "Bush was accompanied at the bill-signing ceremony by one Democrat, Sen. Patty Murray of Washington, alongside a slew of Republican lawmakers. For weeks the president has insisted that Republicans are tough on terror and that Democrats would make the country weaker." The AP adds, "Murray said that for the first time in many years, she will sleep well, knowing that ports in Seattle and other cities will be safer. Murray, who has been working on the bill for more than five years, said it was gratifying to see the president sign a bipartisan bill 'in an extremely political month,' with midterm elections a few weeks away."

AFP (10/14) reports, "Hoping to retain control of Congress in legislative elections on November 7, lawmakers in Bush's Republican party adopted the measure two weeks ago to persuade voters that they are better able to prevent another terrorist attack." They "rode the security issue to electoral victory in 2002 and 2004. But the same strategy may falter this year amid growing public anxiety about the war in Iraq and the economy." And "Bush, who has portrayed the opposition Democrats as failing to grasp the nature of the terrorist threat after the attacks of September 11, 2001, used the signing ceremony as an opportunity to hammer home his campaign message on security."

Bush Signs Law To Crack Down On Internet Gambling. In a front page story the Washington Post (10/14, A1, Ahrens, 748K) briefly notes Bush signed the port security bill and focused instead on the bill's impact on internet gambling, which "was effectively criminalized by the federal government yesterday, as lawmakers work to eliminate an activity enjoyed by as many as 23 million Americans who wagered an estimated $6 billion last year." Although "proponents decried the effects of gambling on society, opponents pointed to the enormous popularity of Internet gambling and compared the new law to the Prohibition amendment of 1919." It "is potentially crippling to a worldwide industry whose biggest customer has been the United States." Even the WTO "has a stake in the game. The organization has ruled that the United States violates trade treaties by outlawing offshore online gambling while tolerating some forms of U.S.-based online gambling, citing the horse-racing ambiguity." But bill sponsor Rep. Bob Goodlatte said, "There are family problems, bankruptcy problems, gambling addiction, gambling by minors, using gambling to launder money for criminal and terrorist organizations and organized crime. It does not help our society."

DOJ_NMG_0080941

TSA Seeks To Boost Attendance For Flight Attendant Counterterror Training. ABC World News (10/13, story 7, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Since the 9/11 attacks flight attendants have been calling for self-defense training. Now, the Transportation Security Administration has launched it." ABC (Stark): "Congress required the Transportation Security Administration to develop this course. It's offered free to flight crews. But it is not required. Out of the 220,000 eligible, a mere 300 have managed to attend. They have to do so on their own time. And cover any cost to get to the course, which used to last three days. The Air Marshals now run the program. They've shortened it to a day, to try to boost enrollment."

FAA Bans General Aviation Along East River. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 5, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight, the F.A.A. announced it is banning low-altitude flights by small private planes in New York city's East River corridor. It's a safety precaution after the crash this week that killed New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and his flight instructor."

Many Immigrant Office Cleaners In Manhattan Fell Ill After 9/11. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Barry, 918K) reports, "The dust around ground zero, we now know, contained caustic, finely pulverized concrete, trillions of microscopic fibers of glass, and particles of lead, mercury and arsenic, as well as carcinogens like asbestos and dioxin. … An ever-growing number of New Yorkers is coming forward to describe symptoms: the first responders who plunged into the tangled wreckage to find survivors; the volunteers who hauled diesel fuel and doled out cigarettes; the students at Stuyvesant High School who returned to classes while acrid fires burned nearby. Less visible is the army of cleaning workers who were sent to the area to clean office buildings."

Cruise Ship Industry Returns To Boost New Orleans. The Washington Times/AP (10/14, Sayre) reports, "The New Orleans' cruise ship industry returns to service tomorrow when the 2,000-passenger Norwegian Sun becomes the first regularly scheduled liner to cast off from the city's docks since Hurricane Katrina." After the negative impact of Katrina "the business is starting over" as "tomorrow's voyage marks the return of regularly scheduled service of four- to seven-day voyages. For a time after Katrina, two cruise ships moored at New Orleans to provide housing for emergency workers." The AP adds, "The port is opening a third cruise terminal and a 1,000-vehicle garage at a cost of $38 million that will give the facility the ability to handle two large passenger ships at once. It is bullish enough to be making plans for a fourth terminal." Yet, "Bob Wall, owner of the New Orleans-based travel agency Vacations at Sea, said the first year probably would only be modest as the ships get re-established. He thinks bookings will increase steadily in the coming months."

Microloan Program Suggested To Aid Katrina Survivors. Nobel Peace Prize winner and economist Muhammad Yunus in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (10/14, A6, 2.03M) suggests initiating a microfinancing program to help Katrina survivors writing, "Many people ask, Why not just give free cash, especially under such dire circumstances? In Bangladesh, we've learned that when aid is free, not only do the poor get the least of it, but everyone inflates their needs." But "Microlending has already helped millions reach a better life through their own initiative. It has also given them valuable skills as well as crucial financial back-up in case they ever face a natural disaster like Katrina. So it might be time to think about another type of support for Katrina's victims: the microloan. As our small, flood-battered country has learned, giving someone a hand up doesn't always require a handout. The most important thing is to help people get back to work while letting them hold on to their self-respect. Microloans can do just that."

DOJ_NMG_0080942

WAR NEWS:

US, UK Downplay British General's Assessment Of Iraq. ABC World News (10/13, story 5, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The British government is struggling to stamp out a furor over statements that made by a top general. Today, General Richard Dannatt insisted he was not at odds with his government's policy." Gen. Dannatt: "We've got to get on with it. We can't be there for years and years in the sort of numbers that we are. We all recognize that. There's nothing new in what I'm saying there." Gibson: "Dannatt did stand by his claim that the presence of British troops was exacerbating the violence in Iraq."

The New York Times (10/14, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "The British government raced Friday to defuse an embarrassing public debate over remarks by" Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, its top military commander, "that Britain should withdraw its troops from Iraq 'sometime soon.'" He "modified some of his remarks in a series of radio and television interviews," saying that "By 'soon,'…he meant that British troops should not remain there for 'years and years.' But he did not completely retract his assessment that the presence of British forces in Iraq 'exacerbated' the violence there." Prime Minister Tony Blair "insisted that, having read transcripts of the general's interviews on Friday, he was echoing official policy," and White House spokesman Tony Snow "also tried to dull the remarks, saying, 'His general point was that, you know, when your work is done you hand over authority to the Iraqis.'"

The Washington Post (10/14, A18, Jordan, 748K) adds, "Snow said Dannatt believed his comments had been 'largely taken out of context.'" Dannatt "said he was not 'backtracking' but expanding on his remarks," adding that "there was no 'rift' between him and Prime Minister Tony Blair." The Financial Times (10/14, Blitz) notes, "Blair was last night fighting to limit the damage to his Iraq policy" by this "unheard of action for a serving leader of the armed forces." The AP (10/13, Haddon) reports that Blair "insisted that there was no difference of opinion between him and army chief General Sir Richard Dannatt."

General Dannatt's Remarks Seen As Reflecting US Generals' Positions. NBC Nightly News (10/13, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It was the shot heard round the world and it came from the commander of the British army. He is on the record as saying British troops have no business in Iraq and should come home. While he has since changed his stance a bit, his words sent shockwaves through British forces. It wasn't what American forces needed to hear, either. As they are already facing an unraveling and violent situation on the ground, counter to their goal of democracy taking hold." NBC (Miklaszewski): "The general's remarks sent political shockwaves through both the British and U.S. Governments but what the British general had to say publicly is what many U.S. generals are saying privately." UK Gen. Richard Dannatt: "We're exacerbating it in the sense that because we are there, we provide a target and we are attacked, ergo, if we are not there, we wouldn't be attacked and the situation would be calmer." Miklaszewski: "It may sound surprising, but that's not far off the position of the U.S. military commanders. Despite a recent spike in deadly sectarian violence, senior U.S. military officials fear that throwing many more American troops into the fight would only intensify the problem and increase U.S. casualties. More troubling, senior U.S. military officials tell NBC News, 'the fabric of law in Iraq is unraveling' and fear that Prime Minister Maliki will not deliver on his pledge to take on sectarian militias."

Blair Seen As Losing Clout. The AP (10/13, Gardiner) reports, "His army chief's brazen declaration that British troops should soon leave Iraq is the latest evidence that the once-formidable prime minister -- who rode out a fierce party rebellion just last month -- may be rapidly losing his political clout."

NY Daily News Concurs With Dannatt. The New York Daily News (10/14, 729K) editorializes, "There is undeniably growing sentiment even in hardy stay-the-course circles that the Iraqi mission -- just and high-minded though it was at the beginning, just and high-minded though it remains -- has been no howling triumph. ... The Iraqis absolutely must begin to take charge of their own affairs."

Basra Shiites Want British To Leave. The AP (10/14) reports, "Many Shiites in this southern port city say they want British troops to leave, though the region is still bloodied by a persistent grind of killings, including Sunni insurgent bombings and Shiite-on-Shiite slayings amid a competition for political control." Basra leaders "agreed with an assessment by Britain's army chief that the British presence only worsens the violence and the soldiers should withdraw soon." Shiites claim that "the British presence only provides a target for attackers seeking to end the 'occupation' -- and some said the troops are doing nothing to rein in party-backed Shiite militias that have risen to prominence."

DOJ_NMG_0080943

Bush Seen As Open To Policy Shift On Troop Withdrawal. CBS Evening News (10/13, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With opposition to the war in Iraq growing and no end in sight plans are now being drawn up to start withdrawing U.S. troops." CBS (Martin): "The Bush Administration has repeatedly opposed setting a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq. But two separate sets of advisors -- one inside the Pentagon and one outside -- are now developing plans for what would amount to a withdrawal schedule. Previously rejected as telling the enemy how long they'd have to hold out, a withdrawal schedule is now seen as a way of forcing the Iraqi government to accept more responsibility and of removing what the head of the British Army identified as one of the causes of the violence: The presence of a foreign army." In addition to the Iraq Study Group, Marine Lieutenant General John Sattler "is developing what one source called a forcing mechanism that would set target dates for the turnover of areas now controlled by American forces to Iraqi troops. Setting a date and sticking to it worked for the Iraqi elections, this source said, suggesting the same model could apply to troop levels. None of these options has been approved yet, but the subject of setting a timetable for troop withdrawals is now on the table." Couric asked, whether "the President will buy this idea?" Martin replied, "Well, he said just this week if his military commanders come in and tell him he needs to do something differently in Iraq, he would accept their advice. So if the military -- and it's still an if -- were to come in with a recommendation for setting some sort of schedule, it would seem likely he would go along."

More Commentary On Troop Withdrawal. Scripps Howard News (10/14) commentator John Hall writes that, despite James Baker's intentions, "The president, more than once, said he was open to any kind of tactical change in course that his top commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., would bring to him. But he seems more entrenched, not less so, on his message that 'the enemy's coming after us' if there should be a premature withdrawal of troops from Iraq.. … Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney, and the network of neo-conservatives who backed the war from the start have formed a protective wall around the existing strategy for a long time."

Experts Offer Iraq Policy Options Contrasting With Administration's. Late in its broadcast, CBS devoted a significant amount of time to interviews with three international national security experts, all of whom offered policy options on Iraq different from the Administration's. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 8, 4:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "You hear about it every night. The violence in Iraq just keeps getting worse. In our latest CBS News/New York Times poll, two-thirds of the respondents told us they believe the war is going badly. But what should the United States do about it?"

Retired U.S. Army Major General Paul Eaton, who was in charge of training the Iraqi military during the first year of the war, said, "with the need to engage across the waterfront we feel need to engage with Syria, get our ambassador back there and we need to get an embassy up and running in Tehran so that we've got at least the opportunity to develop a local engagement."

Anne-Marie Slaughter, dean of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton, said, "Well, I certainly agree with General Eaton that we should be working with Iran and Syria, because the long-term solution is going to require negotiations across the region. But immediately I actually think we have to recognize we are in the middle of a civil war and a civil war typically ends when one side has won decisively. I think we're going to have to stand aside, protect as many Iraqi civilians as possible, but effectively let militias fight it out."

Asked how the US could extricate itself, Daniel Benjamin, an international fellow with the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said, "It's not clear it can. It's not clear that we have any leverage anymore or what we have won't disappear very quickly. We can do a couple of things and one is that we can hold out an option to the parties that there will be an equitable division of resources in the country and that there's a big aid package."

Army Campaigns "Hard" For More Funding. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Brown) reports, "The Army is campaigning hard to ensure that it has enough money to keep up the battles in Iraq and Afghanistan and to prepare for potential future conflicts. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, says the service needs $138 billion in 2008 to ensure it can field as many as 19 combat brigades at any given time, as called for by the Pentagon's latest four-year strategy." The Army "has borne the brunt of manpower and equipment losses. More than 2,100 of the 3,100 U.S. troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan have been Army soldiers. The Army plans to spend $17.1 billion this year to replace or repair equipment that's been lost or damaged, including more than 2,000 vehicles awaiting overhaul." Analysts Loren Thompson and Frederick Kagan discuss the nation's lack of solicitude toward an all-volunteer military and the need to have enough troops for the Iraq war and "other strategic commitments."

DOJ_NMG_0080944

Funding For Additional Troops Seen As Unaffordable. Scripps Howard News (10/14) in an editorial warns, "According to the Congressional Research Service, Congress already has appropriated $437 billion for war, not including $70 billion approved by the Senate as part of next year's record-breaking Pentagon budget ... The fighting in Afghanistan, home of the Taliban and training ground of the 9/11 terrorists, is one thing. But an increasing number of Americans see Iraq as a war we can no longer afford."

Doubts About Maliki Government Grow. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Youssef) reports, "In the five months since Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki became Iraq's leader, the parliament and his ministries have formed hundreds of committees ... No one knows precisely how many committees have been formed - one estimate puts the number at 400. ... That lack of action is eroding Iraqi citizens' and U.S. officials' confidence that Maliki's government will be able to address the problems that plague this country, a development that would leave the U.S. with virtually no policy alternative." McClatchy adds, "There's a growing chorus that Maliki's government is unlikely to ever come to terms with the country's problems, a complaint reflected in Iraqi Web logs, newspaper columns, and, U.S. civilian and military officials say, in private conversations."

An Estimated Million Of Iraqis Have Fled Country. NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 2, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "And now to another aspect of all this fallout from the everyday violence and danger in Iraq. The million or so Iraqis who have left their homes, in nothing short of an exodus. These are ordinary citizens leaving the homes and lives they've all known for years, sometimes for safer places inside Iraq, but more often, they are leaving Iraq altogether." NBC (Engel): "It's the office of last resort -- Baghdad's main passport agency. It's so crowded with Iraqis who want to leave, the government ordered it to stay open seven days a week. Haifa and Hassan Rubaiee, both professors at Baghdad's university, have their passports. They're packing to move to Syria, joining what the government said this week was a million Iraqis who have left since the war."

Al Sistani's Influence Is Declining. The AP (10/13, Hendawi) reports, "Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani once wielded so much influence he seemed to single-handedly chart the post- Saddam Hussein political future" but "priorities for Shiite political parties have changed and their leaders no longer appear to feel the need to be seen to be closely associated with al-Sistani to gain legitimacy. Now, the country's top Shiite cleric appears powerless as Iraq edges toward civil war. ... It is a power shift that does not bode well for Iraq's Shiite-dominated government or the U.S.-led military coalition as they try to contain the stubborn Sunni insurgency and the wave of sectarian killings that has swelled since last winter."

Interior Minister Blames Iraqi Bloodshed On Facilities Protection Service. The Washington Post (10/14, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports, "Iraq's interior minister on Friday rejected allegations that Iraq's police and military have played a major role in the death squads blamed for Baghdad's surging violence, saying that only a small number of all those caught in U.S. or Iraqi raids were members of the police or army. Jawad al-Bolani, speaking to a small group of reporters in Baghdad, blamed the Facilities Protection Service, or FPS, a massive but unregulated government guard force whose numbers he put at about 150,000." The Post adds, "American generals were among the first to publicly express suspicion that the Facilities Protection Service was playing a key role in the growing sectarian killings. U.S. commanders themselves started the agency soon after the 2003 U.S-led invasion, intending it to be a force of a few thousand men who would guard buildings against looting."

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Daragahi, 918K) reports, that Interior Minister Bolani "acknowledged that he was powerless when it came to security in large areas of the capital, especially in Sunni-dominated western Baghdad."

Interior Minister Vows To Clean House At Own Ministry. The New York Times (10/14, Semple, Luo, 1.21M) reports, "Iraq's interior minister, under pressure from Western officials and some Iraqi leaders to purge the ministry of sectarian influence, said Friday that he was preparing to reshuffle its leadership, and that he had the political backing to carry out the plan. ... Although Mr. Bolani has made some strides toward accomplishing his reform goals, including firing thousands of employees, Western officials and some Iraqi officials have said that he has lacked the political support to conduct the necessary purges, particularly at the upper levels of the ministry. According to American officials close to the ministry, among the commanders Mr. Bolani may replace is Adnan al-Asadi, the deputy minister of administration, who is suspected of abetting the Shiite militias. Mr. Bolani denied those assertions on Friday." Observers fear that his political independence "has left him without the political muscle to make radical, necessary changes in the institution."

DOJ_NMG_0080945

Respected Iraqi Colonel Is Killed. The Washington Post (10/14, A1, Knickmeyer, Finer, 748K) in a front page article reports, "Col. Salam al-Mamuri and his Scorpion commando team were a rarity among Iraqi security forces, American and Iraqi colleagues said: a police unit fighting on both sides of the country's sectarian divide. On Friday, a bomb blew apart Mamuri and an aide at the Scorpions' headquarters in the southern city of Hilla. The attack ended the life of a broadly respected commander who had been one of the longest-serving and longest-surviving men in a cadre of Iraqi army veterans struggling to restore law and order after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion." The Post quotes Iraqis and a Special Forces member praising Mamuri's courage and "comparative evenhandedness" in fighting both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias.

15 Killed Across Iraq. The AP (10/13, Bodeen) reports, "At least 15 people were killed in attacks Friday around Iraq, including the commander of a battalion of special Interior Ministry police and six women and two girls who were shot south of Baghdad." In the case of police Col. Mamuri's assassination, officials "were investigating whether the bomb could have been placed by a policeman from the brigade."

Eight Females Killed, Two Teenaged Girls Kidnapped In Iraq. The AP (10/13, Hendawi) reports, "Gunmen attacked Shiite women picking vegetables in a field outside the capital Friday, killing six adults and two young girls and kidnapping two teenagers. It was one of the deadliest assaults specifically targeting women in Iraq's monthslong wave of sectarian violence." Police theorized the gunmen were Sunni insurgents; the AP comments, "Previous major attacks in Iraq have killed many women and men together, and at times individual women have been shot or kidnapped. But rarely have large groups of women been attacked."

SEAL Falls On Grenade To Save Comrades. The AP (10/14, Watkins) reports from Ramadi, "A Navy SEAL sacrificed his life to save his comrades by throwing himself on top of a grenade Iraqi insurgents tossed into their sniper hideout, fellow members of the elite force said. Petty Officer 2nd Class Michael A. Monsoor had been near the only door to the rooftop structure Sept. 29 when the grenade hit him in the chest and bounced to the floor, said four SEALs." Sixteen SEALS have been killed in Afghanistan, while only two have been killed in Iraq; "Navy spokesman Lt. Taylor Clark said the low number of deaths among SEALs in Iraq is a testament to their training."

UK Coroner Says US Military Killed UK Journalist. The Washington Post (10/14, A18, Adam, Sullivan, 748K) reports that British coroner Andrew Walker "ruled Friday that U.S. troops unlawfully killed" British television journalist Terry Lloyd "during the invasion of Iraq in March 2003." He added he would seek prosecution of the U.S. troops responsible for the death." Lloyd's widow, Lynn "called the incident a 'very serious war crime' and said the troops responsible should be tried for murder." The Defense Department "said in a statement that U.S. military authorities had investigated the incident and determined that the American troops 'followed the applicable rules of engagement.'" The AP (10/14, Wagner) adds that Lynn called her husband's death a "despicable, deliberate, vengeful act." The New York Times (10/14, Cowell, 1.21M) mentions the coroner's findings in an article on the top British general's comments about Iraq. AFP (10/13) reports the Pentagon's "rejection" of the coroner's finding, in which the Pentagon said, "We have always gone to extreme measures to avoid civilian casualties and collateral damage."

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Murphy, 918K) reports, "Unlike many journalists who were traveling with American forces at the beginning of the war, Lloyd and his crew were operating near the southern Iraqi city of Basra on their own, a strategy many journalists believed would allow them to get a more impartial view of the war."

US Citizen Sentenced To Death In Iraq. The Washington Post (10/14, White, 748K) reports, "A U.S. citizen who allegedly orchestrated the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists near Baghdad last year was sentenced to death in an Iraqi court Thursday, prompting his lawyers to ask a federal judge in Washington to block the U.S. military from transferring him to the Iraqi government." Mohammad Munaf allegedly "posed as a kidnap victim but was actually involved in a conspiracy for ransom and led them into a trap." Officials "could not recall another U.S. citizen receiving a death sentence from the Central Criminal Court of Iraq." The defendant's "Iraqi attorneys reported that the Central Criminal Court judge was prepared to dismiss the charges at a hearing on Thursday but that two American officials -- including an unnamed general -- stepped into the courtroom and requested a private meeting. The judge returned 15 minutes later and sentenced Munaf and four other defendants to death without hearing additional evidence."

DOJ_NMG_0080946

Shays Suggests Abu Ghraib Abuses Were "More About Pornography Than Torture." The AP (10/14, Miga) reports Rep. Christopher Shays "said Friday the Abu Ghraib prison abuses were more about pornography than torture." Shays "said a National Guard unit was primarily responsible for the abuses although it was actually the 372nd Military Police Company from Cresaptown, Md., an Army Reserve unit. 'It was a National Guard unit run amok,' Shays said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. 'It was torture because sex abuse is torture. It was gross and despicable ... This is more about pornography than torture.' Shays sought to defuse controversy over his previous comments suggesting the Abu Ghraib abuses weren't torture but instead involved a sex ring of troops. 'Now I've seen what happened in Abu Ghraib, and Abu Ghraib was not torture,' Shays said at a debate Wednesday."

Shays Rhetoric Is Less Measured Than In Previous Campaigns. The Washington Post (10/14, A4, Goldfarb, 748K) reports Shays "has been widely known as a moderate Republican who rarely engages in firebrand politics. But that image has been challenged in recent days with remarks that a supporter called 'unusual' and his opponent said were a sign of 'desperation.' In a debate this week with Democratic challenger Diane Farrell, Shays said the Abu Ghraib prison abuse did not constitute torture. … Several analysts attributed the comments to Shays's frustration with what has become the toughest reelection campaign of his career."

Painter's Work Reflects His Outrage At Abu Ghraib. The Washington Post (10/14, Kennicott, 748K) on the front page of Style reports on the paintings of Fernando Botero: "Shocked and angered by news of Abu Ghraib, Botero was inspired to put his familiar figures through the rigors and humiliations of the abuse that American soldiers perpetrated on Iraqi inmates at the notorious prison. The result was some 80 paintings, drawings and watercolors that show his rounded figures with hoods on, shackled, bound at the wrists, forced into human piles, bleeding, screaming and vomiting. They are fat, but they're not happy." His exhibit opens on Tuesday in New York.

Afghan Suicide Bombing Kills Eight. The New York Times (10/14, Gall, 1.21M) reports in a four-sentence article, "A suicide bomber drove his car at a NATO military convoy in the southern city of Kandahar, killing eight people and wounding nine others, officials said. One NATO soldier was among the dead."

Illinois Town Mourns Two Casualties. ABC World News (10/13, story 6, 1:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "On the subject of Iraq, there is deep pride and deep sorrow in a small town in Illinois tonight. Two young men who left that town as best friends to serve in the Army, are now embraced in a sad homecoming." ABC (Reynolds): "They looked so much alike, they could have been brothers. And in many ways, they were. George O'Bourne and Chris Walker, both 20, had been inseparable friends since high school. They joined the Army together. Served in the same unit in Iraq. And last week, they died in the same town outside Baghdad, just two days apart. A week ago at homecoming, the East Peoria Community High School honored them. And presented their parents with hats from the band they played in."

NYTimes Review Of "Hubris" Harshly Critical Of Administration. In the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) review of Hubris (by Michael Isikoff and David Corn), reviewer Jacob Heilbrunn writes, "Where Isikoff and Corn themselves go astray is in their own obsessive focus on Judith Miller and The New York Times, as well as on the story of Joseph Wilson, Valerie Plame Wilson and Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby ... Far more interesting is Isikoff and Corn's exploration of the mental world that the administration inhabits. ... Hubris? Megalomania may be more like it."

Victor Davis Hanson Slams Books Calling Iraq War A Fiasco. In a commentary for the Washington Times (10/14, 88K), scholar Victor Davis Hanson writes about Cobra

DOJ_NMG_0080947

II, State of Denial, and Fiasco that "many of the authors' critical portraits rely on private conversations and anonymous sources. The most damning informants in these books are never identified, and so can't be questioned." Hanson adds, "Rarely do these journalists quote unnamed sources who dissent from their own views, although there are surely pro-U.S. Iraq policy candid voices among the thousands of retired generals. ... When one writes military history in the middle of a war, there is a responsibility to be extra careful. Real-time interpretations don't just offer lessons about the past but may change the very course of events as they happen."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney Pleads Guilty To Corruption Involving Abramoff. Rep. Bob Ney's guilty plea in the Abramoff investigation received prominent attention, with two stories on the network TV news and on the front pages of the major US newspapers. ABC World News (10/13, story 2, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Today in Washington, Bob Ney was the first member of Congress to plead guilty in connection to Jack Abramoff. He plead guilty to conspiracy. But the list of his corrupt activities is much, much longer." ABC added, "Once known as 'the Mayor of Capitol Hill,' today Ney left a Federal court in disgrace. Ney admitted he was at the beck and call of corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, bought and paid for. In exchange for gifts, Ney supported or opposed legislation at Abramoff's request. He also tried to influence the policies of agencies throughout government." NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Ney "admitted taking tens of thousands of dollars in travel and gifts from Abramoff. The Justice Department is recommending a sentence of just over two years in prison. Ney's lawyer says he will resign in the next few weeks."

The Washington Times/AP (10/14, A1, Yost) reports, "Appearing before Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle on charges of conspiracy and making false statements, Ney acknowledged taking trips, tickets, meals and campaign donations from Abramoff in return for official actions on behalf of his clients. Ney, Ohio Republican, faces up to 10 years in prison. The Justice Department recommended 27 months behind bars. Ney's lawyers plan to recommend him for a Bureau of Prisons alcohol-treatment program, which dramatically could cut the time he serves behind bars. Judge Huvelle set sentencing for Jan. 19. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Neuman, Schmitt, 918K) reports Ney "acknowledged he used his legislative clout to do favors for Abramoff and for a Syrian businessman nicknamed the 'Fat Man.'"

The Financial Times (10/14, Daniel) notes, "The fallout from Mr Abramoff's largesse has continued to haunt Washington. Last week Susan Ralston, a White House aide to Karl Rove, the president's political adviser, abruptly resigned amid reports of her accepting gifts from Mr Abramoff. On Thursday, the Democratic staff of the Senate finance committee charged several conservative not-for-profit groups with abusing their tax-exempt status by 'laundering payments and then disbursing funds at Mr Abramoff's direction'."

White House, Congressional GOP Leaders Move To Expel Ney. The New York Times (10/14, A1, Shenon, 1.21M) reports "what had not been expected at Friday's court hearing was Mr. Ney's disclosure that he intended to remain in Congress for now. The announcement appeared to surprise and infuriate House Republican leaders, who are trying to tamp down other scandals that are threatening to damage the party in next month's Congressional elections. After learning that Mr. Ney would not step down immediately and would continue to draw his $165,200-a-year salary, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and other Republican leaders said they would move to expel him as soon as Congress returns next month for a postelection session. … The White House joined in calling for Mr. Ney to resign immediately. 'What Congressman Ney did is not a reflection of the Republican Party,' said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. 'It's a reflection of Congressman Ney, and he ought to step down.'"

The Washington Post (10/14, A1, Schmidt, Grimaldi, 748K) in a front page story reports, "House Republican leaders, still struggling to blunt the impact of a scandal involving House pages, immediately vowed to expel Ney in a post-election session if he has not resigned by then. Ney's attorney said in court that the congressman will resign his seat in the coming weeks but wants to first take care of pending constituent matters and see that his staff is settled." The post adds, "Ney is the eighth person convicted in the continuing federal investigation into Abramoff's activities. A federal task force that includes a dozen Justice Department prosecutors is investigating Abramoff's dealings with other congressional offices, including those of Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.), according to lawyers and witnesses involved in the probe."

DOJ_NMG_0080948

Shimkus Testifies About His Handling Of Foley Allegations. The New York Times (10/14, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports Rep. John Shimkus, chairman of the Congressional page program, "said Friday that he was unaware of previous complaints about Mark Foley." Shimkus "said that had he known of the complaints about Mr. Foley, he would have handled concerns about Mr. Foley's e-mail messages to a page from Louisiana differently. … Mr. Shimkus said that he learned of concerns about Mr. Foley last fall and that he and the clerk of the House confronted Mr. Foley at a meeting in Mr. Foley's office." Shimkus testified before the House Ethics Committee yesterday regarding the Foley scandal and "whether Republican leaders, particularly those inside Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office, had warnings before last year that Mr. Foley had a history of being overly friendly to pages." The Washington Times/AP (10/14) reports Shimkus, "who testified in private, told reporters later that in retrospect, he wished he had handled the episode last year differently. 'Having 20/20 hindsight, a lot of things would have been done differently,' Mr. Shimkus said. Mr. Shimkus has said he kept the two other House members overseeing the pages in the dark as he confronted Mr. Foley last fall." Shimkus "has said he was following the wishes of the boy's parents by not telling the other two lawmakers of overly friendly e-mails sent by Mr. Foley to a former page."

Capitol Police Find No Record Of Alleged Foley Dorm Incident. The Washington Post (10/14, A4, Babington, Sheridan, 748K) reports, "U.S. Capitol Police said yesterday that they have no record of an alleged incident in which then-Rep. Mark Foley supposedly tried to enter a Capitol Hill dormitory for teenage pages. The purported nighttime incident has been cited by lawmakers and a key witness in the scandal that involves Foley's interactions with congressional pages and the House's handling of the matter. Unlike sexually graphic electronic messages that Foley sent to teenage boys, evidence of the alleged dorm incident has proved elusive."

Kolbe's Camping Trip With Minors Is Subject Of Federal Investigation. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 6, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Arizona Republican Jim Kolbe is the latest Congressman to be investigated for his dealings with former Congressional Pages. Federal prosecutors are looking into a camping trip that Kolbe took with two former Pages ten years ago. A spokesman for Kolbe, though, says nothing inappropriate happened." The Washington Times/AP (10/14) reports Kolbe "took…former pages as well as staff members and National Park Service officials on a Fourth of July rafting trip in the Grand Canyon in 1996, his spokeswoman, Korenna Cline, said yesterday. An accusation related to the trip was given to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix, but it was not immediately clear whether it was related to any contention of improper activity by Mr. Kolbe. The official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, described the inquiry as preliminary."

The AP (10/14, Talhelm) reports a "law enforcement official said the 1996 trip may be too old to investigate as a criminal action. … Beth Kolbe, the congressman's younger sister who was on the three-night trip, said nothing inappropriate happened and that she had not heard of any concerns from anyone until the story of the camping trip appeared in the media. 'It's preposterous,' she said of any allegations that taking the pages along was inappropriate." The Washington Post (10/14, A4, Eggen, 748K) reports, "One official cautioned that the inquiry was based on allegations from one unidentified source that has not been substantiated. The allegations involve Kolbe's behavior toward one of the ex-pages, the official said."

Weldon Reportedly Subject Of FBI Corruption Probe. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Gordon) report the Justice Department "is investigating whether Republican Rep. Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania traded his political influence for lucrative lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter, according to sources with direct knowledge of the inquiry. The FBI, which opened an investigation in recent months, has formally referred the matter to the department's Public Integrity Section for additional scrutiny. At issue are Weldon's efforts between 2002 and 2004 to aid two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers with ties to strongman Slobodan Milosevic, a federal law enforcement official said. The Russian companies and a Serbian foundation run by the brothers' family each hired a firm co-owned by Weldon's daughter, Karen, for fees totaling nearly $1 million a year, public records show. Karen Weldon was 28 and lacked consulting experience when she and Charles Sexton, a Weldon ally and longtime Republican leader in Delaware County, Pa., created the firm of Solutions North America Inc. in 2002." The Washington Post (10/14, A4, 748K) runs a shortened version of the McClatchy article.

DOJ_NMG_0080949

The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/14, Mason, Shiffman) reports, "The scandals surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff and Reps. Duke Cunningham, Robert Ney and Mark Foley have hampered Republican candidates in this election. … Every investigation is different, but it is not uncommon for agents probing alleged corruption, drugs and organized crime to spend months, even years, working covertly on a case before the suspects learn that they are under scrutiny."

Judge Rejects Ryan Bid To Remain Free Pending Appeal. The Chicago Tribune (10/14, O'Connor, Bush) reported, "Former Gov. George Ryan must surrender to prison early next year after a federal judge on Friday refused to let him remain free on bond while his appeal winds through court. In a 32-page ruling issued Friday evening, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer rejected claims by the defense that Ryan's conviction was likely to be reversed on appeal. The judge also refused to let Ryan's co-defendant, Lawrence Warner, put off prison pending his appeal." The Tribune noted Ryan "is scheduled to surrender to prison on Jan. 4," and Warner "on Jan. 16." The Chicago Sun-Times (10/14, Korecki) added, "Pallmeyer rejected defense contentions, including that material brought in to the deliberation room was inappropriate enough to taint proceedings, that the foreperson had outside discussions about deliberations, then lied about it, and that the newly formed jury could not truly start over on its deliberations. 'The court investigated each allegation at the time...and concluded either that the incident did not constitute misconduct at all, or that the conduct did not prejudice the defendants,' Pallmeyer wrote." The AP (10/14) also reported on the ruling, in a widely-distributed story.

Unrepentant Tennessee Lawmaker Sentenced To Five Years In Prison. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (10/14, Buser) reported, "Former state senator Roscoe Dixon was sentenced to five years and three months in prison Friday by a judge who viewed him as unrepentant for his Tennessee Waltz bribery conviction. U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla handed down the sentence, the stiffest yet for a defendant in the FBI's undercover sting. …. 'The court has been listening for words it has not heard – "What I did was wrong,"' McCalla told the veteran legislator. 'I'm still listening for those words.' Dixon, 57, testified that he was sorry he had gotten involved in the investigation, but offered no apologies and continued to maintain he was entrapped, a defense the jury rejected this summer." The Commercial Appeal noted, "The three-year-old Tennessee Waltz investigation, which prosecutors have said is ongoing, has resulted in the indictment of 12 elected officials and aides."

The AP (10/14, Baird) reported, "After sentencing, Dixon continued to argue that he was tricked into taking money from FBI agents posing as crooked businessmen wanting a change in state law. He said he declined admitting guilt because 'I wanted to hold all my options open because I'm going to appeal.' Dixon, who is black, has argued that he was targeted by federal investigators because of his race. McCalla said he saw 'not one shred of evidence' of government wrongdoing and admonished Dixon for comments that could undermine the public's faith in the judicial system."

Former NYPD Detective Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison. The New York Times (10/14, Rashbaum) reported, "In a Brooklyn courtroom packed with his family, friends and neighbors, a retired police detective who had admitted to stealing roughly $800,000 from drug dealers delivered a tormented apology yesterday, moments before a judge sentenced him to seven years in federal prison." Thomas Rachko "was arrested on Nov. 26, 2003, just hours after he and his old partner, Julio C. Vasquez, were captured on videotape stealing $169,000 from a drug money courier. He began cooperating with the authorities almost immediately, and the theft unraveled a web of corruption — thefts of drug money and drugs that Mr. Vasquez helped sell for cash. As many as 10 current or retired police detectives and supervisors were implicated." The Times noted, "After the sentencing, an F.B.I. agent who worked on the case shook Mr. Rachko's hand." Newsday (10/14, DeStefano) added that Rachko "begged for mercy Friday and got it" with the seven-year sentence, "much less than the possible life term he faced."

The New York Post (10/14, Haberman) reported, "Rachko's court days may not be over, however. Two convicted drug dealers freed following the arrests of Rachko and Vasquez have filed federal civil-rights lawsuits against the two rogue cops and the city. Bertrand Canty and Nelson Belliard are seeking $56 million for false arrest, negligence, battery and other claims." The New York Daily News (10/14, Marzulli) and AP (10/14) also report on Rachko's sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0080950

Body Of Missing Vermont Student Found In Gorge Near Campus. The New York Times (10/14, Belluck) reported, "A University of Vermont student who had been missing since last weekend was found dead yesterday near a gorge about 15 miles from campus, and the police identified as a suspect a man she had borrowed a cellphone from in downtown Burlington, Vt. Chief Thomas Tremblay of the Burlington police said the body of Michelle Gardner-Quinn, a 21-year-old senior from Arlington, Va., was found off the side of a road in Richmond, Vt., near a popular swimming site called Huntington Gorge. Chief Tremblay said Ms. Gardner-Quinn's death was a homicide, and he identified Brian Rooney, 36, of Richmond as a 'very likely suspect.'" The Times noted, "The disappearance of Ms. Gardner-Quinn prompted an exhaustive search by the police, the F.B.I. and legions of volunteers from the university community, many of them students shocked at the prospect that a kidnapping might have occurred in a city normally considered safe."

The Washington Post (10/14, B1, Stockwell) added, "Tremblay said Rooney was charged yesterday with sexual assault and lewd and lascivious conduct with a child in Caledonia County, about 80 miles east of Burlington. He declined to elaborate on the charges. Rooney is to be arraigned Monday on those charges, Tremblay said." The Boston Globe (10/14, Smalley, Mishra) noted, "As her parents kept vigil in Burlington, Vermont police, FBI agents, and National Guard troops, augmented by eager students and other volunteers from the university, scoured Burlington and the surrounding area. But [Friday's] discovery came about through a phone call from a group of hikers alerting authorities to a body in an area that had not been searched." The AP (10/14, Curran) also reported on the recovery of Gardner-Quinn's remains, in a widely-distributed story.

9th Circuit Upholds "Absurd" Sentence. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Krikorian) reports, "A federal appeals court in San Francisco on Friday upheld a 159-year prison term for a mentally disturbed woman with no criminal history after one judge angrily concluded the nation's rigid sentencing laws left the panel with no options but to affirm the 'irrational, inhumane and absurd' sentence." The Times continues, "The 3-0 ruling by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals came one year after Marion Hungerford, 52, of Billings, Mont., received the sentence for a string of robberies at Montana casinos and bars from April to July 2002. … The robberies, according to the 18-page opinion written by Judge Susan P. Garber, began when Hungerford and her male roommate, Dana Canfield, were both unemployed and decided to rob a convenience store to pay the rent. … 'Marion said she was going to have to go on a crime spree,' Canfield testified at the trial. 'And since she has problems walking and stuff, I decided that I would do it.'" The Times adds, "A jury found Hungerford not guilty of that first robbery and one other, but authorities alleged they were only the start of a string of crimes. … She was convicted on one count of conspiracy, seven counts of robbery and seven counts of using a firearm because her accomplice was armed with a .22-caliber revolver. … In rejecting her appeal of four of the robbery and firearms convictions, the court found sufficient evidence that she knowingly took part in the holdups. 'There is no evidence that [Hungerford] took any affirmative action to withdraw from the ongoing conspiracy,' the court said. 'To the contrary, she continued to accept and spend the proceeds of all the robberies and worked purposefully to conceal the crimes.' … Though affirming Hungerford's conviction, Judge Stephen Reinhardt decried the sentence handed down in the case as a 'predictable byproduct of the cruel and unjust mandatory minimum sentence scheme adopted by Congress.'"

Gonzales, Mueller To Speak At Boston Law Enforcement Conference. The Boston Globe (10/14, Simpson) reports, "More than 14,000 law enforcement professionals will gather in Boston starting this weekend for a conference that will feature some of the nation's highest-ranking officials as speakers " The Globe continues, "The International Association of Chiefs of Police, the world's largest nonprofit organization of police executives, will kick off its annual conference and exposition today at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. Although this will be the association's 113th conference, it will be the first in New England, said John Boyle, a Boston Police Department spokesman." The Globe adds, "Speakers include Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, and Marine General Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. More than 750 exhibitors will showcase police products, such as vehicles, mobile command centers, and helicopters, Boyle said. … There will be international delegates from Europe, Asia, and the Caribbean, said Wendy Balazik, an association spokeswoman."

DOJ_NMG_0080951

CIVIL LAW:

California Man Pursues Claim That Los Angeles Port Misused Funds. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Weikel) reports, "A harbor area activist filed an appeal Friday in an attempt to revive a federal lawsuit alleging that the Port of Los Angeles misappropriated $1.2 billion in government funds to build a giant cargo terminal for the world's largest shipping line." The Times continues, "Stanley D. Mosler of Rancho Palos Verdes is challenging decisions by U.S. District Judge S. James Otero, who dismissed the false-claims case in August, saying that Mosler no longer had an attorney and that he was unqualified as a layperson to handle a lawsuit on behalf of the United States. .. A few weeks after the decision, Mosler hired a lawyer, Alan Gutman, but Otero refused to reinstate the case, saying it was too late. … Otero noted in his ruling that Mosler had been warned earlier that he should obtain counsel." The Times adds, "Mosler was represented for three years by attorney Milford Dahl, who bowed out in February 2005, saying the case would be too costly for him to pursue. Mosler then proceeded on his own, hoping to get the case to trial. … 'The elusive quality in Judge Otero's order is justice,' Mosler said. 'The dismissal was not on the merits but because I could not afford to match the port's spending in legal fees. I trust that the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals will rule that having money is not a necessary element to access our federal courts.'" The Times notes, "Filed in March 2002, Mosler's case alleged that port officials had engaged in a "bait-and-switch" maneuver when they shifted long-standing plans to relocate crude oil and other hazardous shipments to a man-made island that would be built away from populated areas to improve harbor safety. … Mosler said in his suit that port officials decided to turn the island into a massive container facility for Maersk Inc., leaving only 15 acres — instead of hundreds of acres — for petroleum and chemical terminals. … At issue was whether the port violated federal agreements to build the so-called energy island project and misappropriated $108.6 million in federal grants and nearly $1.1 billion in harbor revenue to construct what is now known as Pier 400, which was completed in 2004."

Bankruptcy Filings Down Sharply. The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/14) reports, "The ranks of people seeking to erase their debts have thinned in the year since the biggest changes in U.S. bankruptcy laws in a quarter-century took effect." Consumer bankruptcy Lawrence Brooke "said the paperwork hurdles for debtors to qualify for Chapter 7 have become insurmountable for many, and the workload and aggravation for attorneys have increased." The AP notes, "There were 263,660 personal bankruptcies filed nationwide in the first half of this year, down from 851,683 in the first six months of 2005 and 809,867 in the same period in 2004, according to the American Bankruptcy Institute." Yet "some experts predict that bankruptcy filings will eventually rebound. There was a huge rush of filings by financially strained consumers between the enactment of the legislation in April last year and the Oct. 17 deadline for the new means test and other requirements. Personal bankruptcies soared 30% to a record high last year, surpassing 2 million for the first time at 2,039,214. Then came the precipitous drop."

Air America Declares Bankruptcy. The New York Times (10/14, Leeds, 1.21M) reports, "Air America Radio, the liberal talk network started two years ago in a bid to counter the influence of conservative radio personalities like Rush Limbaugh, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection on Friday." The Times notes, "United States Bankruptcy Court Judge Robert Drain approved motions on Friday that will let the company continue to pay salaries and remain on the air. The judge also approved a loan of $900,000 from Democracy Allies, an entity formed by current investors in the network, including Rob Glaser, chief executive of the media and entertainment company RealNetworks. Its full proposed loan of $2.6 million is to be considered at a later hearing, said Tracy Klestadt, a lawyer representing Air America."

The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A5, McBride, 2.03M) notes Air America "said it had assets of $7.8 million, and short-term liabilities of $19.8 million. A number of individuals have invested in the company, including RealNetworks Inc. CEO Rob Glaser, who is the company's largest secured creditor with $9.8 million in claims. Other claimants include Citigroup Inc.'s Citibank, with $2.5 million in unsecured claims, and Clear Channel Communications Inc., with $558,333 in unsecured claims." The Washington Times/AP (10/14, Sutel) reports similar details.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Bias. The AP (10/13) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice announced Friday that it had filed a lawsuit against the city of Philadelphia alleging violations of the rights of Hispanic and Spanish-speaking voters." The AP continues, "The complaint filed in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania alleges that the city failed to provide Spanish-language assistance at the polls to most Spanish-speaking voters in recent elections, the department said." The AP adds, "Federal authorities also said the city prevented Spanish-speaking voters from receiving assistance from people of their choice, even in cases where bilingual assistance was otherwise unavailable. … Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement that federal officials hope to reach agreement with city officials quickly 'to begin essential remedial measures in time for the 2006 federal elections.'"

DOJ_NMG_0080952

Local Television. At least two local television networks reported that the Department of Justice sued the city of Philadelphia, alleging it failed to provide language assistance to Spanish-speaking voters in recent elections. KYW-TV Philadelphia, (10/14, 11:06 p.m.) broadcasted, "City of Philadelphia is slapped with a voting rights lawsuit. Justice Department claiming rights of Spanish speaking voters were violated in recent elections. They alleged that Spanish language assistance was not available at polls for most voters, and many were not allowed to seek help from another person in cases where there was no other bilingual that will aid."

WPVI-TV Philadelphia, (10/13, 11:09 p.m.) broadcasted, "Justice Department has filed a lawsuit suit against the city of Philadelphia over voting rights. The suit claims the city failed to provide Spanish speaking help at the polls. Justice Department hopes to work with the city to have a solution in place at the time of November elections."

DOJ Assists Clarksville, TN, With Police Department Woes. The AP (10/12) reports from Clarksville, TN, "With 12 discrimination lawsuits filed against the Clarksville Police Department, the mayor has asked a federal official for some help." The AP continues, "Walter Atkinson, who works for U.S. Department of Justice's Community Relations Service, will lead a group of citizens and officials to survey the police department and come up with suggestions to help solve its problems. The group will not investigate the specific lawsuits against the city. … 'This is going to be as much a PR push' as an information-gathering process, said group member David Shelton, of the Clarksville Human Relations Commission." The AP adds, "Mayor Don Trotter said it should take several months before recommendations for the department are finalized. .. .The meetings, which will include interviews with police officers, are closed to the public, but the recommendations will be 'very, very public,' Shelton said." The AP notes, "Discrimination lawsuits have cost the city more than $300,000 in legal expenses thus far. A majority of the suits allege racial discrimination, but at least one female officer has sued claiming gender and age discrimination."

DOJ Settles Redlining Allegations With Indiana Bank. The Northwest (IN) Times (10/14, Williams, Fitton) reports, "The federal government and Whiting-based Centier Bank have reached a $4.3 million agreement to settle allegations the bank engaged in redlining, or discriminating on the basis of race or national origin." The Times continues, "The Justice Department alleged Centier violated the Fair Housing Act and Equal Credit Opportunity Act by unlawfully failing to equally market and provide products and services to predominantly black and Hispanic neighborhoods in Gary, East Chicago and Hammond." The Times adds, "Although it acknowledged its settlement with the government, the locally owned bank 'strongly denies any suggestion that it has previously excluded minority communities from its banking efforts,' Centier said in a news release. … However, the release said, Centier management feels 'equally strongly about its desire to provide significantly enhanced services to residents and businesses in minority neighborhoods.'" The Times notes, "Centier President and CEO Michael Schrage told The Times the bank was surprised by the Justice Department's action and still does not agree with the allegations, but decided to enter into the agreement to avoid the delays and costs of litigation. … Characterizing the negotiations with the Justice Department as 'amiable,' Schrage said the Justice Department action had made Centier 'more diligent in reaching out to underserved areas.' … The consent decree filed in federal court in Hammond will prohibit Centier from discriminating on the basis of race, color or national origin in any aspect of residential real estate or credit transaction, according to the Justice Department. Once approved by the court, the agreement will resolve the allegations."

DOJ Asked To Probe Florida Beating Death. The Bradenton Herald (10/14, Marquez) reports, "A beating months ago that led to the death of a 72-year-old man has the Bradenton police chief looking to the attorney general of the United States for help, calling the chief law officer in the country the 'last hope' for justice." The Herald continues, "After review of the case, the state attorney's office for the 12th Judicial Circuit declined to prosecute Jamaal Lambert, 25, in the death of James Ervin Barfield, saying Lambert was acting in self-defense when he beat Barfield during an argument on May 10 near a downtown apartment building Barfield owned. … Barfield was taken to Manatee Memorial Hospital where he died two weeks later." The Herald adds, "Police Chief Michael Radzilowski wants Lambert prosecuted for the death, which was ruled a homicide by the medical examiner's office, and he's calling the state attorney's decision not to prosecute an error. … In a letter Radzilowski sent to the U.S. Department of Justice on Monday, he asks Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to review the case for 'possible prosecution of any criminal or civil right violation.' … As of Friday afternoon, there was 'nothing open in the civil rights division,' said Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department."

DOJ_NMG_0080953

Judge Orders Mississippi County To Explain Jail Hiring Practices. The Biloxi Sun Herald (10/14, Fitzgerald) reports, "A federal judge has ordered the Harrison County jail to explain what it is doing to hire more corrections officers." The Herald continues, "The order, filed Thursday by U.S. District Judge Walter J. Gex III, addresses a lingering issue of staffing problems at the Harrison County Adult Detention Center. The last time the judge questioned the jail's staffing level via court order was in 2003, when the officer-to-inmate ratio was 1-to-10. The U.S. Justice Department, which has oversight to monitor improvements at the jail, recommends a ratio of 1-to-5. … The ratio is about the same today as it was in 2003. The jail needs to hire about 65 additional corrections officers. It has about 100 jailers to oversee 950 to 1,000 inmates." The Herald adds, "Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. on Friday said his new warden has 'a good plan of action' for hiring and he believes it will meet with approval. Payne said he has beefed up advertising to include television commercials featuring Don Cabana, appointed warden two months ago. … 'We're having the same problem with hiring that many South Mississippi employers have faced since Hurricane Katrina,' Payne said." The Herald notes, "The court order gives the jail until Oct. 26 to provide a supplementary report to answer questions on staffing issues. The report is in addition to the quarterly report the jail is required to submit to the Justice Department. … Payne said staffing levels were up until the hurricane struck. .. .However, issues surrounding the fatal beating of inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr. in February also have affected manpower and morale, Cabana said after his appointment two months ago. Two former jailers face criminal prosecution in the Williams case and a related civil lawsuit is pending."

Gallaudet Has Protesters Arrested. The New York Times (10/14, Schemo) reports, "The authorities at Gallaudet University, the nation's only liberal arts university for the deaf, moved on Friday to end a three-day siege by protesters by arresting the students opposing the board's choice of the next president." Overall, "the police arrested about 60 students in two hours, and arrests continued late into the night." The protesters "are demanding the immediate resignation of Jane K. Fernandes, the former provost who was named last spring to succeed…as president."

The Washington Times (10/14, Cella, Emerling, Nichols) reports, "The students were uncooperative but peaceful -- forming human chains and forcing campus police and Metropolitan Police officers to separate them, lift them and drag them to a waiting fleet of vans. The crowd jeered and howled as each student was carried off. By late last night, police had arrested about 90 protesters." President I. King Jordan said, "the protesters have left me no choice."

Opposition To Gay Marriage Seen As Losing Steam. The New York Times (10/14, Johnson, 1.21M) reports, "The debate over same-sex marriage was a black-or-white proposition two years ago when voters in 11 states barred gay couples from marrying." Yet "this year shades of gray are everywhere, as eight more states consider similar ballot measures. Some of the proposed bans are struggling in the polls, and the issue of same-sex marriage itself has largely failed to rouse conservative voters." While other issues have the voters attention, "the biggest change, people on both sides of the issue say, is that supporters of same-sex marriage this year are likely to be as mobilized as the opponents."

Opponents To Gay Marriage Ban Launch TV Ad Campaign. The Washington Post (10/14, B6, Jenkins, 748K) reports that Commonwealth Coalition, "An organization that opposes a ballot measure that would constitutionally ban same-sex marriage in Virginia is buying a TV commercial to run statewide, marking an intensifying effort to defeat the amendment." Their "30-second ad, which will begin appearing throughout the state today on CNN, shows an image of Virginia's 230-year-old Bill of Rights slowly being engulfed in flames. A narrator warns gravely that the amendment would 'destroy' the spirit of the state's Bill of Rights, which served as the model for the U.S. Bill of Rights. A second ad will appear next week, officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0080954

ANTITRUST:

FCC Delays Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Merger.

The AP (10/14, Dunbar) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission has delayed a vote on the proposed buyout of BellSouth by AT&T until Nov. 3 at the latest after two Democrats asked for time to study last-minute concessions offered by the companies." The AP continues, 'The commission was scheduled to vote on the $80.8 billion deal in a special meeting yesterday that never convened. … Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein circulated a letter among reporters that said in the previous 48 hours, new proposals had been made regarding the buyout that raised 'a number of significant questions and complex technical issues for us to consider.' … They asked that the proposals, which were offered by the companies through Chairman Kevin Martin's office, be made available to the public." The AP notes, "Martin responded in a letter, agreeing to make the proposals available for public comment for 10 days, and set a commission meeting for Nov. 3, though the vote may come sooner and may not require a public meeting."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/14, Geewax) reports, "Analysts said they still believed the deal would be approved. The debate, they said, is over what conditions the FCC will require." The AJC continues, "Late in the day, AT&T disclosed a broad array of possible concessions it had discussed with the FCC, including the sale of stand-alone, high-speed Internet service for a limited period of time and the return of certain jobs that had been moved overseas." The AJC adds, "AT&T spokesman Michael Balmoris said in a statement that a delay 'is not uncommon in these matters' and that the company believes the FCC soon will 'complete its review, approve the merger and allow us to begin delivering the numerous benefits of the merger to consumers.' … Balmoris said AT&T is willing to accept 'reasonable conditions on the merger in order to obtain unanimous approval, so long as they do not affect our ability to deliver merger benefits to customers and share owners, given the intensely competitive environment in which we operate.'"

The New York Times (10/14, Belson) reports, "On Wednesday, the Justice Department signed off on the purchase without imposing any conditions on the companies. That angered Michael J. Copps and Jonathan S. Adelstein — the two Democratic commissioners at the F.C.C. — who said more time was needed to assess how consumers and companies would be affected." The Times adds, "With their objections in mind, the commission rescheduled its vote on the merger to yesterday, from Thursday, to give the commissioners more time to negotiate. When they were unable to decide whether and what conditions to impose on the companies, yesterday's meeting was canceled and rescheduled for Nov. 3. … 'Given the limited analysis from our leading antitrust authorities, it is all the more imperative that we now employ an open process to fully involve all affected parties, including the applicants, in order to get the public and expert review that is otherwise lacking,' the Democratic commissioners wrote in a letter to the F.C.C. chairman, Kevin J. Martin. … The negotiations are complicated further because one Republican commissioner, Robert M. McDowell, is expected to refrain from voting because of a potential conflict of interest. If he were allowed to vote, the Republicans would presumably be able to approve the merger faster because they would outnumber the Democrats, 3 to 2."

The San Antonio Express-News (10/14, Lorek) reports, "In its latest filing, AT&T agreed to provide $10 broadband service, called Digital Subscriber Line, or DSL, to new customers in its territory. … The company also pledged to provide 100 percent broadband access to its entire service area and to give free broadband modems to customers. It also offered a $1 million public safety grant to public entities in its coverage area. … In addition, AT&T discussed returning jobs from overseas to the BellSouth territory. .. .The company also mentioned network neutrality, or requiring AT&T to carry Internet traffic without charging customers more for different services or applications, according to the letter. AT&T didn't provide specifics on these issues in its letter."

The Chicago Tribune (10/14, Van) reports, "FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who had advocated approving the merger without condition, accepted the Democrats' suggested delay and scheduled a meeting for Nov. 3 to consider the matter. Conditions on the deal needed to win the Democrats' support will be open for public discussion." The Tribune continues, "The stock transaction between AT&T and BellSouth is estimated to be worth about $80 billion and would give control of the nation's largest phone company and its largest wireless company to San Antonio-based AT&T, which was formerly SBC Communications Inc. before it took over AT&T last year." The Tribune adds, "A federal court review of two giant telecom mergers from last year—the SBC/AT&T deal and the takeover of MCI by Verizon Communications Inc.—is still pending. Judge Emmet Sullivan is considering evidence as to whether federal regulators gave those deals sufficient scrutiny to protect the public interest. … Senate and House leaders from both parties had asked the FCC and the Justice Department to delay their decisions on the AT&T/BellSouth deal until judicial review of last year's mergers was concluded. The antitrust division of the Justice Department ignored those requests, and the FCC appeared poised to do the same."

DOJ_NMG_0080955

Microsoft Agrees To Vista Changes. The AP (10/14) reports, "Microsoft Corp. is making several key changes to its coming Windows Vista operating system in an bid to soothe European antitrust worries, while keeping its worldwide distribution plans on schedule." The AP continues, "Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said Friday that the company agreed to change how people can set their preferred search service if they upgrade to Microsoft's new Internet Explorer browser. The Redmond, Wash., company also has tweaked Vista's security system to address concerns it was favoring Microsoft's products over competing security offerings." The AP adds, "In addition, the company plans to have an international standards organization review a controversial new file format that will be included in Windows and the company's Office business suite. He said that was a step toward making the format available for other companies to license. … Even with the changes, which will be included in all versions the company ships worldwide, Microsoft said it plans deliver the long-delayed Vista to large businesses in November and consumers and small businesses in January."

The Seattle Times (10/14, Romano) reports, "Last month, the company had raised the specter of a delayed launch in Europe, pending negotiations with the European Commission (EC) over features in Vista." The Times adds, "Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith struck a diplomatic tone Friday, saying the company received 'clear guidance' during months of 'constructive dialogue' with regulators at the commission, the administrative arm of the European Union. In response, it is making significant changes to three areas of the software: security, search and a new file format. … 'Having made each of these changes, the company and [CEO] Steve Ballmer felt comfortable moving forward and felt confident that we are in compliance with our EU competition law obligations,' Smith said during a conference call with reporters." The Times adds, "He said Ballmer spoke with European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes on Thursday to inform her of the company's plans. .. . The company's comments strengthened investor confidence in the release schedule for Vista, due out for large business customers in November and for broad release in January. However, Vista is coming out more than two years later than originally planned."

The New York Times (10/14, Meller) reports, "A delay in one country or region would have serious consequences for software developers, computer manufacturers and retailers there. It would also create complications for Microsoft, which has always rolled out previous versions of Windows simultaneously around the world." The Times adds, "Steven A. Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, confirmed the global introduction of Vista in a phone conversation with the European competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, late Thursday. .. .The new operating system will go on sale to large computer manufacturers next month and to the public in January." The Times adds, "Until now, Microsoft has resisted pressure to change Vista. Last month it accused the European Commission of not giving it clear enough guidance on whether Vista would pass muster under European antitrust law. … It also highlighted research that showed that hundreds of thousands of jobs in the European technology industry were at stake if Vista's introduction were delayed. Also last month, members of the European Parliament wrote to Ms. Kroes warning her of the harm she would be causing to European companies if she forced a delay."

The San Jose Mercury News (10/14, Takahashi) reports, "The software giant will ship corporate versions of Vista in November and consumer versions in January, said Mary Snapp, vice president and deputy general counsel at Microsoft. … Microsoft altered the operating system in several areas to respond to concerns of European and Korean regulators about ensuring fair competition, Snapp said. The company's changes address features related to security, search and document formats recognized by Vista. … The company also answered complaints from Silicon Valley-based security firms Symantec and McAfee. … The companies had accused the software programming giant of abusing its monopoly by controlling which security products can run on its new operating system. They say Microsoft blocked their ability to review the operating system's kernel, or core, and that Microsoft planned to confuse customers by offering its own security dashboard. .. .But Friday, Snapp said the company will allow security vendors to view the operating system's core by making available a key technology dubbed 'application programming interfaces.'"

DOJ_NMG_0080956

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Signs Bill Reauthorizing $80 Million For Great Lakes Restoration. The AP (10/14) in a brief story notes, "President Bush has signed a bill to reauthorize up to $16 million a year for grants programs to restore habitats in the Great Lakes region." It "would authorize $80 million over five years to restore fish and wildlife habitats, provide money for fish and wildlife projects and upgrade reports on the area's ecosystem." The funding "won't be spent unless included it's included in separate appropriations bills, but supporters said it would build momentum for a comprehensive $20 billion plan to restore the Great Lakes."

Concerns Raised About Environmental Impact of US Population Growth. Washington bureau chief Edward Luce in an op-ed in the Financial Times (10/14) downplays concerns that immigration is a threat to US culture as the number of US citizens approaches 300 million. Luce is concerned about "what America's continued expansion means for its future quality of life – and, indeed, that of the rest of the planet. Nobody who drives through America's seemingly endless suburbs and 'exurbs' can miss the tension between the country's vast open horizons and the increasing traffic gridlock around them. Nor can they fail to notice that it is America's sprawling urban environs, rather than the cities themselves, that are accommodating the country's growing numbers." And "like growing numbers of mainstream Americans, I will also ask whether this is the latest sign of America's economic success or a reminder that growth cannot continue in this fashion indefinitely. It is a good question to which the answer is yes, and probably."

NYT Accuses EPA Of Ignoring Science On Air Quality. The New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) editorializes, "The Bush administration loves to talk about the virtues of 'sound science,' by which it usually means science that buttresses its own political agenda. But when some truly independent science comes along to threaten that agenda, the administration often ignores or minimizes it. The latest example involves the Environmental Protection Agency's decision to reject the recommendations of experts inside and outside the government who had urged a significant tightening of federal standards regulating the amount of soot in the air." EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson "claimed there was 'insufficient evidence' linking health problems to long-term exposure. He added that 'wherever the science gave us a clear picture, we took clear action,' noting also that 'there was not complete agreement on the standard.'" Soon "the administration must decide whether to tighten the standards for another pollutant, ground-level ozone. … The scientific advisory committee has tentatively recommended that the ozone standard be tightened, citing new evidence of smog's adverse effects. This time Mr. Johnson should pay more attention to the scientists and less to the political strategists in the White House."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Indicts Medical Marijuana Advocate On New Charges. The New York Times (10/14, Marshall) reports, "A leading medical marijuana advocate who successfully appealed his federal conviction this year has been indicted on new criminal charges that include tax evasion and money laundering." The Times continues, "The man, Ed Rosenthal, a well-known spokesman for the movement to legalize marijuana, was already facing a retrial on federal charges of growing marijuana for medical use. He is to be arraigned Monday in Federal District Court here on the new indictment, unsealed late Thursday. … It accuses Mr. Rosenthal, 61, of 14 felony charges that include cultivating marijuana plants; laundering $1,850, which the government says he got from selling the plants to medical dispensaries; and tax evasion. His tax returns, prosecutors said, omitted income from the sale of the plants." The Times adds, 'Reached Friday at his home in Oakland, Mr. Rosenthal said he thought the efforts to prosecute him were part of a campaign to shutter medical marijuana sites in California and to subvert the state law allowing them. … The state and the federal government have been locked in a legal and cultural battle over the medicinal merits of marijuana since 1996, when California voters approved a ballot measure giving seriously ill patients the right to buy and use the drug with a doctor's prescription. … The Drug Enforcement Agency has been aggressive in investigating medical marijuana facilities. Last week, the authorities raided and closed five Bay Area sites, arresting 15 people. … A spokesman for the United States attorney's office, Luke Macaulay, would not comment on the new indictment, but said, 'Drugs are a priority for the Justice Department, being that marijuana is illegal under federal law.'"

DOJ_NMG_0080957

Cali Drug Cartel Pleas Were 15 Years In The Making. The AP (10/14, Anderson) reports, "The guilty pleas by the two highest-ranking Colombian cocaine traffickers ever to appear in a U.S. courtroom had their roots in a hot summer morning 15 years ago when a drug-sniffing dog named Iowa found something suspicious." The AP continues, "The dog's alert on Aug. 26, 1991, led to the discovery at the Port of Miami of more than 12 tons of cocaine concealed in metal tubes that had, in turn, been hidden inside heavy concrete posts. … The shipment served notice to federal investigators that the Cali cartel had surpassed the better-known - and much more violent - Medellin cartel in controlling Colombia's cocaine trade and was employing ingenious new smuggling methods. … 'It was electric, the atmosphere at the time,' recalled Eddie Ryan, a federal prosecutor who worked the case until leaving Miami for Charlotte three years ago. 'It was a huge load. This was a new game and they were better at it than anybody had ever been.'" The AP adds, 'The investigation spawned by the big find would take many twists and turns and break new legal ground along the way. … It culminated in the Sept. 26 guilty pleas to U.S. drug trafficking charges by brothers Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, the Cali cartel kingpins nicknamed 'The Chess Player' and 'The Master' who are now serving 30-year prison sentences. A total of 141 cartel members have been convicted or pleaded guilty for their roles in an organization once responsible for 80 percent of the world's cocaine. … For Ed Kacerosky, the Customs agent who led the investigation from its inception, that moment in a Miami courtroom wasn't his biggest in the case. … Far better, he said, came after a midlevel defendant briefly mentioned links between the Cali smugglers and operations in Guatemala. That would lead to a Miami frozen vegetable warehouse used as a front to smuggle cocaine and to a lawyer who ran the cartel's South Florida operations."

Colorado Man Pleads Guilty In Bomb Case. The AP (10/14, Sarche) reports, "A former air traffic controller accused of planting homemade bombs in March outside the Grand Junction (CO) homes of four co-workers and a Federal Aviation Administration official pleaded guilty Friday to one single count that could put him in prison for more than a decade." The AP continues, "Burke, 54, was arrested in Utah in April. He agreed to plead guilty to a charge of malicious damage to a building used in interstate commerce." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn said the charge is punishable by five to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000. Prosecutors said they will recommended a term of 10 years when Burke is sentenced on Feb. 2. … Burke had worked for Serco Group PLC, a British company that staffs air traffic control towers at airports in Grand Junction and 55 other locations. He was fired in 2004 after working for Serco for four years. … The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms has said the Grand Junction bombs were similar to a device that exploded at Serco offices in Murfreesboro, Tenn., in February."

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Allows Lawsuit To Proceed Against Tyson's For Hiring Illegal Aliens. The Washington Times (10/14, Hirsch, 88K) reports, "A federal judge has ruled that workers can file a class-action suit against Tyson Foods Inc. for depressing wages by hiring illegal aliens." The workers' lawyer, Howard Foster, described it "as a 'very big step,' allowing him to seek damages for thousands of workers at eight plants -- including one in Glen Allen, Va. -- instead of just the four original plaintiffs." The RICO case "is one of a growing number across the nation challenging illegal aliens in the workplace. In August, a temporary agency in California sued its competitors under the state's unfair-competition laws." But "Tyson Foods described the judge's ruling as 'procedural,' adding that it was 'not based on the merits of this case, which was actually dismissed by another judge back in 2002.'"

DOJ_NMG_0080958

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Government Reform Committee Finds Data Breaches Across Government. On Friday, the House Government Reform Committee released a report summarizing government data thefts since Jan. 1, 2003. The report drew attention from national print media, including the Associated Press, the Los Angeles Times and the Washington Times. While the May VA data theft and other VA data breaches are noted in all of the stories, reports nevertheless focus on the report's verdict that data theft is a problem across many government agencies.

For example, the AP (10/14, Ohlemacher) reports, "Federal workers at 19 agencies have lost personal information affecting thousands of employees and the public, raising fresh concerns about the government's ability to protect sensitive information. … In all, the committee reported 788 incidents involving the loss or compromise of sensitive personal information since Jan. 1, 2003. That was in addition to the 'hundreds of security and privacy incidents' at the Department of Veterans Affairs, the report said."

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Mendoza, 918K) reports, Most of the nearly 800 incidents of data losses have never been publicly reported. The 'vast majority' were not accidental misplacements, but rather outright thefts of computers or data disks containing sensitive information such as Social Security numbers. In some cases the data were used inappropriately by employees and private contractors, the report said." The Times adds, "Veterans Affairs officials reported their data on two large spreadsheets covering hundreds of security and privacy breaches, the report said."

Under a headline that deems the government "careless" with data, the Washington Times (10/14, Seper, 88K) reports, "Personal files maintained by the federal government on all U.S. citizens 'remain at risk,' according to a House report released yesterday, which said the stored information is routinely lost because of carelessness, misconduct or theft. … The report said much of the information was lost when laptop computers were stolen, documenting the theft of more than 1,800 government-owned laptop computers -- including one belonging to the Defense Department and containing personal information on 30,000 applicants, recruiters and prospects that 'fell off a motorcycle belonging to a Navy recruiter.'"

Professor Finds Few Consumer Injuries In Data Thefts. Not mentioning the House Government Reform Committee report, Fred H. Cate, the director of the Indiana University Center for Applied Cybersecurity Research and a distinguished professor of law and adjunct professor of informatics, writes in a column in the Washington Post (10/14, A21, 748K), "When a laptop was stolen from the home of a Department of Veterans Affairs employee this year, newspapers across the nation editorialized about the dangers facing the people whose data were on the computer. … Then the laptop was recovered -- the data untouched and the risk of identity theft shown to be nonexistent. The happy ending to the VA saga should have come as no surprise. The fact is that few if any such breaches lead to identity theft or other consumer injuries."

McClellan Cites Cost Savings Of Medicare Rx Drug Benefit. The Washington Post (10/14, A9, Lee, 748K) reports, "The Medicare prescription drug benefit is on pace to cost the federal government about $30 billion this year, far less than the $43 billion originally projected, outgoing Medicare chief Mark B. McClellan said yesterday." According to McClellan it "is a result of cheaper-than-expected premiums, fewer people than anticipated enrolling in the new coverage, and slower growth in drug spending." McClellan "said he is pleased that independent surveys show that 80 percent of people who signed up for the new drug benefit are satisfied with their plans. But what he is most proud of has been his emphasis on shifting Medicare toward better-coordinated, prevention-oriented care, he said." The Post notes, "Predictions that many employers would drop their plans and send older workers or retirees to Medicare for drug coverage did not come to pass, McClellan said."

White House Rejects Allegations In Kuo Book. NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 6, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) was the only network broadcast to devote a segment to David Kuo's new book "Tempting Faith." According to NBC, the White House "is responding to explosive charges in a new book by the former number-two man in the president's White House Office of Faith-Based Initiatives." NBC continued, "'Tempting Faith,' a new book by a former Bush aide says that instead of being compassionate conservatives, the Bush team manipulated people of faith for political purposes. Criticism the author, David Kuo, first made last year to NBC News." He "quotes the president as saying about visiting ministers, 'money, all these guys care about is money.'" NBC noted, "Today the White House said Kuo is changing his story." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow: "When David Kuo left the White House, he sent the president a very warm letter talking about how wonderful it was." Kuo's "former boss" James Towey was shown saying, "President Bush would not have tolerated that kind of conduct toward any religious leader."

DOJ_NMG_0080959

The AP (10/14, Loven) reports Kuo "singled out staffers in the office of Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser and deputy chief of staff, as particularly condescending toward evangelical Christians, viewing them as necessary to help win elections but ridiculing them behind the scenes." Snow "said he had not yet seen the book. But he said Rove was asked if he made the comments and replied he had not. Kuo, however, doesn't single out anyone by name as making the condescending comments. … Snow denied Kuo's charge that the White House's religious charities program wasn't given the status it deserved, saying Bush's personal commitment to the policy was solid."

Christian Conservative Leaders Come To Bush's Defense. The Washington Post (10/14, A3, Cooperman, 748K) reports, "Conservative religious leaders described themselves as shocked yesterday by a new book's charge that Bush administration staffers privately dismissed evangelical Christian political activists as 'nuts' and 'goofy.' But their dismay was aimed at the book's author, former White House official David Kuo, rather than at President Bush or his senior advisers. James Dobson, Charles W. Colson and other stalwarts of the conservative Christian movement defended the Bush administration and questioned the timing of the book's publication, a month before the midterm elections. Some suggested that Kuo had betrayed the White House. 'I feel sorry for him, because once you do something like this, you get your 15 minutes in the spotlight, but then after that nobody will touch you,' said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council."

Air Force Memorial To Be Unveiled. President Bush will help to dedicate the new Air Force memorial Saturday, but the upcoming event received little media coverage as ABC World News (10/13, story 8, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) in a brief story noted, "As of tomorrow, there's going to be an impressive, new landmark at Arlington National Cemetery. The United States Air Force memorial will be dedicated, filling the last gap in Washington area monuments to the military services. The design was inspired by the Thunderbirds. And the Thunderbirds flew over the memorial today."

Rep. Charles Taylor Demands WSJournal Retract Allegations. The AP (10/14) reports Rep. Charles Taylor "demanded Friday that The Wall Street Journal correct and retract statements in an article that said he slipped projects benefiting his own business interests into the federal budget, a claim he called libelous." Taylor "said he would sue the newspaper if it does not meet his demands. … Taylor is demanding that the Journal retract a front-page article published Wednesday titled 'Seat in Congress Helps Mr. Taylor Help His Business.' It said he added 'earmarks' to legislation to widen two highways near property he owns, to give millions to nonprofit groups run by his business partners and supporters, and to provide $3.8 million for a park in front of a downtown Asheville bank he owns."

NYT Book Review Questions Rove's Success In Making Progress On Agenda. Nicholas Confessore in a review of James Moore and Wayne Slater's book "The Architect: Karl Rove and the Master Plan for Absolute Power" in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) calls it "a blistering sequel," and while "Rove frequently disappears from the narrative for pages at a time, the authors invariably suggest that the lack of apparent fingerprints merely proves his cunning." Confessore believes the authors have overestimated Rove because after Bush's re-election "Social Security privatization…was a political disaster. Iraq is turning into an albatross. Bush has endured some of the lowest approval ratings of any president since Richard Nixon, and voters appear even less enchanted with his allies on the Hill. Even some prominent conservatives, dismayed by growth in the size of government and the deficit spending that has fueled it, are fuming." And "the Republican Party's battles over immigration have repelled Hispanic voters, and the administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina reversed whatever gains Bush had made among blacks. Rove once hoped to build a new big-tent party that could thrive as ethnic and racial minorities become a majority of the electorate. He's had to settle for a narrower and more self-limiting coalition built around white religious conservatives, their fear of what Democratic rule would bring and the genuinely impressive machinery he's built to muster them on Election Day."

DOJ_NMG_0080960

OTHER NEWS:

Lower Gas Prices Spur Consumer Spending.

The impact of lower gas prices in boosting consumer spending was generally reported as good news. But Sen. Barack Obama provided a counterpoint on CBS, warning that the US needed to do more to secure energy independence. The New York Times/Bloomberg (10/14) reports, "Lower gasoline prices encouraged Americans to spend more on clothing, furniture and building materials, and propelled consumer confidence to the highest level in more than a year, according to reports released yesterday." Bloomberg notes, "The largest decline ever in gas-station receipts pushed overall retail sales down 0.4 percent in September, the Commerce Department said. Excluding service stations, purchases climbed 0.6 percent, three times the gain in August." And "the University of Michigan reported that its consumer sentiment index jumped to 92.3 in October, from 85.4 the prior month. It was the highest reading since July 2005."

The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A4, Conkey, 2.03M) in an article titled "Economy Benefits As Gas-Price Drop Spurs Outlays" reports, "Consumers took much of the money they saved at the gas pump last month and spent it elsewhere, giving the economy a critical boost at a time when overall growth appears to be slowing." Experts "said consumers, supported by a strong labor market and solid wage growth, are still increasing their spending at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 3% or more. That's proving to be especially critical now that the economy appears to be settling into a period of slower growth, damped by a decrease in residential construction, higher interest rates and a wider trade deficit."

The Washington Times/AP (10/14) notes that "with confidence rebounding sharply this month, strong sales are forecast for the all-important holiday period." Global Insight chief economist Nariman Behravesh "said this decline is like a huge tax cut that will give consumers nearly $100 billion more to spend on other items." He "said the overall economy, which grew at a 2.6 percent rate in the spring, probably grew by just 1.8 percent in the third quarter but should rebound to around 2.5 percent growth in the final three months of this year."

The Financial Times (10/14, Pimlott, Guha) adds, "The firm underlying retail sales figures and an unexpectedly strong upswing in consumer confidence further diminish the prospect that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates any time soon."

Obama Warns Falling Gas Prices Inadequate Solution To US Energy Needs. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 9, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Gasoline prices continue to fall. They're down to a nationwide average tonight of $2.25 a gallon, the lowest price since the first of the year. But in 'free speech' tonight, a warning that falling gas prices should not lull you into a false sense of energy security." Sen. Barack Obama said, "America's oil addiction doesn't go away when prices come down and the polls close. There are few issues besides energy that combine so many of the challenges we face today. When Ford lays off thousands of workers, it's because they can't compete with foreign companies that are making more fuel efficient cars. When we hear about rising global temperatures, it's because the fossil fuel we burn are damaging our climate. And when we wonder why the U.S. is so involved in the Middle East, it's because we need their oil. We don't have to settle for this future. We should replace more of the oil we use with alternative fuels like ethanol. And we can even make a deal with our auto companies. If they make more fuel-efficient cars, the government will help them pay their retiree health care costs. The point is the ideas on energy are out there, but we need the leadership to make it happen. And now's the time to make your voice heard, not only this November, but in all the days that follow."

Paul Brown echoed that theme in his "What's Offline" column titled "The Deathwatch For Cheap Oil" in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M). He writes, "Those falling prices at the gasoline pump may only be temporary. Indeed, they could signal the start of an era in which, forecasters say, 'the death of cheap, abundant crude might unleash war and plunge the world into a second Great Depression.'" That's according to "Willem Kadijk, a hedge fund adviser quoted by Bloomberg Markets magazine. He is just one of many who believe that global oil production is now at or near its peak, and the only place to go is down."

Clinton Urges California Voters To Approve Increase In Taxes On Oil Revenues. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, McGreevy, 918K) reports, "Accusing oil companies of lying about the cost of Proposition 87, former President Clinton on Friday called 'bogus' their contention that approving a tax on oil revenues would trigger higher gas prices for California motorists." At a UCLA rally Clinton "said the state ballot measure would help California move toward less expensive, cleaner forms of energy by funding research into alternative fuels." Supporters of the tax have already launched an ad campaign featuring Al Gore and Clinton "will be featured in a new round of ads that were filmed during Friday's rally in front of a cheering crowd of 5,000, many of them students." But opponents "noted Friday that support for the measure is sagging, and predicted that the involvement of Clinton and Gore would not be enough to save a proposal that they say would create an unaccountable bureaucracy." Claremont McKenna College professor of government John Pitney said, "This is an effort to pump up the Democratic base of voters. It's a very smart move, because these are the folks the base will respond to."

DOJ_NMG_0080961

Dow Sets New Record By Slight Margin. The New York Times/AP (10/14) in an article titled "Another Record Week For The Dow" reports, "The Dow Jones industrial average inched to another record close yesterday, giving it three consecutive weeks of triple-digit increases." It "was the Dow's sixth record close in two weeks. Still, stocks showed little overall movement as traders were unimpressed with a profit report from General Electric and brokerage firms issued negative comments about Home Depot." And oil prices "moved higher, holding the major indexes to modest gains." The DJIA "rose 12.81 points, or 0.11 percent, to 11,960.51, passing the record close of 11,947.70 set Thursday." The Times adds, "Broader stock indicators also advanced. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 2.79 points, or 0.20 percent, at 1,365.62, and the Nasdaq composite index was up 11.11 points, or 0.47 percent, at 2,357.29."

Providing a cautionary outlook, the Wall Street Journal (10/14, B1, McKay, 2.03M) reports, "As the Dow Jones Industrial Average flirts with a close above 12000, a familiar pattern has emerged. It edges closer to that benchmark, then pulls back. What happens once it tops that milestone may be less predictable." In the past the Dow "performed well following its initial breaches of 1,000-point benchmarks, according to the data firm Ned Davis Research, rising an average of 1.8% in the first month and 14.2% twelve months after such milestones." Yet, "the most recent milestone, which came amid the dot-com bubble, was an unpleasant exception. After the Dow finished above 11000 for the first time in May 1999, it was off 4% just a month later and remained in the red 12 months later, off 1.8%. If 12000 comes soon, it will have taken more than seven years to rise the next 1,000 points." And some experts "like Standard & Poor's strategist Sam Stovall, believe the market is due for a similar pullback now. 'It would be good for the market to have a bull-market correction soon, just to make sure it doesn't get ahead of itself,' Mr. Stovall told clients in a recent briefing."

GE Report Suggests US, Global Economy Performing Well. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A3, Kranhold, 2.03M) in an article titled "GE Earnings Point To Solid Economy" reports, "Robust third-quarter financial results from General Electric Co.'s industrial units suggest that the global economy is weathering both high oil prices and a slowdown in the U.S. housing market." The Journal notes, "Overall, GE reported results that met expectations but disappointed some investors. But GE's industrial units posted a 14% increase in revenue and an 18% jump in profit, bolstered by strong sales of power turbines, locomotives and aircraft engines, among other products."

Similarly, the Financial Times (10/14) adds, "The US economy is proving resilient – at least if one focuses on the right set of core measures. Excluding autos, gasoline and building materials, retail sales rose by 0.8 per cent during September. The data are volatile but fit the rosy macro-economic picture painted by General Electric, a bellwether if there ever was one."

The New York Times (10/14, Deutsch, 1.21M) reports, "Investors reacted tepidly to yesterday's report, sending G.E. shares down less than a percent, to $35.98. But G.E. shares, which had been stagnant for most of the year, rose 13 percent in the last two months, and analysts do not anticipate a sell-off now." GE CFO Keith Sherin said, "We promised to grow two to three times G.D.P., and this is the seventh quarter we made good on that promise." Yet "the quarter was not devoid of disappointments. Profit at GE Commercial Finance, which rose 6 percent, fell short of the 10-to-15-percent growth the company had projected. The reason, Mr. Sherin said, was that some deals that were expected to close in the third quarter would instead close later in the year."

Courts See Upswing In Cases Regarding Long-Term Care Health Insurance. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Selvin, 918K) reports, "Consumer advocates and insurance regulators say that lawsuits and complaints…are likely to mushroom in the coming years as more baby boomers and their ailing parents make claims on long-term care insurance. Sales of such policies grew 65% from 2000 to 2004, but actual and projected payouts have already caused a shakeout that could leave some policyholders with huge bills worried that insurers can't or won't pay. Some insurers who underestimated their potential obligations have sharply hiked their premiums or abandoned the market. Insurers have denied long-term care claims for a variety of reasons, lawyers say. They have, for example, rejected as inadequate documentation from seniors too sick or distracted to be diligent record keepers. Or they have rescinded policies, saying the individual didn't fully disclose a preexisting medical condition on his or her application. In response to multiplying consumer complaints, some states are requiring more training for sales agents and limiting insurers' ability to raise premiums, along with other restrictions."

DOJ_NMG_0080962

Spotlight On Gay Republicans Seen As Threatening GOP Base. ABC World News (10/13, story 3, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Foley scandal as exposed the little-known aspect of life on Capitol Hill. One that is causing real controversy in the Republican Party. … It is threatening to tear the Republican Party apart. Christian conservatives are now arguing that all the gay men present in the Foley scandal prove that the Republican party has been too tolerant." Rev. Louis Sheldon: "It's time for what we call come to Jesus meeting. Homosexuality is a dysfunctional lifestyle. And it must be addressed." ABC continued, "Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council asked 'has the social agenda of the GOP been stalled by homosexual members and/or staffers? Does the party want to represent values voters or Mark Foley and friends?'" ABC went on to report that the Bush White House "won re-election in 2004 partly by campaigning against gay marriage. … And yet, it can seem perfectly accepting of such unions, as was seen this week, when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice swore in AIDS czar Dr. Mark Dybul, who is gay, while Dybul's partner held the Bible. Rice even referred to the partner's mother as Dybul's mother-in-law."

McClatchy Reimburses Nonprofit For McConnell Investigation. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Rosen) report that last year, Marilyn W. Thompson, "then the executive editor of the Lexington Herald-Leader…wanted to initiate a major reporting project but lacked enough money to pay for it. Thompson, who wanted the paper to take a deep look at Mitch McConnell, Kentucky's senior U.S. senator, a Republican, came up with an answer: She'd seek support from the Center for Investigative Reporting, a California-based nonprofit group that's financed or conducted groundbreaking work in television and print journalism. The idea was approved by Thompson's bosses at Knight Ridder, which owned the Herald-Leader at the time. The center approved a $37,500 grant, and Herald-Leader reporter John Cheves went to work. This week, with Cheves winding up a six-month examination of McConnell - and the senator's staff raising questions about the unusual grant - the Herald-Leader's new owner, McClatchy Co., came to a different conclusion. McClatchy acquired Knight Ridder in June. Howard Weaver, McClatchy's vice president for news, announced that the company would reimburse the Center for Investigative Reporting for the grant."

Bush To Campaign For Sherwood And Allen This Week. The New York Times (10/14, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports President Bush "is not the kind of guy to back out on a promise, especially when it comes to raising money for fellow Republicans. So it is that Mr. Bush, who has slogged his way through many a fund-raiser this campaign season, plans to make the rounds of what might be called the Congressional newsmakers caucus next week, with back-to-back fund-raisers on Thursday for Representative Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Senator George Allen of Virginia." The Times notes Sherwood "has admitted having an extra-marital affair with a woman who has accused him of trying to choke her," while Allen "is fighting for re-election after a string of controversies involving racially insensitive remarks; his denial and subsequent embrace of his newly discovered Jewish heritage, and reports that he had failed to disclose stock options." According to the Times, Bush and the GOP "are investing time and money to hold seats they did not originally think they would have to defend so aggressively." The AP (10/14, Hunt) reports, "A congressman who admitted to having an affair and a senator accused of using racial slurs will get some political help from President Bush next week. … 'The President has made a commitment, and he's going to fulfill the commitment,' White House press secretary Tony Snow said Friday." Snow is quoted as saying, "Sherwood has certainly admitted to what has gone on, and the president also believes that we're all sinners, we all seek forgiveness, and in this particular case, he's supporting Don Sherwood's candidacy."

DOJ_NMG_0080963

Some GOP Insiders Claim Bush Is Unprepared For Midterm Losses. U.S. News and World Report's Kenneth T. Walsh (10/14) writes, "Some Republican strategists are increasingly upset with what they consider the overconfidence of President Bush and his senior advisers about the midterm elections November 7–a concern aggravated by the president's news conference this week. 'They aren't even planning for if they lose,' says a GOP insider who informally counsels the West Wing. If Democrats win control of the House, as many analysts expect, Republicans predict that Bush's final two years in office will be marked by multiple congressional investigations and gridlock. 'The Bush White House has had no relationship with Congress,' said a Bush ally. 'Beyond the Democrats, wait till they see how the Republicans–the ones that survive–treat them if they lose next month.' GOP insiders are upset by Bush's seeming inability to come up with new ideas or fresh approaches."

GOP Unable To Fully Fund Candidates In Several Tight Senate Races. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A1, Cummings, 2.03M) reports, "As their prospects dim for holding control of the House, Republicans are increasingly alarmed they also could lose their Senate majority…and the party is finding its fund-raising edge isn't going as far as it used to. … For the first time since taking control of Congress in 1994, party leaders are being forced to pick and choose which of the tight races they can throw money into winning. They simply can't afford them all." According to the Journal, "Republicans have increasingly concentrated on three Senate seats -- Tennessee, Missouri and Ohio -- to try to salvage at least a one-seat majority. They currently hold 55 of the Senate's 100 seats, but at least six of those are now seen as vulnerable. The party's national and Senate campaign accounts have recently spent $14.1 million to hold the seats of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, Missouri Sen. Jim Talent and Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine -- with $8 million spent on Mr. DeWine alone. Yet most polls show Democrats still leading in all three races. That spending comes at the expense of other vulnerable incumbents, including Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, who are also both running behind. They are getting voter turnout help but not independent advertising support from the national party."

Most Incumbent Senators Maintain Fundraising Edge. The AP (10/14, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Incumbent senators entered the final weeks of the midterm campaign with substantial sums in their bank accounts, but challengers also stepped up fundraising to keep races competitive and ad buyers busy to the very end." Sen. Mike DeWine "had a $3 million advantage over Democratic challenger Rep. Sherrod Brown at the end of September. However, Brown had the edge on fundraising for the quarter, according to reports they plan to file with the Federal Election Commission." Sen. Maria Cantwell "said she had $3.5 million in the bank after raising $2 million in the past quarter. Her opponent, Republican Mike McGavick, outraised her this quarter, bringing in nearly $2.2 million for the period ending Sept. 30, and had $2.1 million on hand." Sen. Lincoln Chafee "reported about $700,000 on hand, compared with $1.4 million for his challenger, Sheldon Whitehouse."

Kerry Blasts Republicans Over "Lies" About Iraq, North Korea And Foley. The AP (10/14, Ramer) reports Sen. John Kerry "likened the congressional page scandal to the war in Iraq and the handling of North Korea, saying that Republicans have lied repeatedly. 'A lie, a lie, a lie, a lie. What we have in Washington is a house of lies, and in November, we need to clean house,' Kerry said Friday night during the New Hampshire Democratic Party's annual fall fundraising dinner. 'They tell us we're making progress in Iraq and that there is no civil war. That is a lie,' he said. 'It's immoral to lie about progress in that war in order to get through a news cycle or an election cycle.'

Allen's Cash On Hand Total More Than Double Webb's. The Washington Post (10/14, B5, Craig, 748K) reports James Webb "Outraised" Sen. George Allen "by nearly $1 million from July to October, according to campaign finance reports released yesterday that reflected a surge in support for the challenger after Allen made several controversial comments that dramatically tightened the race. Allen still has twice as much in the bank as Webb, but both candidates said they will have enough money in the campaign's closing weeks to compete on TV in the crucial advertising war that will help decide the outcome. Allen raised $2.6 million between July 1 and Sept. 30 and reported $5.5 million in the bank, according to his finance report, the last required before the Nov. 7 election." Webb "had $2.7 million in the bank at the end of September."

Allen Ads Hammer Webb On Gay Marriage And Taxes. The Washington Times (10/14, Bellantoni, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Allen "has been most effective pummeling the Democrat on taxes and social issues to rally his conservative base. 'Jim Webb, Hillary Clinton and their liberal allies in Washington don't want to give constitutional protection to traditional marriage,' an announcer says on an Allen radio ad. 'And if they don't share our values on something as basic as marriage, how can we trust them on any issue?' The ad, which is running in rural parts of the state, is one of several that hit the airwaves this week to paint Mr. Webb as a liberal out of touch with Virginia values."

DOJ_NMG_0080964

Menendez Leads Kean In Cash On Hand $5.5 Million To $3.2 Million. The New York Times (10/14, Chen, 1.21M) reports, "Posting his strongest fund-raising numbers to date, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. has significantly reduced what had been a three-to-one advantage in resources for his opponent, Senator Robert Menendez, according to preliminary campaign finance data released on Friday. Yet in a caustic race that figures to be dominated by television advertising in its final four weeks, Mr. Menendez, the Democratic incumbent, still enjoys a solid lead in overall cash on hand, $5.5 million compared to $3.2 million for Mr. Kean. From July 1 to Sept. 30, Mr. Kean, a Republican, raised nearly $1.8 million and spent $866,000 — eclipsing his best fund-raising efforts over a three-month period, when he raised $1.6 million in the first quarter of this year." Menendez "had his slowest quarter of the year, collecting almost $1.4 million."

Steele Angered By Cardin's Attempts To Tie Him To Bush. The Washington Times (10/14, Ward, 88K) reports, "A visibly angry Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele yesterday lashed out at Democratic attempts to tie him to President Bush and national Republicans in the U.S. Senate race, saying that he refuses 'to be the whipping boy for or against the Republican Party.' 'You know, I'm tired of this. I've got to justify everything the administration does, or everything it doesn't do. This is not about that,' Mr. Steele told reporters after participating in a forum conducted by the Washington County Chamber of Commerce. The Republican Senate nominee noted that his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, 'mentioned the president 113 times' during their debate last week." The Times notes Steele "previously had distanced himself from Mr. Bush, saying that his Republican Party affiliation is a 'scarlet letter' in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-to-1. But he also has called the president his 'homeboy.'"

Steele Clarifies His Positions On Abortion, Guns. The Washington Post (10/14, B4, Mosk, Marimow, 748K) reports Steele "said yesterday that his strong personal opposition to legalizing abortion would not factor into his work in Washington, or his evaluation of a nominee for U.S. Supreme Court justice, should he be elected next month. 'I have no litmus test in that regard because my constitutional obligation is to represent the people of the state,' said Steele, who is Catholic. … The Republican candidate was less emphatic when asked about gun rights and suggested that his general support might not extend to assault weapons. 'You draw the line. I mean, what do you need an assault weapon for?' Steele said."

Rural "Racism" Considered A Threat To Steele's Campaign. The Washington Times (10/14, Miller, 88K), in an article titled "Rural Areas' Racism May Cost Steele Votes," reports, "Residents in Western Maryland and on the Eastern Shore say there are many whites among them who will not vote for a black candidate. … White voters in Republican strongholds in rural areas pose a threat to the senatorial ambitions of Mr. Steele, who already has battled race-baiting by Democrats in his Senate bid." The Times adds, "an elected Eastern Shore official -- a white Republican -- said privately that racism probably will hurt Mr. Steele 'a little bit' among white voters. In Hagerstown, Gail Curtis, a black hairstylist, said local residents have shouted racial slurs at her and her children. She has 'no doubt' that some white voters will be reluctant to cast a ballot for Mr. Steele because of his race."

Harris Said To Have "Squandered" GOP's Chance To Defeat Nelson. NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 7, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M), in its "In Depth" segment reported, "By her own admission, Katherine Harris' run for senate is an uphill fight. A fight that republican leaders like Jeb Bush never wanted her to wage." She "trails incumbent Bill Nelson by at least 18 points in recent polls and Republican leaders fear she's squandered a golden opportunity to gain a vulnerable Democratic seat." NBC noted, "Neither president Bush nor Florida Governor Bush have campaigned for Harris. When the president recently stopped for two other Florida candidates, he briefly shook her hand and only mentioned her in the audience."

Bay Area Liberals Mobilize Opposition To Doolittle And Pombo. The Los Angeles Times

DOJ_NMG_0080965

(10/14, Tempest, 918K) reports San Francisco Bay area liberal activists have focused on "two candidates vying for seats in bedrock conservative districts to the east, currently occupied by Republicans John T. Doolittle of Granite Bay and Richard W. Pombo of Tracy. Although most experts still give them a narrow edge, Doolittle, 55, seeking his ninth term, and Pombo, 45, pursuing his eighth, are in the toughest fights of their political careers going into the Nov. 7 election. Their Northern California races are considered the most competitive in the state. President Bush demonstrated his concern by showing up at fundraisers for the duo last week, garnering more than $1 million for their campaigns. But the prospect of upset victories contributing to a Democratic takeover of Congress — potentially installing San Francisco's Nancy Pelosi as speaker — has added another dimension to the Doolittle and Pombo races. Hundreds of volunteers and activists in Berkeley and other Bay Area communities have mobilized on the Democratic side, raising money, manning phone banks and carpooling into the districts to canvass neighborhoods for votes."

Three Southern California GOP House Seats Safe Despite Corruption Allegations. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Berthelsen, 918K) reports, "three Southern California Republicans with legal and ethical troubles of their own — including being named among the 'most corrupt members of Congress' by the public interest group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington — are expected to coast to reelection in November." Rep. Jerry Lewis "is accused of earmarking hundreds of millions of taxpayer dollars for the clients of a lobbyist and close friend." Rep. Gary Miller "is accused of using his position in Congress to help a business partner and campaign contributor gain access to a prime piece of public land and of sheltering millions of dollars in real estate investment gains from taxes." Rep. Ken Calvert "is accused of earmarking millions of taxpayer dollars for transportation improvements near real estate developments in which he has a financial interest." The Times notes, "Even Lewis, who faces the most potential legal trouble as the target of an investigation by federal prosecutors, is on safe ground."

Democrats Work To Block Notices For Ballots Cast For Foley. The AP (10/14, Skoloff) reports Democrats "asked a state court Friday to block Election Day notices at polling places that would inform voters in Rep. Mark Foley's district that his GOP replacement on the ballot will receive his votes. … Foley's name is still on the ballot…and election supervisors want voters to know that votes for Foley will be given to state Rep. Joe Negron instead. Democrats say that would be electioneering, which is illegal under state law. 'We think the issue is very simple. What they propose to do is electioneering, and the law says electioneering is not allowed within 100 feet of a polling place. Simple as that,' said Democratic Party spokesman Mark Bubriski." Negron "called the Democrats' request 'a desperate attempt to try to confuse voters.'"

Several Other Once-Safe GOP Seats In Florida Considered Vulnerable. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Williams, 918K) reports, "GOP candidates in several once-certain Florida races now appear to be in trouble." In the 13th District "Democrat Christine Jennings leads Republican Vern Buchanan by 12 percentage points, according to a recent poll, despite the wealthy Buchanan's $3 million contribution from his own pocket. Democratic State Sen. Ron Klein has been running neck-and-neck with Republican U.S. Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. for his 22nd District post. … Democrat Phyllis Busansky's bid for the 9th District has gained strength in the last two weeks, say campaign workers, who are awaiting new poll results. The former local government leader is facing Gus Bilirakis, son of retiring U.S. Rep. Michael Bilirakis."

Immigration Key In Hayworth House Race. The Financial Times (10/14, Luce) reports, "Every night between 6,000 and 6,500 foreigners try to cross from Mexico into the US, most of them into the desert state of Arizona. Some two-thirds of them succeed. If J.D. Hayworth's crushing handshake is any guide, future illegal aliens can expect much stiffer resistance at the border." His position not only puts Hayworth at odds with President Bush and Sen. John McCain, but also his Democratic opponent Harry Mitchell, "who polls say stands at least an odds-even chance at mid-term elections next month of ejecting the Republican from the seat he has held since 1994." At an event before a group from the National Association of Letter Carriers, Mitchell said, "We need to change the way business is done in Washington." While "hardly original, Mr Mitchell's plea appears to be sincere. As does Mr Hayworth's uncompromising line on immigration. 'My opponent,' says Mr Mitchell, 'wants to hire bond bailsmen –- call them bounty hunters –- to deport illegal immigrants. Is this the kind of America we want?' The postal workers evidently like Mr Mitchell. But their applause is not emphatic.

DOJ_NMG_0080966

Anti-GOP Sentiment, Strong Challenger Present Hurdles For Wolf. The Washington Post (10/14, B6, Gardner, 748K) reports, "Northern Virginia's sprawling 10th District, which meanders 70 miles from McLean to the Shenandoah Valley, is nothing if not predictable. For 26 years, voters have sent Republican Frank R. Wolf of Fairfax County to represent them in Congress. That fact alone gives Wolf, 67, an enormous advantage over his Democratic challenger this year, Judy Feder. … But 2006 is not a year to assume that history will be a guide. The war in Iraq, high gasoline prices and the House page scandal are pushing voters away from President Bush's party -- even in a district viewed widely as Northern Virginia's most Republican. Add to that the uncertainty of seeking office in a fast-growing region where the political allegiance has shifted toward Democrats in recent elections, and the outlook for Wolf grows less bullish. Finally, consider the challenger: Though a political newcomer, Feder is a well-funded, well-spoken public policy expert whose aggressive campaign has caused several national political analysts and Web sites to list the 10th District as a race to watch."

WPost Endorses Wolf. The Washington Post (10/14, A20, 748K) endorses Wolf, saying, "we have had our disagreements" with Wolf "but those have been outweighed by our respect for his undisputed diligence, candor, active legislative approach and passionate commitment to human rights in some of the world's darkest corners."

Democrats Find Success Recruiting Physically Attractive Candidates. The Washington Post (10/14, A1, Murray, 748K) in a front page story reports, "Attractive politicians have an edge over not-so-attractive ones. The phenomenon is resonating especially this year. By a combination of luck and design, Democrats seem to be fielding an uncommonly high number of uncommonly good-looking candidates. The beauty gap between the parties, some on Capitol Hill muse, could even be a factor in who controls Congress after Election Day. … In most of the races, the Democratic challengers look a lot like standard-issue politicians -- not likely to impress the judges at Atlantic City. But there are others who, while they might not have movie-star looks, are certainly well above the C-SPAN median. The list is decidedly unscientific, but it includes several whose names come up often on Capitol Hill for reasons other than their policy platforms. Among those on it…are Brad Ellsworth, a swaggering Indiana sheriff; businesswoman Gabrielle Giffords of Arizona, who has chiseled features and rides a motorcycle; and Heath Shuler of North Carolina, a strapping former quarterback for the Washington Redskins. In Tennessee, Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a lean and stylish 36-year-old, has drawn admiring looks."

Political Candidates Find MySpace Useful In Communicating Message. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A4, Lovley, 2.03M) reports, "Politicians across the country are discovering that a presence on social-networking sites such as MySpace isn't just a way of communicating with voters under 30, it is also a means of attracting volunteers and their donations. Howard Dean's 2004 presidential primary run underscored the Internet's untapped potential as a fund-raising tool, and political strategists say these networking sites go further by helping candidates to home in on specific audiences, beyond those who click on campaign Web sites."

Ehrlich And O'Malley To Engage In Two Debates Saturday. The Washington Post (10/14, B1, Wagner, 748K) reports, "After accusing one another of ducking debates for weeks," Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley "are preparing for a political rarity today: a doubleheader." After an hourlong debate in Baltimore this afternoon, "five hours later and 12 miles away, the Republican incumbent and Democratic challenger plan to meet again, this time at the Maryland Public Television station in Owings Mills for another hour-long showdown." The earlier debate will be taped and shown later at 7PM.

Dowd Warns McCain Against Attacking Hillary. Maureen Dowd in her column in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) warns that en. John McCain needs to be careful in criticizing Sen. Hillary Clinton because in the past when "men abused her" she became "a sympathetic figure to many voters." Recently McCain "managed to attack her three ways in one sentence: as a senator, as a wife and as a future opponent. This raises the question: Is it a smart move, pleasing a base that cringes at stories of these celebrity senators palling around, knocking back drinks on an overseas trip? Or is it a misstep, making Mr. McCain look like a sexist bully for pointedly blaming his fellow senator for her husband's old policies -- and calling her 'Mrs. Clinton' just to rub it in?"

DOJ_NMG_0080967

UN Considers "Significant" Sanctions On North Korea. On the network TV news, the UN Security Council sanctions on North Korea were described in generally positive terms. Offering the most detailed TV coverage of the Administration's efforts to deal with North Korea, CBS Evening News (10/13, story 2, 2:10, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported that at the UN "they are moving with uncommon speed and consensus to get a resolution on sanctions. The resolution demands North Korea conduct no more nuclear tests and returns to the negotiating table, those so-called six party talks." US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton: "We refer to cargo you can have air cargo, sea cargo, and land cargo." Axelrod: "China's balking. It thinks inspecting the cargo could lead to a dangerous North Korean response but tonight it appears some compromise will be reached, united by the mutual need to confront North Korea." White House press secretary Tony Snow: "It's sort of like dealing with a bratty child. You give him a piece of candy and hope they'll shut up. Guess what? No more rewards for bad behavior. There will be punishments and consequences." Axelrod: "Secretary of State Rice will leave next week to meet with regional allies, work out the finer points of how to implement those sanctions. For instance, just how those inspections will be conducted, Katie."

In shorter stories ABC World News (10/13, story 4, 1:15, Karl, 8.78M) reported the UN Security Council resolution "will include a ban on weapon shipments. A ban on luxury goods. And it would freeze the weapons on anything related to North Korea's weapons system. And this will be enforced or open to enforcement by inspection of all cargo going in and out of North Korea. These are significant sanctions, even if they are a bit watered down from what the United States wanted."

And NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 3, :30, Williams, 9.87M) briefly, "The United Nations Security Council plans to vote on a resolution tomorrow call for sanctions against North Korea and condemning that nation's recent nuclear test. The resolution does not however talk about any kind of military option. China and Russia objected to that."

In contrast, the major papers' stories focused on China and Russia's objections to the draft proposal. The New York Times (10/14, A1, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "The United States pressed for a Saturday vote on a Security Council resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea for its reported nuclear test, but questions from China and Russia on Friday evening cast the timing and possibly the content of the document into doubt." US Ambassador to the UN John R. Bolton "said the new problems appeared 'technical' rather than 'substantial,' but said they would require another conference of Japan and the five permanent Council members." He also "indicated that one area of dispute remained the methods and legalities of how to inspect cargo." The measure "had already been softened three times this week to meet objections from China and Russia," and Washington officials were "apparently confident of the imminent passage of the measure," as "Senior State Department officials portrayed the United Nations momentum toward a resolution as evidence of a united, multilateral front agreeing to punish North Korea."

The Washington Post (10/14, A14, Kessler, 748K) adds, "China, backed by Russia, insisted that the United States include greater assurances that the resolution could not be used to justify the armed seizure of North Korean ships traveling in international waters." China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, also said "that a ban on luxury goods was unnecessary and too vague." Bolton noted "that Russia raised concerns late Friday about four new problems with the text," including "how we will define nuclear, biological and chemical and weapon-related materials and ballistic missile components."

The Financial Times (10/14, Fifield) reports, "The dispute over the extent of sanctions reflects differences over the purposes of the measure. While the US and perhaps Japan are eyeing regime change, China and South Korea would be happy with a change in behaviour." Also, "doubts are being cast on the effectiveness of whatever measures are agreed. With China and South Korea fearing the collapse of their volatile neighbour, and with a large proportion of North Korea's income coming from illegal trade, even targeted sanctions would have a limited impact." Another Financial Times (10/14, Turner) article also covers this story, as does the Los Angeles Times (10/14, Farley, 918K), the Washington Times (10/14, A1, Gertz, Pisik, 88K), the AP (10/14, Lederer) and Bloomberg (10/14, Zeranski).

Preliminary Test Consistent With Nuclear Detonation. The New York Times (10/14, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports, "American intelligence officials said on Friday evening they had found new evidence that the country detonated a nuclear bomb." The office of John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, sent a document sent to lawmakers on Capitol Hill saying that "an analysis of air samples taken in the region on Wednesday found radioactive material that is 'consistent with a North Korean nuclear test.'" However, a senior intelligence official "said that the results were still preliminary and that final analysis of the data would not be completed for several days." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack sounded a similar note, saying, "We're in the process now of going through, looking through all the data and all the facts to try to come up with the best possible explanation for what, exactly, happened there," but, "We don't know yet." The Washington Post (10/14, A14, Linzer, Pincus, 748K) adds, "intelligence and administration officials were cautious about reaching a conclusion before reviewing all incoming data." The Washington Times (10/14, A1, Gertz, Pisik, 88K), the Financial Times (10/14, Turner), and the AP (10/14, Burns, Gearan) also cover this story, as does a separate New York Times (10/14, Hoge, 1.21M) article.

DOJ_NMG_0080968

Experts Say Kim Isn't Crazy, But Still Is Dangerous. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Johnson) reports that "the whispers in the West that the secretive Kim is crazy are simply wrong, experts say." However, there is "A profound mistrust between North Korea and the United States," as "North Korea believes that Washington is bent on its destruction." Cui Yingjiu, a scholar on North Korea retired from Beijing University and a university classmate of Kim, says that "if Kim is backed into a corner…his regime is capable of selling one of his nuclear weapons to a terrorist group or sparking a calamitous war by bombing Japan." The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A5, 2.03M) notes, "Experts say it is highly unlikely North Korea would drop a nuclear bomb," but a "bigger concern is that North Korea will help Iran proceed with a nuclear-weapons program by sending it technology and supplies, or that it becomes a nuclear-weapons supplier to terrorists who might not be deterred by retaliation since they don't reside in any one nation state."

US Military Plays Stabilizing Role Along DMZ. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 3, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Of course, nowhere is the tension between the two Koreas more palpable than along the demilitarized zone, the D.M.Z., where soldiers from both countries have been staring each other down for more than half a century." CBS (Pizzey): "The North Koreans have said sanctions amount to an act of war, but where north meets south at the D.M.Z., it was business as usual today." Taewoo Kim, Korean Institute for Defense Analyses: "They are aware of even the disadvantages that have to face after nuclear tests." Pizzey: "That certainly included the hardships of sanctions, but any hope that will lead to a popular uprising by people who live in poverty and as satellite images show, in the dark, is considered wishful thinking. There is no known organized opposition in North Korea and the regime has ensured that military options against it are limited." And "South Korean troops routinely strike a martial arts pose as they stare over the demarcation line while the 28,000 U.S. troops who back them up are required to be as much diplomats as fighting men." US Army Capt. David Fischer: "We're here to deescalate issues that may occur. That's our first rule of engagement, deescalate."

Koreans In Japan Unable To Send Care Packages To North With New Embargo. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Doi) reports, "Japan's decision to ban all shipping to North Korea starting Saturday in response to the North's apparent nuclear test this week will cut off care packages from ethnic Koreans who have lived in Japan for decades," including "the divided family of ethnic Korean filmmaker Yang Yonghi," who "made the documentary film 'Dear Pyongyang' based on her visits to her brothers in North Korea over the past decade," which won "the NETPAC Asian award at the Berlin International Film Festival and the special jury prize at the Sundance Film Festival this year."

Former Nuclear Monitor Blames Administration For Terminating Agreement With North Korea. Jon B. Wolfsthal, who monitored North Korea's nuclear program for the United States and is a fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) that the "Agreed Framework helped us avoid a military conflict that could have destroyed Seoul" and "froze Pyongyang's plutonium program." When American intelligence agencies confirmed that North Korea was trying to acquire a uranium enrichment program," the Administration, "instead of working within the framework to get North Korea to abandon its nuclear efforts…terminated the agreement altogether." This "jettisoned something of great diplomatic value…the willingness of North Korea to let Americans -- with whom they were legally at war -- into their nuclear center to secure plutonium-bearing fuel rods for internationally monitored storage." While "administration supporters and commentators are seeking to blame the framework for all our problems," without it, "North Korea would have immediately acquired enough plutonium to produce more nuclear weapons and would have completed construction of two much larger weapon production reactors." The inspectors "protected America from danger and our efforts delayed the onset of the nuclear crisis we now face. To argue otherwise is to play politics with history."

DOJ_NMG_0080969

WSJournal Argues Bush's PSI & Regime Change, Not Arms Control, Stops Nuclear Threats. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A6, 2.03M) editorializes, "The good news here is that at long last the U.N. is attempting to enforce its own nonproliferation regime," but "it took an actual nuclear blast following a long-range missile test this summer to motivate the Security Council to take even these modest actions." Both "North Korea and Iran are revealing the limits of arms control treaties in restraining rogue states bent on gaining nuclear weapons and other WMD," as they cheated on arms control agreements they signed. "The beginning of wisdom is to realize that the threat hasn't ended merely because a rogue regime signs an arms-control treaty." For stopping "rouge bomb makers, "short of deposing a regime, the most successful policy has been the Bush Administration's Proliferation Security Initiative." It differs from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in "that the PSI doesn't give the feckless or evil a veto over what it does. It is a coalition of countries with a shared sense of purpose, and above all the willingness to act."

China Allowing Refugees Suggested As Way To Deal With North Korea. Melanie Kirkpatrick writes for the Wall Street Journal (10/14, A6, 2.03M) editorial board, "If China is to assume what it considers to be its rightful place as a great power, now is the moment." as it is "the only government with a measure of influence over its lunatic nuclear ward in the Hermit Kingdom." Although not yet publicly discussed, "Opening the frontier to refugees would put pressure on Kim Jong Il to give up his nukes or watch his regime implode." Besides, "three official Chinese government documents -- obtained privately and smuggled out of the country -- show that the humanitarian crisis may be more dire than widely believed and the burden on China heavier," and "Allowing the world to help the North Korean refugees in China would help Beijing deal with a problem that is likely to get worse."

Rice Trip To Asia Expected To Focus On Nonproliferation. Towards the end of an article on the proposed UN sanctions against North Korea, the New York Times (10/14, Hoge, 1.21M) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will "travel to Asia next week to discuss how to implement the" expected UN resolution against North Korea, "as well as to discuss other efforts to deter North Korean proliferation of a nuclear bomb or bomb-making materials. Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Ms. Rice would travel to Tokyo, Seoul and Beijing." He added that the trip "is 'an opportunity for her in the region to reaffirm and talk about the strength of our existing alliances there, and also to have a bit more of a wider conversation with others in the region about the current situation, about the security situation, and also to talk broadly about nonproliferation efforts.'"

The Financial Times (10/14, Turner) adds that "Chris Hill, assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator at the stalled talks with North Korea, told reporters Ms Rice's aim was to ensure the UN resolution had 'teeth and will function properly'." The Washington Post (10/14, A14, Kessler, 748K), the Washington Times (10/14, A1, Gertz, Pisik, 88K), and Bloomberg (10/14, Zeranski) also mention Rice's trip in stories focusing on the UN sanctions.

Nuclear Bombs Are Harder To Make Than Commonly Thought. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Boyd) reports that making nuclear weapons "takes a wide set of technical capabilities and a willingness to risk death or injury to join the club of nuclear nations." The scientifically oriented article describes the technical pitfalls at each step of the process for nuclear-weapon aspirants.

Iran Said To Be Watching How North Korea Is Handled. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A2, Seib, 2.03M) reports, "Now may be the time to shelve for good the image of George W. Bush as a unilateralist, go-it-alone cowboy." The Administration "is embarking in coming days on an exceptionally complex set of diplomatic maneuvers to try to contain, simultaneously, the nuclear threats from North Korea and Iran," although "It's hard to say whether the stereotype was wrong, or whether an unfriendly world forced a change." Still, "the stakes are huge. Iran will be watching intently to see whether the U.S. actually can organize a meaningful world response to North Korea's provocation. It's entirely possible that only a truly united response will give the Iranians pause -- which is the real test of the Bush team's newfound fondness for multilateral diplomacy."

Iranian Hard Liners Said To Benefit From US Economic Measures. In a front page story in the Wall Street Journal (10/14, A1, Higgins, 2.03M) reports that "an unintended consequence of U.S. foreign policy" has been that "instead of weakening Iran, America's efforts to squeeze the country ended up boosting the very hard-line forces there that the U.S. wants to curb." Iranian businesses "roil" due to "potent political forces…including the heavy hand of elements close to Iran's hard-line president. Prominent among those forces in business today is the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps," which takes over businesses weakened by the US measures.

DOJ_NMG_0080970

SEC Fines Statoil Over Iranian Payment. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A8, Talley, 2.03M) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department levied a $21 million fine against Norwegian oil company Statoil ASA for a payment it made in 2002 to win development of a critical Iranian petroleum project." Statoil "already paid Norwegian authorities $3 million for the affair" and "acknowledged making the payment." It said "it would accept the penalties. Statoil Chairman Jannik Lindbaek said the incident occurred under the company's previous management and that the company has 'long deplored' it." The SEC "said it wanted to make the Statoil fine high to send a clear signal to other companies."

Ban Appointed Secretary General Of UN. The New York Times (10/14, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister of South Korea, was appointed Friday by the General Assembly as the next secretary general of the United Nations" and was "greeted by sustained applause as he walked onto the rostrum to make his acceptance speech." Ban "listed his priorities as reforming the United Nations, meeting development goals established in 2000, establishing human rights, confronting threats posed by terrorism and weapons of mass destruction, slowing environmental degradation and curbing the spread of AIDS." He also "asked that people understand his modest manner as a cultural attribute and not misread it as lack of decisiveness or passion." The Washington Post (10/14, A14, 748K) adds that UN Secretary General "hailed Ban as 'exceptionally attuned to the sensitivities of countries and constituencies in every continent.'"

New UN Leader Expected To Make North Korea A Priority. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 3, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The General Assembly approved a new Secretary General who is very familiar with the Korean dispute. Ban Ki-Moon is South Korea's foreign minister. He has said improving relations with Kim Jong-Il's government will, in fact, be his top priority." The AP (10/14, Lederer) adds, "Ban has been in the forefront of South Korea's nuclear negotiations with Pyongyang and has said he plans to travel to North Korea as secretary-general, something Annan never did."

Cohen Says Ban Needs To Use Moral Authority To Open North Korea. Roger Cohen writes in his column in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M), "Can a South Korean secretary general of the United Nations" open "the hermit state of a nuclear-armed North Korea?" Ban Ki-Moon "is short on the charisma that made Pope John Paul II a force. But the unanimity he engineered for his nomination testifies to his powers, and sitting atop the UN confers access, authority and agenda-setting discretion not granted by national office." Also, "a chastened U.S. commander-in-chief" is "turning to diplomacy, which is to say the United Nations, at the same time as the organization prepares to greet a new leader for whom the intricacies of the Korean Peninsula are everyday fare. On the face of it, that's a situation with potential." While "fundamental problems remain" – "China has no interest in" Kim's fall, and South Korea is "more intent on the peninsula's stability than its freedom" – if Ban "leaves office with the Korean Peninsula still divided, and 23 million North Koreans still bowing and scraping to Kim, history may prove severe in its judgment."

Violence Continues In Gaza. The New York Times (10/14, Myre, 1.21M) reports that illustrating "the relentless turmoil that has gripped Gaza since militants seized an Israeli soldier and took him to the territory," gunmen from Hamas and Fatah "battled each other overnight and during the day on Friday, leaving a teenager dead and nearly 50 people wounded in the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya." Meanwhile, "Four Palestinians, including three Hamas militants, were killed Friday in a second day of deadly clashes with Israeli forces in the Gaza Strip." While "Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, tried to calm the atmosphere during a midday speech," but despite his and Palestinian Authority president Mahmoud Abbas's pleas, "the internecine fighting has grown worse in recent weeks." The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Ellingwood, 918K) also covers this story.

Bush Expands Sudan Sanctions. The AP (10/14, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush signed an executive order Friday that stiffens sanctions on Sudan and its oil industry in an effort to persuade the government to accept U.N. peacekeepers and stop killings of civilians in Darfur." It "continues a countrywide blocking of the Sudan government's property, and prohibits transactions related to Sudan's oil sector." The White house says the order "imposes sanctions against those responsible for genocide, backs measures to protect civilians and humanitarian operations and supports peace efforts in the war-torn land."

DOJ_NMG_0080971

Incentives Said To Favor Russian, Georgian Escalations. The Washington Times (10/14, Sands, 88K) reports that, according to regional security analysts, "The bitter dispute that erupted last month between Russia and Georgia is a 'perfect storm' of mutual suspicion and hostility in which both sides have their reasons for escalating the tension." While "the European Union and the U.N. Security Council have appealed for calm…both Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili and Russian President Vladimir Putin could benefit from the clash." Saakashvili wants "a Russian 'overreaction' to boost his popularity at home and to attract U.S. and European support for Georgia's long-term hopes to break away from Moscow's influence and join such Western institutions as NATO and the European Union," while "Russia and Mr. Putin are equally keen to slap down Georgia, in part to punish Tbilisi for its desire to ally with the European Union and United States and in part to show Ukraine and other former Soviet states on its border the costs of pulling away from Moscow in favor of the West."

Britain, Ireland Offer New North Ireland Agreement. The New York Times (10/14, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "After three days of closed-door negotiations, Britain and Ireland on Friday offered a compromise formula to restore Northern Ireland's power-sharing government by next March, allowing for an election or referendum to endorse the deal." However, it "was not immediately embraced by the province's fractious political parties," and "it is not certain that an agreement sponsored by London and Dublin will be enough to survive the tripwires of Northern Ireland's fissured politics." Prime Ministers Tony Blair of Britain and Bertie Ahern of Ireland "refrained from high-flown language to herald the end of the negotiations." The Democratic Unionists "had been pressing for Sinn Fein…to commit itself completely to respecting the province's police force" and "Sinn Fein has been pressing for" The Rev. Ian Paisley, the Protestant leader, "to sit in a power-sharing government as first minister with a republican leader as his deputy." Under the agreement, "each side would have to accept the other's demands," and "On Friday, at least, they seemed determined to do that." Northern Ireland's political parties would have until Nov. 10 to agree to the plan.

The Washington Post (10/14, A13, Sullivan, 748K) adds, "Blair and Ahern had said that if the parties could not reach agreement by Nov. 24, the province would have everything from water rates to education controlled by the central government in London. The St. Andrews talks were an attempt to avert that outcome."

The Financial Times (10/14, Adam, Brown) is more optimistic, reporting that "After lengthy overnight talks, Thursday's pessimistic mood began to dissipate," and "there was optimism that Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionists and Sinn Fein could within weeks overcome long-standing differences and agree to form a joint power-sharing executive." It refers to "evidence that republicans and unionists were edging closer to a deal over power-sharing." Blair "put a positive gloss on the talks, but acknowledged there was still some way to go to secure a deal and that the talks could yet unravel."

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Murphy, 918K) takes a more negative tone, leading that "the prime ministers of Britain and Ireland failed to bring Northern Ireland's feuding parties to immediate agreement on power sharing, but worked out a proposal that could establish a new joint government."

Unlike Neighbors, Chile Embraces Trade With China. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Dickerson, 918K) reports, "Chinese competition has put hundreds of textile manufacturers in Latin America out of business," but "Chile has cobbled one of Latin America's most successful trading relationships with the Asian giant. While other countries in the region maintain high tariffs on Chinese goods, Chile is busy tearing down trade barriers." Also, "in contrast to countries such as Mexico, where domestic producers are clamoring for protection, Chilean manufacturers are among the strongest supporters of the free-trade deal with China." Patricia Perez, general manager of a Santiago-based medical products company and president of AsexmaChile, an exporters' trade group, said, "'We see an opportunity to find niches for our products in China … and to make Chile a platform' for Chinese manufacturing and trade with the rest of Latin America."

Book Examines Spy That Betrayed US Intelligence Secrets To Cuba. McClatchy

DOJ_NMG_0080972

Newspapers (10/14, Bachelet) reports that Ana Belen Montes, who was a senior Cuba analyst for the Defense Intelligence Agency, "gave Havana detailed information on U.S. eavesdropping programs aimed at the Castro government, allowing Cuba to mount effective counterintelligence and deception operations for year, according to" the book "Enemies: How America's Foes are Stealing Our Vital Secrets and How We Let it Happen" by Bill Gertz, a defense correspondent for The Washington Times. "Some U.S. officials rank the damage she did with that caused by Aldrich Ames and Robert Hanssen, the infamous CIA and FBI turncoats for Moscow whose information resulted in the deaths of dozens of U.S. agents," and "the book also says there are 'indications' that her spying may have led to the deaths of some U.S. agents in Latin America, but it provides no details." It also "paints an embarrassing picture for U.S. spy-catchers."

Founder Of Micro-Loan Program Awarded Nobel Peace Prize. The award of the Nobel Peace Prize to Muhammad Yunus for his international micro loan program received significant media attention. NBC and CBS only briefly mentioned it, but ABC World News (10/13, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) in a full story segment contrasted his generosity with US congressional scandals reporting, "In Democracies around the world, people are elected to serve the public good. Tonight, a man who held no office, yet helped more families than most politicians ever do, was awarded the Nobel Peace Price."

The Washington Post (10/14, A1, Moore, 748K) in a front page story reports, "The Grameen Bank's pioneering use of micro-credit has been duplicated across the globe since Yunus started the project in his home village three decades ago. Loans as low as $9 have helped beggars start small businesses and poor women buy cellular phones and basket-weaving materials." The New York Times (10/14, Dugger, 1.21M) and the AP (10/14, Hossain) report similar details.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

All Eyes Are on Schools Chief as He Takes Stage
Lost in the Dust of 9/11
Trusting a Promise to Care
GOP's Sure Bets in Florida Now Appear in Question
Peace Prize Winner Sees Every Cent as a Seed
Brewer Aced His Final
Vote on N. Korea Faces Last Hurdles

New York Times:

U.S. Hits Obstacle in Getting a Vote on North Korea
Gay Marriage Losing Punch as Ballot Issue
Wall St. Woos Film Producers, Skirting Studios
Mrs. Astor's Son to Give Up Control of Her Estate
Peace Prize to Pioneer of Loans to Poor No Bank Would Touch
A Cult of Backyard Rocketeers Keeps the Solid Fuel Burning
Earnings for Insurers Are Soaring
London and Dublin Offer Northern Ireland a Compromise
Discord? Not Here, British Say After General's Iraq Comment
Congressman Pleads Guilty but Won't Resign for Now
Snowstorm Blankets Buffalo, Killing at Least 3
Small-Plane Pilots Must Ask Before Flying Up East River

Washington Post:

Dozens of Protesters Arrested On Gallaudet President's Order
New Law Cripples Internet Gambling
Micro-Credit Pioneer Wins Peace Prize
Ney Pleads Guilty to Corruption Charges
Democratic Faces That Could Launch Thousands of Votes
Iraqi Colonel Who Bridged Sectarian Divide Is Killed

Washington Times:

U.S. finding indicates nuclear test
GOP's Ney pleads guilty
Rural areas' racism may cost Steele votes
Body of missing student found in Vermont
Gallaudet rally broken up
Air America files for bankruptcy, will stay on the air
Suit over illegals OK'd for workers at Tyson Foods

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

Home Depot set to enter China market
Dacula woman hits lifetime lotto
Lakewood has been 'like family'
Conyers school, NASA partner
Settlement opens realty listings
Fulton tries to polish its image

Dallas Morning News:

Coal plant interests give Perry $132,000
Departure from Wright era begins
House fire kills boy, 5, grandmother

DOJ_NMG_0080973

Girl's killer gets death penalty
Kaufman suspect charged

Houston Chronicle:

Head's 20 points lead Rockets past Hawks
Suburbs focus on crime, not nationality
Expert: Native disease killed Aztecs, still may lurk
Attorney hired by Mexico to aid Quintero's case
Hidden bag reveals big cash, bad blood
Houston meteorite hunters may join in record find
Students create mosaic of Fifth Ward history
Palmer ends 52-year golf career at Administaff
Sellers get savvy to Latino diversity

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Nobel Peace Prize; Ney Pleads Guilty; GOP Foley Rift; North Korea Nuclear Test; British General Defends Iraq Remarks; US Iraq Casualties Mourned; Buffalo Snow; Flight Attendant Counterror Training; Air Force Memorial; Skateboarder.

CBS: US Troops Iraq Policy Shift; North Korean Nuclear Test; Korean DMZ Tensions; Guantanamo Detainees; FAA NY Flight Ban; Kolbe Page Questions; Buffalo Snow; Iraq Policy Options; Obama Energy Dependence Warning; Nobel Peace Prize; Woodpecker Research.

NBC: UK General On Iraq, Exiles From Iraq, North Korea And The UN, Buffalo Snow, Ney Plea, Kuo Book, Katherine Harris Campaign, NYC Plane Crash, Nobel Peace Prize, Bono Charity.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH – THE PRESIDENT'S SCHEDULE. Highlights: President and Mrs. Bush depart The White House en route Arlington, Virginia - The United States Air Force Memorial. President and Mrs. Bush depart arrive the United States Air Force Memorial. Makes Remarks at the United States Sir Force Memorial Dedication. The United States Air Force Memorial, Arlington, Virginia. President and Mrs. Bush depart The United States Air Force Memorial en route The White House.

President and Mrs. Bush Arrive The White House. President and Mrs. Bush depart The White House via Marine One en route Camp David. South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY -- No schedule available.

US Senate: -- No events scheduled.

US House: -- No events scheduled.

Other. ALL DAY

Other: Oct. 11 - 14. NEUROMUSCULAR MEDICINE _ The American Association of Neuromuscular and Electrodiagnostic Medicine holds its annual meeting. Location: Washington Marriott Wardman Park, 2660 Woodley Road NW. Contacts: n/a, 507-288-0100

Oct. 13 - 14. HOME REHAB _ The Rebuilding Together home rehabilitation organization holds its 18th annual conference. Highlights:
2:30 p.m. New CEO Gary Officer visits an all-day rebuilding event. 1903 Kearney St. NE. Location: Marriott-Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Hwy., Arlington, Va. Contacts: Cindy Price, 202-483-9083

Oct. 14 - 15. GAIA THEORY _ Weekend program on ``The Gaia Theory: Model and Metaphor for the 21st Century." Location: George Mason University law school, 3301 Fairfax Dr., Arlington. Contacts: n/a, 703-528-5406 On the Net: http://www.gaiatheory.org

Oct. 14 - 23. PSYCHIATRIC SERVICES _ The American Psychiatric Association hosts its 2006 Institute on Psychiatric Services.
Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

9 a.m. POLISH/HUNGARIAN UPRISINGS _ The Cold War Museum, in conjunction with the Embassies of Hungary and Poland, will convene a gathering of diplomats, officials and historians to discuss the 1956 Polish and Hungarian uprisings against the Soviets and Communism. Highlights: 9 a.m. Welcome by Jay Rowley, Student Government President, SCSS; Dr. Richard Moniuszko, Deputy Superintendent of Schools, FCPS; Gerry Connolly, Fairfax County Board of Supervisors Chairman; and Francis Gary Powers Jr., The Cold War Museum. 9:30 a.m. Video Screening: Polish documentary on 1956 Poznan Uprising. 10 a.m. Panel 1 - The Polish Perspective: Dr. Padraic Kenney; Dr. Krzysztof Persak; Dr. Marek Chodakiewicz. Moderator: Dr. Christian Ostermann. 11:30 a.m. Video Screening: Video Interview with General Bela Kiraly. 12 p.m. Panel 2 - The Hungarian Perspective: Dr. Imre L. Toth; and Dr. Charles Gati. Moderator: Dr. Christian Ostermann. 2:15 p.m. - 3:45 p.m. Panel 3 - The International Perspective: Dr. Sergei Khrushchev, son of Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev; and David Eisenhower, grandson of President Dwight D. Eisenhower. Moderator: Dr. Christian Ostermann. 3:45 p.m. -

DOJ_NMG_0080974

4 p.m. Closing Remarks by Francis Gary Powers Jr. 4 p.m. - 5 p.m. Signings of ``Failed Illusions: Moscow, Washington, Budapest, and the 1956 Hungarian Revolt' by Dr. Charles Gati. ``Lorton - Then & Now." Location: South County Secondary School, 8501 Silverbrook Road, Lorton, Va. Contacts: Francis Gary Powers Jr., 703-273-2381

11 a.m. - 3 p.m. THEODORE ROOSEVELT BIRTHDAY _ The National Parks Service celebrates President Theodore Roosevelt's 148th birthday anniversary. Activities will include ranger-led walks, birdhouse building, children's crafts, live animals and exhibits. Location: Theodore Roosevelt Island. Contacts: 703-289-2550

1:30 p.m. AIR FORCE MEMORIAL _ Dedication ceremony for the Air Force Memorial. Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, Secretary of the Air Force Michael Wynne and Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley, deliver remarks at the Air Force Memorial Dedication. Secretary of the Air Force Michael Wynne, Under Secretary of the Air Force Ronald Sega, Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley, Air Force Chief of Chaplains, Chaplain (Maj. Gen.) Charles Baldwin and Chief Master Sgt. Rodney McKinley will conduct a media availability at 11:30 a.m. after the wreath-laying at the Air Force Memorial. Secretary of the Air Force Michael Wynne, Under Secretary of the Air Force Ronald Sega, Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley and Chief Master Sgt. Rodney McKinley will conduct a media availability at 3 p.m. after the Air Force Memorial dedication. Location: 1 Air Force Dr., Arlington. Contacts: Richard Baker, 202-585-2084 On the Net: http://www.airforcememorial.org

6 p.m. BLACK GOLD _ Preview screening of documentary ``Black Gold," a documentary on Ethiopian coffee farmers. Q and A session follows the showing. Location: D.C. Convention Center. Contacts: Helen DaSilva, 617-728-2409

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
US Appeals Warrantless Surveillance Ruling To 6th Circuit 3
SouthCom Investigates Guantanamo Abuse Charges..... 3
Swiss Say Banks Broke Law By Giving Data To US..... 3
Georgia Imam Pleads Guilty To Providing Material Support For Hamas..... 3

Homeland Response:
Bush Signs Bill To Increase Port Security 4
TSA Seeks To Boost Attendance For Flight Attendant Counterterror Training..... 4
FAA Bans General Aviation Along East River 5
Many Immigrant Office Cleaners In Manhattan Fell Ill After 9/11 .. 5
Cruise Ship Industry Returns To Boost New Orleans 5

War News:
US, UK Downplay British General's Assessment Of Iraq..... 5
Bush Seen As Open To Policy Shift On Troop Withdrawal..... 6
Experts Offer Iraq Policy Options Contrasting With Administration's..... 6
Army Campaigns "Hard" For More Funding 7
Doubts About Maliki Government Grow 7
Al Sistani's Influence Is Declining 7
Interior Minister Blames Iraqi Bloodshed On Facilities Protection Service 8
Respected Iraqi Colonel Is Killed 8
15 Killed Across Iraq 8
SEAL Falls On Grenade To Save Comrades..... 8
UK Coroner Says US Military Killed UK Journalist 8
US Citizen Sentenced To Death In Iraq..... 9
Shays Suggests Abu Ghraib Abuses Were "More About Pornography Than Torture." 9
Afghan Suicide Bombing Kills Eight..... 9
Illinois Town Mourns Two Casualties..... 9
NYTimes Review Of "Hubris" Harshly Critical Of Administration... 9

Criminal Law:
Ney Pleads Guilty To Corruption Involving Abramoff 10
Shimkus Testifies About His Handling Of Foley Allegations 10
Kolbe's Camping Trip With Minors Is Subject Of Federal Investigation..... 11
Weldon Reportedly Subject Of FBI Corruption Probe 11
Judge Rejects Ryan Bid To Remain Free Pending Appeal..... 11
Unrepentant Tennessee Lawmaker Sentenced To Five Years In Prison 12
Former NYPD Detective Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison . 12
Body Of Missing Vermont Student Found In Gorge Near Campus..... 12
9th Circuit Upholds "Absurd" Sentence..... 12
Gonzales, Mueller To Speak At Boston Law Enforcement Conference 13

Civil Law:
California Man Pursues Claim That Los Angeles Port Misused Funds 13
Bankruptcy Filings Down Sharply 13
Air America Declares Bankruptcy 14

Civil Rights:
DOJ Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Bias..... 14
DOJ Assists Clarksville, TN, With Police Department Woes..... 14
DOJ Settles Redlining Allegations With Indiana Bank..... 14
DOJ Asked To Probe Florida Beating Death..... 15
Judge Orders Mississippi County To Explain Jail Hiring Practices 15
Gallaudet Has Protesters Arrested 15
Opposition To Gay Marriage Seen As Losing Steam..... 15

Antitrust:
FCC Delays Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Merger..... 16
Microsoft Agrees To Vista Changes 17

Environment:
Bush Signs Bill Reauthorizing $80 Million For Great Lakes Restoration..... 18
Concerns Raised About Environmental Impact of US Population Growth 18
NYT Accuses EPA Of Ignoring Science On Air Quality 18

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
US Indicts Medical Marijuana Advocate On New Charges 18
Cali Drug Cartel Pleas Were 15 Years In The Making 18
Colorado Man Pleads Guilty In Bomb Case 19

Immigration:
Judge Allows Lawsuit To Proceed Against Tyson's For Hiring Illegal Aliens..... 19

Congress-Administration:

House Government Reform Committee Finds Data Breaches Across Government ... 19
McClellan Cites Cost Savings Of Medicare Rx Drug Benefit ... 20
White House Rejects Allegations In Kuo Book ... 20
Air Force Memorial To Be Unveiled ... 20
Rep. Charles Taylor Demands WSJournal Retract Allegations ... 20
NYT Book Review Questions Rove's Success In Making Progress On Agenda ... 21

Other News:

Lower Gas Prices Spur Consumer Spending ... 21
Dow Sets New Record By Slight Margin ... 22
GE Report Suggests US, Global Economy Performing Well ... 22
Courts See Upswing In Cases Regarding Long-Term Care Health Insurance ... 23
Spotlight On Gay Republicans Seen As Threatening GOP Base 23
McClatchy Reimburses Nonprofit For McConnell Investigation ... 23
Bush To Campaign For Sherwood And Allen This Week ... 23
Some GOP Insiders Claim Bush Is Unprepared For Midterm Losses ... 24
GOP Unable To Fully Fund Candidates In Several Tight Senate Races ... 24
Kerry Blasts Republicans Over "Lies" About Iraq, North Korea And Foley ... 24
Allen's Cash On Hand Total More Than Double Webb's ... 24
Menendez Leads Kean In Cash On Hand $5.5 Million To $3.2 Million ... 25
Steele Angered By Cardin's Attempts To Tie Him To Bush ... 25
Harris Said To Have "Squandered" GOP's Chance To Defeat Nelson ... 25
Bay Area Liberals Mobilize Opposition To Doolittle And Pombo. 25
Three Southern California GOP House Seats Safe Despite Corruption Allegations ... 26
Democrats Work To Block Notices For Ballots Cast For Foley ... 26
Several Other Once-Safe GOP Seats In Florida Considered Vulnerable ... 26
Immigration Key In Hayworth House Race ... 26
Anti-GOP Sentiment, Strong Challenger Present Hurdles For Wolf ... 26
Democrats Find Success Recruiting Physically Attractive Candidates ... 26
Political Candidates Find MySpace Useful In Communicating Message ... 27
Ehrlich And O'Malley To Engage In Two Debates Saturday ... 27
Dowd Warns McCain Against Attacking Hillary ... 27
UN Considers "Significant" Sanctions On North Korea ... 27
Rice Trip To Asia Expected To Focus On Nonproliferation ... 29
Iran Said To Be Watching How North Korea Is Handled ... 30
Ban Appointed Secretary General Of UN ... 30
Violence Continues In Gaza ... 30
Bush Expands Sudan Sanctions ... 31
Incentives Said To Favor Russian, Georgian Escalations ... 31
Britain, Ireland Offer New North Ireland Agreement ... 31
Unlike Neighbors, Chile Embraces Trade With China ... 31
Book Examines Spy That Betrayed US Intelligence Secrets To Cuba ... 31
Founder Of Micro-Loan Program Awarded Nobel Peace Prize ... 32

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 32

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 33
Other ... 33

DOJ_NMG_0080977

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Appeals Warrantless Surveillance Ruling To 6th Circuit. The AP (10/14, Irwin) reports, "The Justice Department on Friday asked a federal appeals court to throw out a lower court decision that said the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program is unconstitutional." The AP continues, "The president has said the program is needed in the war on terrorism. U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit agreed with the program's opponents when she ruled Aug. 17 that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers." The AP adds, 'Government lawyers said in pleadings filed Friday with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the surveillance program 'is necessary to protect the nation from an ongoing national security threat of the highest order and is vital to waging and winning the ongoing armed conflict.' … Taylor's injunction 'dismantles a vital tool that already has helped detect and disrupt al-Qaida plots,' the Justice Department attorneys argued. They also said Taylor's order barring use of the program 'in any way' showed the judge dealt with sensitive national security issues in a 'blunderbuss manner.'" The AP notes, "A three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based appeals court ruled Oct. 4 that the administration could keep the program in place while it appeals Taylor's decision. The judges said their ruling considered the likelihood an appeal would succeed, the potential damage to both sides, and the public interest. … The appeal is likely to take months."

SouthCom Investigates Guantanamo Abuse Charges. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 4, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Some barroom bragging has prompted an investigation into whether terror suspects at Guantanamo Bay were abused. A U.S. Marine sergeant says she blew the whistle after hearing guards boasting at a bar about beating prisoners. Today the Pentagon told the U.S. Southern Command to look into it. Meanwhile, the Red Cross just wrapped up a visit to Guantanamo, meeting with 14 new prisoners there, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the 9/11 mastermind."

The AP (10/13, Selsky) reports, "The U.S. Southern Command on Friday launched an investigation into 'credible allegations' that guards at Guantanamo Bay abused detainees, and appointed an Army colonel to head the probe. ... Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, who represents a detainee at the U.S. naval base in eastern Cuba, filed the 'hotline' complaint last week. Vokey attached a sworn statement from his paralegal, Sgt. Heather Cerveny, 23."

Red Cross Will Give US Confidential Suggestions. The AP (10/13, Selsky) reports, "The Red Cross will make confidential recommendations to the U.S. government after meeting at Guantanamo Bay with 14 new detainees, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks ... The encounters apparently mark the first time the 14 detainees have spoken with anyone other than their captors since they were arrested." A Red Cross spokesman "said there were now 454 detainees at Guantanamo and the Red Cross has private access to all of them."

Lawyer Says Gitmo Detainee's Confession Was Coerced. The Washington Post (10/14, Leonnig, 748K) reports on Abdul Rahim, a 22-year-old who claims that he "endured cigarette burns, electric shocks and repeated beatings at the hands of Taliban soldiers who captured him in 2000, he said -- all because he refused to fight for al-Qaeda." Ironically, the US now holds him allegedly because of "the false confession Rahim gave to placate his Taliban torturers." His "account of being imprisoned and tortured by the Taliban is supported by newspaper accounts about Rahim and fellow prisoners whom the Taliban abandoned when U.S. forces began bombing Afghanistan in the fall of 2001. It is also supported by documents from impartial agencies that had contact with Rahim, notably the International Committee of the Red Cross."

Swiss Say Banks Broke Law By Giving Data To US. The New York Times (10/14, Bilefsky, Lichtblau, 1.21M) reports, "Swiss banks broke their nation's laws by providing banking information to American counterterrorism officials, Switzerland's top data-protection official said Friday. The banks, known for safeguarding privacy, should have informed customers using the Swift money-transfer service that their data could be passed on to third parties, the Swiss official, Hanspeter Thür, said." His opinion differed from "the views of the Swiss finance minister, Hans-Rudolf Merz, who said last month that giving the Central Intelligence Agency such access did not infringe on the country's banking secrecy rules." The AP (10/14) briefly reports the same story.

Georgia Imam Pleads Guilty To Providing Material Support For Hamas. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/14, Rankin) reported, "The prayer leader of a North Georgia mosque has pleaded guilty to federal charges of providing material support to the Islamic militant group Hamas." Mohamed Shorbagi, "who lived near Rome, entered his guilty plea on Aug. 28, federal authorities said Friday. Shorbagi's court documents were unsealed in U.S. District Court in Atlanta Friday morning. … Said FBI Special Agent in Charge Gregory Jones, 'It is very disturbing to see people in the United States who are so willing to offer their assistance to known terrorist organizations, and this case should remind us all of the continued need to be vigilant.'" US Attorney David Nahmias said that "Shorbagi was a Georgia representative for the Holy Land Foundation and attended foundation meetings at which high-level Hamas officials made presentations condemning Israel." The Journal-Constitution noted, "Shorbagi's plea agreement states he is to be sentenced to 15 years in prison, the maximum allowed under federal sentencing guidelines."

DOJ_NMG_0080978

The New York Times (10/14, Goodman, 1.21M) reports, "In a case kept secret for nearly two months, the religious leader of a mosque in Rome, Ga., has pleaded guilty to providing financial support to the militant Palestinian organization Hamas...the 42-year-old defendant, Mohamed Shorbagi, a citizen of the Palestinian territories who is living legally in the United States with his wife and young children, was charged on Aug. 28 with providing aid to Hamas through donations he made to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an Islamic charity shut down by federal authorities in 2001." The Washington Post/AP (10/14, Bluestein) also reports the story.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Signs Bill To Increase Port Security. President Bush's signing of a bill to increase port security was primarily covered by the Washington Times and the wire services. The Washington Times (10/14, Curl, 88K) reports, "President Bush yesterday signed a law to protect U.S. ports from terrorists smuggling weapons into the United States hidden within the 11 million containers that enter the country each year." It "authorizes $3.4 billion over five years for safety measures, including the installation of radiation detectors at the 22 largest U.S. ports by the end of next year. More inspectors will be hired to increase the number of random searches of containers." In response, Rep. Edward Markey "called the new law a 'sham port bill' and complained it did not go far enough by authorizing only a pilot program to study scanning of cargo containers headed for the United States from three ports."

The wire services highlighted the political angle of the issue as the midterm elections approach. The AP (10/14, Loven) reports Bush "used the bill-signing ceremony to assert that Republicans are tough on terror, a key issue in congressional elections just less than four weeks away." But Bush "didn't mention an unrelated provision that seeks to put teeth into laws that forbid most online gambling. Instead, Bush focused on the multiple ways the legislation tightens security and closes a loophole in anti-terror defenses, especially at ports."

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, 918K) publishes a similar version of the AP article adding that while Democrats supported the bill, "Bush was accompanied at the bill-signing ceremony by one Democrat, Sen. Patty Murray of Washington, alongside a slew of Republican lawmakers. For weeks the president has insisted that Republicans are tough on terror and that Democrats would make the country weaker." The AP adds, "Murray said that for the first time in many years, she will sleep well, knowing that ports in Seattle and other cities will be safer. Murray, who has been working on the bill for more than five years, said it was gratifying to see the president sign a bipartisan bill 'in an extremely political month,' with midterm elections a few weeks away."

AFP (10/14) reports, "Hoping to retain control of Congress in legislative elections on November 7, lawmakers in Bush's Republican party adopted the measure two weeks ago to persuade voters that they are better able to prevent another terrorist attack." They "rode the security issue to electoral victory in 2002 and 2004. But the same strategy may falter this year amid growing public anxiety about the war in Iraq and the economy." And "Bush, who has portrayed the opposition Democrats as failing to grasp the nature of the terrorist threat after the attacks of September 11, 2001, used the signing ceremony as an opportunity to hammer home his campaign message on security."

Bush Signs Law To Crack Down On Internet Gambling. In a front page story the Washington Post (10/14, A1, Ahrens, 748K) briefly notes Bush signed the port security bill and focused instead on the bill's impact on internet gambling, which "was effectively criminalized by the federal government yesterday, as lawmakers work to eliminate an activity enjoyed by as many as 23 million Americans who wagered an estimated $6 billion last year." Although "proponents decried the effects of gambling on society, opponents pointed to the enormous popularity of Internet gambling and compared the new law to the Prohibition amendment of 1919." It "is potentially crippling to a worldwide industry whose biggest customer has been the United States." Even the WTO "has a stake in the game. The organization has ruled that the United States violates trade treaties by outlawing offshore online gambling while tolerating some forms of U.S.-based online gambling, citing the horse-racing ambiguity." But bill sponsor Rep. Bob Goodlatte said, "There are family problems, bankruptcy problems, gambling addiction, gambling by minors, using gambling to launder money for criminal and terrorist organizations and organized crime. It does not help our society."

TSA Seeks To Boost Attendance For Flight Attendant Counterterror Training. ABC World News (10/13, story 7, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Since the 9/11 attacks flight attendants have been calling for self-defense training. Now, the Transportation Security Administration has launched it." ABC (Stark): "Congress required the Transportation Security Administration to develop this course. It's offered free to flight crews. But it is not required. Out of the 220,000 eligible, a mere 300 have managed to attend. They have to do so on their own time. And cover any cost to get to the course, which used to last three days. The Air Marshals now run the program. They've shortened it to a day, to try to boost enrollment."

DOJ_NMG_0080979

FAA Bans General Aviation Along East River. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 5, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight, the F.A.A. announced it is banning low-altitude flights by small private planes in New York city's East River corridor. It's a safety precaution after the crash this week that killed New York Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and his flight instructor."

Many Immigrant Office Cleaners In Manhattan Fell Ill After 9/11. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Barry, 918K) reports, "The dust around ground zero, we now know, contained caustic, finely pulverized concrete, trillions of microscopic fibers of glass, and particles of lead, mercury and arsenic, as well as carcinogens like asbestos and dioxin. … An ever-growing number of New Yorkers is coming forward to describe symptoms: the first responders who plunged into the tangled wreckage to find survivors; the volunteers who hauled diesel fuel and doled out cigarettes; the students at Stuyvesant High School who returned to classes while acrid fires burned nearby. Less visible is the army of cleaning workers who were sent to the area to clean office buildings."

Cruise Ship Industry Returns To Boost New Orleans. The Washington Times/AP (10/14, Sayre) reports, "The New Orleans' cruise ship industry returns to service tomorrow when the 2,000-passenger Norwegian Sun becomes the first regularly scheduled liner to cast off from the city's docks since Hurricane Katrina." After the negative impact of Katrina "the business is starting over" as "tomorrow's voyage marks the return of regularly scheduled service of four- to seven-day voyages. For a time after Katrina, two cruise ships moored at New Orleans to provide housing for emergency workers." The AP adds, "The port is opening a third cruise terminal and a 1,000-vehicle garage at a cost of $38 million that will give the facility the ability to handle two large passenger ships at once. It is bullish enough to be making plans for a fourth terminal." Yet, "Bob Wall, owner of the New Orleans-based travel agency Vacations at Sea, said the first year probably would only be modest as the ships get re-established. He thinks bookings will increase steadily in the coming months."

Microloan Program Suggested To Aid Katrina Survivors. Nobel Peace Prize winner and economist Muhammad Yunus in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (10/14, A6, 2.03M) suggests initiating a microfinancing program to help Katrina survivors writing, "Many people ask, Why not just give free cash, especially under such dire circumstances? In Bangladesh, we've learned that when aid is free, not only do the poor get the least of it, but everyone inflates their needs." But "Microlending has already helped millions reach a better life through their own initiative. It has also given them valuable skills as well as crucial financial back-up in case they ever face a natural disaster like Katrina. So it might be time to think about another type of support for Katrina's victims: the microloan. As our small, flood-battered country has learned, giving someone a hand up doesn't always require a handout. The most important thing is to help people get back to work while letting them hold on to their self-respect. Microloans can do just that."

WAR NEWS:

US, UK Downplay British General's Assessment Of Iraq. ABC World News (10/13, story 5, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The British government is struggling to stamp out a furor over statements that made by a top general. Today, General Richard Dannatt insisted he was not at odds with his government's policy." Gen. Dannatt: "We've got to get on with it. We can't be there for years and years in the sort of numbers that we are. We all recognize that. There's nothing new in what I'm saying there." Gibson: "Dannatt did stand by his claim that the presence of British troops was exacerbating the violence in Iraq."

The New York Times (10/14, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "The British government raced Friday to defuse an embarrassing public debate over remarks by" Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, its top military commander, "that Britain should withdraw its troops from Iraq 'sometime soon.'" He "modified some of his remarks in a series of radio and television interviews," saying that "By 'soon,'…he meant that British troops should not remain there for 'years and years.' But he did not completely retract his assessment that the presence of British forces in Iraq 'exacerbated' the violence there." Prime Minister Tony Blair "insisted that, having read transcripts of the general's interviews on Friday, he was echoing official policy," and White House spokesman Tony Snow "also tried to dull the remarks, saying, 'His general point was that, you know, when your work is done you hand over authority to the Iraqis.'"

The Washington Post (10/14, A18, Jordan, 748K) adds, "Snow said Dannatt believed his comments had been 'largely taken out of context.'" Dannatt "said he was not 'backtracking' but expanding on his remarks," adding that "there was no 'rift' between him and Prime Minister Tony Blair." The Financial Times (10/14, Blitz) notes, "Blair was last night fighting to limit the damage to his Iraq policy" by this

DOJ_NMG_0080980

"unheard of action for a serving leader of the armed forces." The AP (10/13, Haddon) reports that Blair "insisted that there was no difference of opinion between him and army chief General Sir Richard Dannatt."

General Dannatt's Remarks Seen As Reflecting US Generals' Positions. NBC Nightly News (10/13, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It was the shot heard round the world and it came from the commander of the British army. He is on the record as saying British troops have no business in Iraq and should come home. While he has since changed his stance a bit, his words sent shockwaves through British forces. It wasn't what American forces needed to hear, either. As they are already facing an unraveling and violent situation on the ground, counter to their goal of democracy taking hold." NBC (Miklaszewski): "The general's remarks sent political shockwaves through both the British and U.S. Governments but what the British general had to say publicly is what many U.S. generals are saying privately." UK Gen. Richard Dannatt: "We're exacerbating it in the sense that because we are there, we provide a target and we are attacked, ergo, if we are not there, we wouldn't be attacked and the situation would be calmer." Miklaszewski: "It may sound surprising, but that's not far off the position of the U.S. military commanders. Despite a recent spike in deadly sectarian violence, senior U.S. military officials fear that throwing many more American troops into the fight would only intensify the problem and increase U.S. casualties. More troubling, senior U.S. military officials tell NBC News, 'the fabric of law in Iraq is unraveling' and fear that Prime Minister Maliki will not deliver on his pledge to take on sectarian militias."

Blair Seen As Losing Clout. The AP (10/13, Gardiner) reports, "His army chief's brazen declaration that British troops should soon leave Iraq is the latest evidence that the once-formidable prime minister -- who rode out a fierce party rebellion just last month -- may be rapidly losing his political clout."

NY Daily News Concurs With Dannatt. The New York Daily News (10/14, 729K) editorializes, "There is undeniably growing sentiment even in hardy stay-the-course circles that the Iraqi mission -- just and high-minded though it was at the beginning, just and high-minded though it remains -- has been no howling triumph. ... The Iraqis absolutely must begin to take charge of their own affairs."

Basra Shiites Want British To Leave. The AP (10/14) reports, "Many Shiites in this southern port city say they want British troops to leave, though the region is still bloodied by a persistent grind of killings, including Sunni insurgent bombings and Shiite-on-Shiite slayings amid a competition for political control." Basra leaders "agreed with an assessment by Britain's army chief that the British presence only worsens the violence and the soldiers should withdraw soon." Shiites claim that "the British presence only provides a target for attackers seeking to end the 'occupation' -- and some said the troops are doing nothing to rein in party-backed Shiite militias that have risen to prominence."

Bush Seen As Open To Policy Shift On Troop Withdrawal. CBS Evening News (10/13, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With opposition to the war in Iraq growing and no end in sight plans are now being drawn up to start withdrawing U.S. troops." CBS (Martin): "The Bush Administration has repeatedly opposed setting a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq. But two separate sets of advisors -- one inside the Pentagon and one outside -- are now developing plans for what would amount to a withdrawal schedule. Previously rejected as telling the enemy how long they'd have to hold out, a withdrawal schedule is now seen as a way of forcing the Iraqi government to accept more responsibility and of removing what the head of the British Army identified as one of the causes of the violence: The presence of a foreign army." In addition to the Iraq Study Group, Marine Lieutenant General John Sattler "is developing what one source called a forcing mechanism that would set target dates for the turnover of areas now controlled by American forces to Iraqi troops. Setting a date and sticking to it worked for the Iraqi elections, this source said, suggesting the same model could apply to troop levels. None of these options has been approved yet, but the subject of setting a timetable for troop withdrawals is now on the table." Couric asked, whether "the President will buy this idea?" Martin replied, "Well, he said just this week if his military commanders come in and tell him he needs to do something differently in Iraq, he would accept their advice. So if the military -- and it's still an if -- were to come in with a recommendation for setting some sort of schedule, it would seem likely he would go along."

More Commentary On Troop Withdrawal. Scripps Howard News (10/14) commentator John Hall writes that, despite James Baker's intentions, "The president, more than once, said he was open to any kind of tactical change in course that his top commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., would bring to him. But he seems more entrenched, not less so, on his message that 'the enemy's coming after us' if there should be a premature withdrawal of troops from Iraq.. … Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney, and the network of neo-conservatives who backed the war from the start have formed a protective wall around the existing strategy for a long time."

Experts Offer Iraq Policy Options Contrasting With Administration's. Late in its broadcast, CBS devoted a significant amount of time to interviews with three international national security experts, all of whom offered policy options on Iraq different from the Administration's. CBS

DOJ_NMG_0080981

Evening News (10/13, story 8, 4:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "You hear about it every night. The violence in Iraq just keeps getting worse. In our latest CBS News/New York Times poll, two-thirds of the respondents told us they believe the war is going badly. But what should the United States do about it?"

Retired U.S. Army Major General Paul Eaton, who was in charge of training the Iraqi military during the first year of the war, said, "with the need to engage across the waterfront we feel need to engage with Syria, get our ambassador back there and we need to get an embassy up and running in Tehran so that we've got at least the opportunity to develop a local engagement."

Anne-Marie Slaughter, dean of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton, said, "Well, I certainly agree with General Eaton that we should be working with Iran and Syria, because the long-term solution is going to require negotiations across the region. But immediately I actually think we have to recognize we are in the middle of a civil war and a civil war typically ends when one side has won decisively. I think we're going to have to stand aside, protect as many Iraqi civilians as possible, but effectively let militias fight it out."

Asked how the US could extricate itself, Daniel Benjamin, an international fellow with the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said, "It's not clear it can. It's not clear that we have any leverage anymore or what we have won't disappear very quickly. We can do a couple of things and one is that we can hold out an option to the parties that there will be an equitable division of resources in the country and that there's a big aid package."

Army Campaigns "Hard" For More Funding. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Brown) reports, "The Army is campaigning hard to ensure that it has enough money to keep up the battles in Iraq and Afghanistan and to prepare for potential future conflicts. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, says the service needs $138 billion in 2008 to ensure it can field as many as 19 combat brigades at any given time, as called for by the Pentagon's latest four-year strategy." The Army "has borne the brunt of manpower and equipment losses. More than 2,100 of the 3,100 U.S. troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan have been Army soldiers. The Army plans to spend $17.1 billion this year to replace or repair equipment that's been lost or damaged, including more than 2,000 vehicles awaiting overhaul." Analysts Loren Thompson and Frederick Kagan discuss the nation's lack of solicitude toward an all-volunteer military and the need to have enough troops for the Iraq war and "other strategic commitments."

Funding For Additional Troops Seen As Unaffordable. Scripps Howard News (10/14) in an editorial warns, "According to the Congressional Research Service, Congress already has appropriated $437 billion for war, not including $70 billion approved by the Senate as part of next year's record-breaking Pentagon budget ... The fighting in Afghanistan, home of the Taliban and training ground of the 9/11 terrorists, is one thing. But an increasing number of Americans see Iraq as a war we can no longer afford."

Doubts About Maliki Government Grow. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Youssef) reports, "In the five months since Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki became Iraq's leader, the parliament and his ministries have formed hundreds of committees ... No one knows precisely how many committees have been formed - one estimate puts the number at 400. ... That lack of action is eroding Iraqi citizens' and U.S. officials' confidence that Maliki's government will be able to address the problems that plague this country, a development that would leave the U.S. with virtually no policy alternative." McClatchy adds, "There's a growing chorus that Maliki's government is unlikely to ever come to terms with the country's problems, a complaint reflected in Iraqi Web logs, newspaper columns, and, U.S. civilian and military officials say, in private conversations."

An Estimated Million Of Iraqis Have Fled Country. NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 2, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "And now to another aspect of all this fallout from the everyday violence and danger in Iraq. The million or so Iraqis who have left their homes, in nothing short of an exodus. These are ordinary citizens leaving the homes and lives they've all known for years, sometimes for safer places inside Iraq, but more often, they are leaving Iraq altogether." NBC (Engel): "It's the office of last resort -- Baghdad's main passport agency. It's so crowded with Iraqis who want to leave, the government ordered it to stay open seven days a week. Haifa and Hassan Rubaiee, both professors at Baghdad's university, have their passports. They're packing to move to Syria, joining what the government said this week was a million Iraqis who have left since the war."

Al Sistani's Influence Is Declining. The AP (10/13, Hendawi) reports, "Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani once wielded so much influence he seemed to single-handedly chart the post- Saddam Hussein political future" but "priorities for Shiite political parties have changed and their leaders no longer appear to feel the need to be seen to be closely associated with al-Sistani to gain legitimacy. Now, the country's top Shiite cleric appears powerless as Iraq edges toward civil war. ... It is a power shift that does not bode well for Iraq's Shiite-dominated government or the U.S.-led military coalition as they try to contain the stubborn Sunni insurgency and the wave of sectarian killings that has swelled since last winter."

DOJ_NMG_0080982

Interior Minister Blames Iraqi Bloodshed On Facilities Protection Service. The Washington Post (10/14, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports, "Iraq's interior minister on Friday rejected allegations that Iraq's police and military have played a major role in the death squads blamed for Baghdad's surging violence, saying that only a small number of all those caught in U.S. or Iraqi raids were members of the police or army. Jawad al-Bolani, speaking to a small group of reporters in Baghdad, blamed the Facilities Protection Service, or FPS, a massive but unregulated government guard force whose numbers he put at about 150,000." The Post adds, "American generals were among the first to publicly express suspicion that the Facilities Protection Service was playing a key role in the growing sectarian killings. U.S. commanders themselves started the agency soon after the 2003 U.S-led invasion, intending it to be a force of a few thousand men who would guard buildings against looting."

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Daragahi, 918K) reports, that Interior Minister Bolani "acknowledged that he was powerless when it came to security in large areas of the capital, especially in Sunni-dominated western Baghdad."

Interior Minister Vows To Clean House At Own Ministry. The New York Times (10/14, Semple, Luo, 1.21M) reports, "Iraq's interior minister, under pressure from Western officials and some Iraqi leaders to purge the ministry of sectarian influence, said Friday that he was preparing to reshuffle its leadership, and that he had the political backing to carry out the plan. ... Although Mr. Bolani has made some strides toward accomplishing his reform goals, including firing thousands of employees, Western officials and some Iraqi officials have said that he has lacked the political support to conduct the necessary purges, particularly at the upper levels of the ministry. According to American officials close to the ministry, among the commanders Mr. Bolani may replace is Adnan al-Asadi, the deputy minister of administration, who is suspected of abetting the Shiite militias. Mr. Bolani denied those assertions on Friday." Observers fear that his political independence "has left him without the political muscle to make radical, necessary changes in the institution."

Respected Iraqi Colonel Is Killed. The Washington Post (10/14, A1, Knickmeyer, Finer, 748K) in a front page article reports, "Col. Salam al-Mamuri and his Scorpion commando team were a rarity among Iraqi security forces, American and Iraqi colleagues said: a police unit fighting on both sides of the country's sectarian divide. On Friday, a bomb blew apart Mamuri and an aide at the Scorpions' headquarters in the southern city of Hilla. The attack ended the life of a broadly respected commander who had been one of the longest-serving and longest-surviving men in a cadre of Iraqi army veterans struggling to restore law and order after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion." The Post quotes Iraqis and a Special Forces member praising Mamuri's courage and "comparative evenhandedness" in fighting both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias.

15 Killed Across Iraq. The AP (10/13, Bodeen) reports, "At least 15 people were killed in attacks Friday around Iraq, including the commander of a battalion of special Interior Ministry police and six women and two girls who were shot south of Baghdad." In the case of police Col. Mamuri's assassination, officials "were investigating whether the bomb could have been placed by a policeman from the brigade."

Eight Females Killed, Two Teenaged Girls Kidnapped In Iraq. The AP (10/13, Hendawi) reports, "Gunmen attacked Shiite women picking vegetables in a field outside the capital Friday, killing six adults and two young girls and kidnapping two teenagers. It was one of the deadliest assaults specifically targeting women in Iraq's monthslong wave of sectarian violence." Police theorized the gunmen were Sunni insurgents; the AP comments, "Previous major attacks in Iraq have killed many women and men together, and at times individual women have been shot or kidnapped. But rarely have large groups of women been attacked."

SEAL Falls On Grenade To Save Comrades. The AP (10/14, Watkins) reports from Ramadi, "A Navy SEAL sacrificed his life to save his comrades by throwing himself on top of a grenade Iraqi insurgents tossed into their sniper hideout, fellow members of the elite force said. Petty Officer 2nd Class Michael A. Monsoor had been near the only door to the rooftop structure Sept. 29 when the grenade hit him in the chest and bounced to the floor, said four SEALs." Sixteen SEALS have been killed in Afghanistan, while only two have been killed in Iraq; "Navy spokesman Lt. Taylor Clark said the low number of deaths among SEALs in Iraq is a testament to their training."

UK Coroner Says US Military Killed UK Journalist. The Washington Post (10/14, A18, Adam, Sullivan, 748K) reports that British coroner Andrew Walker "ruled Friday that U.S. troops unlawfully killed" British television journalist Terry Lloyd "during the invasion of Iraq in March 2003." He added he would seek prosecution of the U.S. troops responsible for the death." Lloyd's widow, Lynn "called the incident a 'very serious war crime' and said the troops responsible should be tried for murder." The Defense Department "said in a statement that U.S. military authorities had investigated the incident and determined that the American troops 'followed the applicable rules of engagement.'" The AP (10/14, Wagner) adds that Lynn called her husband's death a "despicable, deliberate, vengeful act." The New York Times (10/14, Cowell, 1.21M) mentions the coroner's findings in an article on the top British general's comments about Iraq. AFP (10/13) reports the Pentagon's "rejection" of the coroner's finding, in which the Pentagon said, "We have always gone to extreme measures to avoid civilian casualties and collateral damage."

DOJ_NMG_0080983

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Murphy, 918K) reports, "Unlike many journalists who were traveling with American forces at the beginning of the war, Lloyd and his crew were operating near the southern Iraqi city of Basra on their own, a strategy many journalists believed would allow them to get a more impartial view of the war."

US Citizen Sentenced To Death In Iraq. The Washington Post (10/14, White, 748K) reports, "A U.S. citizen who allegedly orchestrated the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists near Baghdad last year was sentenced to death in an Iraqi court Thursday, prompting his lawyers to ask a federal judge in Washington to block the U.S. military from transferring him to the Iraqi government." Mohammad Munaf allegedly "posed as a kidnap victim but was actually involved in a conspiracy for ransom and led them into a trap." Officials "could not recall another U.S. citizen receiving a death sentence from the Central Criminal Court of Iraq." The defendant's "Iraqi attorneys reported that the Central Criminal Court judge was prepared to dismiss the charges at a hearing on Thursday but that two American officials -- including an unnamed general -- stepped into the courtroom and requested a private meeting. The judge returned 15 minutes later and sentenced Munaf and four other defendants to death without hearing additional evidence."

Shays Suggests Abu Ghraib Abuses Were "More About Pornography Than Torture." The AP (10/14, Miga) reports Rep. Christopher Shays "said Friday the Abu Ghraib prison abuses were more about pornography than torture." Shays "said a National Guard unit was primarily responsible for the abuses although it was actually the 372nd Military Police Company from Cresaptown, Md., an Army Reserve unit. 'It was a National Guard unit run amok,' Shays said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. 'It was torture because sex abuse is torture. It was gross and despicable ... This is more about pornography than torture.' Shays sought to defuse controversy over his previous comments suggesting the Abu Ghraib abuses weren't torture but instead involved a sex ring of troops. 'Now I've seen what happened in Abu Ghraib, and Abu Ghraib was not torture,' Shays said at a debate Wednesday."

Shays Rhetoric Is Less Measured Than In Previous Campaigns. The Washington Post (10/14, A4, Goldfarb, 748K) reports Shays "has been widely known as a moderate Republican who rarely engages in firebrand politics. But that image has been challenged in recent days with remarks that a supporter called 'unusual' and his opponent said were a sign of 'desperation.' In a debate this week with Democratic challenger Diane Farrell, Shays said the Abu Ghraib prison abuse did not constitute torture. … Several analysts attributed the comments to Shays's frustration with what has become the toughest reelection campaign of his career."

Painter's Work Reflects His Outrage At Abu Ghraib. The Washington Post (10/14, Kennicott, 748K) on the front page of Style reports on the paintings of Fernando Botero: "Shocked and angered by news of Abu Ghraib, Botero was inspired to put his familiar figures through the rigors and humiliations of the abuse that American soldiers perpetrated on Iraqi inmates at the notorious prison. The result was some 80 paintings, drawings and watercolors that show his rounded figures with hoods on, shackled, bound at the wrists, forced into human piles, bleeding, screaming and vomiting. They are fat, but they're not happy." His exhibit opens on Tuesday in New York.

Afghan Suicide Bombing Kills Eight. The New York Times (10/14, Gall, 1.21M) reports in a four-sentence article, "A suicide bomber drove his car at a NATO military convoy in the southern city of Kandahar, killing eight people and wounding nine others, officials said. One NATO soldier was among the dead."

Illinois Town Mourns Two Casualties. ABC World News (10/13, story 6, 1:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "On the subject of Iraq, there is deep pride and deep sorrow in a small town in Illinois tonight. Two young men who left that town as best friends to serve in the Army, are now embraced in a sad homecoming." ABC (Reynolds): "They looked so much alike, they could have been brothers. And in many ways, they were. George O'Bourne and Chris Walker, both 20, had been inseparable friends since high school. They joined the Army together. Served in the same unit in Iraq. And last week, they died in the same town outside Baghdad, just two days apart. A week ago at homecoming, the East Peoria Community High School honored them. And presented their parents with hats from the band they played in."

NYTimes Review Of "Hubris" Harshly Critical Of Administration. In the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) review of Hubris (by Michael Isikoff and David Corn), reviewer Jacob Heilbrunn writes, "Where Isikoff and Corn themselves go astray is in their own obsessive focus on Judith Miller and The New York Times, as well as on the story of Joseph Wilson, Valerie Plame Wilson and Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby ... Far more interesting is Isikoff and Corn's exploration of the mental world that the administration inhabits. ... Hubris? Megalomania may be more like it."

Victor Davis Hanson Slams Books Calling Iraq War A Fiasco. In a commentary for the Washington Times

DOJ_NMG_0080984

(10/14, 88K), scholar Victor Davis Hanson writes about Cobra II, State of Denial, and Fiasco that "many of the authors' critical portraits rely on private conversations and anonymous sources. The most damning informants in these books are never identified, and so can't be questioned." Hanson adds, "Rarely do these journalists quote unnamed sources who dissent from their own views, although there are surely pro-U.S. Iraq policy candid voices among the thousands of retired generals. ... When one writes military history in the middle of a war, there is a responsibility to be extra careful. Real-time interpretations don't just offer lessons about the past but may change the very course of events as they happen."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney Pleads Guilty To Corruption Involving Abramoff. Rep. Bob Ney's guilty plea in the Abramoff investigation received prominent attention, with two stories on the network TV news and on the front pages of the major US newspapers. ABC World News (10/13, story 2, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Today in Washington, Bob Ney was the first member of Congress to plead guilty in connection to Jack Abramoff. He plead guilty to conspiracy. But the list of his corrupt activities is much, much longer." ABC added, "Once known as 'the Mayor of Capitol Hill,' today Ney left a Federal court in disgrace. Ney admitted he was at the beck and call of corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, bought and paid for. In exchange for gifts, Ney supported or opposed legislation at Abramoff's request. He also tried to influence the policies of agencies throughout government." NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Ney "admitted taking tens of thousands of dollars in travel and gifts from Abramoff. The Justice Department is recommending a sentence of just over two years in prison. Ney's lawyer says he will resign in the next few weeks."

The Washington Times/AP (10/14, A1, Yost) reports, "Appearing before Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle on charges of conspiracy and making false statements, Ney acknowledged taking trips, tickets, meals and campaign donations from Abramoff in return for official actions on behalf of his clients. Ney, Ohio Republican, faces up to 10 years in prison. The Justice Department recommended 27 months behind bars. Ney's lawyers plan to recommend him for a Bureau of Prisons alcohol-treatment program, which dramatically could cut the time he serves behind bars. Judge Huvelle set sentencing for Jan. 19. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Neuman, Schmitt, 918K) reports Ney "acknowledged he used his legislative clout to do favors for Abramoff and for a Syrian businessman nicknamed the 'Fat Man.'"

The Financial Times (10/14, Daniel) notes, "The fallout from Mr Abramoff's largesse has continued to haunt Washington. Last week Susan Ralston, a White House aide to Karl Rove, the president's political adviser, abruptly resigned amid reports of her accepting gifts from Mr Abramoff. On Thursday, the Democratic staff of the Senate finance committee charged several conservative not-for-profit groups with abusing their tax-exempt status by 'laundering payments and then disbursing funds at Mr Abramoff's direction'."

White House, Congressional GOP Leaders Move To Expel Ney. The New York Times (10/14, A1, Shenon, 1.21M) reports "what had not been expected at Friday's court hearing was Mr. Ney's disclosure that he intended to remain in Congress for now. The announcement appeared to surprise and infuriate House Republican leaders, who are trying to tamp down other scandals that are threatening to damage the party in next month's Congressional elections. After learning that Mr. Ney would not step down immediately and would continue to draw his $165,200-a-year salary, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and other Republican leaders said they would move to expel him as soon as Congress returns next month for a postelection session. … The White House joined in calling for Mr. Ney to resign immediately. 'What Congressman Ney did is not a reflection of the Republican Party,' said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. 'It's a reflection of Congressman Ney, and he ought to step down.'"

The Washington Post (10/14, A1, Schmidt, Grimaldi, 748K) in a front page story reports, "House Republican leaders, still struggling to blunt the impact of a scandal involving House pages, immediately vowed to expel Ney in a post-election session if he has not resigned by then. Ney's attorney said in court that the congressman will resign his seat in the coming weeks but wants to first take care of pending constituent matters and see that his staff is settled." The post adds, "Ney is the eighth person convicted in the continuing federal investigation into Abramoff's activities. A federal task force that includes a dozen Justice Department prosecutors is investigating Abramoff's dealings with other congressional offices, including those of Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.), according to lawyers and witnesses involved in the probe."

Shimkus Testifies About His Handling Of Foley Allegations. The New York Times (10/14, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports Rep. John Shimkus, chairman of the Congressional page program, "said Friday that he was unaware of previous complaints about Mark Foley." Shimkus "said that had he known of the complaints about Mr. Foley, he would have handled concerns about Mr. Foley's e-mail messages to a page from Louisiana differently. … Mr. Shimkus said that he learned of concerns about Mr. Foley last fall and that he and the clerk of the House confronted Mr. Foley at a meeting in Mr. Foley's office." Shimkus testified before the House Ethics Committee yesterday regarding the Foley scandal and

DOJ_NMG_0080985

"whether Republican leaders, particularly those inside Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office, had warnings before last year that Mr. Foley had a history of being overly friendly to pages." The Washington Times/AP (10/14) reports Shimkus, "who testified in private, told reporters later that in retrospect, he wished he had handled the episode last year differently. 'Having 20/20 hindsight, a lot of things would have been done differently,' Mr. Shimkus said. Mr. Shimkus has said he kept the two other House members overseeing the pages in the dark as he confronted Mr. Foley last fall." Shimkus "has said he was following the wishes of the boy's parents by not telling the other two lawmakers of overly friendly e-mails sent by Mr. Foley to a former page."

Capitol Police Find No Record Of Alleged Foley Dorm Incident. The Washington Post (10/14, A4, Babington, Sheridan, 748K) reports, "U.S. Capitol Police said yesterday that they have no record of an alleged incident in which then-Rep. Mark Foley supposedly tried to enter a Capitol Hill dormitory for teenage pages. The purported nighttime incident has been cited by lawmakers and a key witness in the scandal that involves Foley's interactions with congressional pages and the House's handling of the matter. Unlike sexually graphic electronic messages that Foley sent to teenage boys, evidence of the alleged dorm incident has proved elusive."

Kolbe's Camping Trip With Minors Is Subject Of Federal Investigation. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 6, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Arizona Republican Jim Kolbe is the latest Congressman to be investigated for his dealings with former Congressional Pages. Federal prosecutors are looking into a camping trip that Kolbe took with two former Pages ten years ago. A spokesman for Kolbe, though, says nothing inappropriate happened." The Washington Times/AP (10/14) reports Kolbe "took…former pages as well as staff members and National Park Service officials on a Fourth of July rafting trip in the Grand Canyon in 1996, his spokeswoman, Korenna Cline, said yesterday. An accusation related to the trip was given to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix, but it was not immediately clear whether it was related to any contention of improper activity by Mr. Kolbe. The official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, described the inquiry as preliminary."

The AP (10/14, Talhelm) reports a "law enforcement official said the 1996 trip may be too old to investigate as a criminal action. … Beth Kolbe, the congressman's younger sister who was on the three-night trip, said nothing inappropriate happened and that she had not heard of any concerns from anyone until the story of the camping trip appeared in the media. 'It's preposterous,' she said of any allegations that taking the pages along was inappropriate." The Washington Post (10/14, A4, Eggen, 748K) reports, "One official cautioned that the inquiry was based on allegations from one unidentified source that has not been substantiated. The allegations involve Kolbe's behavior toward one of the ex-pages, the official said."

Weldon Reportedly Subject Of FBI Corruption Probe. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Gordon) report the Justice Department "is investigating whether Republican Rep. Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania traded his political influence for lucrative lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter, according to sources with direct knowledge of the inquiry. The FBI, which opened an investigation in recent months, has formally referred the matter to the department's Public Integrity Section for additional scrutiny. At issue are Weldon's efforts between 2002 and 2004 to aid two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers with ties to strongman Slobodan Milosevic, a federal law enforcement official said. The Russian companies and a Serbian foundation run by the brothers' family each hired a firm co-owned by Weldon's daughter, Karen, for fees totaling nearly $1 million a year, public records show. Karen Weldon was 28 and lacked consulting experience when she and Charles Sexton, a Weldon ally and longtime Republican leader in Delaware County, Pa., created the firm of Solutions North America Inc. in 2002." The Washington Post (10/14, A4, 748K) runs a shortened version of the McClatchy article.

The Philadelphia Inquirer (10/14, Mason, Shiffman) reports, "The scandals surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff and Reps. Duke Cunningham, Robert Ney and Mark Foley have hampered Republican candidates in this election. … Every investigation is different, but it is not uncommon for agents probing alleged corruption, drugs and organized crime to spend months, even years, working covertly on a case before the suspects learn that they are under scrutiny."

Judge Rejects Ryan Bid To Remain Free Pending Appeal. The Chicago Tribune (10/14, O'Connor, Bush) reported, "Former Gov. George Ryan must surrender to prison early next year after a federal judge on Friday refused to let him remain free on bond while his appeal winds through court. In a 32-page ruling issued Friday evening, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer rejected claims by the defense that Ryan's conviction was likely to be reversed on appeal. The judge also refused to let Ryan's co-defendant, Lawrence Warner, put off prison pending his appeal." The Tribune noted Ryan "is scheduled to surrender to prison on Jan. 4," and Warner "on Jan. 16." The Chicago Sun-Times (10/14, Korecki) added, "Pallmeyer rejected defense contentions, including that material brought in to the deliberation room was inappropriate enough to taint proceedings, that the foreperson had outside discussions about deliberations, then lied about it, and that the newly formed jury could not truly start over on its deliberations. 'The court investigated each allegation at the time...and concluded either that the incident did not constitute misconduct at all, or that the conduct did not prejudice the defendants,' Pallmeyer wrote." The AP (10/14) also reported on the ruling, in a widely-distributed story.

DOJ_NMG_0080986

Unrepentant Tennessee Lawmaker Sentenced To Five Years In Prison. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (10/14, Buser) reported, "Former state senator Roscoe Dixon was sentenced to five years and three months in prison Friday by a judge who viewed him as unrepentant for his Tennessee Waltz bribery conviction. U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla handed down the sentence, the stiffest yet for a defendant in the FBI's undercover sting. …. 'The court has been listening for words it has not heard – "What I did was wrong,"' McCalla told the veteran legislator. 'I'm still listening for those words.' Dixon, 57, testified that he was sorry he had gotten involved in the investigation, but offered no apologies and continued to maintain he was entrapped, a defense the jury rejected this summer." The Commercial Appeal noted, "The three-year-old Tennessee Waltz investigation, which prosecutors have said is ongoing, has resulted in the indictment of 12 elected officials and aides."

The AP (10/14, Baird) reported, "After sentencing, Dixon continued to argue that he was tricked into taking money from FBI agents posing as crooked businessmen wanting a change in state law. He said he declined admitting guilt because 'I wanted to hold all my options open because I'm going to appeal.' Dixon, who is black, has argued that he was targeted by federal investigators because of his race. McCalla said he saw 'not one shred of evidence' of government wrongdoing and admonished Dixon for comments that could undermine the public's faith in the judicial system."

Former NYPD Detective Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison. The New York Times (10/14, Rashbaum) reported, "In a Brooklyn courtroom packed with his family, friends and neighbors, a retired police detective who had admitted to stealing roughly $800,000 from drug dealers delivered a tormented apology yesterday, moments before a judge sentenced him to seven years in federal prison." Thomas Rachko "was arrested on Nov. 26, 2003, just hours after he and his old partner, Julio C. Vasquez, were captured on videotape stealing $169,000 from a drug money courier. He began cooperating with the authorities almost immediately, and the theft unraveled a web of corruption — thefts of drug money and drugs that Mr. Vasquez helped sell for cash. As many as 10 current or retired police detectives and supervisors were implicated." The Times noted, "After the sentencing, an F.B.I. agent who worked on the case shook Mr. Rachko's hand." Newsday (10/14, DeStefano) added that Rachko "begged for mercy Friday and got it" with the seven-year sentence, "much less than the possible life term he faced."

The New York Post (10/14, Haberman) reported, "Rachko's court days may not be over, however. Two convicted drug dealers freed following the arrests of Rachko and Vasquez have filed federal civil-rights lawsuits against the two rogue cops and the city. Bertrand Canty and Nelson Belliard are seeking $56 million for false arrest, negligence, battery and other claims." The New York Daily News (10/14, Marzulli) and AP (10/14) also report on Rachko's sentencing.

Body Of Missing Vermont Student Found In Gorge Near Campus. The New York Times (10/14, Belluck) reported, "A University of Vermont student who had been missing since last weekend was found dead yesterday near a gorge about 15 miles from campus, and the police identified as a suspect a man she had borrowed a cellphone from in downtown Burlington, Vt. Chief Thomas Tremblay of the Burlington police said the body of Michelle Gardner-Quinn, a 21-year-old senior from Arlington, Va., was found off the side of a road in Richmond, Vt., near a popular swimming site called Huntington Gorge. Chief Tremblay said Ms. Gardner-Quinn's death was a homicide, and he identified Brian Rooney, 36, of Richmond as a 'very likely suspect.'" The Times noted, "The disappearance of Ms. Gardner-Quinn prompted an exhaustive search by the police, the F.B.I. and legions of volunteers from the university community, many of them students shocked at the prospect that a kidnapping might have occurred in a city normally considered safe."

The Washington Post (10/14, B1, Stockwell) added, "Tremblay said Rooney was charged yesterday with sexual assault and lewd and lascivious conduct with a child in Caledonia County, about 80 miles east of Burlington. He declined to elaborate on the charges. Rooney is to be arraigned Monday on those charges, Tremblay said." The Boston Globe (10/14, Smalley, Mishra) noted, "As her parents kept vigil in Burlington, Vermont police, FBI agents, and National Guard troops, augmented by eager students and other volunteers from the university, scoured Burlington and the surrounding area. But [Friday's] discovery came about through a phone call from a group of hikers alerting authorities to a body in an area that had not been searched." The AP (10/14, Curran) also reported on the recovery of Gardner-Quinn's remains, in a widely-distributed story.

9th Circuit Upholds "Absurd" Sentence. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Krikorian) reports, "A federal appeals court in San Francisco on Friday upheld a 159-year prison term for a mentally disturbed woman with no criminal history after one judge angrily concluded the nation's rigid sentencing laws left the panel with no options but to affirm the

DOJ_NMG_0080987

'irrational, inhumane and absurd' sentence." The Times continues, "The 3-0 ruling by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals came one year after Marion Hungerford, 52, of Billings, Mont., received the sentence for a string of robberies at Montana casinos and bars from April to July 2002. … The robberies, according to the 18-page opinion written by Judge Susan P. Garber, began when Hungerford and her male roommate, Dana Canfield, were both unemployed and decided to rob a convenience store to pay the rent. … 'Marion said she was going to have to go on a crime spree,' Canfield testified at the trial. 'And since she has problems walking and stuff, I decided that I would do it.'" The Times adds, "A jury found Hungerford not guilty of that first robbery and one other, but authorities alleged they were only the start of a string of crimes. … She was convicted on one count of conspiracy, seven counts of robbery and seven counts of using a firearm because her accomplice was armed with a .22-caliber revolver. … In rejecting her appeal of four of the robbery and firearms convictions, the court found sufficient evidence that she knowingly took part in the holdups. 'There is no evidence that [Hungerford] took any affirmative action to withdraw from the ongoing conspiracy,' the court said. 'To the contrary, she continued to accept and spend the proceeds of all the robberies and worked purposefully to conceal the crimes.' … Though affirming Hungerford's conviction, Judge Stephen Reinhardt decried the sentence handed down in the case as a 'predictable byproduct of the cruel and unjust mandatory minimum sentence scheme adopted by Congress.'"

Gonzales, Mueller To Speak At Boston Law Enforcement Conference. The Boston Globe (10/14, Simpson) reports, "More than 14,000 law enforcement professionals will gather in Boston starting this weekend for a conference that will feature some of the nation's highest-ranking officials as speakers " The Globe continues, "The International Association of Chiefs of Police, the world's largest nonprofit organization of police executives, will kick off its annual conference and exposition today at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. Although this will be the association's 113th conference, it will be the first in New England, said John Boyle, a Boston Police Department spokesman." The Globe adds, "Speakers include Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, and Marine General Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. More than 750 exhibitors will showcase police products, such as vehicles, mobile command centers, and helicopters, Boyle said. … There will be international delegates from Europe, Asia, and the Caribbean, said Wendy Balazik, an association spokeswoman."

CIVIL LAW:

California Man Pursues Claim That Los Angeles Port Misused Funds. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Weikel) reports, "A harbor area activist filed an appeal Friday in an attempt to revive a federal lawsuit alleging that the Port of Los Angeles misappropriated $1.2 billion in government funds to build a giant cargo terminal for the world's largest shipping line." The Times continues, "Stanley D. Mosler of Rancho Palos Verdes is challenging decisions by U.S. District Judge S. James Otero, who dismissed the false-claims case in August, saying that Mosler no longer had an attorney and that he was unqualified as a layperson to handle a lawsuit on behalf of the United States. .. A few weeks after the decision, Mosler hired a lawyer, Alan Gutman, but Otero refused to reinstate the case, saying it was too late. … Otero noted in his ruling that Mosler had been warned earlier that he should obtain counsel." The Times adds, "Mosler was represented for three years by attorney Milford Dahl, who bowed out in February 2005, saying the case would be too costly for him to pursue. Mosler then proceeded on his own, hoping to get the case to trial. … 'The elusive quality in Judge Otero's order is justice,' Mosler said. 'The dismissal was not on the merits but because I could not afford to match the port's spending in legal fees. I trust that the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals will rule that having money is not a necessary element to access our federal courts.'" The Times notes, "Filed in March 2002, Mosler's case alleged that port officials had engaged in a "bait-and-switch" maneuver when they shifted long-standing plans to relocate crude oil and other hazardous shipments to a man-made island that would be built away from populated areas to improve harbor safety. … Mosler said in his suit that port officials decided to turn the island into a massive container facility for Maersk Inc., leaving only 15 acres — instead of hundreds of acres — for petroleum and chemical terminals. … At issue was whether the port violated federal agreements to build the so-called energy island project and misappropriated $108.6 million in federal grants and nearly $1.1 billion in harbor revenue to construct what is now known as Pier 400, which was completed in 2004."

Bankruptcy Filings Down Sharply. The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/14) reports, "The ranks of people seeking to erase their debts have thinned in the year since the biggest changes in U.S. bankruptcy laws in a quarter-century took effect." Consumer bankruptcy Lawrence Brooke "said the paperwork hurdles for debtors to qualify for Chapter 7 have become insurmountable for many, and the workload and aggravation for attorneys have increased." The AP notes, "There were 263,660 personal bankruptcies filed nationwide in the first half of this year, down from 851,683 in the first six months of 2005 and 809,867 in the same period in 2004, according to the American Bankruptcy Institute." Yet "some experts predict that bankruptcy filings will eventually rebound. There was a huge rush of filings by financially strained consumers between the enactment of the legislation in April last year and the Oct. 17 deadline for the new means test and other requirements. Personal bankruptcies soared 30% to a record high last year, surpassing 2 million for the first time at 2,039,214. Then came the precipitous drop."

DOJ_NMG_0080988

Air America Declares Bankruptcy. The New York Times (10/14, Leeds, 1.21M) reports, "Air America Radio, the liberal talk network started two years ago in a bid to counter the influence of conservative radio personalities like Rush Limbaugh, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection on Friday." The Times notes, "United States Bankruptcy Court Judge Robert Drain approved motions on Friday that will let the company continue to pay salaries and remain on the air. The judge also approved a loan of $900,000 from Democracy Allies, an entity formed by current investors in the network, including Rob Glaser, chief executive of the media and entertainment company RealNetworks. Its full proposed loan of $2.6 million is to be considered at a later hearing, said Tracy Klestadt, a lawyer representing Air America."

The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A5, McBride, 2.03M) notes Air America "said it had assets of $7.8 million, and short-term liabilities of $19.8 million. A number of individuals have invested in the company, including RealNetworks Inc. CEO Rob Glaser, who is the company's largest secured creditor with $9.8 million in claims. Other claimants include Citigroup Inc.'s Citibank, with $2.5 million in unsecured claims, and Clear Channel Communications Inc., with $558,333 in unsecured claims." The Washington Times/AP (10/14, Sutel) reports similar details.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Bias. The AP (10/13) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice announced Friday that it had filed a lawsuit against the city of Philadelphia alleging violations of the rights of Hispanic and Spanish-speaking voters." The AP continues, "The complaint filed in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania alleges that the city failed to provide Spanish-language assistance at the polls to most Spanish-speaking voters in recent elections, the department said." The AP adds, "Federal authorities also said the city prevented Spanish-speaking voters from receiving assistance from people of their choice, even in cases where bilingual assistance was otherwise unavailable. … Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement that federal officials hope to reach agreement with city officials quickly 'to begin essential remedial measures in time for the 2006 federal elections.'"

Local Television. At least two local television networks reported that the Department of Justice sued the city of Philadelphia, alleging it failed to provide language assistance to Spanish-speaking voters in recent elections. KYW-TV Philadelphia, (10/14, 11:06 p.m.) broadcasted, "City of Philadelphia is slapped with a voting rights lawsuit. Justice Department claiming rights of Spanish speaking voters were violated in recent elections. They alleged that Spanish language assistance was not available at polls for most voters, and many were not allowed to seek help from another person in cases where there was no other bilingual that will aid."

WPVI-TV Philadelphia, (10/13, 11:09 p.m.) broadcasted, "Justice Department has filed a lawsuit suit against the city of Philadelphia over voting rights. The suit claims the city failed to provide Spanish speaking help at the polls. Justice Department hopes to work with the city to have a solution in place at the time of November elections."

DOJ Assists Clarksville, TN, With Police Department Woes. The AP (10/12) reports from Clarksville, TN, "With 12 discrimination lawsuits filed against the Clarksville Police Department, the mayor has asked a federal official for some help." The AP continues, "Walter Atkinson, who works for U.S. Department of Justice's Community Relations Service, will lead a group of citizens and officials to survey the police department and come up with suggestions to help solve its problems. The group will not investigate the specific lawsuits against the city. … 'This is going to be as much a PR push' as an information-gathering process, said group member David Shelton, of the Clarksville Human Relations Commission." The AP adds, "Mayor Don Trotter said it should take several months before recommendations for the department are finalized. .. .The meetings, which will include interviews with police officers, are closed to the public, but the recommendations will be 'very, very public,' Shelton said." The AP notes, "Discrimination lawsuits have cost the city more than $300,000 in legal expenses thus far. A majority of the suits allege racial discrimination, but at least one female officer has sued claiming gender and age discrimination."

DOJ Settles Redlining Allegations With Indiana Bank. The Northwest (IN) Times (10/14, Williams, Fitton) reports, "The federal government and Whiting-based Centier Bank have reached a $4.3 million agreement to settle allegations the bank engaged in redlining, or discriminating on the basis of race or national origin." The Times continues, "The Justice Department alleged Centier violated the Fair Housing Act and Equal Credit Opportunity Act by unlawfully failing to equally market and provide products and services to predominantly black and Hispanic neighborhoods in Gary, East Chicago and Hammond." The Times adds, "Although it acknowledged its settlement with the government, the locally owned bank 'strongly denies any suggestion that it has previously excluded minority communities from its banking efforts,' Centier said in a news release. … However, the release said, Centier management feels 'equally strongly about its desire to provide significantly enhanced services to residents and businesses in minority neighborhoods.'" The Times notes, "Centier President and CEO Michael Schrage told The Times the bank was surprised by the Justice Department's action and still does not agree with the allegations, but decided to enter into the agreement to avoid the delays and costs of litigation. … Characterizing the negotiations with the Justice Department as 'amiable,' Schrage said the Justice Department action had made Centier 'more diligent in reaching out to underserved areas.' … The consent decree filed in federal court in Hammond will prohibit Centier from discriminating on the basis of race, color or national origin in any aspect of residential real estate or credit transaction, according to the Justice Department. Once approved by the court, the agreement will resolve the allegations."

DOJ_NMG_0080989

DOJ Asked To Probe Florida Beating Death. The Bradenton Herald (10/14, Marquez) reports, "A beating months ago that led to the death of a 72-year-old man has the Bradenton police chief looking to the attorney general of the United States for help, calling the chief law officer in the country the 'last hope' for justice." The Herald continues, "After review of the case, the state attorney's office for the 12th Judicial Circuit declined to prosecute Jamaal Lambert, 25, in the death of James Ervin Barfield, saying Lambert was acting in self-defense when he beat Barfield during an argument on May 10 near a downtown apartment building Barfield owned. … Barfield was taken to Manatee Memorial Hospital where he died two weeks later." The Herald adds, "Police Chief Michael Radzilowski wants Lambert prosecuted for the death, which was ruled a homicide by the medical examiner's office, and he's calling the state attorney's decision not to prosecute an error. … In a letter Radzilowski sent to the U.S. Department of Justice on Monday, he asks Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to review the case for 'possible prosecution of any criminal or civil right violation.' … As of Friday afternoon, there was 'nothing open in the civil rights division,' said Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department."

Judge Orders Mississippi County To Explain Jail Hiring Practices. The Biloxi Sun Herald (10/14, Fitzgerald) reports, "A federal judge has ordered the Harrison County jail to explain what it is doing to hire more corrections officers." The Herald continues, "The order, filed Thursday by U.S. District Judge Walter J. Gex III, addresses a lingering issue of staffing problems at the Harrison County Adult Detention Center. The last time the judge questioned the jail's staffing level via court order was in 2003, when the officer-to-inmate ratio was 1-to-10. The U.S. Justice Department, which has oversight to monitor improvements at the jail, recommends a ratio of 1-to-5. … The ratio is about the same today as it was in 2003. The jail needs to hire about 65 additional corrections officers. It has about 100 jailers to oversee 950 to 1,000 inmates." The Herald adds, "Sheriff George H. Payne Jr. on Friday said his new warden has 'a good plan of action' for hiring and he believes it will meet with approval. Payne said he has beefed up advertising to include television commercials featuring Don Cabana, appointed warden two months ago. … 'We're having the same problem with hiring that many South Mississippi employers have faced since Hurricane Katrina,' Payne said." The Herald notes, "The court order gives the jail until Oct. 26 to provide a supplementary report to answer questions on staffing issues. The report is in addition to the quarterly report the jail is required to submit to the Justice Department. … Payne said staffing levels were up until the hurricane struck. .. .However, issues surrounding the fatal beating of inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr. in February also have affected manpower and morale, Cabana said after his appointment two months ago. Two former jailers face criminal prosecution in the Williams case and a related civil lawsuit is pending."

Gallaudet Has Protesters Arrested. The New York Times (10/14, Schemo) reports, "The authorities at Gallaudet University, the nation's only liberal arts university for the deaf, moved on Friday to end a three-day siege by protesters by arresting the students opposing the board's choice of the next president." Overall, "the police arrested about 60 students in two hours, and arrests continued late into the night." The protesters "are demanding the immediate resignation of Jane K. Fernandes, the former provost who was named last spring to succeed…as president."

The Washington Times (10/14, Cella, Emerling, Nichols) reports, "The students were uncooperative but peaceful -- forming human chains and forcing campus police and Metropolitan Police officers to separate them, lift them and drag them to a waiting fleet of vans. The crowd jeered and howled as each student was carried off. By late last night, police had arrested about 90 protesters." President I. King Jordan said, "the protesters have left me no choice."

Opposition To Gay Marriage Seen As Losing Steam. The New York Times (10/14, Johnson, 1.21M) reports, "The debate over same-sex marriage was a black-or-white proposition two years ago when voters in 11 states barred gay couples from marrying." Yet "this year shades of gray are everywhere, as eight more states consider similar ballot measures. Some of the proposed bans are struggling in the polls, and the issue of same-sex marriage itself has largely failed to rouse conservative voters." While other issues have the voters attention, "the biggest change, people on both sides of the issue say, is that supporters of same-sex marriage this year are likely to be as mobilized as the opponents."

DOJ_NMG_0080990

Opponents To Gay Marriage Ban Launch TV Ad Campaign. The Washington Post (10/14, B6, Jenkins, 748K) reports that Commonwealth Coalition, "An organization that opposes a ballot measure that would constitutionally ban same-sex marriage in Virginia is buying a TV commercial to run statewide, marking an intensifying effort to defeat the amendment." Their "30-second ad, which will begin appearing throughout the state today on CNN, shows an image of Virginia's 230-year-old Bill of Rights slowly being engulfed in flames. A narrator warns gravely that the amendment would 'destroy' the spirit of the state's Bill of Rights, which served as the model for the U.S. Bill of Rights. A second ad will appear next week, officials said."

ANTITRUST:

FCC Delays Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Merger.

The AP (10/14, Dunbar) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission has delayed a vote on the proposed buyout of BellSouth by AT&T until Nov. 3 at the latest after two Democrats asked for time to study last-minute concessions offered by the companies." The AP continues, 'The commission was scheduled to vote on the $80.8 billion deal in a special meeting yesterday that never convened. … Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein circulated a letter among reporters that said in the previous 48 hours, new proposals had been made regarding the buyout that raised 'a number of significant questions and complex technical issues for us to consider.' … They asked that the proposals, which were offered by the companies through Chairman Kevin Martin's office, be made available to the public." The AP notes, "Martin responded in a letter, agreeing to make the proposals available for public comment for 10 days, and set a commission meeting for Nov. 3, though the vote may come sooner and may not require a public meeting."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/14, Geewax) reports, "Analysts said they still believed the deal would be approved. The debate, they said, is over what conditions the FCC will require." The AJC continues, "Late in the day, AT&T disclosed a broad array of possible concessions it had discussed with the FCC, including the sale of stand-alone, high-speed Internet service for a limited period of time and the return of certain jobs that had been moved overseas." The AJC adds, "AT&T spokesman Michael Balmoris said in a statement that a delay 'is not uncommon in these matters' and that the company believes the FCC soon will 'complete its review, approve the merger and allow us to begin delivering the numerous benefits of the merger to consumers.' … Balmoris said AT&T is willing to accept 'reasonable conditions on the merger in order to obtain unanimous approval, so long as they do not affect our ability to deliver merger benefits to customers and share owners, given the intensely competitive environment in which we operate.'"

The New York Times (10/14, Belson) reports, "On Wednesday, the Justice Department signed off on the purchase without imposing any conditions on the companies. That angered Michael J. Copps and Jonathan S. Adelstein — the two Democratic commissioners at the F.C.C. — who said more time was needed to assess how consumers and companies would be affected." The Times adds, "With their objections in mind, the commission rescheduled its vote on the merger to yesterday, from Thursday, to give the commissioners more time to negotiate. When they were unable to decide whether and what conditions to impose on the companies, yesterday's meeting was canceled and rescheduled for Nov. 3. … 'Given the limited analysis from our leading antitrust authorities, it is all the more imperative that we now employ an open process to fully involve all affected parties, including the applicants, in order to get the public and expert review that is otherwise lacking,' the Democratic commissioners wrote in a letter to the F.C.C. chairman, Kevin J. Martin. … The negotiations are complicated further because one Republican commissioner, Robert M. McDowell, is expected to refrain from voting because of a potential conflict of interest. If he were allowed to vote, the Republicans would presumably be able to approve the merger faster because they would outnumber the Democrats, 3 to 2."

The San Antonio Express-News (10/14, Lorek) reports, "In its latest filing, AT&T agreed to provide $10 broadband service, called Digital Subscriber Line, or DSL, to new customers in its territory. … The company also pledged to provide 100 percent broadband access to its entire service area and to give free broadband modems to customers. It also offered a $1 million public safety grant to public entities in its coverage area. … In addition, AT&T discussed returning jobs from overseas to the BellSouth territory. .. .The company also mentioned network neutrality, or requiring AT&T to carry Internet traffic without charging customers more for different services or applications, according to the letter. AT&T didn't provide specifics on these issues in its letter."

The Chicago Tribune (10/14, Van) reports, "FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who had advocated approving the merger without condition, accepted the Democrats' suggested delay and scheduled a meeting for Nov. 3 to consider the matter. Conditions on the deal needed to win the Democrats' support will be open for public discussion." The Tribune continues, "The stock transaction between AT&T and BellSouth is estimated to be worth about $80 billion and would give control of the nation's largest phone company and its largest wireless company to San Antonio-based AT&T, which was formerly SBC Communications Inc. before it took over AT&T last year." The Tribune adds, "A federal court review of two giant telecom mergers from last year—the SBC/AT&T deal and the takeover of MCI by Verizon Communications Inc.—is still pending. Judge Emmet Sullivan is considering evidence as to whether federal regulators gave those deals sufficient scrutiny to protect the public interest. … Senate and House leaders from both parties had asked the FCC and the Justice Department to delay their decisions on the AT&T/BellSouth deal until judicial review of last year's mergers was concluded. The antitrust division of the Justice Department ignored those requests, and the FCC appeared poised to do the same."

DOJ_NMG_0080991

Microsoft Agrees To Vista Changes. The AP (10/14) reports, "Microsoft Corp. is making several key changes to its coming Windows Vista operating system in an bid to soothe European antitrust worries, while keeping its worldwide distribution plans on schedule." The AP continues, "Brad Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said Friday that the company agreed to change how people can set their preferred search service if they upgrade to Microsoft's new Internet Explorer browser. The Redmond, Wash., company also has tweaked Vista's security system to address concerns it was favoring Microsoft's products over competing security offerings." The AP adds, "In addition, the company plans to have an international standards organization review a controversial new file format that will be included in Windows and the company's Office business suite. He said that was a step toward making the format available for other companies to license. … Even with the changes, which will be included in all versions the company ships worldwide, Microsoft said it plans deliver the long-delayed Vista to large businesses in November and consumers and small businesses in January."

The Seattle Times (10/14, Romano) reports, "Last month, the company had raised the specter of a delayed launch in Europe, pending negotiations with the European Commission (EC) over features in Vista." The Times adds, "Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith struck a diplomatic tone Friday, saying the company received 'clear guidance' during months of 'constructive dialogue' with regulators at the commission, the administrative arm of the European Union. In response, it is making significant changes to three areas of the software: security, search and a new file format. … 'Having made each of these changes, the company and [CEO] Steve Ballmer felt comfortable moving forward and felt confident that we are in compliance with our EU competition law obligations,' Smith said during a conference call with reporters." The Times adds, "He said Ballmer spoke with European Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes on Thursday to inform her of the company's plans. .. . The company's comments strengthened investor confidence in the release schedule for Vista, due out for large business customers in November and for broad release in January. However, Vista is coming out more than two years later than originally planned."

The New York Times (10/14, Meller) reports, "A delay in one country or region would have serious consequences for software developers, computer manufacturers and retailers there. It would also create complications for Microsoft, which has always rolled out previous versions of Windows simultaneously around the world." The Times adds, "Steven A. Ballmer, Microsoft's chief executive, confirmed the global introduction of Vista in a phone conversation with the European competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, late Thursday. .. .The new operating system will go on sale to large computer manufacturers next month and to the public in January." The Times adds, "Until now, Microsoft has resisted pressure to change Vista. Last month it accused the European Commission of not giving it clear enough guidance on whether Vista would pass muster under European antitrust law. … It also highlighted research that showed that hundreds of thousands of jobs in the European technology industry were at stake if Vista's introduction were delayed. Also last month, members of the European Parliament wrote to Ms. Kroes warning her of the harm she would be causing to European companies if she forced a delay."

The San Jose Mercury News (10/14, Takahashi) reports, "The software giant will ship corporate versions of Vista in November and consumer versions in January, said Mary Snapp, vice president and deputy general counsel at Microsoft. … Microsoft altered the operating system in several areas to respond to concerns of European and Korean regulators about ensuring fair competition, Snapp said. The company's changes address features related to security, search and document formats recognized by Vista. … The company also answered complaints from Silicon Valley-based security firms Symantec and McAfee. … The companies had accused the software programming giant of abusing its monopoly by controlling which security products can run on its new operating system. They say Microsoft blocked their ability to review the operating system's kernel, or core, and that Microsoft planned to confuse customers by offering its own security dashboard. .. .But Friday, Snapp said the company will allow security vendors to view the operating system's core by making available a key technology dubbed 'application programming interfaces.'"

DOJ_NMG_0080992

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Signs Bill Reauthorizing $80 Million For Great Lakes Restoration. The AP (10/14) in a brief story notes, "President Bush has signed a bill to reauthorize up to $16 million a year for grants programs to restore habitats in the Great Lakes region." It "would authorize $80 million over five years to restore fish and wildlife habitats, provide money for fish and wildlife projects and upgrade reports on the area's ecosystem." The funding "won't be spent unless included it's included in separate appropriations bills, but supporters said it would build momentum for a comprehensive $20 billion plan to restore the Great Lakes."

Concerns Raised About Environmental Impact of US Population Growth. Washington bureau chief Edward Luce in an op-ed in the Financial Times (10/14) downplays concerns that immigration is a threat to US culture as the number of US citizens approaches 300 million. Luce is concerned about "what America's continued expansion means for its future quality of life – and, indeed, that of the rest of the planet. Nobody who drives through America's seemingly endless suburbs and 'exurbs' can miss the tension between the country's vast open horizons and the increasing traffic gridlock around them. Nor can they fail to notice that it is America's sprawling urban environs, rather than the cities themselves, that are accommodating the country's growing numbers." And "like growing numbers of mainstream Americans, I will also ask whether this is the latest sign of America's economic success or a reminder that growth cannot continue in this fashion indefinitely. It is a good question to which the answer is yes, and probably."

NYT Accuses EPA Of Ignoring Science On Air Quality. The New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) editorializes, "The Bush administration loves to talk about the virtues of 'sound science,' by which it usually means science that buttresses its own political agenda. But when some truly independent science comes along to threaten that agenda, the administration often ignores or minimizes it. The latest example involves the Environmental Protection Agency's decision to reject the recommendations of experts inside and outside the government who had urged a significant tightening of federal standards regulating the amount of soot in the air." EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson "claimed there was 'insufficient evidence' linking health problems to long-term exposure. He added that 'wherever the science gave us a clear picture, we took clear action,' noting also that 'there was not complete agreement on the standard.'" Soon "the administration must decide whether to tighten the standards for another pollutant, ground-level ozone. … The scientific advisory committee has tentatively recommended that the ozone standard be tightened, citing new evidence of smog's adverse effects. This time Mr. Johnson should pay more attention to the scientists and less to the political strategists in the White House."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Indicts Medical Marijuana Advocate On New Charges. The New York Times (10/14, Marshall) reports, "A leading medical marijuana advocate who successfully appealed his federal conviction this year has been indicted on new criminal charges that include tax evasion and money laundering." The Times continues, "The man, Ed Rosenthal, a well-known spokesman for the movement to legalize marijuana, was already facing a retrial on federal charges of growing marijuana for medical use. He is to be arraigned Monday in Federal District Court here on the new indictment, unsealed late Thursday. … It accuses Mr. Rosenthal, 61, of 14 felony charges that include cultivating marijuana plants; laundering $1,850, which the government says he got from selling the plants to medical dispensaries; and tax evasion. His tax returns, prosecutors said, omitted income from the sale of the plants." The Times adds, 'Reached Friday at his home in Oakland, Mr. Rosenthal said he thought the efforts to prosecute him were part of a campaign to shutter medical marijuana sites in California and to subvert the state law allowing them. … The state and the federal government have been locked in a legal and cultural battle over the medicinal merits of marijuana since 1996, when California voters approved a ballot measure giving seriously ill patients the right to buy and use the drug with a doctor's prescription. … The Drug Enforcement Agency has been aggressive in investigating medical marijuana facilities. Last week, the authorities raided and closed five Bay Area sites, arresting 15 people. … A spokesman for the United States attorney's office, Luke Macaulay, would not comment on the new indictment, but said, 'Drugs are a priority for the Justice Department, being that marijuana is illegal under federal law.'"

Cali Drug Cartel Pleas Were 15 Years In The Making. The AP (10/14, Anderson) reports, "The guilty pleas by the two highest-ranking Colombian cocaine traffickers ever to appear in a U.S. courtroom had their roots in a hot summer morning 15 years ago when a drug-sniffing dog named Iowa found something suspicious." The AP continues, "The dog's alert on Aug. 26, 1991, led to the discovery at the Port of Miami of more than 12 tons of cocaine concealed in metal tubes that had, in turn, been hidden inside heavy concrete posts. … The shipment served notice to federal investigators that the Cali cartel had surpassed the better-known - and much more violent - Medellin cartel in controlling Colombia's cocaine trade and was employing ingenious new smuggling methods. … 'It was electric, the atmosphere at the time,' recalled Eddie Ryan, a federal prosecutor who worked the case until leaving Miami for Charlotte three years ago. 'It was a huge load. This was a new game and they were better at it than anybody had ever been.'" The AP adds, 'The investigation spawned by the big find would take many twists and turns and break new legal ground along the way. … It culminated in the Sept. 26 guilty pleas to U.S. drug trafficking charges by brothers Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, the Cali cartel kingpins nicknamed 'The Chess Player' and 'The Master' who are now serving 30-year prison sentences. A total of 141 cartel members have been convicted or pleaded guilty for their roles in an organization once responsible for 80 percent of the world's cocaine. … For Ed Kacerosky, the Customs agent who led the investigation from its inception, that moment in a Miami courtroom wasn't his biggest in the case. … Far better, he said, came after a midlevel defendant briefly mentioned links between the Cali smugglers and operations in Guatemala. That would lead to a Miami frozen vegetable warehouse used as a front to smuggle cocaine and to a lawyer who ran the cartel's South Florida operations."

DOJ_NMG_0080993

Colorado Man Pleads Guilty In Bomb Case. The AP (10/14, Sarche) reports, "A former air traffic controller accused of planting homemade bombs in March outside the Grand Junction (CO) homes of four co-workers and a Federal Aviation Administration official pleaded guilty Friday to one single count that could put him in prison for more than a decade." The AP continues, "Burke, 54, was arrested in Utah in April. He agreed to plead guilty to a charge of malicious damage to a building used in interstate commerce." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn said the charge is punishable by five to 20 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000. Prosecutors said they will recommended a term of 10 years when Burke is sentenced on Feb. 2. … Burke had worked for Serco Group PLC, a British company that staffs air traffic control towers at airports in Grand Junction and 55 other locations. He was fired in 2004 after working for Serco for four years. … The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms has said the Grand Junction bombs were similar to a device that exploded at Serco offices in Murfreesboro, Tenn., in February."

IMMIGRATION:

Judge Allows Lawsuit To Proceed Against Tyson's For Hiring Illegal Aliens. The Washington Times (10/14, Hirsch, 88K) reports, "A federal judge has ruled that workers can file a class-action suit against Tyson Foods Inc. for depressing wages by hiring illegal aliens." The workers' lawyer, Howard Foster, described it "as a 'very big step,' allowing him to seek damages for thousands of workers at eight plants -- including one in Glen Allen, Va. -- instead of just the four original plaintiffs." The RICO case "is one of a growing number across the nation challenging illegal aliens in the workplace. In August, a temporary agency in California sued its competitors under the state's unfair-competition laws." But "Tyson Foods described the judge's ruling as 'procedural,' adding that it was 'not based on the merits of this case, which was actually dismissed by another judge back in 2002.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Government Reform Committee Finds Data Breaches Across Government. On Friday, the House Government Reform Committee released a report summarizing government data thefts since Jan. 1, 2003. The report drew attention from national print media, including the Associated Press, the Los Angeles Times and the Washington Times. While the May VA data theft and other VA data breaches are noted in all of the stories, reports nevertheless focus on the report's verdict that data theft is a problem across many government agencies.

For example, the AP (10/14, Ohlemacher) reports, "Federal workers at 19 agencies have lost personal information affecting thousands of employees and the public, raising fresh concerns about the government's ability to protect sensitive information. … In all, the committee reported 788 incidents involving the loss or compromise of sensitive personal information since Jan. 1, 2003. That was in addition to the 'hundreds of security and privacy incidents' at the Department of Veterans Affairs, the report said."

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Mendoza, 918K) reports, Most of the nearly 800 incidents of data losses have never been publicly reported. The 'vast majority' were not accidental misplacements, but rather outright thefts of computers or data disks containing sensitive information such as Social Security numbers. In some cases the data were used inappropriately by employees and private contractors, the report said." The Times adds, "Veterans Affairs officials reported their data on two large spreadsheets covering hundreds of security and privacy breaches, the report said."

Under a headline that deems the government "careless" with data, the Washington Times (10/14, Seper, 88K) reports, "Personal files maintained by the federal government on all U.S. citizens 'remain at risk,' according to a House report released yesterday, which said the stored information is routinely lost because of carelessness, misconduct or theft. … The report said much of the information was lost when laptop computers were stolen, documenting the theft of more than 1,800 government-owned laptop computers -- including one belonging to the Defense Department and containing personal information on 30,000 applicants, recruiters and prospects that 'fell off a motorcycle belonging to a Navy recruiter.'"

DOJ_NMG_0080994

Professor Finds Few Consumer Injuries In Data Thefts. Not mentioning the House Government Reform Committee report, Fred H. Cate, the director of the Indiana University Center for Applied Cybersecurity Research and a distinguished professor of law and adjunct professor of informatics, writes in a column in the Washington Post (10/14, A21, 748K), "When a laptop was stolen from the home of a Department of Veterans Affairs employee this year, newspapers across the nation editorialized about the dangers facing the people whose data were on the computer. … Then the laptop was recovered -- the data untouched and the risk of identity theft shown to be nonexistent. The happy ending to the VA saga should have come as no surprise. The fact is that few if any such breaches lead to identity theft or other consumer injuries."

McClellan Cites Cost Savings Of Medicare Rx Drug Benefit. The Washington Post (10/14, A9, Lee, 748K) reports, "The Medicare prescription drug benefit is on pace to cost the federal government about $30 billion this year, far less than the $43 billion originally projected, outgoing Medicare chief Mark B. McClellan said yesterday." According to McClellan it "is a result of cheaper-than-expected premiums, fewer people than anticipated enrolling in the new coverage, and slower growth in drug spending." McClellan "said he is pleased that independent surveys show that 80 percent of people who signed up for the new drug benefit are satisfied with their plans. But what he is most proud of has been his emphasis on shifting Medicare toward better-coordinated, prevention-oriented care, he said." The Post notes, "Predictions that many employers would drop their plans and send older workers or retirees to Medicare for drug coverage did not come to pass, McClellan said."

White House Rejects Allegations In Kuo Book. NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 6, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) was the only network broadcast to devote a segment to David Kuo's new book "Tempting Faith." According to NBC, the White House "is responding to explosive charges in a new book by the former number-two man in the president's White House Office of Faith-Based Initiatives." NBC continued, "'Tempting Faith,' a new book by a former Bush aide says that instead of being compassionate conservatives, the Bush team manipulated people of faith for political purposes. Criticism the author, David Kuo, first made last year to NBC News." He "quotes the president as saying about visiting ministers, 'money, all these guys care about is money.'" NBC noted, "Today the White House said Kuo is changing his story." White House Press Secretary Tony Snow: "When David Kuo left the White House, he sent the president a very warm letter talking about how wonderful it was." Kuo's "former boss" James Towey was shown saying, "President Bush would not have tolerated that kind of conduct toward any religious leader."

The AP (10/14, Loven) reports Kuo "singled out staffers in the office of Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser and deputy chief of staff, as particularly condescending toward evangelical Christians, viewing them as necessary to help win elections but ridiculing them behind the scenes." Snow "said he had not yet seen the book. But he said Rove was asked if he made the comments and replied he had not. Kuo, however, doesn't single out anyone by name as making the condescending comments. … Snow denied Kuo's charge that the White House's religious charities program wasn't given the status it deserved, saying Bush's personal commitment to the policy was solid."

Christian Conservative Leaders Come To Bush's Defense. The Washington Post (10/14, A3, Cooperman, 748K) reports, "Conservative religious leaders described themselves as shocked yesterday by a new book's charge that Bush administration staffers privately dismissed evangelical Christian political activists as 'nuts' and 'goofy.' But their dismay was aimed at the book's author, former White House official David Kuo, rather than at President Bush or his senior advisers. James Dobson, Charles W. Colson and other stalwarts of the conservative Christian movement defended the Bush administration and questioned the timing of the book's publication, a month before the midterm elections. Some suggested that Kuo had betrayed the White House. 'I feel sorry for him, because once you do something like this, you get your 15 minutes in the spotlight, but then after that nobody will touch you,' said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council."

Air Force Memorial To Be Unveiled. President Bush will help to dedicate the new Air Force memorial Saturday, but the upcoming event received little media coverage as ABC World News (10/13, story 8, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) in a brief story noted, "As of tomorrow, there's going to be an impressive, new landmark at Arlington National Cemetery. The United States Air Force memorial will be dedicated, filling the last gap in Washington area monuments to the military services. The design was inspired by the Thunderbirds. And the Thunderbirds flew over the memorial today."

Rep. Charles Taylor Demands WSJournal Retract Allegations. The AP (10/14) reports Rep. Charles Taylor "demanded Friday that The Wall Street Journal correct and retract statements in an article that said he slipped projects benefiting his own business interests into the federal budget, a claim he called libelous." Taylor "said he would sue the newspaper if it does not meet his demands. … Taylor is demanding that the Journal retract a front-page article published Wednesday titled 'Seat in Congress Helps Mr. Taylor Help His Business.' It said he added 'earmarks' to legislation to widen two highways near property he owns, to give millions to nonprofit groups run by his business partners and supporters, and to provide $3.8 million for a park in front of a downtown Asheville bank he owns."

DOJ_NMG_0080995

NYT Book Review Questions Rove's Success In Making Progress On Agenda. Nicholas Confessore in a review of James Moore and Wayne Slater's book "The Architect: Karl Rove and the Master Plan for Absolute Power" in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) calls it "a blistering sequel," and while "Rove frequently disappears from the narrative for pages at a time, the authors invariably suggest that the lack of apparent fingerprints merely proves his cunning." Confessore believes the authors have overestimated Rove because after Bush's re-election "Social Security privatization…was a political disaster. Iraq is turning into an albatross. Bush has endured some of the lowest approval ratings of any president since Richard Nixon, and voters appear even less enchanted with his allies on the Hill. Even some prominent conservatives, dismayed by growth in the size of government and the deficit spending that has fueled it, are fuming." And "the Republican Party's battles over immigration have repelled Hispanic voters, and the administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina reversed whatever gains Bush had made among blacks. Rove once hoped to build a new big-tent party that could thrive as ethnic and racial minorities become a majority of the electorate. He's had to settle for a narrower and more self-limiting coalition built around white religious conservatives, their fear of what Democratic rule would bring and the genuinely impressive machinery he's built to muster them on Election Day."

OTHER NEWS:

Lower Gas Prices Spur Consumer Spending. The impact of lower gas prices in boosting consumer spending was generally reported as good news. But Sen. Barack Obama provided a counterpoint on CBS, warning that the US needed to do more to secure energy independence. The New York Times/Bloomberg (10/14) reports, "Lower gasoline prices encouraged Americans to spend more on clothing, furniture and building materials, and propelled consumer confidence to the highest level in more than a year, according to reports released yesterday." Bloomberg notes, "The largest decline ever in gas-station receipts pushed overall retail sales down 0.4 percent in September, the Commerce Department said. Excluding service stations, purchases climbed 0.6 percent, three times the gain in August." And "the University of Michigan reported that its consumer sentiment index jumped to 92.3 in October, from 85.4 the prior month. It was the highest reading since July 2005."

The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A4, Conkey, 2.03M) in an article titled "Economy Benefits As Gas-Price Drop Spurs Outlays" reports, "Consumers took much of the money they saved at the gas pump last month and spent it elsewhere, giving the economy a critical boost at a time when overall growth appears to be slowing." Experts "said consumers, supported by a strong labor market and solid wage growth, are still increasing their spending at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 3% or more. That's proving to be especially critical now that the economy appears to be settling into a period of slower growth, damped by a decrease in residential construction, higher interest rates and a wider trade deficit."

The Washington Times/AP (10/14) notes that "with confidence rebounding sharply this month, strong sales are forecast for the all-important holiday period." Global Insight chief economist Nariman Behravesh "said this decline is like a huge tax cut that will give consumers nearly $100 billion more to spend on other items." He "said the overall economy, which grew at a 2.6 percent rate in the spring, probably grew by just 1.8 percent in the third quarter but should rebound to around 2.5 percent growth in the final three months of this year."

The Financial Times (10/14, Pimlott, Guha) adds, "The firm underlying retail sales figures and an unexpectedly strong upswing in consumer confidence further diminish the prospect that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates any time soon."

Obama Warns Falling Gas Prices Inadequate Solution To US Energy Needs. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 9, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Gasoline prices continue to fall. They're down to a nationwide average tonight of $2.25 a gallon, the lowest price since the first of the year. But in 'free speech' tonight, a warning that falling gas prices should not lull you into a false sense of energy security." Sen. Barack Obama said, "America's oil addiction doesn't go away when prices come down and the polls close. There are few issues besides energy that combine so many of the challenges we face today. When Ford lays off thousands of workers, it's because they can't compete with foreign companies that are making more fuel efficient cars. When we hear about rising global temperatures, it's because the fossil fuel we burn are damaging our climate. And when we wonder why the U.S. is so involved in the Middle East, it's because we need their oil. We don't have to settle for this future. We should replace more of the oil we use with alternative fuels like ethanol. And we can even make a deal with our auto companies. If they make more fuel-efficient cars, the government will help them pay their retiree health care costs. The point is the ideas on energy are out there, but we need the leadership to make it happen. And now's the time to make your voice heard, not only this November, but in all the days that follow."

DOJ_NMG_0080996

Paul Brown echoed that theme in his "What's Offline" column titled "The Deathwatch For Cheap Oil" in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M). He writes, "Those falling prices at the gasoline pump may only be temporary. Indeed, they could signal the start of an era in which, forecasters say, 'the death of cheap, abundant crude might unleash war and plunge the world into a second Great Depression.'" That's according to "Willem Kadijk, a hedge fund adviser quoted by Bloomberg Markets magazine. He is just one of many who believe that global oil production is now at or near its peak, and the only place to go is down."

Clinton Urges California Voters To Approve Increase In Taxes On Oil Revenues. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, McGreevy, 918K) reports, "Accusing oil companies of lying about the cost of Proposition 87, former President Clinton on Friday called 'bogus' their contention that approving a tax on oil revenues would trigger higher gas prices for California motorists." At a UCLA rally Clinton "said the state ballot measure would help California move toward less expensive, cleaner forms of energy by funding research into alternative fuels." Supporters of the tax have already launched an ad campaign featuring Al Gore and Clinton "will be featured in a new round of ads that were filmed during Friday's rally in front of a cheering crowd of 5,000, many of them students." But opponents "noted Friday that support for the measure is sagging, and predicted that the involvement of Clinton and Gore would not be enough to save a proposal that they say would create an unaccountable bureaucracy." Claremont McKenna College professor of government John Pitney said, "This is an effort to pump up the Democratic base of voters. It's a very smart move, because these are the folks the base will respond to."

Dow Sets New Record By Slight Margin. The New York Times/AP (10/14) in an article titled "Another Record Week For The Dow" reports, "The Dow Jones industrial average inched to another record close yesterday, giving it three consecutive weeks of triple-digit increases." It "was the Dow's sixth record close in two weeks. Still, stocks showed little overall movement as traders were unimpressed with a profit report from General Electric and brokerage firms issued negative comments about Home Depot." And oil prices "moved higher, holding the major indexes to modest gains." The DJIA "rose 12.81 points, or 0.11 percent, to 11,960.51, passing the record close of 11,947.70 set Thursday." The Times adds, "Broader stock indicators also advanced. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 2.79 points, or 0.20 percent, at 1,365.62, and the Nasdaq composite index was up 11.11 points, or 0.47 percent, at 2,357.29."

Providing a cautionary outlook, the Wall Street Journal (10/14, B1, McKay, 2.03M) reports, "As the Dow Jones Industrial Average flirts with a close above 12000, a familiar pattern has emerged. It edges closer to that benchmark, then pulls back. What happens once it tops that milestone may be less predictable." In the past the Dow "performed well following its initial breaches of 1,000-point benchmarks, according to the data firm Ned Davis Research, rising an average of 1.8% in the first month and 14.2% twelve months after such milestones." Yet, "the most recent milestone, which came amid the dot-com bubble, was an unpleasant exception. After the Dow finished above 11000 for the first time in May 1999, it was off 4% just a month later and remained in the red 12 months later, off 1.8%. If 12000 comes soon, it will have taken more than seven years to rise the next 1,000 points." And some experts "like Standard & Poor's strategist Sam Stovall, believe the market is due for a similar pullback now. 'It would be good for the market to have a bull-market correction soon, just to make sure it doesn't get ahead of itself,' Mr. Stovall told clients in a recent briefing."

GE Report Suggests US, Global Economy Performing Well. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A3, Kranhold, 2.03M) in an article titled "GE Earnings Point To Solid Economy" reports, "Robust third-quarter financial results from General Electric Co.'s industrial units suggest that the global economy is weathering both high oil prices and a slowdown in the U.S. housing market." The Journal notes, "Overall, GE reported results that met expectations but disappointed some investors. But GE's industrial units posted a 14% increase in revenue and an 18% jump in profit, bolstered by strong sales of power turbines, locomotives and aircraft engines, among other products."

Similarly, the Financial Times (10/14) adds, "The US economy is proving resilient – at least if one focuses on the right set of core measures. Excluding autos, gasoline and building materials, retail sales rose by 0.8 per cent during September. The data are volatile but fit the rosy macro-economic picture painted by General Electric, a bellwether if there ever was one."

The New York Times (10/14, Deutsch, 1.21M) reports, "Investors reacted tepidly to yesterday's report, sending G.E. shares down less than a percent, to $35.98. But G.E. shares, which had been stagnant for most of the year, rose 13 percent in the last two months, and analysts do not anticipate a sell-off now." GE CFO Keith Sherin said, "We promised to grow two to three times G.D.P., and this is the seventh quarter we made good on that promise." Yet "the quarter was not devoid of disappointments. Profit at GE Commercial Finance, which rose 6 percent, fell short of the 10-to-15-percent growth the company had projected. The reason, Mr. Sherin said, was that some deals that were expected to close in the third quarter would instead close later in the year."

DOJ_NMG_0080997

Courts See Upswing In Cases Regarding Long-Term Care Health Insurance. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Selvin, 918K) reports, "Consumer advocates and insurance regulators say that lawsuits and complaints…are likely to mushroom in the coming years as more baby boomers and their ailing parents make claims on long-term care insurance. Sales of such policies grew 65% from 2000 to 2004, but actual and projected payouts have already caused a shakeout that could leave some policyholders with huge bills worried that insurers can't or won't pay. Some insurers who underestimated their potential obligations have sharply hiked their premiums or abandoned the market. Insurers have denied long-term care claims for a variety of reasons, lawyers say. They have, for example, rejected as inadequate documentation from seniors too sick or distracted to be diligent record keepers. Or they have rescinded policies, saying the individual didn't fully disclose a preexisting medical condition on his or her application. In response to multiplying consumer complaints, some states are requiring more training for sales agents and limiting insurers' ability to raise premiums, along with other restrictions."

Spotlight On Gay Republicans Seen As Threatening GOP Base. ABC World News (10/13, story 3, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Foley scandal as exposed the little-known aspect of life on Capitol Hill. One that is causing real controversy in the Republican Party. … It is threatening to tear the Republican Party apart. Christian conservatives are now arguing that all the gay men present in the Foley scandal prove that the Republican party has been too tolerant." Rev. Louis Sheldon: "It's time for what we call come to Jesus meeting. Homosexuality is a dysfunctional lifestyle. And it must be addressed." ABC continued, "Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council asked 'has the social agenda of the GOP been stalled by homosexual members and/or staffers? Does the party want to represent values voters or Mark Foley and friends?'" ABC went on to report that the Bush White House "won re-election in 2004 partly by campaigning against gay marriage. … And yet, it can seem perfectly accepting of such unions, as was seen this week, when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice swore in AIDS czar Dr. Mark Dybul, who is gay, while Dybul's partner held the Bible. Rice even referred to the partner's mother as Dybul's mother-in-law."

McClatchy Reimburses Nonprofit For McConnell Investigation. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Rosen) report that last year, Marilyn W. Thompson, "then the executive editor of the Lexington Herald-Leader…wanted to initiate a major reporting project but lacked enough money to pay for it. Thompson, who wanted the paper to take a deep look at Mitch McConnell, Kentucky's senior U.S. senator, a Republican, came up with an answer: She'd seek support from the Center for Investigative Reporting, a California-based nonprofit group that's financed or conducted groundbreaking work in television and print journalism. The idea was approved by Thompson's bosses at Knight Ridder, which owned the Herald-Leader at the time. The center approved a $37,500 grant, and Herald-Leader reporter John Cheves went to work. This week, with Cheves winding up a six-month examination of McConnell - and the senator's staff raising questions about the unusual grant - the Herald-Leader's new owner, McClatchy Co., came to a different conclusion. McClatchy acquired Knight Ridder in June. Howard Weaver, McClatchy's vice president for news, announced that the company would reimburse the Center for Investigative Reporting for the grant."

Bush To Campaign For Sherwood And Allen This Week. The New York Times (10/14, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports President Bush "is not the kind of guy to back out on a promise, especially when it comes to raising money for fellow Republicans. So it is that Mr. Bush, who has slogged his way through many a fund-raiser this campaign season, plans to make the rounds of what might be called the Congressional newsmakers caucus next week, with back-to-back fund-raisers on Thursday for Representative Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania and Senator George Allen of Virginia." The Times notes Sherwood "has admitted having an extra-marital affair with a woman who has accused him of trying to choke her," while Allen "is fighting for re-election after a string of controversies involving racially insensitive remarks; his denial and subsequent embrace of his newly discovered Jewish heritage, and reports that he had failed to disclose stock options." According to the Times, Bush and the GOP "are investing time and money to hold seats they did not originally think they would have to defend so aggressively." The AP (10/14, Hunt) reports, "A congressman who admitted to having an affair and a senator accused of using racial slurs will get some political help from President Bush next week. … 'The President has made a commitment, and he's going to fulfill the commitment,' White House press secretary Tony Snow said Friday." Snow is quoted as saying, "Sherwood has certainly admitted to what has gone on, and the president also believes that we're all sinners, we all seek forgiveness, and in this particular case, he's supporting Don Sherwood's candidacy."

DOJ_NMG_0080998

Some GOP Insiders Claim Bush Is Unprepared For Midterm Losses. U.S. News and World Report's Kenneth T. Walsh (10/14) writes, "Some Republican strategists are increasingly upset with what they consider the overconfidence of President Bush and his senior advisers about the midterm elections November 7–a concern aggravated by the president's news conference this week. 'They aren't even planning for if they lose,' says a GOP insider who informally counsels the West Wing. If Democrats win control of the House, as many analysts expect, Republicans predict that Bush's final two years in office will be marked by multiple congressional investigations and gridlock. 'The Bush White House has had no relationship with Congress,' said a Bush ally. 'Beyond the Democrats, wait till they see how the Republicans–the ones that survive–treat them if they lose next month.' GOP insiders are upset by Bush's seeming inability to come up with new ideas or fresh approaches."

GOP Unable To Fully Fund Candidates In Several Tight Senate Races. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A1, Cummings, 2.03M) reports, "As their prospects dim for holding control of the House, Republicans are increasingly alarmed they also could lose their Senate majority…and the party is finding its fund-raising edge isn't going as far as it used to. … For the first time since taking control of Congress in 1994, party leaders are being forced to pick and choose which of the tight races they can throw money into winning. They simply can't afford them all." According to the Journal, "Republicans have increasingly concentrated on three Senate seats -- Tennessee, Missouri and Ohio -- to try to salvage at least a one-seat majority. They currently hold 55 of the Senate's 100 seats, but at least six of those are now seen as vulnerable. The party's national and Senate campaign accounts have recently spent $14.1 million to hold the seats of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, Missouri Sen. Jim Talent and Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine -- with $8 million spent on Mr. DeWine alone. Yet most polls show Democrats still leading in all three races. That spending comes at the expense of other vulnerable incumbents, including Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, who are also both running behind. They are getting voter turnout help but not independent advertising support from the national party."

Most Incumbent Senators Maintain Fundraising Edge. The AP (10/14, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Incumbent senators entered the final weeks of the midterm campaign with substantial sums in their bank accounts, but challengers also stepped up fundraising to keep races competitive and ad buyers busy to the very end." Sen. Mike DeWine "had a $3 million advantage over Democratic challenger Rep. Sherrod Brown at the end of September. However, Brown had the edge on fundraising for the quarter, according to reports they plan to file with the Federal Election Commission." Sen. Maria Cantwell "said she had $3.5 million in the bank after raising $2 million in the past quarter. Her opponent, Republican Mike McGavick, outraised her this quarter, bringing in nearly $2.2 million for the period ending Sept. 30, and had $2.1 million on hand." Sen. Lincoln Chafee "reported about $700,000 on hand, compared with $1.4 million for his challenger, Sheldon Whitehouse."

Kerry Blasts Republicans Over "Lies" About Iraq, North Korea And Foley. The AP (10/14, Ramer) reports Sen. John Kerry "likened the congressional page scandal to the war in Iraq and the handling of North Korea, saying that Republicans have lied repeatedly. 'A lie, a lie, a lie, a lie. What we have in Washington is a house of lies, and in November, we need to clean house,' Kerry said Friday night during the New Hampshire Democratic Party's annual fall fundraising dinner. 'They tell us we're making progress in Iraq and that there is no civil war. That is a lie,' he said. 'It's immoral to lie about progress in that war in order to get through a news cycle or an election cycle.'

Allen's Cash On Hand Total More Than Double Webb's. The Washington Post (10/14, B5, Craig, 748K) reports James Webb "Outraised" Sen. George Allen "by nearly $1 million from July to October, according to campaign finance reports released yesterday that reflected a surge in support for the challenger after Allen made several controversial comments that dramatically tightened the race. Allen still has twice as much in the bank as Webb, but both candidates said they will have enough money in the campaign's closing weeks to compete on TV in the crucial advertising war that will help decide the outcome. Allen raised $2.6 million between July 1 and Sept. 30 and reported $5.5 million in the bank, according to his finance report, the last required before the Nov. 7 election." Webb "had $2.7 million in the bank at the end of September."

Allen Ads Hammer Webb On Gay Marriage And Taxes. The Washington Times (10/14, Bellantoni, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Allen "has been most effective pummeling the Democrat on taxes and social issues to rally his conservative base. 'Jim Webb, Hillary Clinton and their liberal allies in Washington don't want to give constitutional protection to traditional marriage,' an announcer says on an Allen radio ad. 'And if they don't share our values on something as basic as marriage, how can we trust them on any issue?' The ad, which is running in rural parts of the state, is one of several that hit the airwaves this week to paint Mr. Webb as a liberal out of touch with Virginia values."

DOJ_NMG_0080999

Menendez Leads Kean In Cash On Hand $5.5 Million To $3.2 Million. The New York Times (10/14, Chen, 1.21M) reports, "Posting his strongest fund-raising numbers to date, State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr. has significantly reduced what had been a three-to-one advantage in resources for his opponent, Senator Robert Menendez, according to preliminary campaign finance data released on Friday. Yet in a caustic race that figures to be dominated by television advertising in its final four weeks, Mr. Menendez, the Democratic incumbent, still enjoys a solid lead in overall cash on hand, $5.5 million compared to $3.2 million for Mr. Kean. From July 1 to Sept. 30, Mr. Kean, a Republican, raised nearly $1.8 million and spent $866,000 — eclipsing his best fund-raising efforts over a three-month period, when he raised $1.6 million in the first quarter of this year." Menendez "had his slowest quarter of the year, collecting almost $1.4 million."

Steele Angered By Cardin's Attempts To Tie Him To Bush. The Washington Times (10/14, Ward, 88K) reports, "A visibly angry Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele yesterday lashed out at Democratic attempts to tie him to President Bush and national Republicans in the U.S. Senate race, saying that he refuses 'to be the whipping boy for or against the Republican Party.' 'You know, I'm tired of this. I've got to justify everything the administration does, or everything it doesn't do. This is not about that,' Mr. Steele told reporters after participating in a forum conducted by the Washington County Chamber of Commerce. The Republican Senate nominee noted that his Democratic opponent, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, 'mentioned the president 113 times' during their debate last week." The Times notes Steele "previously had distanced himself from Mr. Bush, saying that his Republican Party affiliation is a 'scarlet letter' in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-to-1. But he also has called the president his 'homeboy.'"

Steele Clarifies His Positions On Abortion, Guns. The Washington Post (10/14, B4, Mosk, Marimow, 748K) reports Steele "said yesterday that his strong personal opposition to legalizing abortion would not factor into his work in Washington, or his evaluation of a nominee for U.S. Supreme Court justice, should he be elected next month. 'I have no litmus test in that regard because my constitutional obligation is to represent the people of the state,' said Steele, who is Catholic. … The Republican candidate was less emphatic when asked about gun rights and suggested that his general support might not extend to assault weapons. 'You draw the line. I mean, what do you need an assault weapon for?' Steele said."

Rural "Racism" Considered A Threat To Steele's Campaign. The Washington Times (10/14, Miller, 88K), in an article titled "Rural Areas' Racism May Cost Steele Votes," reports, "Residents in Western Maryland and on the Eastern Shore say there are many whites among them who will not vote for a black candidate. … White voters in Republican strongholds in rural areas pose a threat to the senatorial ambitions of Mr. Steele, who already has battled race-baiting by Democrats in his Senate bid." The Times adds, "an elected Eastern Shore official -- a white Republican -- said privately that racism probably will hurt Mr. Steele 'a little bit' among white voters. In Hagerstown, Gail Curtis, a black hairstylist, said local residents have shouted racial slurs at her and her children. She has 'no doubt' that some white voters will be reluctant to cast a ballot for Mr. Steele because of his race."

Harris Said To Have "Squandered" GOP's Chance To Defeat Nelson. NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 7, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M), in its "In Depth" segment reported, "By her own admission, Katherine Harris' run for senate is an uphill fight. A fight that republican leaders like Jeb Bush never wanted her to wage." She "trails incumbent Bill Nelson by at least 18 points in recent polls and Republican leaders fear she's squandered a golden opportunity to gain a vulnerable Democratic seat." NBC noted, "Neither president Bush nor Florida Governor Bush have campaigned for Harris. When the president recently stopped for two other Florida candidates, he briefly shook her hand and only mentioned her in the audience."

Bay Area Liberals Mobilize Opposition To Doolittle And Pombo. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Tempest, 918K) reports San Francisco Bay area liberal activists have focused on "two candidates vying for seats in bedrock conservative districts to the east, currently occupied by Republicans John T. Doolittle of Granite Bay and Richard W. Pombo of Tracy. Although most experts still give them a narrow edge, Doolittle, 55, seeking his ninth term, and Pombo, 45, pursuing his eighth, are in the toughest fights of their political careers going into the Nov. 7 election. Their Northern California races are considered the most competitive in the state. President Bush demonstrated his concern by showing up at fundraisers for the duo last week, garnering more than $1 million for their campaigns. But the prospect of upset victories contributing to a Democratic takeover of Congress — potentially installing San Francisco's Nancy Pelosi as speaker — has added another dimension to the Doolittle and Pombo races. Hundreds of volunteers and activists in Berkeley and other Bay Area communities have mobilized on the Democratic side, raising money, manning phone banks and carpooling into the districts to canvass neighborhoods for votes."

DOJ_NMG_0081000

Three Southern California GOP House Seats Safe Despite Corruption Allegations. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Berthelsen, 918K) reports, "three Southern California Republicans with legal and ethical troubles of their own — including being named among the 'most corrupt members of Congress' by the public interest group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington — are expected to coast to reelection in November." Rep. Jerry Lewis "is accused of earmarking hundreds of millions of taxpayer dollars for the clients of a lobbyist and close friend." Rep. Gary Miller "is accused of using his position in Congress to help a business partner and campaign contributor gain access to a prime piece of public land and of sheltering millions of dollars in real estate investment gains from taxes." Rep. Ken Calvert "is accused of earmarking millions of taxpayer dollars for transportation improvements near real estate developments in which he has a financial interest." The Times notes, "Even Lewis, who faces the most potential legal trouble as the target of an investigation by federal prosecutors, is on safe ground."

Democrats Work To Block Notices For Ballots Cast For Foley. The AP (10/14, Skoloff) reports Democrats "asked a state court Friday to block Election Day notices at polling places that would inform voters in Rep. Mark Foley's district that his GOP replacement on the ballot will receive his votes. … Foley's name is still on the ballot…and election supervisors want voters to know that votes for Foley will be given to state Rep. Joe Negron instead. Democrats say that would be electioneering, which is illegal under state law. 'We think the issue is very simple. What they propose to do is electioneering, and the law says electioneering is not allowed within 100 feet of a polling place. Simple as that,' said Democratic Party spokesman Mark Bubriski." Negron "called the Democrats' request 'a desperate attempt to try to confuse voters.'"

Several Other Once-Safe GOP Seats In Florida Considered Vulnerable. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Williams, 918K) reports, "GOP candidates in several once-certain Florida races now appear to be in trouble." In the 13th District "Democrat Christine Jennings leads Republican Vern Buchanan by 12 percentage points, according to a recent poll, despite the wealthy Buchanan's $3 million contribution from his own pocket. Democratic State Sen. Ron Klein has been running neck-and-neck with Republican U.S. Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. for his 22nd District post. … Democrat Phyllis Busansky's bid for the 9th District has gained strength in the last two weeks, say campaign workers, who are awaiting new poll results. The former local government leader is facing Gus Bilirakis, son of retiring U.S. Rep. Michael Bilirakis."

Immigration Key In Hayworth House Race. The Financial Times (10/14, Luce) reports, "Every night between 6,000 and 6,500 foreigners try to cross from Mexico into the US, most of them into the desert state of Arizona. Some two-thirds of them succeed. If J.D. Hayworth's crushing handshake is any guide, future illegal aliens can expect much stiffer resistance at the border." His position not only puts Hayworth at odds with President Bush and Sen. John McCain, but also his Democratic opponent Harry Mitchell, "who polls say stands at least an odds-even chance at mid-term elections next month of ejecting the Republican from the seat he has held since 1994." At an event before a group from the National Association of Letter Carriers, Mitchell said, "We need to change the way business is done in Washington." While "hardly original, Mr Mitchell's plea appears to be sincere. As does Mr Hayworth's uncompromising line on immigration. 'My opponent,' says Mr Mitchell, 'wants to hire bond bailsmen –- call them bounty hunters –- to deport illegal immigrants. Is this the kind of America we want?' The postal workers evidently like Mr Mitchell. But their applause is not emphatic.

Anti-GOP Sentiment, Strong Challenger Present Hurdles For Wolf. The Washington Post (10/14, B6, Gardner, 748K) reports, "Northern Virginia's sprawling 10th District, which meanders 70 miles from McLean to the Shenandoah Valley, is nothing if not predictable. For 26 years, voters have sent Republican Frank R. Wolf of Fairfax County to represent them in Congress. That fact alone gives Wolf, 67, an enormous advantage over his Democratic challenger this year, Judy Feder. … But 2006 is not a year to assume that history will be a guide. The war in Iraq, high gasoline prices and the House page scandal are pushing voters away from President Bush's party -- even in a district viewed widely as Northern Virginia's most Republican. Add to that the uncertainty of seeking office in a fast-growing region where the political allegiance has shifted toward Democrats in recent elections, and the outlook for Wolf grows less bullish. Finally, consider the challenger: Though a political newcomer, Feder is a well-funded, well-spoken public policy expert whose aggressive campaign has caused several national political analysts and Web sites to list the 10th District as a race to watch."

WPost Endorses Wolf. The Washington Post (10/14, A20, 748K) endorses Wolf, saying, "we have had our disagreements" with Wolf "but those have been outweighed by our respect for his undisputed diligence, candor, active legislative approach and passionate commitment to human rights in some of the world's darkest corners."

Democrats Find Success Recruiting Physically Attractive Candidates. The Washington Post (10/14, A1, Murray, 748K) in a front page story reports, "Attractive politicians have an edge over not-so-attractive ones. The phenomenon is resonating especially this year. By a combination of luck and design, Democrats seem to be fielding an uncommonly high number of uncommonly good-looking candidates. The beauty gap between the parties, some on Capitol Hill muse, could even be a factor in who controls Congress after Election Day. … In most of the races, the Democratic challengers look a lot like standard-issue politicians -- not likely to impress the judges at Atlantic City. But there are others who, while they might not have movie-star looks, are certainly well above the C-SPAN median. The list is decidedly unscientific, but it includes several whose names come up often on Capitol Hill for reasons other than their policy platforms. Among those on it…are Brad Ellsworth, a swaggering Indiana sheriff; businesswoman Gabrielle Giffords of Arizona, who has chiseled features and rides a motorcycle; and Heath Shuler of North Carolina, a strapping former quarterback for the Washington Redskins. In Tennessee, Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., a lean and stylish 36-year-old, has drawn admiring looks."

DOJ_NMG_0081001

Political Candidates Find MySpace Useful In Communicating Message. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A4, Lovley, 2.03M) reports, "Politicians across the country are discovering that a presence on social-networking sites such as MySpace isn't just a way of communicating with voters under 30, it is also a means of attracting volunteers and their donations. Howard Dean's 2004 presidential primary run underscored the Internet's untapped potential as a fund-raising tool, and political strategists say these networking sites go further by helping candidates to home in on specific audiences, beyond those who click on campaign Web sites."

Ehrlich And O'Malley To Engage In Two Debates Saturday. The Washington Post (10/14, B1, Wagner, 748K) reports, "After accusing one another of ducking debates for weeks," Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley "are preparing for a political rarity today: a doubleheader." After an hourlong debate in Baltimore this afternoon, "five hours later and 12 miles away, the Republican incumbent and Democratic challenger plan to meet again, this time at the Maryland Public Television station in Owings Mills for another hour-long showdown." The earlier debate will be taped and shown later at 7PM.

Dowd Warns McCain Against Attacking Hillary. Maureen Dowd in her column in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) warns that en. John McCain needs to be careful in criticizing Sen. Hillary Clinton because in the past when "men abused her" she became "a sympathetic figure to many voters." Recently McCain "managed to attack her three ways in one sentence: as a senator, as a wife and as a future opponent. This raises the question: Is it a smart move, pleasing a base that cringes at stories of these celebrity senators palling around, knocking back drinks on an overseas trip? Or is it a misstep, making Mr. McCain look like a sexist bully for pointedly blaming his fellow senator for her husband's old policies -- and calling her 'Mrs. Clinton' just to rub it in?"

UN Considers "Significant" Sanctions On North Korea. On the network TV news, the UN Security Council sanctions on North Korea were described in generally positive terms. Offering the most detailed TV coverage of the Administration's efforts to deal with North Korea, CBS Evening News (10/13, story 2, 2:10, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported that at the UN "they are moving with uncommon speed and consensus to get a resolution on sanctions. The resolution demands North Korea conduct no more nuclear tests and returns to the negotiating table, those so-called six party talks." US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton: "We refer to cargo you can have air cargo, sea cargo, and land cargo." Axelrod: "China's balking. It thinks inspecting the cargo could lead to a dangerous North Korean response but tonight it appears some compromise will be reached, united by the mutual need to confront North Korea." White House press secretary Tony Snow: "It's sort of like dealing with a bratty child. You give him a piece of candy and hope they'll shut up. Guess what? No more rewards for bad behavior. There will be punishments and consequences." Axelrod: "Secretary of State Rice will leave next week to meet with regional allies, work out the finer points of how to implement those sanctions. For instance, just how those inspections will be conducted, Katie."

In shorter stories ABC World News (10/13, story 4, 1:15, Karl, 8.78M) reported the UN Security Council resolution "will include a ban on weapon shipments. A ban on luxury goods. And it would freeze the weapons on anything related to North Korea's weapons system. And this will be enforced or open to enforcement by inspection of all cargo going in and out of North Korea. These are significant sanctions, even if they are a bit watered down from what the United States wanted."

And NBC Nightly News (10/13, story 3, :30, Williams, 9.87M) briefly, "The United Nations Security Council plans to vote on a resolution tomorrow call for sanctions against North Korea and condemning that nation's recent nuclear test. The resolution does not however talk about any kind of military option. China and Russia objected to that."

In contrast, the major papers' stories focused on China and Russia's objections to the draft proposal. The New York Times (10/14, A1, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "The United States pressed for a Saturday vote on a Security Council resolution that would impose sanctions on North Korea for its reported nuclear test, but questions from China and Russia on Friday evening cast the timing and possibly the content of the document into doubt." US Ambassador to the UN John R. Bolton "said the new problems appeared 'technical' rather than 'substantial,' but said they would require another conference of Japan and the five permanent Council members." He also "indicated that one area of dispute remained the methods and legalities of how to inspect cargo." The measure "had already been softened three times this week to meet objections from China and Russia," and Washington officials were "apparently confident of the imminent passage of the measure," as "Senior State Department officials portrayed the United Nations momentum toward a resolution as evidence of a united, multilateral front agreeing to punish North Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0081002

The Washington Post (10/14, A14, Kessler, 748K) adds, "China, backed by Russia, insisted that the United States include greater assurances that the resolution could not be used to justify the armed seizure of North Korean ships traveling in international waters." China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, also said "that a ban on luxury goods was unnecessary and too vague." Bolton noted "that Russia raised concerns late Friday about four new problems with the text," including "how we will define nuclear, biological and chemical and weapon-related materials and ballistic missile components."

The Financial Times (10/14, Fifield) reports, "The dispute over the extent of sanctions reflects differences over the purposes of the measure. While the US and perhaps Japan are eyeing regime change, China and South Korea would be happy with a change in behaviour." Also, "doubts are being cast on the effectiveness of whatever measures are agreed. With China and South Korea fearing the collapse of their volatile neighbour, and with a large proportion of North Korea's income coming from illegal trade, even targeted sanctions would have a limited impact." Another Financial Times (10/14, Turner) article also covers this story, as does the Los Angeles Times (10/14, Farley, 918K), the Washington Times (10/14, A1, Gertz, Pisik, 88K), the AP (10/14, Lederer) and Bloomberg (10/14, Zeranski).

Preliminary Test Consistent With Nuclear Detonation. The New York Times (10/14, Mazzetti, 1.21M) reports, "American intelligence officials said on Friday evening they had found new evidence that the country detonated a nuclear bomb." The office of John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, sent a document sent to lawmakers on Capitol Hill saying that "an analysis of air samples taken in the region on Wednesday found radioactive material that is 'consistent with a North Korean nuclear test.'" However, a senior intelligence official "said that the results were still preliminary and that final analysis of the data would not be completed for several days." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack sounded a similar note, saying, "We're in the process now of going through, looking through all the data and all the facts to try to come up with the best possible explanation for what, exactly, happened there," but, "We don't know yet." The Washington Post (10/14, A14, Linzer, Pincus, 748K) adds, "intelligence and administration officials were cautious about reaching a conclusion before reviewing all incoming data." The Washington Times (10/14, A1, Gertz, Pisik, 88K), the Financial Times (10/14, Turner), and the AP (10/14, Burns, Gearan) also cover this story, as does a separate New York Times (10/14, Hoge, 1.21M) article.

Experts Say Kim Isn't Crazy, But Still Is Dangerous. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Johnson) reports that "the whispers in the West that the secretive Kim is crazy are simply wrong, experts say." However, there is "A profound mistrust between North Korea and the United States," as "North Korea believes that Washington is bent on its destruction." Cui Yingjiu, a scholar on North Korea retired from Beijing University and a university classmate of Kim, says that "if Kim is backed into a corner…his regime is capable of selling one of his nuclear weapons to a terrorist group or sparking a calamitous war by bombing Japan." The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A5, 2.03M) notes, "Experts say it is highly unlikely North Korea would drop a nuclear bomb," but a "bigger concern is that North Korea will help Iran proceed with a nuclear-weapons program by sending it technology and supplies, or that it becomes a nuclear-weapons supplier to terrorists who might not be deterred by retaliation since they don't reside in any one nation state."

US Military Plays Stabilizing Role Along DMZ. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 3, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Of course, nowhere is the tension between the two Koreas more palpable than along the demilitarized zone, the D.M.Z., where soldiers from both countries have been staring each other down for more than half a century." CBS (Pizzey): "The North Koreans have said sanctions amount to an act of war, but where north meets south at the D.M.Z., it was business as usual today." Taewoo Kim, Korean Institute for Defense Analyses: "They are aware of even the disadvantages that have to face after nuclear tests." Pizzey: "That certainly included the hardships of sanctions, but any hope that will lead to a popular uprising by people who live in poverty and as satellite images show, in the dark, is considered wishful thinking. There is no known organized opposition in North Korea and the regime has ensured that military options against it are limited." And "South Korean troops routinely strike a martial arts pose as they stare over the demarcation line while the 28,000 U.S. troops who back them up are required to be as much diplomats as fighting men." US Army Capt. David Fischer: "We're here to deescalate issues that may occur. That's our first rule of engagement, deescalate."

DOJ_NMG_0081003

Koreans In Japan Unable To Send Care Packages To North With New Embargo. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Doi) reports, "Japan's decision to ban all shipping to North Korea starting Saturday in response to the North's apparent nuclear test this week will cut off care packages from ethnic Koreans who have lived in Japan for decades," including "the divided family of ethnic Korean filmmaker Yang Yonghi," who "made the documentary film 'Dear Pyongyang' based on her visits to her brothers in North Korea over the past decade," which won "the NETPAC Asian award at the Berlin International Film Festival and the special jury prize at the Sundance Film Festival this year."

Former Nuclear Monitor Blames Administration For Terminating Agreement With North Korea. Jon B. Wolfsthal, who monitored North Korea's nuclear program for the United States and is a fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M) that the "Agreed Framework helped us avoid a military conflict that could have destroyed Seoul" and "froze Pyongyang's plutonium program." When American intelligence agencies confirmed that North Korea was trying to acquire a uranium enrichment program," the Administration, "instead of working within the framework to get North Korea to abandon its nuclear efforts…terminated the agreement altogether." This "jettisoned something of great diplomatic value…the willingness of North Korea to let Americans -- with whom they were legally at war -- into their nuclear center to secure plutonium-bearing fuel rods for internationally monitored storage." While "administration supporters and commentators are seeking to blame the framework for all our problems," without it, "North Korea would have immediately acquired enough plutonium to produce more nuclear weapons and would have completed construction of two much larger weapon production reactors." The inspectors "protected America from danger and our efforts delayed the onset of the nuclear crisis we now face. To argue otherwise is to play politics with history."

WSJournal Argues Bush's PSI & Regime Change, Not Arms Control, Stops Nuclear Threats. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A6, 2.03M) editorializes, "The good news here is that at long last the U.N. is attempting to enforce its own nonproliferation regime," but "it took an actual nuclear blast following a long-range missile test this summer to motivate the Security Council to take even these modest actions." Both "North Korea and Iran are revealing the limits of arms control treaties in restraining rogue states bent on gaining nuclear weapons and other WMD," as they cheated on arms control agreements they signed. "The beginning of wisdom is to realize that the threat hasn't ended merely because a rogue regime signs an arms-control treaty." For stopping "rouge bomb makers, "short of deposing a regime, the most successful policy has been the Bush Administration's Proliferation Security Initiative." It differs from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in "that the PSI doesn't give the feckless or evil a veto over what it does. It is a coalition of countries with a shared sense of purpose, and above all the willingness to act."

China Allowing Refugees Suggested As Way To Deal With North Korea. Melanie Kirkpatrick writes for the Wall Street Journal (10/14, A6, 2.03M) editorial board, "If China is to assume what it considers to be its rightful place as a great power, now is the moment." as it is "the only government with a measure of influence over its lunatic nuclear ward in the Hermit Kingdom." Although not yet publicly discussed, "Opening the frontier to refugees would put pressure on Kim Jong Il to give up his nukes or watch his regime implode." Besides, "three official Chinese government documents -- obtained privately and smuggled out of the country -- show that the humanitarian crisis may be more dire than widely believed and the burden on China heavier," and "Allowing the world to help the North Korean refugees in China would help Beijing deal with a problem that is likely to get worse."

Rice Trip To Asia Expected To Focus On Nonproliferation. Towards the end of an article on the proposed UN sanctions against North Korea, the New York Times (10/14, Hoge, 1.21M) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will "travel to Asia next week to discuss how to implement the" expected UN resolution against North Korea, "as well as to discuss other efforts to deter North Korean proliferation of a nuclear bomb or bomb-making materials. Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Ms. Rice would travel to Tokyo, Seoul and Beijing." He added that the trip "is 'an opportunity for her in the region to reaffirm and talk about the strength of our existing alliances there, and also to have a bit more of a wider conversation with others in the region about the current situation, about the security situation, and also to talk broadly about nonproliferation efforts.'"

The Financial Times (10/14, Turner) adds that "Chris Hill, assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator at the stalled talks with North Korea, told reporters Ms Rice's aim was to ensure the UN resolution had 'teeth and will function properly'." The Washington Post (10/14, A14, Kessler, 748K), the Washington Times (10/14, A1, Gertz, Pisik, 88K), and Bloomberg (10/14, Zeranski) also mention Rice's trip in stories focusing on the UN sanctions.

Nuclear Bombs Are Harder To Make Than Commonly Thought. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Boyd) reports that making nuclear weapons "takes a wide set of technical capabilities and a willingness to risk death or injury to join the club of nuclear nations." The scientifically oriented article describes the technical pitfalls at each step of the process for nuclear-weapon aspirants.

DOJ_NMG_0081004

Iran Said To Be Watching How North Korea Is Handled. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A2, Seib, 2.03M) reports, "Now may be the time to shelve for good the image of George W. Bush as a unilateralist, go-it-alone cowboy." The Administration "is embarking in coming days on an exceptionally complex set of diplomatic maneuvers to try to contain, simultaneously, the nuclear threats from North Korea and Iran," although "It's hard to say whether the stereotype was wrong, or whether an unfriendly world forced a change." Still, "the stakes are huge. Iran will be watching intently to see whether the U.S. actually can organize a meaningful world response to North Korea's provocation. It's entirely possible that only a truly united response will give the Iranians pause -- which is the real test of the Bush team's newfound fondness for multilateral diplomacy."

Iranian Hard Liners Said To Benefit From US Economic Measures. In a front page story in the Wall Street Journal (10/14, A1, Higgins, 2.03M) reports that "an unintended consequence of U.S. foreign policy" has been that "instead of weakening Iran, America's efforts to squeeze the country ended up boosting the very hard-line forces there that the U.S. wants to curb." Iranian businesses "roil" due to "potent political forces…including the heavy hand of elements close to Iran's hard-line president. Prominent among those forces in business today is the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps," which takes over businesses weakened by the US measures.

SEC Fines Statoil Over Iranian Payment. The Wall Street Journal (10/14, A8, Talley, 2.03M) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department levied a $21 million fine against Norwegian oil company Statoil ASA for a payment it made in 2002 to win development of a critical Iranian petroleum project." Statoil "already paid Norwegian authorities $3 million for the affair" and "acknowledged making the payment." It said "it would accept the penalties. Statoil Chairman Jannik Lindbaek said the incident occurred under the company's previous management and that the company has 'long deplored' it." The SEC "said it wanted to make the Statoil fine high to send a clear signal to other companies."

Ban Appointed Secretary General Of UN. The New York Times (10/14, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister of South Korea, was appointed Friday by the General Assembly as the next secretary general of the United Nations" and was "greeted by sustained applause as he walked onto the rostrum to make his acceptance speech." Ban "listed his priorities as reforming the United Nations, meeting development goals established in 2000, establishing human rights, confronting threats posed by terrorism and weapons of mass destruction, slowing environmental degradation and curbing the spread of AIDS." He also "asked that people understand his modest manner as a cultural attribute and not misread it as lack of decisiveness or passion." The Washington Post (10/14, A14, 748K) adds that UN Secretary General "hailed Ban as 'exceptionally attuned to the sensitivities of countries and constituencies in every continent.'"

New UN Leader Expected To Make North Korea A Priority. CBS Evening News (10/13, story 3, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The General Assembly approved a new Secretary General who is very familiar with the Korean dispute. Ban Ki-Moon is South Korea's foreign minister. He has said improving relations with Kim Jong-Il's government will, in fact, be his top priority." The AP (10/14, Lederer) adds, "Ban has been in the forefront of South Korea's nuclear negotiations with Pyongyang and has said he plans to travel to North Korea as secretary-general, something Annan never did."

Cohen Says Ban Needs To Use Moral Authority To Open North Korea. Roger Cohen writes in his column in the New York Times (10/14, 1.21M), "Can a South Korean secretary general of the United Nations" open "the hermit state of a nuclear-armed North Korea?" Ban Ki-Moon "is short on the charisma that made Pope John Paul II a force. But the unanimity he engineered for his nomination testifies to his powers, and sitting atop the UN confers access, authority and agenda-setting discretion not granted by national office." Also, "a chastened U.S. commander-in-chief" is "turning to diplomacy, which is to say the United Nations, at the same time as the organization prepares to greet a new leader for whom the intricacies of the Korean Peninsula are everyday fare. On the face of it, that's a situation with potential." While "fundamental problems remain" – "China has no interest in" Kim's fall, and South Korea is "more intent on the peninsula's stability than its freedom" – if Ban "leaves office with the Korean Peninsula still divided, and 23 million North Koreans still bowing and scraping to Kim, history may prove severe in its judgment."

Violence Continues In Gaza. The New York Times (10/14, Myre, 1.21M) reports that illustrating "the relentless turmoil that has gripped Gaza since militants seized an Israeli soldier and took him to the territory," gunmen from Hamas and Fatah "battled each other overnight and during the day on Friday, leaving a teenager dead and nearly 50 people wounded in the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya." Meanwhile, "Four Palestinians, including three Hamas militants, were killed Friday in a second day of deadly clashes with Israeli forces in the Gaza Strip." While "Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, tried to calm the atmosphere during a midday speech," but despite his and Palestinian Authority president Mahmoud Abbas's pleas, "the internecine fighting has grown worse in recent weeks." The

DOJ_NMG_0081005

Los Angeles Times (10/14, Ellingwood, 918K) also covers this story.

Bush Expands Sudan Sanctions. The AP (10/14, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush signed an executive order Friday that stiffens sanctions on Sudan and its oil industry in an effort to persuade the government to accept U.N. peacekeepers and stop killings of civilians in Darfur." It "continues a countrywide blocking of the Sudan government's property, and prohibits transactions related to Sudan's oil sector." The White house says the order "imposes sanctions against those responsible for genocide, backs measures to protect civilians and humanitarian operations and supports peace efforts in the war-torn land."

Incentives Said To Favor Russian, Georgian Escalations. The Washington Times (10/14, Sands, 88K) reports that, according to regional security analysts, "The bitter dispute that erupted last month between Russia and Georgia is a 'perfect storm' of mutual suspicion and hostility in which both sides have their reasons for escalating the tension." While "the European Union and the U.N. Security Council have appealed for calm…both Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili and Russian President Vladimir Putin could benefit from the clash." Saakashvili wants "a Russian 'overreaction' to boost his popularity at home and to attract U.S. and European support for Georgia's long-term hopes to break away from Moscow's influence and join such Western institutions as NATO and the European Union," while "Russia and Mr. Putin are equally keen to slap down Georgia, in part to punish Tbilisi for its desire to ally with the European Union and United States and in part to show Ukraine and other former Soviet states on its border the costs of pulling away from Moscow in favor of the West."

Britain, Ireland Offer New North Ireland Agreement. The New York Times (10/14, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "After three days of closed-door negotiations, Britain and Ireland on Friday offered a compromise formula to restore Northern Ireland's power-sharing government by next March, allowing for an election or referendum to endorse the deal." However, it "was not immediately embraced by the province's fractious political parties," and "it is not certain that an agreement sponsored by London and Dublin will be enough to survive the tripwires of Northern Ireland's fissured politics." Prime Ministers Tony Blair of Britain and Bertie Ahern of Ireland "refrained from high-flown language to herald the end of the negotiations." The Democratic Unionists "had been pressing for Sinn Fein…to commit itself completely to respecting the province's police force" and "Sinn Fein has been pressing for" The Rev. Ian Paisley, the Protestant leader, "to sit in a power-sharing government as first minister with a republican leader as his deputy." Under the agreement, "each side would have to accept the other's demands," and "On Friday, at least, they seemed determined to do that." Northern Ireland's political parties would have until Nov. 10 to agree to the plan.

The Washington Post (10/14, A13, Sullivan, 748K) adds, "Blair and Ahern had said that if the parties could not reach agreement by Nov. 24, the province would have everything from water rates to education controlled by the central government in London. The St. Andrews talks were an attempt to avert that outcome."

The Financial Times (10/14, Adam, Brown) is more optimistic, reporting that "After lengthy overnight talks, Thursday's pessimistic mood began to dissipate," and "there was optimism that Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionists and Sinn Fein could within weeks overcome long-standing differences and agree to form a joint power-sharing executive." It refers to "evidence that republicans and unionists were edging closer to a deal over power-sharing." Blair "put a positive gloss on the talks, but acknowledged there was still some way to go to secure a deal and that the talks could yet unravel."

The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Murphy, 918K) takes a more negative tone, leading that "the prime ministers of Britain and Ireland failed to bring Northern Ireland's feuding parties to immediate agreement on power sharing, but worked out a proposal that could establish a new joint government."

Unlike Neighbors, Chile Embraces Trade With China. The Los Angeles Times (10/14, Dickerson, 918K) reports, "Chinese competition has put hundreds of textile manufacturers in Latin America out of business," but "Chile has cobbled one of Latin America's most successful trading relationships with the Asian giant. While other countries in the region maintain high tariffs on Chinese goods, Chile is busy tearing down trade barriers." Also, "in contrast to countries such as Mexico, where domestic producers are clamoring for protection, Chilean manufacturers are among the strongest supporters of the free-trade deal with China." Patricia Perez, general manager of a Santiago-based medical products company and president of AsexmaChile, an exporters' trade group, said, "'We see an opportunity to find niches for our products in China … and to make Chile a platform' for Chinese manufacturing and trade with the rest of Latin America."

Book Examines Spy That Betrayed US Intelligence Secrets To Cuba. McClatchy Newspapers (10/14, Bachelet) reports that Ana Belen Montes, who was a senior Cuba analyst for the Defense Intelligence Agency, "gave Havana detailed information on U.S. eavesdropping programs aimed at the Castro government, allowing Cuba to mount effective counterintelligence and deception operations for year, according to" the book "Enemies: How America's Foes are Stealing Our Vital Secrets and How We Let it Happen" by Bill Gertz, a defense correspondent for The Washington Times. "Some U.S. officials rank the damage she did with that caused by Aldrich Ames and Robert Hanssen, the infamous CIA and FBI turncoats for Moscow whose information resulted in the deaths of dozens of U.S. agents," and "the book also says there are 'indications' that her spying may have led to the deaths of some U.S. agents in Latin America, but it provides no details." It also "paints an embarrassing picture for U.S. spy-catchers."

DOJ_NMG_0081006

Founder Of Micro-Loan Program Awarded Nobel Peace Prize. The award of the Nobel Peace Prize to Muhammad Yunus for his international micro loan program received significant media attention. NBC and CBS only briefly mentioned it, but ABC World News (10/13, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) in a full story segment contrasted his generosity with US congressional scandals reporting, "In Democracies around the world, people are elected to serve the public good. Tonight, a man who held no office, yet helped more families than most politicians ever do, was awarded the Nobel Peace Price."

The Washington Post (10/14, A1, Moore, 748K) in a front page story reports, "The Grameen Bank's pioneering use of micro-credit has been duplicated across the globe since Yunus started the project in his home village three decades ago. Loans as low as $9 have helped beggars start small businesses and poor women buy cellular phones and basket-weaving materials." The New York Times (10/14, Dugger, 1.21M) and the AP (10/14, Hossain) report similar details.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
All Eyes Are on Schools Chief as He Takes Stage
Lost in the Dust of 9/11
Trusting a Promise to Care
GOP's Sure Bets in Florida Now Appear in Question
Peace Prize Winner Sees Every Cent as a Seed
Brewer Aced His Final
Vote on N. Korea Faces Last Hurdles

New York Times:
U.S. Hits Obstacle in Getting a Vote on North Korea
Gay Marriage Losing Punch as Ballot Issue
Wall St. Woos Film Producers, Skirting Studios
Mrs. Astor's Son to Give Up Control of Her Estate
Peace Prize to Pioneer of Loans to Poor No Bank Would Touch
A Cult of Backyard Rocketeers Keeps the Solid Fuel Burning
Earnings for Insurers Are Soaring
London and Dublin Offer Northern Ireland a Compromise
Discord? Not Here, British Say After General's Iraq Comment
Congressman Pleads Guilty but Won't Resign for Now
Snowstorm Blankets Buffalo, Killing at Least 3
Small-Plane Pilots Must Ask Before Flying Up East River

Washington Post:
Dozens of Protesters Arrested On Gallaudet President's Order
New Law Cripples Internet Gambling
Micro-Credit Pioneer Wins Peace Prize
Ney Pleads Guilty to Corruption Charges
Democratic Faces That Could Launch Thousands of Votes
Iraqi Colonel Who Bridged Sectarian Divide Is Killed

Washington Times:
U.S. finding indicates nuclear test
GOP's Ney pleads guilty
Rural areas' racism may cost Steele votes
Body of missing student found in Vermont
Gallaudet rally broken up
Air America files for bankruptcy, will stay on the air
Suit over illegals OK'd for workers at Tyson Foods

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
Home Depot set to enter China market
Dacula woman hits lifetime lotto
Lakewood has been 'like family'
Conyers school, NASA partner
Settlement opens realty listings
Fulton tries to polish its image

Dallas Morning News:
Coal plant interests give Perry $132,000
Departure from Wright era begins
House fire kills boy, 5, grandmother
Girl's killer gets death penalty
Kaufman suspect charged

Houston Chronicle:
Head's 20 points lead Rockets past Hawks
Suburbs focus on crime, not nationality
Expert: Native disease killed Aztecs, still may lurk
Attorney hired by Mexico to aid Quintero's case
Hidden bag reveals big cash, bad blood
Houston meteorite hunters may join in record find
Students create mosaic of Fifth Ward history
Palmer ends 52-year golf career at Administaff
Sellers get savvy to Latino diversity

DOJ_NMG_0081007

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Nobel Peace Prize; Ney Pleads Guilty; GOP Foley Rift; North Korea Nuclear Test; British General Defends Iraq Remarks; US Iraq Casualties Mourned; Buffalo Snow; Flight Attendant Counterror Training; Air Force Memorial; Skateboarder.
CBS: US Troops Iraq Policy Shift; North Korean Nuclear Test; Korean DMZ Tensions; Guantanamo Detainees; FAA NY Flight Ban; Kolbe Page Questions; Buffalo Snow; Iraq Policy Options; Obama Energy Dependence Warning; Nobel Peace Prize; Woodpecker Research.
NBC: UK General On Iraq, Exiles From Iraq, North Korea And The UN, Buffalo Snow, Ney Plea, Kuo Book, Katherine Harris Campaign, NYC Plane Crash, Nobel Peace Prize, Bono Charity.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH – THE PRESIDENT'S SCHEDULE. Highlights: President and Mrs. Bush depart The White House en route Arlington, Virginia - The United States Air Force Memorial. President and Mrs. Bush depart arrive the United States Air Force Memorial. Makes Remarks at the United States Sir Force Memorial Dedication. The United States Air Force Memorial, Arlington, Virginia. President and Mrs. Bush depart The United States Air Force Memorial en route The White House.
President and Mrs. Bush Arrive The White House. President and Mrs. Bush depart The White House via Marine One en route Camp David. South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY -- No schedule available.

US Senate: -- No events scheduled.

US House: -- No events scheduled.

Other. ALL DAY

Other: Oct. 11 - 14. NEUROMUSCULAR MEDICINE _ The American Association of Neuromuscular and Electrodiagnostic Medicine holds its annual meeting. Location: Washington Marriott Wardman Park, 2660 Woodley Road NW. Contacts: n/a, 507-288-0100

Oct. 13 - 14. HOME REHAB _ The Rebuilding Together home rehabilitation organization holds its 18th annual conference. Highlights:
2:30 p.m. New CEO Gary Officer visits an all-day rebuilding event. 1903 Kearney St. NE. Location: Marriott-Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Hwy., Arlington, Va.
Contacts: Cindy Price, 202-483-9083

Oct. 14 - 15. GAIA THEORY _ Weekend program on ``The Gaia Theory: Model and Metaphor for the 21st Century." Location: George Mason University law school, 3301 Fairfax Dr., Arlington. Contacts: n/a, 703-528-5406 On the Net: http://www.gaiatheory.org

Oct. 14 - 23. PSYCHIATRIC SERVICES _ The American Psychiatric Association hosts its 2006 Institute on Psychiatric Services.
Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

9 a.m. POLISH/HUNGARIAN UPRISINGS _ The Cold War Museum, in conjunction with the Embassies of Hungary and Poland, will convene a gathering of diplomats, officials and historians to discuss the 1956 Polish and Hungarian uprisings against the Soviets and Communism. Highlights: 9 a.m. Welcome by Jay Rowley, Student Government President, SCSS; Dr. Richard Moniuszko, Deputy Superintendent of Schools, FCPS; Gerry Connolly, Fairfax County Board of Supervisors Chairman; and Francis Gary Powers Jr., The Cold War Museum. 9:30 a.m. Video Screening: Polish documentary on 1956 Poznan Uprising. 10 a.m. Panel 1 - The Polish Perspective: Dr. Padraic Kenney; Dr. Krzysztof Persak; Dr. Marek Chodakiewicz. Moderator: Dr. Christian Ostermann. 11:30 a.m. Video Screening: Video Interview with General Bela Kiraly. 12 p.m. Panel 2 - The Hungarian Perspective: Dr. Imre L. Toth; and Dr. Charles Gati. Moderator: Dr. Christian Ostermann. 2:15 p.m. - 3:45 p.m. Panel 3 - The International Perspective: Dr. Sergei Khrushchev, son of Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev; and David Eisenhower, grandson of President Dwight D. Eisenhower. Moderator: Dr. Christian Ostermann. 3:45 p.m. - 4 p.m. Closing Remarks by Francis Gary Powers Jr. 4 p.m. - 5 p.m. Signings of ``Failed Illusions: Moscow, Washington, Budapest, and the 1956 Hungarian Revolt' by Dr. Charles Gati. ``Lorton - Then & Now." Location: South County Secondary School, 8501 Silverbrook Road, Lorton, Va. Contacts: Francis Gary Powers Jr., 703-273-2381

11 a.m. - 3 p.m. THEODORE ROOSEVELT BIRTHDAY _ The National Parks Service celebrates President Theodore Roosevelt's 148th birthday anniversary. Activities will include ranger-led walks, birdhouse building, children's crafts, live animals and exhibits. Location: Theodore Roosevelt Island. Contacts: 703-289-2550

1:30 p.m. AIR FORCE MEMORIAL _ Dedication ceremony for the Air Force Memorial. Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, Secretary of the Air Force Michael Wynne and Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley, deliver remarks at the Air Force Memorial Dedication. Secretary of the Air Force Michael Wynne, Under Secretary of the Air Force Ronald Sega, Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley, Air Force Chief of Chaplains, Chaplain (Maj. Gen.) Charles Baldwin and Chief Master Sgt. Rodney McKinley will conduct a media availability at 11:30 a.m. after the wreath-laying at the Air Force Memorial. Secretary of the Air Force Michael Wynne, Under Secretary of the Air Force Ronald Sega, Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley and Chief Master Sgt.

DOJ_NMG_0081008

Rodney McKinley will conduct a media availability at 3 p.m. after the Air Force Memorial dedication. Location: 1 Air Force Dr., Arlington. Contacts: Richard Baker, 202-585-2084 On the Net: http://www.airforcememorial.org

6 p.m. BLACK GOLD _ Preview screening of documentary ``Black Gold,'' a documentary on Ethiopian coffee farmers. Q and A session follows the showing. Location: D.C. Convention Center. Contacts: Helen DaSilva, 617-728-2409

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, October 16, 2006 8:26 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, October 14, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061014.pdf; dojclips061014.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Government Argues To Uphold Warrantless Surveillance Program (AP)....4
Southern Command Probe Gitmo Charges (AP)....4
Red Cross To Issue Suggestions To U.S. (AP)....5
Coerced Confession Traps Detainee, Lawyers Say (WP)....6
Swiss Official Says Banks Broke Law By Supplying Data To U.S. (NYT)....7
Official: Swiss Banks Broke Privacy Law (AP-YBIZ)....8
N. Ga. Man Guilty Of Aiding Hamas (AJC)....9
Leader Of A Georgia Mosque Pleads Guilty To Aiding Hamas (NYT)....9
Imam Guilty Of Aiding Hamas (WP/AP)....10

Homeland Response:

Bush Signs Bill On Port Safety (WT)....11
Bush Signs Port Security, Internet Bill (AP-Y)....12
Bush Signs Bill To Protect Ports From Terrorism (LAT/AP)....12
Bush Signs Law On Security For US Ports, Ban On Online Gambling (AFP)....13
New Law Cripples Internet Gambling (WP)....14
Lost In The Dust Of 9/11 (LAT)....15
A Big Easy Bon Voyage (WT/AP)....18
'A Hand Up Doesn't Always Require A Handout' (WSJ)....19

War News:

British Downplay Discord After General's Remark (NYT)....20
Britain's Army Chief Clarifies Remarks On Troop Withdrawal (WP)....21
Blair Seeks To Counter General's Attack Over Iraq (FT)....22
Blair Stresses No Disagreement With Army Chief In Iraq Pull-out Row (AFP)....22
Blair's Power Sliding On Dannatt Remarks (AP)....23
Seeking Success In Iraq (NYDN)....24
Shiites Push For British Troops To Leave (AP)....26
Home Winning The Peace II (SN)....26
Army Chief Campaigns For Increased Funding (MCT)....27
The Cost Of Iraq War Is Out Of Control (SN)....29
Lack Of Confidence In Maliki Government Grows (MCT)....29
Al-Sistani's Influence Declining In Iraq (AP)....31
Official: Guard Force Is Behind Death Squads (WP)....32
Iraqi Official Deflects Criticism (LAT)....33
Iraqi Colonel Who Bridged Sectarian Divide Is Killed (WP)....34
15 Killed In Attacks Across Iraq (AP)....36
8 Females, 2 Teenagers Kidnapped In Iraq (AP)....36
SEAL Falls On Grenade To Save Comrades (AP)....37
Coroner Says U.S. Forces Unlawfully Shot Reporter (WP)....38
Coroner: U.S. Forces Killed TV Reporter (AP)....39
Pentagon Rejects Coroner's Verdict On Killing Of British Journalist (AFP)....41
U.S. Forces Blamed In Death Of British Journalist (LAT)....41
U.S. Citizen Sentenced To Death In Iraq (WP)....42
Shays: Abu Ghraib Abuses Were Sex Ring (AP)....43
In Tight Race, Republican Shays Takes A Less Measured Tone (WP)....44
A Conflict Of Images (WP)....45
Afghanistan: Suicide Bomb Kills Soldier And 7 Civilians (NYT)....47
Winds Of War (NYT)....47
Pseudo-histories Of The Iraq War (WT)....48

Criminal Law:

GOP's Ney Pleads Guilty (WT/AP)....49
Ohio Republican Pleads Guilty In Bribery Case (LAT)....51
Ney Falls Victim To Abramoff Scandal (FT)....52
Congressman Pleads Guilty But Won't Resign For Now (NYT)....52
Ney Pleads Guilty To Corruption Charges (WP)....53
No Early Foley Complaints, Head Of Pages Says (NYT)....54
Page Board Chairman Testifies In Foley Case (WT/AP)....55
Police Find No Report Of A Foley Dorm Incident (WP)....56
Kolbe Camping Trip Being Investigated (AP-Y)....57

Ex-Pages' Trip With Rep. Kolbe Examined (WP) 58
FBI Investigates Rep. Curt Weldon (MCT) 58
Rep. Weldon Probed Over Contracts For His Daughter (WP/MCT) 61
FBI Is Said To Be Probing Weldon Over His Influence (PHI) . 61
Ryan Loses Freedom Bid (CHIT) 62
Judge To Ryan: Go To Prison Jan. 4 (CHIST) 63
Judge Denies Appeal Bond, Tells Ryan He Must Go To Prison (BVND) 64
5 Years For Dixon (MCA) 65
Ex-senator Dixon Sentenced To Five Years For Bribery (KNOXNS/AP) 66
Ex-Detective Is Given 7-Year Prison Term (NYT) 67
Ex-cop Gets 7 Years In Scheme (NSDY) 68
COP'S CRYING SHAME (NYPOST) 69
I Gambled Life Away, Sez Ex-cop Who Gets 7 Years (NYDN) 69
NYC Detective In Drug Scandal Gets 7 Years (NSDY/AP) 70
Vermont Student's Body Is Found (NYT) 70
Police In Vt. Find Body Of Student (WP) 70
Worst Fears Come True In Vt. Search (BOS) 72
Autopsy Performed On Vt. College Senior (WP/AP) 73
159-Year Sentence Upheld But Called Absurd (LAT) 74
Law Enforcement Gathering To Bring Thousands To Hub (BOS) 75

Civil Law:

Activist Pursues Claim That L.A. Port Illegally Funded Maersk Facility (LAT) 76
Bankruptcy Filings Drop After Changes In Law (LAT/AP) 76
Air America, Home Of Liberal Talk, Files For Bankruptcy Protection (NYT) 78
Air America's Parent Files For Chapter 11 (WSJ) 79
Air America Files For Bankruptcy, Will Stay On The Air (WT/AP) 79

Civil Rights:

Justice Department Sues Philadelphia Over Voting Rights (AP) 80
Justice Department To Help Troubled Clarksville Police Department (AP) 80
Feds, Centier Settle Redlining Allegations (NINT) 81
Attorney General Looked To For Help (BRAH) 82
Judge Orders Jail Explanation (BSH) 82
Students Arrested In Third Day Of Protest At College For The Deaf (NYT) 83
Gallaudet Rally Broken Up (WT) 84
Gay Marriage Losing Punch As Ballot Issue (NYT) 85
Ban's Foes To Run Ad Across Va. (WP) 87

Antitrust:

AT&T-BellSouth Vote Is Delayed (AP) 87
FCC Delays Its Vote On BellSouth AT&T Discusses Protections Wanted By Consumer Groups (AJC) 88
F.C.C. Delays Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal A Second Time (NYT) 90
AT&T Makes Concessions On Merger (SAEN) 90
FCC Puts Off Vote On Deal By AT&T (CHIT) 91
Microsoft To Tweak Vista For EU Agency (AP) 92
Microsoft Makes Vista Changes (SEATIMES) 93
Microsoft Makes Changes In Windows Vista To Suit Foreign Regulators (NYT) 94
Microsoft To Ship Vista On Schedule (MERCN) 95

Environment:

Bush Signs Bill For Great Lakes Habitats (AP-Y) 96
Overcrowding, Not Race, Is US's Immigration Problem (FT) 96
Science Ignored, Again (NYT) 98

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Medical Marijuana Advocate Faces New U.S. Indictment (NYT) 98
Guilty Pleas By 2 Top Cali Cartel Figures Were 15 Years In Making (AP) 99
Guilty Plea In Colo. House Bombs Case (AP) 100

Immigration:

Suit Over Illegals OK'd For Workers At Tyson Foods (WT) ... 101

Congress-Administration:

Govt. Reports 788 Cases Of Lost Data (AP-Y) 102
Data Theft At Agencies Not As Uncommon As Hoped (LAT) 103
U.S. Careless With Citizens' Information (WASHTIMES) 104
The Identity Theft Scare (WP) 104
Outgoing Medicare Chief Cites Drug Savings (WP) 105
White House Denies Book's Allegations (AP-Y) 106
Conservatives Rally Against Bush Aide-Turned-Critic (WP) .. 107
Congressman Demands Retraction From WSJ (AP) 109
Strategist In Chief (NYT) 109

Other News:

Cheaper Gas Lifts Spending By Consumers (NYT) 110
Economy Benefits As Gas-Price Drop Spurs Outlays (WSJ) 111
Savings At Pump Fueling Shoppers (WT/AP) 112
Oil Price Drop Cheers US Consumers (FT) 113
The Deathwatch For Cheap Oil (NYT) 113
Clinton Touts Oil Tax Measure At UCLA Rally (LAT) 114
Another Record Week For The Dow (NYT/AP) 116

DOJ_NMG_0081012

Big 12000 Mark Stays Out Of Reach For Dow (WSJ).....116
GE Earnings Point To Solid Economy (WSJ).....117
General Electric (FT).....118
G.E. Reports That Earnings Rose Sharply In The Quarter (NYT).....119
Trusting A Promise To Care (LAT).....120
Newspaper Company Returns Outside Funding For Investigation (MCT).....122
Despite Woes, Bush Offers Fund-Raising As Promised (NYT).....124
Bush To Campaign For Troubled Lawmakers (AP-Y).....125
Bush Is Said To Have No Plan If GOP Loses (USNEWS).....125
Tight Races Republican Money Can't Stave Off New Peril In Senate (WSJ).....126
Incumbents Hold Cash Advantages (AP-Y).....129
Kerry Says GOP Lied About Foley, Iraq (AP).....129
Webb Has Profitable Quarter, But Allen Still Leads (WP).....130
Allen's Ads Put Webb On Defense (WT).....131
Kean Campaign Shows Improvement In Its Fund-Raising Efforts (NYT).....132
Steele Hits Cardin For Linking Him To Bush, GOP (WT).....133
Opposition To Abortion Won't Affect Job, Steele Says (WP).134
Rural Areas' Racism May Cost Steele Votes (WT).....134
To Invade GOP Strongholds, Tap Bay Area (LAT).....136
3 Southland Congressional Seats Safe, Despite Ethics Issues (LAT).....138
Fla. Dems Attack Election Day Notices (AP-Y).....139
GOP's Sure Bets In Florida Now Appear In Question (LAT).139
Battle Lines Drawn Along Mexico Border (FT).....141
Wolf Vs. Feder Becomes Race To Watch (WP).....142
Mr. Wolf 'S Diligence (WP).....144
Democratic Faces That Could Launch Thousands Of Votes (WP).....144
Politicians Try Out MySpace (WSJ).....146
It's Ehrlich Vs. O'Malley, Bouts I And II (WP).....148
Is Chivalry Shivved? (NYT).....149
U.S. Hits Obstacle In Getting A Vote On North Korea (NYT) 150
Russia, China Resist U.N. Vote On N. Korea (WP).....152
The Search For Pyongyang's Pressure Point (FT).....153
Vote On N. Korea Faces Last Hurdles (LAT).....154
U.S. Finding Indicates Nuclear Test (WT).....155
U.S., Japan Seek N. Korea Sanctions Vote (AP).....157
UN Sets Vote On North Korea As Russia Seeks Changes (Update8) (BLOOM).....159
Preliminary Samples Hint At North Korean Nuclear Test (NYT).....160
U.S. Detects Signs Of Radiation Consistent With Test (WP) 161
U.S.: Test Points To N. Korea Nuke Blast (AP-Y).....162
North Korea Spawns New Fears As Member Of Nuclear Club (MCT).....164
North Korea: Joining The Nuclear Club? (WSJ).....166
Embargo Halts Families' Care Packages From Japan To North Korea (MCT).....167
Behind Enemy Reactors (NYT).....167
The Arms-Control Illusion (WSJ).....168
Let Them Go (WSJ).....169
Making An Atomic Bomb Requires Skill, Guts (MCT).....170
Diplomacy How Bush Aims To Lasso U.N. Sanctions (WSJ)172
A Feared Force Roils Business In Iran (WSJ).....172
Norway's Statoil Is Fined By SEC Over Iran Affair (WSJ).....176
South Korean Is Appointed Secretary General Of U.N. (NYT)177
South Korean Approved As U.N. Secretary General (WP).....178
Ban Named Next U.N. Secretary-general (AP).....178
Seismic Task For Korean Assuming U.N. Mantle (NYT).....180
5 Die As Palestinians Clash With Israelis And Each Other (NYT).....181
9 Slain As Gaza Clashes Continue (LAT).....182
Bush Strengthens Sanctions On Sudan (AP-Y).....183
'Perfect Storm' Brewing In Georgia (WT).....183
London And Dublin Offer Northern Ireland A Compromise (NYT).....184
Deal Would Revive N. Ireland Assembly (WP).....186
Renewed Optimism Over N Ireland Deal (FT).....186
N. Ireland Talks Yield Progress (LAT).....187
Chile Holds Own In Global Market (LAT).....188
Book Outlines How Spy Exposed U.S. Intelligence Secrets To Cuba (MCT).....190
Micro-Credit Pioneer Wins Peace Prize (WP).....191
Peace Prize To Pioneer Of Loans To Poor No Bank Would Touch (NYT).....193
Economist, Bank Win Nobel Peace Prize (AP).....195

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ_NMG_0081013

Government Argues To Uphold Warrantless Surveillance Program (AP)

By Jim Irwin, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

DETROIT -- The Justice Department on Friday asked a federal appeals court to throw out a lower court decision that said the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program is unconstitutional.

The president has said the program is needed in the war on terrorism. U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit agreed with the program's opponents when she ruled Aug. 17 that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers.

Government lawyers said in pleadings filed Friday with the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the surveillance program "is necessary to protect the nation from an ongoing national security threat of the highest order and is vital to waging and winning the ongoing armed conflict."

Taylor's injunction "dismantles a vital tool that already has helped detect and disrupt al-Qaida plots," the Justice Department attorneys argued. They also said Taylor's order barring use of the program "in any way" showed the judge dealt with sensitive national security issues in a "blunderbuss manner."

A three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based appeals court ruled Oct. 4 that the administration could keep the program in place while it appeals Taylor's decision. The judges said their ruling considered the likelihood an appeal would succeed, the potential damage to both sides, and the public interest.

The appeal is likely to take months.

Taylor's ruling came in a lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union seeking to block the program. Kary Moss, executive director of the ACLU's Michigan chapter, said Friday that the government's arguments buttressed "a very dramatic power grab" by the Bush administration.

"There's an awful lot of hyperbole in there, and fear mongering -- suggesting we're at war when Congress has declared no war," Moss said in a telephone interview. "They want to act as a kingdom. But we live in a democracy."

The surveillance program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links. A secret court has been set up to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the government says it can't always wait for a court to act.

The ACLU sued the National Security Agency in January on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who claim the program has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets.

Similar lawsuits challenging the program have been filed by other groups, including in New York and San Francisco. The issue could wind up before the U.S. Supreme Court.

On the Net:

6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals: http://www.ca6.uscourts.gov

Taylor's ruling: http://www.mied.uscourts.gov/eGov/taylorpdf/06%2010204.pdf

ACLU information on the case: http://www.aclu.org/nsaspying

National Security Agency: http://www.nsa.gov

Southern Command Probe Gitmo Charges (AP)

By Andrew O. Selsky, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The U.S. Southern Command on Friday launched an investigation into "credible allegations" that guards at Guantanamo Bay abused detainees, and appointed an Army colonel to head the probe.

The Pentagon's Inspector General's office told The Associated Press on Friday that it had ordered the Miami-based Southern Command to investigate after Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, who represents a detainee at the U.S. naval base in eastern Cuba, filed the "hotline" complaint last week.

DOJ_NMG_0081014

Vokey attached a sworn statement from his paralegal, Sgt. Heather Cerveny, 23, in which she said several guards in a bar at Guantanamo Bay bragged about beating detainees and described it as common practice.

"Other ones of them were talking about how when they get annoyed with the detainees, about how they hit them, or they punched them in the face," Cerveny said during a telephone interview Thursday night. "It was a general consensus that I (detected) that as a group this is something they did. That this was OK at Guantanamo, that this is how the detainees get treated."

Cerveny visited the U.S. Naval Base in Cuba last month and said she spent an hour with the guards at the military club. The guards quit discussing beating detainees after finding out she works for a detainee's legal team.

In her complaint, she wrote: "From the whole conversation, I understood that striking detainees was a common practice. ... Everyone in the group laughed at the others' stories of beating detainees."

Asked Thursday if the conversation could have been exaggerated bar talk, she said, "I don't think that they were trying to impress me in any way. They were already in a discussion in there when I walked into a group."

She said she filed the complaint because "I don't think it's right for us to be allowing these prisoners to be treated poorly ... I think we should hold ourselves to a higher standard."

Gary Comerford, spokesman for the Pentagon's Inspector General's office, told the AP that in the past two days, the case "has been referred to Southcom for action. They're going to have to look into this."

Gen. John Craddock, the commander of the Southern Command, said later Friday that he had ordered the investigation, headed by an Army colonel, to begin.

"The investigation is consistent with U.S. Southern Command's policy to investigate credible allegations of abuse" at Guantanamo detention facilities, the Southern Command said in a statement.

The military Joint Task Force that runs the detention camps in Guantanamo Bay pledged to work with investigators from the Southern Command, which oversees U.S. military operations in the Caribbean and Latin America.

"The Joint Task Force will cooperate fully with Southcom to learn the facts of the matter and will take action where misconduct is discovered," said Navy Cmdr. Rob Durand, spokesman for the detention center, in an e-mail to the AP from the base.

He insisted that his group's mission "is the safe and humane care and custody of detained enemy combatants. Abuse or harassment of detainees in any form is not condoned or tolerated."

The Inspector General receives 14,000 tips on misconduct each year via the hotline, and opens 3,000 cases each year as a result, Comerford said.

There are now 454 detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to Vincent Lusser, a spokesman for the Geneva-based International Committee of the Red Cross.

The Red Cross just completed a two-week visit to the prison, meeting the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks and 13 other high-profile detainees who were transferred there weeks ago from CIA custody.

Guantanamo Bay began receiving prisoners, most of them captured in Afghanistan and Pakistan, in January 2002. Only 10 of the detainees have been charged with crimes.

___

Associated Press Writer Thomas Watkins in San Diego contributed to this report.

Red Cross To Issue Suggestions To U.S. (AP)

By Andrew O. Selsky, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

The Red Cross will make confidential recommendations to the U.S. government after meeting at Guantanamo Bay with 14 new detainees, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, a spokesman for the humanitarian organization said.

The encounters apparently mark the first time the 14 detainees have spoken with anyone other than their captors since they were arrested. They had been held in CIA custody at secret locations, and were transferred weeks ago to the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeastern Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0081015

The men include Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who allegedly planned the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States, as well as the alleged architect of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole and the alleged plotter of the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

President Bush announced Sept. 6 that the 14 men had been moved from CIA custody to Guantanamo Bay for trial and that "there are now no terrorists in the CIA program."

The Red Cross would be concerned if the secret CIA prisons were to resume operation, Vincent Lusser, a spokesman for the International Committee of the Red Cross, told reporters in Geneva on Friday.

The Red Cross had been trying to obtain access to U.S. detainees in secret locations for a long time under the Geneva Conventions, Lusser said.

Red Cross officials, who are supposed to have access to all prisoners of war, said they were aware of the arrests of some detainees but were unable to find them in the U.S. detention facilities they visited. Until the 14 high-profile detainees were recently transferred to Guantanamo Bay, their whereabouts were unknown. The locations of the CIA prisons are secret.

Bush has left open the possibility of future secret detentions, saying that "having a CIA program for questioning terrorists will continue to be crucial to getting lifesaving information."

Simon Schorno, a Washington spokesman for the Red Cross, said the group would make recommendations to the U.S. government after visiting the 14 new "high-value" detainees at Guantanamo Bay this week. He gave no time frame, but stressed the recommendations would be confidential.

He said Red Cross officials met with all 14 of the new detainees, and gave each a standard one-page form to write letters to their family members, which — after going through U.S. military censorship — would be delivered by the Red Cross.

"We were able to speak to them privately," Schorno told The Associated Press in a telephone interview late Thursday.

"The detainee is not forced to speak to us," he added. "It is up to the detainee to raise any issues that fall within our concern, for example past detentions and current conditions. It's up to the detainee to address whatever he wants to address."

The Pentagon has confirmed that the Red Cross arrived at Guantanamo Bay on Sept. 25 and met the 14 newest detainees this week.

Mohammed was believed to be the No. 3 al-Qaida leader before he was captured in Pakistan in 2003. Also among the 14 new detainees are Ramzi Binalshibh, who is accused of helping plan the Sept. 11 attacks and being a lead operative for a foiled plot to crash aircraft into London's Heathrow Airport, and Abu Zubaydah, who was believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaida cells before he was captured in Pakistan in 2002.

Lusser said there were now 454 detainees at Guantanamo and the Red Cross has private access to all of them. He said Red Cross workers in Afghanistan have visited the 600-odd detainees at the U.S. military prison at Bagram air base.

___

Associated Press writer Alexander G. Higgins in Geneva contributed to this report.

Coerced Confession Traps Detainee, Lawyers Say (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Former Prisoner of Taliban Held at Guantanamo

Young runaway Abdul Rahim endured cigarette burns, electric shocks and repeated beatings at the hands of Taliban soldiers who captured him in 2000, he said -- all because he refused to fight for al-Qaeda.

In one of the bizarre twists of war, the 22-year-old college student was taken from the Taliban prison to another prison run by Americans after the invasion of Afghanistan. And the U.S. military's chief reason for holding Rahim for the past five years, according to newly declassified records, is the false confession Rahim gave to placate his Taliban torturers.

Rahim's American lawyers filed the records in federal court in Washington this week, along with the results of their own investigation corroborating Rahim's claims of innocence, adding sworn statements from witnesses. They are asking a judge to order the military to admit that it made a mistake and release Rahim, who is being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0081016

The filings outline a chain of unfortunate circumstances. Rahim left his family home in the United Arab Emirates after a quarrel with his strict father and was captured by Taliban fighters as he crossed into Afghanistan. They took him to an al-Qaeda training camp, and when he tried to flee, soldiers put him in prison and tortured him, the records say.

While in a cell in Kandahar, Rahim said, he gave his captors what they wanted to hear: He falsely confessed on videotape that he was a spy for the United States and promised to renounce the West and wage jihad. Among the people who tortured him, he said, was one of America's most notorious enemies: al-Qaeda operative Muhammad Atef, who was killed in 2001.

Rahim's account of being imprisoned and tortured by the Taliban is supported by newspaper accounts about Rahim and fellow prisoners whom the Taliban abandoned when U.S. forces began bombing Afghanistan in the fall of 2001. It is also supported by documents from impartial agencies that had contact with Rahim, notably the International Committee of the Red Cross.

Navy Lt. Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, a Defense Department spokesman, said in a statement yesterday that he could not comment on the specifics of Rahim's case, but he said detainees have several opportunities for review of their detention by military panels.

"There is a significant amount of evidence, both unclassified and classified, which supports detention by U.S. forces," he said. "This evidence has been carefully weighed at the Combatant Status Review Tribunals (CSRT) and Administrative Review Boards (ARB) held over the past two years at Guantanamo."

The U.S. military is detaining 440 foreign nationals at Guantanamo, and most have been there for more than 4 1/2 years.

The investigation and new records describe Rahim as a pawn trapped unfairly on both sides of the war on terrorism -- first in the Taliban's prison in Kandahar and then at Guantanamo. Given that much of the gathered information suggesting Rahim's innocence was available in 2001, his lawyers say the case raises alarms about the U.S. military's willingness to fairly assess decisions to indefinitely detain foreign nationals.

"They accused me of being a spy. And here, you guys accuse me of being al-Qaeda. No mercy. Who am I?" Rahim told a U.S. military tribunal, according to transcripts. "You take me from that prison and nothing changed in my life."

According to court records, in December 2001, a New York Times reporter quoted Rahim and other prisoners left behind when the Taliban fled the prison. He described being desperate to recover from his torture and to find a way back to his family.

"We just need the Red Cross or the United Nations to come take us out of here," he was quoted as saying.

But Rahim and a Russian prisoner, who has since been released from Guantanamo, attest that U.S. troops arrived instead. At first, they told Rahim and his companions that they needed to remain in U.S. custody in case they had useful information about their former captors. Rahim told the soldiers about being forced to confess on a Taliban videotape that was broadcast in his home country and being worried about how he would be received there. A few days later, after finding the Taliban videotape of Rahim's confession, the detainee and his attorneys assert, the soldiers began to treat Rahim very badly, interrogating him about his interest in suicide missions and eventually taking him to Guantanamo.

"By me telling them about the video it created confusion to the point that the Americans believed I was working with al-Qaeda," Rahim told a military review panel last year, according to transcripts. "I swear I am not al-Qaeda. . . . Please be just and fair. . . . Look into this."

Rahim's attorneys, who work in the federal public defender's office in Oregon, said they traveled to Afghanistan in their investigation of Rahim's case. The key facts were not difficult to gather, they said.

"All you have to do is find public news articles and find out this guy was imprisoned by the Taliban," said Steve Sady, one of the lawyers.

In court filings, the attorneys argue that there is no legal justification for the Bush administration to detain someone who never took up arms against the United States and was simply in Afghanistan without a passport.

"No conceivable definition of enemy combatant would include a freed political prisoner who had been subjected to brutal torture and confinement by the enemy prior to the declaration of war," the lawyers wrote in their court filing.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Swiss Official Says Banks Broke Law By Supplying Data To U.S. (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky And Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 13 — Swiss banks broke their nation's laws by providing banking information to American counterterrorism officials, Switzerland's top data-protection official said Friday.

The banks, known for safeguarding privacy, should have informed customers using the Swift money-transfer service that their data could be passed on to third parties, the Swiss official, Hanspeter Thür, said in Bern, according to The Associated Press.

Just the possibility of the data being leaked should have been grounds enough to warn customers, he said. His statement was at odds with the views of the Swiss finance minister, Hans-Rudolf Merz, who said last month that giving the Central Intelligence Agency such access did not infringe on the country's banking secrecy rules.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Swift provided records on millions of international banking transactions to the American government in response to subpoenas from the Treasury Department. Swift — formally the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication — operates a secure electronic-messaging service used by some 7,800 financial institutions to make international money transfers worth $6 trillion a day.

Analysts at the C.I.A. have used the records to conduct tens of thousands of individual examinations of banking records in search of evidence and patterns of possible terrorist financing. A prime focus of the effort has been on international transactions coming into and out of the United States.

Swift and American officials have defended the operation as a vital and lawful effort to cut off money to terrorists, but it has come under sharp international criticism.

Mr. Thür said the issue was whether information could be given to countries whose data protection laws are less stringent than Switzerland's.

He urged that a solution be negotiated by which United States laws and European data-protection rules are standardized. Some European officials want the appointment of an independent, European-based auditor to guard against abuses, in place of a Washington consulting firm that now has that role.

Switzerland is not a member of the European Union, which separately has lashed out at Swift. European Union legislators criticized the consortium in early October; at the same time, one of Swift's supervisors, the European Central Bank, acknowledged that it had known for years that the consortium was giving confidential banking records to the United States authorities.

Earlier, the privacy commission for Belgium, where Swift is based, accused the consortium of flouting European rules. "It has to be seen as a gross miscalculation by Swift that it has, for years, secretly and systematically transferred massive amounts of personal data for surveillance without effective and clear legal basis and independent controls in line with Belgian and European law," the report said.

Official: Swiss Banks Broke Privacy Law (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 14, 2006

Swiss Banks Broke Law by Passing Banking Data to CIA, Data Protection Chief Says

BERN, Switzerland (AP) -- Swiss banks violated the law by passing banking information on to the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, the country's top data protection official said Friday.

The banks, usually known for safeguarding the privacy of their clients, should have informed customers making international money transfers via the Belgium-based SWIFT money-transfer service that their data could be passed on to third parties, Hanspeter Thuer said.

Just the possibility of the data being leaked should have been grounds enough to warn customers, he said.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, SWIFT largely complied with U.S. requests for banking information in its anti-terror investigations.

SWIFT, or the Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, operates a secure electronic messaging service used by some 7,800 financial institutions to make international money transfers worth $6 trillion a day.

DOJ_NMG_0081018

Thuer said the issue was whether information could be passed on to states whose data protection laws are not as stringent as those in Switzerland.

Referring to a report by a Belgian privacy commission, Thuer urged that a solution be negotiated by which U.S. laws and European data protection rules are standardized.

Last month, Switzerland Finance Minister Hans-Rudolf Merz said giving the CIA access to the SWIFT information did not infringe Swiss sovereignty or the country's banking secrecy rules.

N. Ga. Man Guilty Of Aiding Hamas (AJC)

By Bill Rankin, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 14, 2006

The prayer leader of a North Georgia mosque has pleaded guilty to federal charges of providing material support to the Islamic militant group Hamas.

Mohamed Shorbagi, 42, who lived near Rome, entered his guilty plea on Aug. 28, federal authorities said Friday. Shorbagi's court documents were unsealed in U.S. District Court in Atlanta Friday morning.

"This case illustrates that people who illegally support foreign terrorist organizations may be found anywhere in the United States, even in quiet and pleasant places like Rome," U.S. Attorney David Nahmias said in a prepared statement. "We will use every lawful tool to ferret out terrorism and those who provide material support to it, regardless of where they live or how they try to hide their criminal activities."

Said FBI Special Agent in Charge Gregory Jones, "It is very disturbing to see people in the United States who are so willing to offer their assistance to known terrorist organizations, and this case should remind us all of the continued need to be vigilant."

In 1997, the United States formally designated Hamas as a foreign terrorist organization. Hamas' ideology calls for the destruction of Israel.

Up until December 2001, Shorbagi provided financial support to Hamas and conspired with others, whose names were not disclosed, to provide material support to the militant group, Nahmias said. He provided the support through donations to the "Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development," knowing that some or all of the money was destined for Hamas, Nahmias said.

Shorbagi was a Georgia representative for the Holy Land Foundation and attended foundation meetings at which high-level Hamas officials made presentations condemning Israel, Nahmias said. Shorgagi also hosted Hamas officials at a mosque in Rome where he was Imam, or prayer leader, he added.

Nahmias would not say how much money Shorbagi contributed to the Holy Land Foundation, saying only that it "was not a large amount of money."

"It goes to emphasize the point that you can not provide any money to a designated foreign terrorist organization or you're looking at 15 years in federal prison," Nahmias said.

Shorbagi's plea agreement states he is to be sentenced to 15 years in prison, the maximum allowed under federal sentencing guidelines.

The agreement also states that if Shorbagi provides "substantial assistance" to the government's ongoing investigation, "the government will consider whether to file a motion for reduction of sentence."

"This is part of an overall investigation. We're continue to investigate every angle and rely on Mr. Shorbagi's cooperation in that respect," Nahmias said.

Shorbagi agreed to pay full restitution to the victims of the "fraud crimes" he committed -- and which the government agreed not to charge him with, federal authorities said. Details of those fraud crimes were not released Friday.

Nahmias said that Shorbagi, who was born in Israel and is a citizen of the Palestinian territory of Gaza, is a lawful permanent resident of the United States. He is in federal protective custody in an undisclosed location, Nahmias said.

Sentencing for Shorbagi is scheduled for Nov. 3, before U.S. District Judge Harold L. Murphy in Rome.

Staff writer Mike Morris contributed to this article.

Leader Of A Georgia Mosque Pleads Guilty To Aiding Hamas (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

ATLANTA, Oct. 13 — In a case kept secret for nearly two months, the religious leader of a mosque in Rome, Ga., has pleaded guilty to providing financial support to the militant Palestinian organization Hamas, federal prosecutors said Friday.

The government said the 42-year-old defendant, Mohamed Shorbagi, a citizen of the Palestinian territories who is living legally in the United States with his wife and young children, was charged on Aug. 28 with providing aid to Hamas through donations he made to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an Islamic charity shut down by federal authorities in 2001.

Mr. Shorbagi was also a Georgia representative for the Holy Land Foundation and attended meetings that were addressed by "high level" Hamas officials, said David E. Nahmias, the United States attorney for the Northern District of Georgia.

Mr. Nahmias hinted that there could be more legal action to follow, saying the charges and the plea agreement involving Mr. Shorbagi were being unsealed now "because we expected it to be made public in the near future in another forum as part of Mr. Shorbagi's cooperation."

Support for Hamas is illegal, because the government deems it a foreign terrorist organization. Prosecutors said Mr. Shorbagi provided financial help to the group from 1997 until the Holy Land Foundation was shut down five years ago. In pleading guilty to material support of terrorism, he agreed to serve a maximum prison term of 15 years and pay restitution of at least $240,000 to unidentified victims of that support.

Still, the plea agreement provides that if he cooperates "truthfully and completely," as is expected, the government may recommend a lesser sentence.

Michael J. Trost, an Atlanta lawyer representing Mr. Shorbagi, declined to characterize the government's case, but did say "mitigating factors" would become public at sentencing.

President Bush ordered the Holy Land Foundation closed in December 2001, saying that by raising money in the United States and funneling it to Hamas, the group "pays for murder abroad."

Seven former board members and fund-raisers for Holy Land, six of whom are American citizens, have previously been charged with conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists because they gave money to charities believed run by Hamas and to the orphans and families of "martyrs" killed in the Palestinian conflict.

There has been little public examination of the evidence against the defendants, however, and the government's efforts have been criticized because of their high level of secrecy.

"The facts of these cases are never actually released," said Rabiah Ahmed, a spokeswoman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, based in Washington. "There's no public scrutiny except what the government chooses to release. The perception is that they're being heavy-handed and the Muslim community is being unfairly targeted."

John W. Boyd, a partner in an Albuquerque law firm that has represented the Holy Land Foundation, said he was not familiar with the particulars of the case against Mr. Shorbagi and so could not comment on its merits. But he did say he was dismayed to hear that a donor to Holy Land had been charged, since, he said, that was likely to discourage people from giving to Palestinian relief organizations.

"It certainly is going to have that effect if there's any aroma that donors are being targeted," Mr. Boyd said. "If they're now going to make it so that Islamic charities can't function at all, that's pretty dire."

Imam Guilty Of Aiding Hamas (WP/AP)

By Greg Bluestein

The Washington Post/AP, October 14, 2006

Under Plea Deal, Georgia Cleric Could Get 15 Years

ATLANTA, Oct. 13 -- The imam of a northern Georgia mosque pleaded guilty to providing material support to the militant group Hamas in a case in which the agreement, charges and even the plea hearing were handled in secret.

The U.S. attorney's office said Friday that the charges and plea agreement involving Mohamed Shorbagi were filed Aug. 28 in federal court in Rome, Ga., a division of Atlanta's federal court, but were sealed until Friday.

Shorbagi, 42, agreed to a maximum of 15 years in prison, prosecutors said. His sentencing hearing is scheduled for Nov. 3.

DOJ_NMG_0081020

According to prosecutors, between 1997 and 2001, Shorbagi provided financial support to Hamas, a group designated by the United States as a foreign terrorist organization. He also was accused of conspiring with unnamed others to provide material support to Hamas.

The donations were passed through the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, prosecutors said.

"It was not for a large amount of money," U.S. Attorney David Nahmias said. "But that goes to show you it doesn't take a large amount of money to get 15 years in prison."

He said the prison time could be reduced if Shorbagi cooperates, which he is expected to do. The prosecutor's office said the sentencing is likely to take place in Rome.

Nahmias's office said Shorbagi was a Georgia representative of the Holy Land Foundation and knew money provided to the foundation was actually funneled to Hamas.

He had attended Holy Land Foundation meetings at which high-level Hamas officials made presentations condemning Israel, and had hosted high-level Hamas officials at the Rome mosque where he served as imam, prosecutors said.

Shorbagi's attorney, Michael Trost, did not immediately return a call seeking comment Friday.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Signs Bill On Port Safety (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

President Bush yesterday signed a law to protect U.S. ports from terrorists smuggling weapons into the United States hidden within the 11 million containers that enter the country each year.

"With the bill I sign today, we renew a clear commitment: We will work tirelessly to keep our nation safe and our ports open for business," the president said in a signing ceremony at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building.

The Security and Accountability For Every Port Act of 2006 (SAFE) includes an amendment that bans Internet gamblers from using credit cards, checks and electronic funds, drawing protests from a group representing the gambling industry.

The SAFE act authorizes $3.4 billion over five years for safety measures, including the installation of radiation detectors at the 22 largest U.S. ports by the end of next year. More inspectors will be hired to increase the number of random searches of containers.

"The SAFE Port Act will make this nation more prepared, more prosperous and more secure," Mr. Bush said. "We're going to protect our ports. We're going to defend this homeland. And we're going to win the war on terror.¶

Congress approved the bill two weeks ago before lawmakers left to campaign for the Nov. 7 midterm elections in which national security, the war in Iraq and terrorism are major issues. Democrats favored the bill, but said it failed to address rail and mass transit, other areas considered highly vulnerable to terrorists.

Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts Democrat, called the new law a "sham port bill" and complained it did not go far enough by authorizing only a pilot program to study scanning of cargo containers headed for the United States from three ports.

"Even though the technology exists today to scan 100 percent of U.S.-bound cargo at all ports to make sure it doesn't contain nuclear bombs, this bill doesn't require that to occur," Mr. Markey said.

But Mr. Bush said the bill codifies the Container Security Initiative, which deploys U.S. inspectors to dozens of foreign ports on five continents, where they can screen cargo bound for the United States. He said it also codifies the Customs Trade Partnership Against Terrorism, a joint public-private sector initiative in which private shippers agree to improve their own security measures in exchange for benefits, including expedited clearance through U.S. ports.

The bill was approved on a 409-2 vote in the House, and by a voice vote in the Senate.

The decision by the Republican majority to lump the Internet gambling ban onto the bipartisan ports bill had drawn scathing criticism from some Democrats.

"Today is a dark day for the great American game of poker," said Michael Bolcerek, president of the Poker Players Alliance, a grass-roots advocacy organization of more than 110,000 poker enthusiasts.

DOJ_NMG_0081021

"Twenty-three million Americans who play the game online will effectively be denied the ability to enjoy this popular form of entertainment, even in the privacy of their own homes," he said.

• This article is based in part on wire service reports.

Bush Signs Port Security, Internet Bill (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

President Bush signed a bill Friday to help prevent terrorists from sneaking a nuclear, chemical or germ weapon into the United States inside one of the 11 million shipping containers that enter the nation each year — many without inspection.

"We're going to protect our ports. We're going to defend this homeland, and we're going to win this war on terror," Bush said.

The president used the bill-signing ceremony to assert that Republicans are tough on terror, a key issue in congressional elections just less than four weeks away.

He didn't mention an unrelated provision that seeks to put teeth into laws that forbid most online gambling. Instead, Bush focused on the multiple ways the legislation tightens security and closes a loophole in anti-terror defenses, especially at ports.

He noted that the SAFE Port Act authorizes the development of high-tech inspection equipment so customs agents can check cargo containers for dangerous materials without having to open them. It requires radiation-detection technology at 22 of the nation's busiest ports by the end of next year.

"We'll do everything we can to prevent an attack, but if the terrorists succeed in launching an attack, we'll be ready to respond," Bush said.

The president said the bill codifies the Container Security Initiative, which deploys U.S. inspectors to dozens of foreign ports on five continents where they can screen cargo bound for the United States. He said it also codifies the Customs Trade Partnership Against Terrorism, a joint public-private sector initiative in which private shippers agree to improve their own security measures and in return can receive benefits, including expedited clearance through U.S. ports.

Bush also noted that the bill provides additional authority for the Domestic Nuclear Detection Office, which was established to guard against the threat of terrorists smuggling a nuclear device into the country. And the act requires the Department of Homeland Security to establish a plan to speed the resumption of trade in the event of a terrorist attack on a U.S. port or waterway.

"This bill makes clear that the federal government has the authority to clear waterways, identify cleanup equipment and re-establish the flow of commerce following a terrorist attack," the president said.

Bush Signs Bill To Protect Ports From Terrorism (LAT/AP)

From Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

Unrelated provision seeks to put teeth into online gambling laws.

WASHINGTON — President Bush signed a law today to deter terrorists from smuggling weapons into the United States inside the 11 million shipping containers that enter the country from foreign ports each year.

An unrelated provision of the bill also seeks to put teeth into laws that forbid most online gambling. It prohibits Internet gamblers from using credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers to settle their wagers.

At the signing ceremony, Bush spoke only about sections of the SAFE Port Act that tighten security and close a loophole in anti-terror defenses, especially at ports.

"Our seaports are a gateway to commerce, a source of opportunity, and a provider of jobs," Bush said. "Our ports could also be a target of a terrorist attack, and we're determined to protect them."

Congress approved the bill two weeks ago before lawmakers left to campaign for the Nov. 7 midterm elections in which national security, the war in Iraq and terrorism are major issues. Democrats favored the bill, but said it failed to address rail and mass transit, other areas considered highly vulnerable to terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0081022

Bush was accompanied at the bill-signing ceremony by one Democrat, Sen. Patty Murray of Washington, alongside a slew of Republican lawmakers. For weeks the president has insisted that Republicans are tough on terror and that Democrats would make the country weaker.

He said the new law authorizes the development of high-tech inspection equipment so customs agents can check cargo containers for dangerous materials without having to open them. It requires radiation-detection technology at 22 of the nation's busiest ports by the end of next year.

"We'll do everything we can to prevent an attack, but if the terrorists succeed in launching an attack, we'll be ready to respond," Bush said.

He said the bill codifies the Container Security Initiative, which deploys U.S. inspectors to dozens of foreign ports on five continents where they can screen cargo bound for the United States. He said it also codifies the Customs Trade Partnership Against Terrorism, a joint public-private sector initiative in which private shippers agree to improve their own security measures in exchange for benefits, including expedited clearance through U.S. ports.

Bush said the bill provides more authority for the Domestic Nuclear Detection Office, which was established to guard against the threat of terrorists smuggling a nuclear device into the country. And the act requires the Department of Homeland Security to establish a plan to speed the resumption of trade in the event of a terrorist attack on a U.S. port or waterway.

"This bill makes clear that the federal government has the authority to clear waterways, identify cleanup equipment and re-establish the flow of commerce following a terrorist attack," the president said.

The bill was approved on a 409-2 vote in the House, and by a voice vote in the Senate.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, called the bill landmark legislation that will help close "a dangerous gap in our homeland security."

Murray said that for the first time in many years, she will sleep well, knowing that ports in Seattle and other cities will be safer. Murray, who has been working on the bill for more than five years, said it was gratifying to see the president sign a bipartisan bill "in an extremely political month," with midterm elections a few weeks away.

Bush Signs Law On Security For US Ports, Ban On Online Gambling (AFP)

AFP, October 14, 2006

President George W. Bush signed a law designed to bolster security at US ports and prevent terrorists from smuggling in nuclear weapons.

The law also included an unrelated provision inserted by lawmakers in Congress to severely restrict Internet gambling, prompting gaming companies abroad to close down their US operations.

Hoping to retain control of Congress in legislative elections on November 7, lawmakers in Bush's Republican party adopted the measure two weeks ago to persuade voters that they are better able to prevent another terrorist attack.

The Republicans rode the security issue to electoral victory in 2002 and 2004. But the same strategy may falter this year amid growing public anxiety about the war in Iraq and the economy.

Bush, who has portrayed the opposition Democrats as failing to grasp the nature of the terrorist threat after the attacks of September 11, 2001, used the signing ceremony as an opportunity to hammer home his campaign message on security.

"We're going to protect our ports. We're going to defend this homeland, and we're going to win this war on terror," said Bush, surrounded by Republican lawmakers.

Entitled the "Security and Accountability For Every (SAFE) Port Act of 2006," the law provides 3.4 billion dollars over five years to strengthen security at ports and requires radiation detection technology to be installed in 22 of the country's largest ports by the end of 2007.

The measure calls for bolstering inspections on some 11 million containers that transit American ports every year, deploying inspectors to foreign ports to check cargo headed to US ports, and speeding up paperwork from private shipowners.

The opposition Democrats mostly supported the law, but said the Bush administration has neglected other vulnerable sectors such as rail and mass transit.

DOJ_NMG_0081023

Congress took the gaming industry by surprise in approving restrictions on online gambling. The law prohibits US banks and credit card companies from processing online bets.

Republicans backing the provision said it was designed to protect youngsters from the financial and moral damage of online gambling, but opponents said it could prove extremely difficult to enforce.

Critics also said that gambling businesses that cater to horse-racing and state lotteries, which enjoy powerful political patronage, were exempted from the law.

New Law Cripples Internet Gambling (WP)

By Frank Ahrens, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Banks Are Barred From Handling Transactions

Placing bets over the Internet was effectively criminalized by the federal government yesterday, as lawmakers work to eliminate an activity enjoyed by as many as 23 million Americans who wagered an estimated $6 billion last year.

Attached to a port-security bill signed by President Bush yesterday was the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, which prohibits online gamblers from using credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers to place and settle bets. The law puts enforcement on the shoulders of banks and other U.S. financial institutions, some of which fought the legislation.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte (R-Va.), said he opposes all gambling, citing its "ill effects on society," but particularly Internet gambling, which led him to draft the legislation in the summer. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) attached Goodlatte's bill to the port-security measure to ensure its passage and Bush's signature.

While proponents decried the effects of gambling on society, opponents pointed to the enormous popularity of Internet gambling and compared the new law to the Prohibition amendment of 1919, which led to the rise of illegal speak-easies and organized crime.

"We're going to have Prohibition, and what happened then?" said champion poker player Annie Duke, a former University of Pennsylvania doctoral candidate who began playing professionally in 1994. "We had people running around with tommy guns and drinking moonshine because they weren't given a safe product."

The new law is potentially crippling to a worldwide industry whose biggest customer has been the United States. Already, several online wagering businesses have pulled their operations out of the United States and some have collapsed, including publicly traded companies in Britain, where online betting is legal and regulated. International online gambling businesses have been watching closely as U.S. regulatory and law enforcement officials stepped up their campaign against online wagering in recent months.

Gambling, along with pornography, was one of the earliest businesses on the Internet, and one of the few profitable ones. The first Internet gambling site appeared in 1995, according to the American Gaming Association, the trade group of big casinos. Over the past decade, online gambling has caught fire, especially among men in their 20s, and crossed into the mainstream to include poker and fantasy sports leagues.

Nevertheless, online gambling has been a legally gray area, equally populated by legitimate, publicly traded overseas corporations and fly-by-night predators who, like music pirates, can shut down and move their computer servers overnight to stay ahead of the law.

In the United States, the Justice Department and federal courts are unable to agree on whether Internet gambling is illegal. The Justice Department maintains that the 1961 Wire Act, written to prohibit betting transactions via telephone, applies to the Internet. Courts have disagreed, saying that betting on sports teams over the Internet is illegal, but wagering on casino games, such as poker, is not. And though the Justice Department thinks that off-track and online wagering on horse races is illegal, it has never prosecuted a case.

Internet gamblers typically set up accounts at offshore businesses, and place and settle bets using credit cards and checks that are converted in electronic currency, much as eBay users buy and sell items using the PayPal system.

Instead of targeting specific games, such as criminalizing blackjack but not fantasy sports leagues, the new law seeks to block the financial transactions that fuel them.

DOJ_NMG_0081024

The Poker Players Alliance, a lobbying group that opposes the new law, said it would ask Congress to exempt poker from the statute. The group considers poker a game of skill, not chance.

The new law is shaking up the worldwide Internet gambling industry, with some comparing it to Congress banning the sale of Toyotas, BMWs and all other foreign vehicles here. Britain's Sportingbet PLC, for example, said 62 percent of winning bets on its site came from the United States.

A major offshore e-currency company, FirePay of Britain, said it no longer will accept payments from U.S. customers. Sportingbet sold its U.S. online operations to an Antiguan company yesterday for $1, five weeks after former company chairman Peter Dicks was arrested in New York when customs officials found he was wanted in Louisiana on charges of illegal online gambling. New York Gov. George E. Pataki (R) refused to extradite Dicks to Louisiana, and a federal judge cleared his return to England.

Former BetOnSports PLC chief executive David Carruthers was arrested in the Dallas airport in July. BetOnSports founder Gary Stephen Kaplan, also wanted by U.S. authorities, is a fugitive. BetOnSports said yesterday it would pull out of the United States and repay balances to customers here.

Most online wagering and e-currency Web sites posted releases yesterday commenting on the law and its impact on customers.

"After taking extensive legal advice, the board of PartyGaming PLC has concluded that the new legislation . . . will make it practically impossible to provide U.S. residents with access to its real money poker and other real money gaming sites," the company said.

The World Trade Organization even has a stake in the game. The organization has ruled that the United States violates trade treaties by outlawing offshore online gambling while tolerating some forms of U.S.-based online gambling, citing the horse-racing ambiguity.

The major casinos in Las Vegas and Atlantic City and on Indian reservations did not take a position on the new law, said Frank J. Fahrenkopf Jr., president of the American Gaming Association. The group's reasoning: Less casino revenue comes from gambling, as entertainment, retail and other non-wagering spending now makes up 55 percent of the cash streaming into resorts such as Harrah's and Bellagio.

"The guy who comes home and goes to his den and cracks open a can of beer and bets on the Internet is not really our customer," Fahrenkopf said. "We never viewed the Internet as being competitive."

The association wants Congress to authorize an independent study of whether a legalized, nationwide, taxed and regulated online gambling system would work in the United States, as it does in Britain.

"Would we like to get into that business?" Fahrenkopf said. "Yeah, some of our guys would."

Goodlatte said he would press to update the Wire Act to conclusively extend its authority to the Internet. That part of his bill was dropped in the Senate.

"All the problems that manifest themselves with gambling, even in heavily regulated states, are even worse on the Internet," Goodlatte said yesterday. "There are family problems, bankruptcy problems, gambling addiction, gambling by minors, using gambling to launder money for criminal and terrorist organizations and organized crime. It does not help our society."

For poker advocates such as Duke, the new law is the wrong way to cure social problems.

"We've proven in history that trying to protect the minority and punish the majority never works," Duke said. "The fact is, there is a certain percentage of people who have addictive personalities [and gamble online]. Are you going to pass a law outlawing online shopping? Or day trading?"

Lost In The Dust Of 9/11 (LAT)

By Ellen Barry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

From society's margins, janitors were drafted for an epic cleanup around ground zero. Then 'the cough' racked their lives.

NEW YORK — There is no voice left in Manuel Checo's voice. He speaks in a granular rasp that fades, occasionally, to whispery puffs of air. Sometimes, for periods as long as two days, he is unable to speak at all.

When that happens, Checo carries a pad of paper with him so he can scribble down notes if he needs something. But for the most part, he will simply disappear into his rented room, ignoring his cellphone when it rings.

Checo, a janitor, spent six months cleaning dust from office buildings around ground zero after the World Trade Center attack. Five years later, the lining of his lungs is pocked with scars and densities that do not belong there — possibly a sign of a disease that can cause lung tissue to become so stiff that it can no longer carry oxygen, wrote a radiologist who examined a scan of his lungs last year.

The son of a general in the Dominican Republic, Checo, 54, irons his shirts with military precision. When he meets a woman on the street, he kisses her hand. But the truth is that when he discovered that he was too weak to work again, his life veered terribly off course. He was evicted from his apartment and slept in his car for six months. Acquaintances didn't understand his racking cough and thought he had tuberculosis or AIDS.

Whoever he was before Sept. 12, 2001 — when a supervisor from his company called to tell him there was work near ground zero — he is a different man now. Sometimes he is overwhelmed by the feeling that he has lost his way.

"I get up, I get dressed," he said, in Spanish, through a translator. "And then I say to myself, 'Where am I going?' "

The dust around ground zero, we now know, contained caustic, finely pulverized concrete, trillions of microscopic fibers of glass, and particles of lead, mercury and arsenic, as well as carcinogens like asbestos and dioxin. Five years out, the "World Trade Center cough" has started to look like a persistent — and in some cases disabling — respiratory condition.

An ever-growing number of New Yorkers is coming forward to describe symptoms: the first responders who plunged into the tangled wreckage to find survivors; the volunteers who hauled diesel fuel and doled out cigarettes; the students at Stuyvesant High School who returned to classes while acrid fires burned nearby.

Less visible is the army of cleaning workers who were sent to the area to clean office buildings. Those were the cases that were shocking to Scottie Hill, a social worker, when the Mount Sinai Medical Center opened its WTC health clinic in 2002. The cleaners, mostly Polish and Latino immigrants, were already living close to the edge when the job began; by the following year, many were in crisis because of lost wages and poor health.

Three out of four lacked health insurance. Forget workers' compensation — many of them could not even contact their employers by phone. Hill frequently saw clients who were facing eviction or had lost their homes. Some couldn't afford the $4 it cost to ride the subway to the clinic and back.

A few of the immigrant workers, too sick to support themselves in the U.S. anymore, have returned to their home countries. But that decision is fraught, too, because relatives back home — or doctors, for that matter — may not know what is wrong with them. Jaime Carcamo, a psychologist who treats 50 Latino workers who cleaned around ground zero, said some of them, finding that they were unable to work, simply withdrew from society.

"They just remain like nomads," he said. "Some of these people just fell into the cracks. People don't know about them, but they're out there still."

It is ironic, then, that Checo remembers the job so fondly. He had been a U.S. citizen for almost a decade by then, and working around ground zero gave him "so much sense of brotherhood," as if he were descending into the pit every day with police and firefighters. It was an environment stripped of class, of racism. What he says about the experience is this: "Something so bad created something so beautiful."

He worked a night shift as part of a two-man team with Alex Sanchez, a fellow Dominican 15 years his junior. Using a handsaw, they would cut two holes, each large enough for a man's torso, in a building's air vents. Peering into the dark passageway with a flashlight, all they could see was dust, glittering in the dark. Then one of them would hold up a hand vacuum, and the other would switch on an air hose, and both would disappear in a cloud of dust.

Tons of material had settled in the buildings. When terrorists crashed two planes into the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, its two towers collapsed with such force that dust and debris poured in and upward through the ventilation systems of the buildings around them. It was up to landlords to decide who would clear the buildings, and many chose cheaper labor: men and women who days before had been emptying trash cans and dusting computers.

The city's Department of Environmental Protection generally oversees the removal of debris containing asbestos, but that system was informally abandoned after Sept. 11, according to David Newman, an industrial hygienist with the New York

DOJ_NMG_0081026

Committee for Occupational Safety and Health, a coalition of union leaders and safety activists. Landlords got no guidance from state or federal agencies, leaving them "free, if you will, to do whatever they wanted, or to do nothing," Newman said. "It was kind of a Wild West."

Checo and Sanchez wore paper masks that covered their noses and mouths when they were available — about 30% of the time, Sanchez said. But the dust permeated everything; a T-shirt that was white at the beginning of a shift would be mousy-gray by its end. Anyway, health was the last thing on their minds. They were making $18 an hour, plus time and a half for overtime, instead of the $12.75 an hour they earned cleaning university buildings. It was good money. It was a good cause.

What was painful, oddly, was leaving at the end of a shift; that's when the hopeless, leaden feeling sank in. Sanchez, 39, who was born in the U.S. and wears hip, Woody Allen-ish glasses, recalls making a conscious effort to tune out at the end of the day. Back in his apartment in Washington Heights, he would watch silly, diverting television shows. Then he would collapse in bed. He had no idea whether the air was safe to breathe because he didn't ask.

"If we all used common sense, we would say, 'This is not a healthy environment,' " Sanchez said. "But the whole 9/11 situation itself kept you from thinking."

Sanchez figured he deserved to be exhausted at the end of the job. But this exhaustion was depthless, unfathomable. In May, when he tried to return to his ordinary job — buffing floors at New York University — he got dizzy and his chest closed up. He lasted six days, then went back to bed. He, his mother and his son had moved in with an aunt to save money, and both women were pressuring him, angrily, to go back to work. At one point, the fighting grew so stormy that his mother called the police.

Sanchez's world revolved around his symptoms: fatigue, joint pain, pressure in his chest, a sore throat that would not go away. Only one person seemed to believe him, and that was his work partner, Checo. The sickness drove them closer to each other, and farther from everyone else. "Me and him, we're a team," said Sanchez.

Checo had his own set of problems. Because of a bureaucratic mix-up at the company where he worked, ABM Industries, he was unable to receive unemployment benefits, and he ran through his savings so quickly that in the summer of 2002, he took a few of his possessions and moved into his car. He began to tell Sanchez that there were shadowy figures following him. Asked how Sept. 11 had altered him, he rasped out this answer:

"Every man — every great man, every evil man — has feelings," he said. "No matter how rough you are outside, you have a weak spot. 9/11 hit me in my weak spot."

Soon after the first anniversary of Sept. 11, Checo called Sanchez with exciting news: He had been watching a news show when Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton appeared, urging ground zero workers to go for screening at the Mount Sinai Medical Center's new clinic. "Boom. I put one and one together," Sanchez said. "It's like, 'This is why this is happening.' "

The day they went in for appointments, everything changed. Checo was diagnosed with rhinitis, sinusitis, asthma, chronic post-traumatic stress disorder, major depression, delusional disorder, and schizophrenia, paranoid type. Sanchez was diagnosed with asthma, sinusitis, gastroesophageal reflux, various musculoskeletal injuries and post-traumatic stress disorder. Each now takes fistfuls of medications.

The two men don't see their old circle of Dominican friends as much these days, Sanchez said. New friends have replaced them: doctors, therapists, environmental activists. In 2004, Sanchez and Checo traveled to Washington to testify before an Environmental Protection Agency panel.

Both now receive regular workers' compensation payments — Sanchez receives $243 a week, Checo about $350 — and free healthcare at Mount Sinai. They are among 75 plaintiffs who have filed a $30-million lawsuit against the owners of dozens of office towers in Lower Manhattan. But that case is not likely to go to trial for at least two years, said their attorney, Robert Grochow.

In the meantime, Sanchez and Checo shuttle from appointment to appointment. Each man carries a sheaf of medical records and hospital bills around with him — artillery in an ongoing battle to get care. The future is something they do not focus on. But this is not unusual, said Carcamo, the psychologist.

"We don't know what is ahead of them,' " he said. "They often ask me, 'What am I going to do?' To be honest about it, I am not sure."

Sanchez is jerked back to ordinary life by the demands of his son, Jack, who started kindergarten this fall. But Checo still seems a bit lost as he walks slowly down Broadway, stopping every now and then to catch his breath. What undoes him, as he waits for the next round of doctor's appointments, are the trappings of ordinary life that have slipped away from him: for instance, the collection of jazz recordings that he gave away when he was evicted.

DOJ_NMG_0081027

In the black vinyl folder that he carries around with him — it contains, among other things, the program from his father's funeral — is a photograph of himself kneeling in front of a softball team, the J-Boys, for whom he played center field until he got sick. In the picture, he is dark-haired, vigorous. It was taken a few weeks before the World Trade Center attack. He looks at it, occasionally, to remind himself who he was.

ellen.barry@latimes.com

A Big Easy Bon Voyage (WT/AP)

By Alan Sayre, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 14, 2006

The New Orleans' cruise ship industry returns to service tomorrow when the 2,000-passenger Norwegian Sun becomes the first regularly scheduled liner to cast off from the city's docks since Hurricane Katrina.

The 853-foot Norwegian Cruise Lines vessel is leaving for the Caribbean. Three other cruise ships are expected to return later this year and in 2007.

Before Katrina, four cruise ships called New Orleans home. The industry was rapidly expanding, with more than 700,000 passengers leaving and arriving in 2004 through the port.

But Katrina, which struck in August 2005, shut down the usually strong fall season. Only 308,000 passengers sailed from New Orleans during the first eight months of the year, according to the International Council of Cruise Lines (ICCL), an industry group.

The truncated year supported nearly 5,000 jobs in Louisiana as the industry spent $241 million, a figure that was still higher than the $208 million spent for all of 2004, according to ICCL.

Now, nearly 14 months since the Carnival Sensation embarked on the last regular voyage -- just before Katrina hit -- the business is starting over.

There have been several one-time liner stops at New Orleans since Katrina, but tomorrow's voyage marks the return of regularly scheduled service of four- to seven-day voyages. For a time after Katrina, two cruise ships moored at New Orleans to provide housing for emergency workers.

The port is opening a third cruise terminal and a 1,000-vehicle garage at a cost of $38 million that will give the facility the ability to handle two large passenger ships at once. It is bullish enough to be making plans for a fourth terminal.

But Bob Wall, owner of the New Orleans-based travel agency Vacations at Sea, said the first year probably would only be modest as the ships get re-established. He thinks bookings will increase steadily in the coming months.

"Once they (the public) see the ships docked, I think that's going to provide a nice bump of sales," he said.

Next in line at the Port of New Orleans is Carnival Cruise Lines' Fantasy, which sails on Oct. 26, followed by Royal Caribbean International's Grandeur of the Seas on Dec. 7. Carnival is expected to begin sailing Carnival Triumph next September. All the voyages will be bound to the western Caribbean.

New Orleans' return to the vacation cruise business comes during a heady time for the industry worldwide, according to the Cruise Lines International Association (CLIA), another industry group. The industry has averaged an 8.5 percent annual growth rate in passengers since 1980, according to the group. The ICCL put total U.S. economic impact in 2005 at $32.2 billion.

After an industry record of 11.2 million passengers in 2005, the business is expecting 11.7 million this year, said CLIA spokesman Brian Major.

Before Katrina, New Orleans was one of the fastest-growing cruise ports in the country. That was fueled by the attraction of the city itself. Passengers often toured the French Quarter and other attractions before or after a cruise.

No figures are available on collateral spending specifically by cruise passengers. However, the New Orleans Convention and Visitors Bureau said the average domestic visitor spent $196 per day in the city in 2004, the latest year for which figures are available, while an international visitor put down $244 per day on average.

DOJ_NMG_0081028

But that was before Katrina. Since the storm, the city has struggled with losses in its convention business and a very slow summer, in part affected by widespread concern outside the region about the city's condition.

Mr. Wall said tomorrow's cruise is near capacity, but like airlines, cruise companies offer various ticket deals in hopes of filling up all the cabins. "The question is on-board revenue, such as shore excursions, the casinos, the bars," he said.

Ticket prices for the cruise were the lowest in several years, Mr. Wall said, ranging from about $500 per passenger for an interior cabin to $1,200 for luxury accommodations. "That's great for the consumer, though, of course, it keeps the cruise line officials nervous," he said.

'A Hand Up Doesn't Always Require A Handout' (WSJ)

By Muhammad Yunus

The Wall Street Journal, October 14, 2006

America's government and people brought charity to a new level last year in their response to Hurricane Katrina. The rebuilding has been particularly difficult, however, because it has involved lives as well as bricks and mortar. Many victims had been desperately poor all their lives. Helping them to self-sufficiency has proved just as difficult, if not harder, than putting homes and businesses back up again.

Having many very poor citizens, and more than its share of natural disasters, Bangladesh -- my own country -- has a great deal of experience facing both these challenges. We have a per capita gross national income of $440, with half the population living below the poverty line. We've little to start with, and much of that is repeatedly snatched away. In 1998, floods covered much of the country for over two months, affecting 30 million people; and a single cyclone killed 300,000 in 1970. Despite these catastrophes, more of our people are climbing out of poverty.

So at the risk of sounding presumptuous: What can the U.S. learn from Bangladesh about post-disaster economic recovery? Like many other countries, even Bangladeshis were quick with a handout after Katrina, giving the U.S. $1 million for the victims. But Americans might be surprised to learn that one of our most successful tools for rebuilding businesses is not government handouts, but rather, small loans packaged with practical business and social advice.

Microfinance is one of the biggest success stories of the developing world, and proponents like me believe it could be just as successful in helping the poor in wealthy countries such as the U.S. The basic philosophy behind microfinance is that the poor, although spurned by traditional banks because they can't provide collateral, are actually a great investment: No one works harder than someone who is striving to achieve life's basic necessities, particularly a woman with children to support. Sadly, it is also true that in catastrophic circumstances, very little of the cash so generously given ever gets all the way down to the very poor. There are too many "professionals" ahead of them in line, highly skilled at diverting funds into their own pockets. This is particularly regrettable because very poor people need only a little money to set up a business that can make a dramatic difference in the quality of their lives.

I started the Grameen Bank 30 years ago by distributing about $27 (no typo here!) worth of loans among 40 extremely poor Bangladeshis. Since the bank officially opened in 1983, it has loaned $5.7 billion in microfinance. Today, Grameen has 6.6 million borrowers in Bangladesh alone, borrowing $500 million a year in loans that average just over $100 each. The loans are entirely financed by borrowers' deposits and the bank recovers 98.85% of all money loaned. Notably, Grameen Bank has been profitable in all but three years since its launch. Our largely poor customers save $1.008 for every dollar they borrow, so the poor are truly funding the poor.

The bank supports businesses such as small services, stores, direct sales, furniture-making, cell phone stations and milling, all of which support the local economy. And it works. More than half of our borrowers have moved out of poverty, mainly through their own efforts. Most importantly, when you lend money to disadvantaged people, it gives them a sense of pride, rather than the humiliation they may feel over a handout. And just as helpful as the money is the guidance they get from the bank. Training and connecting poor, inexperienced workers to a reliable and ethical lending and savings service is a huge advantage for them that only gets stronger after a disaster. This is particularly true of women, who are often constrained by social and financial barriers. Grameen communities have also made tremendous strides on health and social issues, such as sanitation, and pushed aside discriminatory practices such as bridal dowries.

DOJ_NMG_0081029

The impact of microfinance is spreading worldwide. As of December 2004, 3,100 microcredit institutions reported reaching 92,270,289 clients, 66,614,871 of whom were among the world's poorest when they took their first loan. Assuming five persons per family, the loans to the 54.8 million poorest clients affected some 330 million family members by the end of 2004.

Microfinance has worked so well that it has become a major instrument of reconstruction in post-tsunami Asia as well. A Sri Lankan conglomerate, Ceylinco, partnered with Grameen to provide small loans to 10,000 tsunami victims. These range from $300 to $10,000 and carry an interest rate of 6%, less than half the rate for similar small loans in Sri Lanka. The loans have a one-year grace-period, and Ceylinco takes no collateral, thereby heaping all the risk onto itself. But the company felt this was still a wise investment.

Because some countries that rely heavily on microfinance also happen to be disaster-prone, Grameen now has special disaster loan funds (DLFs) to help meet the urgent need for cash after a catastrophe. These funds also aim to offset the microlender's own losses. The funds were established in Bangladesh after the record flooding of 1998, which affected 20% of the population. Similar funds were set up in Central America in the wake of Hurricane Mitch, and in Poland after the floods of 1997. The DLFs are financial reserves and usually derived from the initial donor grant to the micro-credit lender.

Many people ask, Why not just give free cash, especially under such dire circumstances? In Bangladesh, we've learned that when aid is free, not only do the poor get the least of it, but everyone inflates their needs. While some handouts are clearly necessary in such times, we focus on lending small amounts of money. This lets us keep costs down and rebuild funds for the next disaster. Most importantly, our Grameen banks are ready to act at a moment's notice. They can respond to a disaster without waiting for anyone's permission, immediately becoming like humanitarian agencies by suspending loan payments, and providing cash, food and medicines. Once rebuilding starts, the bankers keep detailed records of the money lent, and people are allowed to repay bit by bit.

That is the strategy we followed after the 1998 flooding, which covered 50% of Bangladesh's land and affected customers at about 70% of our branches. More than 700 Grameen borrowers or their family members were killed and just over half (a million borrowers) were affected by the flooding. That represents a small percentage of the overall population affected, but the Bank and its staff where there right away to help with immediate needs. Later, microlenders helped people restructure their loans or gave out new loans on more favorable terms.

Microlending has already helped millions reach a better life through their own initiative. It has also given them valuable skills as well as crucial financial back-up in case they ever face a natural disaster like Katrina. So it might be time to think about another type of support for Katrina's victims: the microloan. As our small, flood-battered country has learned, giving someone a hand up doesn't always require a handout. The most important thing is to help people get back to work while letting them hold on to their self-respect. Microloans can do just that.

Mr. Yunus, who yesterday won the 2006 Nobel Peace Prize, is founder and managing director of the Grameen Bank of Bangladesh.

WAR NEWS:

British Downplay Discord After General's Remark (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, October 14, 2006

ST. ANDREWS, Scotland, Oct. 13 — The British government raced Friday to defuse an embarrassing public debate over remarks by its top military commander that Britain should withdraw its troops from Iraq "sometime soon."

To critics of the government, his comments amounted to a challenge to Prime Minister Tony Blair's authority, since they seemed to be a direct contradiction of Mr. Blair's insistence that a retreat would be "a craven act of surrender."

The officer, Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, modified some of his remarks in a series of radio and television interviews on Friday to expand on his comments in The Daily Mail, which first featured them on its Web site late Thursday.

By "soon," he later said, he meant that British troops should not remain there for "years and years." But he did not completely retract his assessment that the presence of British forces in Iraq "exacerbated" the violence there.

DOJ_NMG_0081030

"I have withdrawn none of the comments that I have made," he said in a radio interview. "I have given a little more explanation about what I meant by 'sometime soon.' That's not backtracking."

At a news conference after the Northern Ireland political settlement talks here in Scotland, Mr. Blair was asked whether Sir Richard had been opposing government policy. Mr. Blair insisted that, having read transcripts of the general's interviews on Friday, he was echoing official policy. "In terms of what he was saying about Britain, he was saying exactly the same as we have all said," Mr. Blair said, though he has never used the general's words. "We will stay and get the job done."

Mr. Blair also said, "The reason that we have been able to give up two provinces now to Iraqi control is precisely because the job has been done there."

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, also tried to dull the remarks, saying, "His general point was that, you know, when your work is done you hand over authority to the Iraqis."

At an earlier briefing here, Mr. Blair's spokesman said the general's remarks after his Daily Mail interview showed there was "not a cigarette paper between" the prime minister and the general.

Opposition to the war led two members of Mr. Blair's cabinet to resign in protest to the invasion, and the war has greatly diminished Mr. Blair's popularity.

In another emotional issue that generates continued anger against the war, a coroner in Oxford said Friday that an inquest had found that Terry Lloyd, a British television war correspondent killed in Iraq in March 2003, was "unlawfully killed" by United States forces who opened fire on a vehicle carrying the wounded reporter away from a battlefield.

The coroner in Oxford, Andrew Walker, said the American troops should not have fired on a vehicle with wounded civilians. Mr. Lloyd was working as a so-called unilateral journalist, meaning he was not embedded with the allied forces. The coroner reviewed videotape of the fighting.

On Friday, Britain's National Union of Journalists called Mr. Lloyd's death a war crime, and Mr. Walker said he would write to the British attorney general urging him to prosecute the killers. In the fighting, Mr. Lloyd's Lebanese translator, Hussein Osman, also died. A French cameraman, Frédéric Nérac, is still missing and is presumed dead.

The general's initial comments drew widespread approval among antiwar legislators and on unofficial Web sites used by military bloggers. Britain has some 7,000 troops in Iraq, based primarily in the south around Basra.

In the Daily Mail interview, Sir Richard said British soldiers should leave Iraq "sometime soon, because our presence exacerbates the security problems." He also was quoted as saying that overstretching the British Army in Iraq could "break it."

The general told the BBC on Friday in a radio interview, "It was never my intention to have this hoo-ha."

"My intention is particularly to speak up for what is right for the army," he said.

On the same radio show, another British officer, Col. Tim Collins, who fought in Iraq in 2003, said the general's comments had offered a "refreshing and very honest insight into what the army generally feels."

In an interview with Sky News on Friday, Sir Richard said: "We are not on the run; we are not hauling our colors down. We are going to see this thing through, but we have got to get on with it; we can't be there for years and years in the sorts of numbers we are."

Britain's Army Chief Clarifies Remarks On Troop Withdrawal (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 13 -- Britain's top army commander, who ignited a controversy by saying that British troops should withdraw from Iraq "sometime soon," clarified Friday that he wants a pullout but not until "the mission is substantially done."

Gen. Richard Dannatt had been quoted in Friday editions of the Daily Mail as saying that British troops should leave Iraq "sometime soon because our presence exacerbates the security problems."

"We weren't invited" into Iraq, he said, but rather "kicked the door in," and "whatever consent we may have had in the first place" from the Iraqi people "has largely turned to intolerance."

Dannatt said he had "much more optimism that we can get it right in Afghanistan."

DOJ_NMG_0081031

In television and radio interviews Friday, Dannatt said he was not "backtracking" but expanding on his remarks and putting them in context. He said there was no "rift" between him and Prime Minister Tony Blair, whose office reportedly was engaged in a flurry of phone calls with the Defense Ministry over the issue. Blair recently has said a British withdrawal from Iraq would be "a craven act of surrender."

Military experts on both sides of the Atlantic have said they believe that many British military officials are eager to find a way to withdraw from the unpopular war in Iraq and concentrate on Afghanistan. Britain has 7,200 troops in Iraq and 5,600 in Afghanistan, according to the Defense Ministry. According to ministry figures, 119 British soldiers have died in Iraq and 40 in Afghanistan.

Dannatt, echoing a statement put out by Blair's office, said in a statement issued Friday that "I am on record publicly saying we're standing shoulder to shoulder with the Americans."

In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Snow said Dannatt believed his comments had been "largely taken out of context."

"He's saying there may be some times when the Brits no longer are necessary -- they're there, they're seen as an occupier, that may exacerbate some of the tensions. And that's the context in which he was discussing it," Snow said.

Amyas Godfrey, a former British army officer at the Royal United Services Institute, said officials have responded to public pressure to set a timetable for a withdrawal from Iraq by saying that it will come "when the job is done." So it is significant, he said, that the army chief has said: "We should be leaving."

"Right or wrong, there is a feeling we followed Americans into Iraq," Godfrey said. As the security situation worsens in Iraq, he said, there is a feeling of "it wasn't our idea in the first place, so why are we still there?"

In interviews Friday, Dannatt, who took over as head of the army in August, continued to speak more candidly than previous military leaders. He said that in some parts of Iraq, the "mere presence" of British troops exacerbates violence.

"I am just saying, 'Come on, we can't be here forever at this level.' . . . I have got an army to look after, which is going to be successful in current operations, but I want an army in five years' time and 10 years' time. Don't let's break it on this one. Let's keep an eye on time," Dannatt said.

"Let's face it, we have been there three and a half years," he said. "We have an interest in getting on with this."

Blair Seeks To Counter General's Attack Over Iraq (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, October 14, 2006

Tony Blair was last night fighting to limit the damage to his Iraq policy after Sir Richard Dannatt, the UK's top soldier, warned that Britain's military presence there would "break" the Army if it were required to operate in the country for much longer.

His assault on the prime minister's foreign policy - an unheard of action for a serving leader of the armed forces - provoked a day of tension between Downing Street and the military. Sir Richard had to clarify a comment in a newspaper interview that troops must leave Iraq "some time soon". But he drew wide support from former military leaders.

In radio and TV appearances Sir Richard said there was no difference between his views on Iraq and those of Mr Blair, who has argued that Britain would only leave when Iraqi forces could manage national security.

A contrite-sounding Sir Richard said the 8,000 troops in Iraq would leave "some time soon when the mission is done".

But while he insisted there was no difference between himself and Downing Street on Iraq policy, Sir Richard did not retreat from arguing that the campaign in Iraq was stretching the army to intolerable levels.

Warning that Britain must be out of Iraq by 2008, he said: "We don't want to be there another two, three, four, five years. We've got to think about this in terms of a reasonable length of time."

Sir Richard received a show of support from senior military figures. Colonel Tim Collins, a senior UK officer in Iraq in 2003, said he had given a "refreshing and very honest insight into what the army generally feel".

But Michael Portillo, ex-Tory defence secretary, said Sir Richard was "absolutely compromised" by his initial contradiction of UK government policy.

Blair Stresses No Disagreement With Army Chief In Iraq Pull-out Row (AFP)

By Katherine Haddon

AFP, October 14, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair insisted that there was no difference of opinion between him and army chief General Sir Richard Dannatt, who has said British troops in Iraq are exacerbating security problems and should pull out soon.

In an interview with the Daily Mail newspaper published Friday, Dannatt said: "I don't say the difficulties we are experiencing round the world are caused by our presence in Iraq but undoubtedly our presence in Iraq exacerbates them."

He added that Britain should pull out "sometime soon because our presence exacerbates the security problems".

Dannatt, the chief of general staff, later used a statement after further interviews on television and radio Friday to try to scotch the impression that he was at odds with Blair and Defence Secretary Des Browne.

He said that the army would stay in southern Iraq "until the job is done", adding: "I'm a soldier -- we don't do surrender".

Blair said Dannatt had used his later interviews to set the one with the Mail in context, during a press conference at St Andrews, Scotland, where he has been taking part in talks on restoring power-sharing to Northern Ireland.

The Prime Minister said he agreed with "every word" of Dannatt's later radio interview.

"If you read the transcript of his interview on the radio this morning and the television, he sets in proper context exactly what he was saying," Blair said.

"And if I can take just one example of why it's important these things are in context, what he is saying about wanting the British troops out of Iraq is precisely the same as what we're all saying."

Meanwhile, White House spokesman Tony Snow indicated that the United States had asked for an explanation of Dannatt's comments.

"We did call and say 'what did he say?' and we received transcripts, especially this morning's interview," he said.

Since the newspaper interview appeared overnight, Dannatt has also been at pains to show any troop reductions had to be coordinated with the United States, which provides the bulk of allied troops in Iraq.

Dannatt told the Mail that though the intention of invading Iraq was to set up a pro-Western liberal democracy which "might have a beneficial effect on the balance within the Middle East", he did not think "we are going to do that."

"I think we should aim for a lower ambition."

On BBC radio, Dannatt suggested a reduced goal might involve aiming for a unitary Iraqi state but added "whether we can make it happen, I don't know."

The Mail interview was widely interpreted as contradicting Blair's defence of the presence of British troops in Iraq in September, when he said that if Britain were to withdraw, the country "will be committing a craven act of surrender that will put our future security in the deepest peril".

Colonel Tim Collins, one of the most senior British Army officers in Iraq in 2003, praised Dannatt for what he said as a "refreshing and very honest insight into what the army generally feel."

Anti-war campaigners welcomed Dannatt airing his views, with the left-wing Stop The War Coalition even inviting the general to speak at the group's next public demonstration.

Britain has 7,200 troops in southern Iraq patrolling an area around Basra, a bastion of Iranian-backed Shiite militias. Since Britain joined the US-led invasion three years ago, 119 British troops have been killed in Iraq.

Blair's Power Sliding On Dannatt Remarks (AP)

By Beth Gardiner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Is Tony Blair losing control? His army chief's brazen declaration that British troops should soon leave Iraq is the latest evidence that the once-formidable prime minister — who rode out a fierce party rebellion just last month — may be rapidly losing his political clout.

The catalyst is clearly the Iraq war, which is seen across Britain as a tragic mistake. But Blair's influence also has suffered because of his close ties to President Bush, who is deeply unpopular in Britain, and in recent months over his support of Bush's stand that Israel should not be forced into a premature cease-fire in Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0081033

Blair struggled Friday to stamp out the furor following Gen. Richard Dannatt's statement that the presence of British troops is provoking violence in Iraq, not preventing it.

The opposition Conservative party — which has branded Blair a lame duck leader since he announced last month that he would resign within a year — said the army chief's comments were further proof that the Labour leader's authority was waning.

Dannatt later tried to tone down his remarks — saying he wanted a gradual pullout over the next few years — but he did not back away from them entirely. And it was too late to quell the debate set off by comments that not long ago would have seemed almost inconceivable.

"The general is just saying what millions of people in this country know to be true from simply reading the papers and watching the news," said John Rees, a co-founder of the Stop the War Coalition.

"He better than anybody knows that the British army isn't in a position to sustain this," Rees said. "It's chaos in Iraq."

Dannatt gave a series of interviews Friday and issued a statement clarifying the remarks he originally made to the Daily Mail newspaper, which were dominating the British media.

"The mere fact that we are still in some places (in Iraq) exacerbates violence from those who want to destabilize Iraqi democracy," his statement said.

"But that is not a reason for us to leave. I am on record publicly saying we're standing shoulder-to-shoulder with the Americans," he said. "I'm a soldier — we don't do surrender, we don't pull down white flags. We will remain in southern Iraq until the job is done. We're going to see this through."

Blair, in Scotland brokering talks between Northern Ireland's Catholic and Protestant political parties, said the Daily Mail had twisted Dannatt's words and taken them out of context.

The prime minister said he agreed with what he saw as the general's real message — that British troops should leave areas of Iraq as soon as local forces were able to take over security, and would be unwelcome if they stayed beyond that time. British troops have so far left two provinces in the country's south.

"What he is saying about wanting British forces out of Iraq is precisely the same as we're all saying," Blair told reporters. "Our strategy is to withdraw from Iraq — when the job is done."

Liam Fox, defense spokesman for the opposition Conservative Party — whose recent surge in the polls has made it a real threat to Blair's Labour Party — said the government should be as candid as Dannatt was about Iraq.

"What is surprising is the timing and outspoken nature of the (Dannatt) interview, which occurs at a time when the prime minister's authority seems to be ebbing away," the Tory said in a statement.

The Daily Mail, which released its interview on its Web site Thursday night, quoted Dannatt as saying that while Iraqis might have welcomed coalition forces following the ouster of Saddam Hussein, the good will has since evaporated.

The British military should "get ourselves out sometime soon because our presence exacerbates the security problems," he reportedly said.

British and American planning for postwar Iraq was poor, he added — "probably based more on optimism than sound planning."

The criticism follows months of political trouble for Blair, whose government has been damaged by a war that was unpopular from the beginning and has grown more so as the violence grinds on.

A rebellion in the Labour Party trying to oust Blair forced his reluctant announcement last month that he will resign within a year.

Former Home Secretary David Blunkett also claimed in memoirs excerpted this week that Treasury chief Gordon Brown — who seems likely to take over the party, and the government, when Blair steps down — privately opposed the war until shortly before it began, when he decided to back Blair.

Seeking Success In Iraq (NYDN)

New York Daily News, October 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0081034

However fast Britain's top general clarified remarks appearing to suggest he is less enthusiastic about staying the course in Iraq than he's expected to be, there is undeniably growing sentiment even in hardy stay-the-course circles that the Iraqi mission - just and high-minded though it was at the beginning, just and high-minded though it remains - has been no howling triumph.

Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, no cut-and-run man, said: "I'm a soldier. We don't do surrender. We're going to see this through." But he also said: "History will show that the planning for what happened after the initial successful war fighting phase was poor, probably based more on optimism than sound planning." No arguing with that.

Which is why the war's immediate future hangs heavily on the soon-to-be-issued recommendations of ex-Secretary of State James Baker's bipartisan Iraq Study Group. It may already be too late in the game to undo some of the Bush administration's blunders, which have become a familiar litany in the national dialogue: There were too few boots on the ground to begin with, nobody moved fast enough to quell civil unrest in the invasion's immediate aftermath, Coalition Provisional Authority chief Paul Bremer was an utter fool to disband the Iraqi military, etc., etc. All true, all true, inexcusable, indefensible, a sorry prosecution. And all there is to say about it is, well, that was then and now is now, and there's no starting over.

High hopes attend whatever the Baker group's ideas will be about redirecting the allied energies into coherent goals, however they might be realized under the real-world conditions that now exist in what Sen. Hillary Clinton has just described as the Iraq that is, not the Iraq we would like it to be. The fact remains that the success of the allied effort has always been contingent on Baghdad's new leadership, which has yet to bring meaningful order to its own set of circumstances. The Iraqis absolutely must begin to take charge of their own affairs. Like the general said: We don't do surrender. "But we've got to get on with it. We can't be there for years and years."

No, we can't. And at this hour, it's up to Baker's bunch to help the White House find a path toward satisfactory resolution - and perhaps even to find America's way home again. Wish them wisdom.

It still stinks in Albany

The group that tagged New York's state Legislature as the nation's worst reports now that - surprise! -precious little has changed.

Wily pols that they are, Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver and Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno mollified the public with gestures - such as meeting the budget deadline and requiring lawmakers to actually be in their seats when voting. But the pair still giveth and taketh away committee chairmanships - and the extra pay accompanying same - so the rank-and-file sheepishly obeys their every command. No wonder, then, that the followup report from the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU pronounces the system "still broken."

Committees still rubber-stamp major legislation without hearings. Bruno and Silver still determine, unilaterally, which bills go to the floor. And bills that go to the floor always, always, always pass.

In 2004, the Brennan Center proved by objective measures that ours was the land's most dysfunctional legislature - which is saying a lot (think Trenton). The authors did not take the trouble to repeat that calculation this time around, but no matter. When it comes to godawful government, everyone knows Albany takes the prize.

Economics lesson

It doesn't take a Nobel Prize in economics to realize that the federal minimum wage - frozen at $5.15 an hour since 1997 - should be higher. Say, $7.25. But the Republican Congress, parroting the disproved argument that a higher minimum hurts employers, refuses to act. To refute the politicos, more than 650 economists, among them five Nobelists, this week issued a public letter calling for an increase.

They explain that a decent minimum not only fights poverty but equalizes "the imbalance in bargaining power that low-wage workers face in the labor market." And they note that the value of the 1997 increase"has been fully eroded," its purchasing power at its lowest point since 1951. Those hurt are not employers but the working poor. Which does not appear to matter to the working rich in Congress, who are not likely to change their minds, even with a lesson from the laureates. Perhaps control of Congress should be changed.

You can e-mail the Daily News editors at voicers@edit.nydailynews.com. Please include your full name, address and phone number. The Daily News reserves the right to edit letters. The shorter the letter, the better the chance it will be used.

DOJ_NMG_0081035

Shiites Push For British Troops To Leave (AP)

AP, October 14, 2006

Many Shiites in this southern port city say they want British troops to leave, though the region is still bloodied by a persistent grind of killings, including Sunni insurgent bombings and Shiite-on-Shiite slayings amid a competition for political control.

Several prominent Basra leaders on Friday agreed with an assessment by Britain's army chief that the British presence only worsens the violence and the soldiers should withdraw soon. Gen. Richard Dannatt backpedaled Friday from the comments he made in an interview a day earlier, saying he meant troops should leave within years, but the statements caused a political storm in Britain.

In Basra, Shiites insist the British presence only provides a target for attackers seeking to end the "occupation" — and some said the troops are doing nothing to rein in party-backed Shiite militias that have risen to prominence.

"To tell the truth, (the British) have caused the chaos and the security decline in southern Iraq, especially Basra, by their leniency with the militias and their parties," said Ghali Nijm, head of the Shiite Wifaq party in Basra.

Added Aqil Talib, a member of the Basra provincial council from the Shiite Fadila party: "The British presence is no longer desired, as is that of the Americans and others, even though the British are kinder than the Americans."

It's a change in attitude from early in the Iraqi conflict, when Shiites across the country welcomed U.S.-led coalition troops that toppled Saddam Hussein, who had persecuted the Shiite majority. British troops in Basra were even praised for taking a gentler approach to policing the region than American troops further north, who were seen as heavy-handed.

But with the violence wearing on, anti-U.S. sentiment has been growing among Shiites across Iraq, and with it the feeling that international troops should go. The militia of Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, which deeply opposes the U.S.-British presence, has been growing in power.

The central government in Baghdad underlined on Friday that it wants U.S. and British troops to remain, saying they are needed to contain the violence and train Iraqi forces.

In early October, British and Iraqi forces began a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep of Basra — code-named "Operation Sinbad" — similar to one launched in August by U.S. troops in Baghdad. The sweep has gone through three districts — including two with a heavy militia presence — clearing out weapons, arresting about 100 people and launching reconstruction projects.

"The presence of these forces is necessary so that they can participate in establishing stability in Iraq," government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said.

The predominantly Shiite south has long been less violent than Baghdad and the Sunni regions of central and western Iraq, where the anti-U.S. insurgency has been based.

But there has still been steady bloodshed, and it has increased this year with the swelling of sectarian killings across the country. Basra province — home to about 3 million people, where most of the 7,000 British troops are based — sees a constant toll of bombings, shootings and kidnappings.

They come in part from Sunni insurgent attacks against British troops and Iraqi civilians with bombings, mortars and rocket fire. But increasingly the area has seen killings between Shiites as party-backed militias vie for influence.

On Thursday, a prominent al-Sadr cleric, Sheik Radhi al-Assadi, was gunned down near his home. His slaying came days after another cleric — also named Radhi al-Assadi, a distant relative, but connected to the rival Badr Brigade militia — was killed by gunmen.

Shiite militias also intimidate residents, enforcing strict Islamic laws in some districts, such as banning haircuts seen as Western, forcing women to wear the veil and closing video and music shops.

The desire to see foreign troops leave is also fueled in part by Shiite insistence they can run their own affairs.

"The British forces entered Iraq and liberated it from the Saddam regime," said one Basra resident, Essam Mohammed. "Since they have fully accomplished their mission, they should now leave Iraq ... because they are creating some obstacles and problems for the Iraqi people."

Home Winning The Peace II (SN)

DOJ_NMG_0081036

By John Hall

Scripps News, October 14, 2006

Commentary

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who says the Bush administration "seriously misjudged winning the peace" in Iraq, now is heading a bipartisan commission that almost certainly will recommend broad changes in policy there before the end of the year.

What will become of these recommendations is becoming this capital's most interesting guessing game.

Baker is the respected Bush family friend and solicitor who made Bush's troubles go away in the famous 2000 contested Florida election that made him president. President Bush affectionately called the older man "Jimmy" in the Rose Garden last week. Yet, according to author Bob Woodward, he passed over Baker as secretary of Defense so he could stand by Donald Rumsfeld.

You could not tell listening to Bush's press conference last week, or reading the transcript of it, whether he is amenable to any change Baker and his distinguished panel might come up with. Baker suggested last Sunday that "stay the course" is no longer a good idea in Iraq.

Here was Bush's response to that:

"Stay the course means keep doing what you're doing. My attitude is, don't do what you're doing if it's not working; change.

"Stay the course also means don't leave before the job is done. We're going to get the job done in Iraq. And it's important that we do get the job done in Iraq."

The president, more than once, said he was open to any kind of tactical change in course that his top commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., would bring to him. But he seems more entrenched, not less so, on his message that "the enemy's coming after us" if there should be a premature withdrawal of troops from Iraq.

The Defense department is now spreading the doctrine of the "long war" against radical Islam to a new generation of intelligence officers. They are being taught by the Joint Chiefs of Staff that only a victory in Iraq will stop the establishment of a caliphate that will spread its tentacles out of Baghdad into a half dozen major capitals of the Middle East, threatening the existence of Israel and the Western oil supply.

That is the 21st century version of the "falling dominoes" theory, which held that failure in Vietnam would lead to the loss of Asian alliances starting with Thailand. Now it has been brought up to date and modernized with the horror of the 9/11 attacks behind it.

Bush spoke of a day when "extreme forms of religion fight each other for influence in the Middle East; in which they've got the capacity to use oil as an economic weapon."

Indeed, it was Baker who raised concerns about Saddam Hussein's use of Iraq's oil wealth as a tool to leverage power. Iraq's invasion of Kuwait led to the first Gulf War. When Baker suggested Bush's father, who was then president, was justified in invading Iraq because of the effect of oil on jobs and the U.S. economy, he and the elder Bush were roundly criticized.

What influence Baker and his Iraq Study Group will have with the second President Bush, particularly when he is officially classified as a lame duck after the November elections, is arguable. The panel was created by Congress and includes such luminaries as former Republican New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, former Sen. Charles Robb of Virginia and former Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana. The latter two moderate Democrats were co-chairmen of the bipartisan commission that investigated the failures of government agencies that led to the 9/11 attacks and the breakdown in intelligence before the Iraq war.

The Iraq panel has largely kept its own counsel since it started work last March, quietly interviewing many of the principal players on the Iraq drama from Bush down. But the two most important, Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney, and the network of neo-conservatives who backed the war from the start have formed a protective wall around the existing strategy for a long time.

It will be difficult for Baker or anyone else to break through or get around them.

(John Hall is the senior Washington correspondent of Media General News Service. E-mail jhall(at)mediageneral.com.)

Army Chief Campaigns For Increased Funding (MCT)

By Drew Brown

DOJ_NMG_0081037

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Army is campaigning hard to ensure that it has enough money to keep up the battles in Iraq and Afghanistan and to prepare for potential future conflicts.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, says the service needs $138 billion in 2008 to ensure it can field as many as 19 combat brigades at any given time, as called for by the Pentagon's latest four-year strategy. That figure is about $20 billion more than Congress approved for the Army in the 2007 budget.

The Army has 17 combat brigades deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan - a total of about 136,000 soldiers - but keeping those troops in battle has put unprecedented strain on the Army's funding, despite an estimated $507 billion that Congress has set aside since 2001 to pay for the wars.

But with more boots on the ground than any other service, the Army also has borne the brunt of manpower and equipment losses. More than 2,100 of the 3,100 U.S. troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan have been Army soldiers. The Army plans to spend $17.1 billion this year to replace or repair equipment that's been lost or damaged, including more than 2,000 vehicles awaiting overhaul.

It's against this backdrop that Schoomaker appeared this week at the Army's annual convention in Washington and called for the country to increase defense spending. It was part of a public relations campaign not often seen among top uniformed military officials.

While he didn't name a figure, the general said the Army's continued effectiveness in the war would depend upon a "national commitment" to recruit, train and equip soldiers and support them and their families properly.

"This is a matter of national priorities, not affordability," Schoomaker said.

The call for increased defense spending comes at a time when the United States is spending about 4 percent of its gross domestic product on defense. The White House predicts defense spending will fall in coming years.

Schoomaker said spending 4 percent of GDP on defense is a historic low during a war. The United States spent 38 percent of its GDP on defense during World War II, 14 percent during the Korean War and 10 percent during the Vietnam conflict.

As one seasoned non-commissioned officer put it, professional armies are expensive to maintain and Schoomaker is being straightforward about what it's going to take to support the all-volunteer Army in a time of protracted war.

"The nation has not realized that yet," said the officer, a sergeant major with more than 30 years in uniform who spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to speak publicly. "The recent wars just now are bringing it to light. The (chief) is just saying that we're through pretending that everything is OK."

Army officials have been meeting since June with senior defense officials, the White House and members of Congress to come up with a spending figure for 2008. Schoomaker described it as a "very serious dialogue" designed to agree upon a "common set of facts" about the strategic challenges the Army faces in the future and what kind of resources it will need to meet those challenges.

"We have to increase the base budget just to support the strategy," said an Army official, who wasn't authorized to speak on the record about policy, but who agreed that Schoomaker's speech was designed to send a public message. "That's his main focus. Who was the message directed at? It's directed at Congress. It's directed at the people."

But one problem the Army is facing is that having a successful all-volunteer force has undercut much of the responsibility that the country has traditionally felt for the military, said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute, a policy research group in Arlington, Va.

"When you're absolutely certain that you're not going to have to serve in the military, it becomes something that's an afterthought rather than a primary concern," he said. "What he's saying in his speech is that the country needs to recognize the Army's needs and fund those needs, even if it doesn't intend to serve."

Underlying the public appeal for support is a very real fear among the top Army ranks that instead of increasing spending, Congress will take money away from the Army's highest-priority modernization program, the Future Combat System.

The FCS is a $120 billion program designed to build a group of 18 manned and unmanned vehicles linked by satellite communications and a common sensor network. Advocates say it will give soldiers unparalleled situational awareness on the battlefield. The Army hopes to begin fielding the first of elements of the program in 2008.

If squeezed by competing budget pressures, the Army is likely to give priority to the program, even if it means forgoing adding soldiers to the ranks, said Frederick W. Kagan, a military historian and defense analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative Washington research group.

The active-duty Army currently has about 494,000 soldiers, but Kagan and many other experts believe the service needs tens of thousands more to fight the war and meet other strategic commitments.

"We're in a crisis as far as personnel goes, and FCS should be a much lower priority," Kagan said. "Nevertheless, transformation is very important. The U.S. is entering a period of tremendous crisis in terms of national security, and the armed forces should not have to be making hard choices now - like FCS versus soldiers."

Congress has authorized the Army to grow to 533,000 soldiers.

The Cost Of Iraq War Is Out Of Control (SN)

Scripps News, October 14, 2006

Commentary

When it comes to casualties in the war in Iraq, no one can put a price on human life. But the cost in taxpayer dollars of U.S. military operations there continues to rise to gargantuan proportions.

According to the Congressional Research Service, Congress already has appropriated $437 billion for war, not including $70 billion approved by the Senate as part of next year's record-breaking Pentagon budget. That's half a trillion dollars _ about three-quarters of it for Iraq, 20 percent for Afghanistan and 5 percent for increased security against terrorism at other foreign bases.

The fighting in Afghanistan, home of the Taliban and training ground of the 9/11 terrorists, is one thing. But an increasing number of Americans see Iraq as a war we can no longer afford. Either way, the fiscal burden will be felt for generations because the cost is being applied daily to the nation's budget deficit.

More than 2,700 American soldiers have lost their lives in Iraq and Afghanistan, and some 20,000 others have been wounded. We would not presume to trivialize their sacrifice by placing a dollar value on the mayhem, but how many more lives may be put in jeopardy when the growing cost of the Iraq war crowds out spending for, say, a new cancer drug?

These are the real costs that will multiply under an administration that has the nation stuck in an open-ended commitment, with no thought to the long-range consequences. And these costs will continue to grow until the American people decide they've had enough.

Lack Of Confidence In Maliki Government Grows (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - In the five months since Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki became Iraq's leader, the parliament and his ministries have formed hundreds of committees to address problems on everything from how to disarm militias to whether tainted meat caused a group of police officers to fall ill last week.

No one knows precisely how many committees have been formed - one estimate puts the number at 400. Yet only one committee has brought its findings to the parliament.

That lack of action is eroding Iraqi citizens' and U.S. officials' confidence that Maliki's government will be able to address the problems that plague this country, a development that would leave the U.S. with virtually no policy alternative.

U.S. strategy in Iraq currently revolves around the idea that given enough time and the proper security environment, Maliki's government will take control of the country and calm the sectarian tensions that threaten to dismember it.

Yet since Iraq's first permanent government was elected, security has eroded by nearly every measure, despite the U.S. training of more than 300,000 Iraqi police and soldiers. When the government came into power, 65 bodies on average were appearing on Iraq's streets a day; today, 100 are killed daily.

According to the interior minister, the government is issuing 15,000 passports a week, many to residents who say they're desperate to flee; school populations have dropped; and some Iraqi neighborhoods have become so sectarian that some areas are divided up street by street. Services, such as electricity, haven't improved.

DOJ_NMG_0081039

Now there's a growing chorus that Maliki's government is unlikely to ever come to terms with the country's problems, a complaint reflected in Iraqi Web logs, newspaper columns, and, U.S. civilian and military officials say, in private conversations.

"I think Maliki is trying to convince the American people that he is serious about fixing things, and he is not serious," said Saad Assim al Janabi, a former member of government loyal to Ayad Allawi, whom the United States appointed interim prime minister of Iraq in 2004. "Maliki believes he is a Shiite Muslim first and that he belongs to the Dawa Party (a mostly Shiite party). We need someone to say he belongs to all of Iraq."

Top U.S. military and civilian officials here have been raising the tenor of their complaints about the government's inaction over the past month, warning that the government has only about two months to make major changes - though they don't say what might happen if it doesn't.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, in an interview this week, also sounded that alarm, saying the government must tackle such broad issues as de-Baathification, needed changes to the constitution, distribution of oil and strengthening the security forces.

But when pressed on how he expects the government to respond, he couldn't offer an answer.

The government "has committed themselves to making those decisions. And we will see how much progress they are making. But we will work with them. And if there are adjustments that need to be made to those tactics, we will consider them," Khalilzad said. "We had said the (first) six months are critical. They still have a couple of months."

Some members of the parliament, such as revered leader Humam Hamoodi, said American pressure is only making their task more difficult and that they need time.

Maliki took office on May 20 and within days announced a 24-point national reconciliation plan. It was the first of many plans that so far have had little beneficial effect on Iraq's conditions but came with a host of committees, each of which is given $13,333 a month to operate.

Under the national reconciliation plan, various committees were appointed to address a number of issues: prevention of human right violations, dissemination of a message of reconciliation, the removal of obstacles that hinder Iraqis from wanting to work.

But after a highly celebrated news conference, immortalized in the next day's newspapers by a photo of Maliki and the Sunni Muslim speaker of the house seemingly glaring at each other, there were no visible signs of changes in how the Iraqi government functioned.

Maliki's next initiative was a plan to bring peace to Basra, the predominantly Shiite city in southern Iraq that had been racked by growing violence between rival Shiite militias. That plan was to last 30 days and involved the creation of several committees. But at the end of 30 days, there was no lessening of violence. Basra residents reported that promised checkpoints aimed at curbing violence disappeared within days of the plan's inception. The second phase of the plan began this month, which included promises of more committees to rebuild Basra and hand the security apparatus to Iraqis.

The government's next peace initiative was the Baghdad security plan, or Operation Together Forward, a house-by-house sweep through the capital's most troubled neighborhoods by the Iraqi army, with the help of American forces. While crime dropped when U.S. troops blocked all entrances into the neighborhoods, when they began pulling out, criminal elements started moving back in.

Attacks in Baghdad rose from an average of 25.3 daily before the operation, to 36.1, according to the U.S. military.

"The Americans used to set up a checkpoint for a few days, especially when the security plan started, but now the Iraqi commando forces are responsible for the checkpoints. And they don't know how to deal with the people. They are really sectarian. I feel that the whole security plan had failed," said Abu Amer, 35, of the mostly Sunni Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, one of the areas swept by the American forces.

Finally, last week, Maliki and top Sunni leaders signed a four-point pact vowing to create several committees to end sectarian violence, including one to curb the media from showing graphic images of bombings and assassinations. It took them two days to hammer out the deal, and in a prime-time broadcast, they swore that either the Shiite-dominated militias or the government would survive, but not both.

DOJ_NMG_0081040

Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. general in Iraq, issued a statement that evening calling the pact a significant step in the right direction showing that the Iraqi leaders wanted their country to succeed and were responding to their people's wishes for security.

But Grand Ayatollah Ali al Sistani, the top Shiite religious leader, issued a statement through his representative a few days later saying the pact lacked details - a statement echoed last week at a news conference in Washington by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., who had just returned from Iraq.

Brandishing a copy of Maliki's speech, Warner told reporters he would share it with them. "But I have to tell you, folks, it's five pages long, and you're hard put to figure out how this represents a plan that was so carefully described to us," Warner said. "That, I think, symbolizes the difficulty we have in dealing with this situation."

Most recently, Maliki has met with leaders in Anbar province and promised to create two non-sectarian army brigades in Baghdad. It remains unclear when the brigades will hit the streets, and government officials couldn't explain how they would form a non-sectarian force in the current political climate.

Ali Debaugh, a spokesman for Maliki, said the administration's greatest success is that there is dialogue among the sects.

"I think the most important accomplishment is not the reconciliation project itself as the dissemination of the reconciliation spirit," Debaugh said.

But dissemination of spirit isn't what Iraq needs, say the government's critics.

"None of the plans have reached the Iraqi street," Janabi said. "They say everything. They do nothing."

Al-Sistani's Influence Declining In Iraq (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani once wielded so much influence he seemed to single-handedly chart the post-Saddam Hussein political future in Iraq. Now, the country's top Shiite cleric appears powerless as Iraq edges toward civil war.

With dozens of Iraqis dying daily from Sunni-Shiite reprisal killings, the failures of al-Sistani's pleas for peace underline a major power shift in the Shiite establishment.

"Their political interests now outweigh religious interests," said Mustapha al-Ani, a Dubai-based Iraqi analyst. "To some extent, the need for al-Sistani's endorsement is no longer a prerequisite to gain power. Those with street credibility and a militia now have the power."

It's a major shift from the more than two years following Saddam's ouster, when Shiite leaders hung on al-Sistani's every word concerning politics. His opposition to U.S. plans for elections and a constitution forced the Americans to make dramatic changes. His calls for Shiites to avoid violence were largely adhered to.

But priorities for Shiite political parties have changed and their leaders no longer appear to feel the need to be seen to be closely associated with al-Sistani to gain legitimacy.

The swing has stripped the Shiite clergy, with the Iranian-born al-Sistani at its head, of much of its influence and given a lead role to followers of anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who does not recognize al-Sistani's religious authority.

It is a power shift that does not bode well for Iraq's Shiite-dominated government or the U.S.-led military coalition as they try to contain the stubborn Sunni insurgency and the wave of sectarian killings that has swelled since last winter.

Al-Sadr's supporters are widely suspected in many of the attacks on Sunni Arabs. His militiamen, who staged two revolts against U.S. troops in 2004, also have clashed with U.S. and Iraqi soldiers in Baghdad and southern Iraq in recent weeks.

Al-Sistani has responded to the bloodshed with a mixture of resignation and a deep sense of disappointment, said an official who is in regular contact with al-Sistani in the southern holy city of Najaf.

"He keeps praying for peace," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak to the media. "He feels the pain every day, but he has no magic wand. He tells visitors every day that what's happening does not please God or his prophet and has nothing to do with Islamic teachings."

Al-Sistani's last public statement on the crisis in Iraq came more than three months ago, when after a meeting with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, he publicly upbraided the leader for the government's failure to bring security.

DOJ_NMG_0081041

Although al-Sistani has steadfastly refused to meet with U.S. officials, he counseled Shiites not to take up arms against the Americans. In 2004, he personally intervened to broker a truce that ended weeks of fighting between al-Sadr's militiamen and the U.S. military in Najaf.

In statements earlier this year, al-Sistani emotionally appealed for peace between the Shiite majority and the once-dominant Sunni minority.

The cleric, who is in his mid-70s and suffers from a heart condition, sets aside 90 minutes every day to receive visitors and well-wishers and without fail he urges them to work for an end to the bloodshed, said the official close to al-Sistani.

The visitors are mostly tribal chiefs or public figures but include less prominent Shiites. The flow of visitors shows that reverence for al-Sistani as a religious figure remains strong — but the continuing violence is a sign of his waning political leverage.

Iraq's main media give significantly less coverage to al-Sistani than they did a year ago. Portrait posters of al-Sadr in the streets of Baghdad as well as the mainly Shiite south now far outnumber those of al-Sistani.

Previously, Shiite politicians could hardly make a major decision without traveling to al-Sistani's office in Najaf to get his opinion or seek his endorsement.

When the United States tried to put off elections, al-Sistani's insistence on the vote — and mass protests he called for — forced a change of heart in Washington and elections were held in January and December 2005.

The January 2005 election produced a parliament that drafted a new constitution adopted in a referendum last October. A second election, for a full, four-year legislature, was held last December.

Al-Sistani was credited for the high Shiite turnout in all three votes. But the dismal performance of the two Shiite-led governments produced by last year's elections chipped away at his prestige since it was his support that brought them to power.

The governments' failures drove many Shiites away from moderates and into the camps of radicals like al-Sadr, whose militia — the Mahdi Army — controls Baghdad's teeming Shiite district of Sadr City and a string of Shiite towns across central and southern Iraq.

"After the elections and the referendum, people as well as the marjayiah (top Shiite clergy) expected life to be rosy, but all we got was trouble," said the official in contact with al-Sistani.

Vali Nasr, who lectures on Islamic affairs at the U.S. Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif., believes al-Sistani's involvement in politics hurt his standing.

"In some ways, his authority has gone down and he lost control of the political process," Nasr said.

___

Associated Press writer Qassim Abdul-Zahra contributed to this report.

Official: Guard Force Is Behind Death Squads (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 13 -- Iraq's interior minister on Friday rejected allegations that Iraq's police and military have played a major role in the death squads blamed for Baghdad's surging violence, saying that only a small number of all those caught in U.S. or Iraqi raids were members of the police or army.

Jawad al-Bolani, speaking to a small group of reporters in Baghdad, blamed the Facilities Protection Service, or FPS, a massive but unregulated government guard force whose numbers he put at about 150,000.

"Whenever we capture someone, we rarely find anyone is an employee of the government ministries," Bolani said. When they are, "they've turned out to be mostly from the FPS, with very few individual, actual incidents involving anyone from the Ministry of Interior or Ministry of Defense."

Since midsummer, Shiite-Sunni violence has escalated in Baghdad, with the Health Ministry last month reporting that the number of monthly killings here had roughly doubled since spring, to 2,600. Most of the victims had been shot and their bodies dumped in the streets, often handcuffed, blindfolded and showing signs of torture.

DOJ_NMG_0081042

Many victims are Sunni Arabs. Sunnis and some U.S. officials charge that Shiite Muslim militias, sometimes operating inside the mainly Shiite police forces, are responsible for much of the killing. Victims of Baghdad's violence are often taken away by men in police uniforms, and sometimes in police vehicles, and later found dead.

Bolani and his predecessor as interior minister, Bayan Jabr, both have minimized the possibility of any police involvement in the nightly killings. "We are experiencing a problem of impressions" regarding a police role in killings and militia infiltration of police, Bolani said Friday.

American generals were among the first to publicly express suspicion that the Facilities Protection Service was playing a key role in the growing sectarian killings. U.S. commanders themselves started the agency soon after the 2003 U.S-led invasion, intending it to be a force of a few thousand men who would guard buildings against looting.

The service today has grown to a size rivaling that of the U.S. force in Iraq, although control of the service's men is split among the various ministries they are nominally assigned to guard. Most wear uniforms similar or identical to those of the police.

Bolani also said bodyguard units assigned to unspecified officials were carrying out some of the killings.

Bolani, like Jabr, has repeatedly suggested that killings by gunmen in police uniforms were being carried out by impostors. On Friday, he repeated promises made since early this year that police would soon be issued uniforms and vehicles that would be difficult to duplicate.

Bolani also said police forces are trying to reform themselves, such as by retraining men and requiring loyalty oaths. He said major changes were needed at the command level of the Interior Ministry itself and that he had the backing of the government to make them.

Iraq's government, led by the Shiite religious parties that also lead the militias, has shown little willingness to confront them.

Interior Ministry officials were serious about purging "corrupt elements" and had fired about 3,000 employees for that reason, Bolani said. Aides said 1,228 of those employees had been subjected to administrative punishment, and Bolani said 10 to 20 percent of the 3,000 had been referred for possible prosecution. He declined to immediately give examples of infractions or name those punished.

Bolani, an independent allied to the coalition of governing Shiite religious parties, also said three of the country's biggest militias -- those of the country's two main Kurdish parties and that of a leading Shiite religious party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq -- were among those that had been lawfully integrated into the country's security forces.

He said that a fourth major militia, the Mahdi Army of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, along with Sunni insurgent groups, were "outside the political body and structure."

"We do not approve of the existence of these militias," Bolani said of the Mahdi Army and Sunni insurgents.

Iraqi Official Deflects Criticism (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

The interior minister says few of those aiding or tolerating sectarian killings work for him.

BAGHDAD — Iraq's interior minister, whose forces are accused of complicity in sectarian death squad killings, defended his agency in an interview with U.S. reporters Friday, and said he had the backing of the prime minister and parliament to remove corrupt and incompetent police commanders from the streets.

Jawad Bolani, a political independent who took over as interior minister in June, downplayed the problems at his ministry, seen by many as a source of sectarian tension and violence throughout the country.

He said more than two-thirds of sectarian slaying victims were found in areas of Baghdad under the control of the Defense Ministry, which oversees the Iraqi army, suggesting that U.S. and Iraqi focus on the alleged abuses by his forces was misplaced.

"Baghdad is not only the Ministry of Interior," Bolani said in his office in the capital. "It is divided in responsibility."

The Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry has been accused by Sunni Arab politicians of harboring or tolerating Shiite Muslim militias linked to killings of Sunni Arab civilians. Dozens of corpses showing signs of torture show up daily in the Tigris River or in abandoned lots. At least 18 bodies were discovered Friday in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0081043

North of the capital, near the Tigris River town of Duluiya, police discovered the beheaded bodies of 14 Shiite Muslim laborers who were among 17 abducted Thursday by gunmen believed to be Sunni Arab insurgents. The victims were handcuffed and showed signs of torture.

South of Baghdad, insurgents killed an Iraqi police SWAT commander Friday in a bombing at an Interior Ministry compound that also killed a deputy and injured two others, officials said.

One U.S. soldier was reported killed in combat near Tikrit on Thursday when his vehicle struck a homemade bomb. A U.S. military news release said two Western security contractors guarding a U.S. Army Corps of Engineers convoy were killed by a roadside bomb Wednesday.

Bolani sidestepped questions about whether he saw militia influence in the Interior Ministry. But he drew a distinction between militias that existed before the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and others, such as radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi army, that emerged afterward. Under Iraqi law, those that existed before the invasion and fought former President Saddam Hussein have a right to be incorporated into security forces, whereas the others are illegal, he said.

Bolani said few sectarian militia members who had been arrested worked for the Interior Ministry. Often they were employees of an Iraqi security force that guarded government buildings, or were security guards at other ministries or for politicians. He said some had been linked to the Iraqi National Intelligence Service.

Bolani said he had removed 3,000 police officers from their posts, referring anywhere from 10% to 20% of the cases to prosecutors. An aide said Bolani had issued 1,228 "administrative punishments" to employees.

But the minister acknowledged that he was powerless when it came to security in large areas of the capital, especially in Sunni-dominated western Baghdad.

He noted that Amer Hashimi, the brother of a Sunni Arab politician, was killed this week in his Baghdad home in a neighborhood under the control of the Defense Ministry.

Increasingly shaken by the violence, many Iraqis have demanded accountability.

"It is not reasonable that cars in the daylight come to the house of a well-known commander and kill him, and the government says, 'We don't know,' " Sheik Harith Obeidi told worshipers Friday at the Shawaf Mosque in Baghdad.

Cmdr. Salam Trad, leader of a special police squadron, and his assistant were killed Friday in a bombing at his office in the Shiite city of Hillah, U.S. and Iraqi officials said. Investigators provided no details about the blast, but an Interior Ministry official said a bomb might have been placed beneath Trad's desk.

"It's obvious there was some kind of inside collaboration," said Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Kinani, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry.

The attack in the southern city came as thousands prepared to descend on the Shiite holy city of Najaf to commemorate a religious holiday.

More than 20,000 police officers will be on duty in the city, south of Hillah. Officials worry that Sunni Arab insurgents will attack the worshipers.

daragahi@latimes.com

Times special correspondents in Baghdad, Hillah and Najaf contributed to this report.

Iraqi Colonel Who Bridged Sectarian Divide Is Killed (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Jonathan Finer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Officer Bridged Sectarian Divide

BAGHDAD, Oct. 13 -- Operating between the insurgent Sunni Arab suburbs of Baghdad and the Shiite militia-dominated south, Col. Salam al-Mamuri and his Scorpion commando team were a rarity among Iraqi security forces, American and Iraqi colleagues said: a police unit fighting on both sides of the country's sectarian divide.

On Friday, a bomb blew apart Mamuri and an aide at the Scorpions' headquarters in the southern city of Hilla. The attack ended the life of a broadly respected commander who had been one of the longest-serving and longest-surviving men in a cadre of Iraqi army veterans struggling to restore law and order after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0081044

Mamuri's comparative evenhandedness enforcing the law may have earned him an enemy within his own sect, the Shiites. Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani in Baghdad called it a "possibility and a probability" that the assassination was at least in part an inside job, because the killer was able to gain access to Mamuri's office to plant the bomb.

Mamuri had founded the Scorpion brigade soon after Americans arrived and had led it ever since. Though the unit, whose commandos wore the emblem of a black arachnid, was known to locals as the Scorpions, successive deployments of U.S. Special Operations members and Marines generally called it simply Hilla SWAT.

The Scorpions were made up of about 800 men, most of them Shiites from Hilla. The unit, which Bolani called "one of the most important and vital of the Ministry of Interior," has remained relatively stable and cohesive since its early days, as other U.S. efforts to build Iraqi security forces have collapsed.

"The way I look at it, I am not here to serve Sunnis or Shiites. I am here to serve Iraq," Mamuri said in early May, in an interview in the office in which he was killed Friday. His close-cropped salt-and-pepper hair made him look a decade older than his 35 years.

His expression of neutrality was indistinguishable from those issued up and down the ranks of Iraq's predominantly Shiite police forces, many members of which are accused by Sunnis and Americans of a role in the country's escalating Shiite-Sunni killings. The difference, many Americans and Iraqis said, was that Mamuri acted as if he meant it.

"They are literally the only Iraqi unit under arms in the south that is completely independent of the political parties and the militias," a Special Forces intelligence specialist and medic said this year. "Everyone else -- the police, the army -- is playing ball for somebody. They won't."

An American Special Forces team leader who worked with the Scorpions for several months said, "We look at them as peers, we don't look at them as below us." As a matter of policy, Special Forces soldiers speak only on the condition of anonymity.

In Hilla on Friday, the commando leader's funeral dirge was the rattle of automatic-weapons fire, as the Scorpions shot into the air to mark Mamuri's death. Many residents of the flat, sprawling market town stayed indoors, taking shelter from the gunfire and fearing the killing would spark retaliatory violence.

"Ninety percent of the people are so sad about what happened, because the colonel was a very good man with the good people, but he was an iron hand against the outlaws," Hayder Foaud, a lawyer in Hilla, said by telephone.

Seven other officers were wounded by the bomb that killed Mamuri.

Capt. Muthana Ahmad, a spokesman for the provincial police force there, said the bomb may have been attached to a window of Mamuri's office. Others, including Abdul Kareem al-Kinani, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry in Baghdad, said investigators believed the wreckage indicated that the bomb had been placed under his desk.

"This is correct," Ahmad said, asked whether authorities suspected that one or more of the commando leader's aides collaborated in the killing. "As you may know, infiltration has taken place" in Iraq's security forces.

Bolani told reporters that he had ordered an investigation.

Hilla, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, is markedly more peaceful than the towns on the capital's southern outskirts that serve as strongholds for Sunni insurgents. Shiite schoolchildren today sing the Sunni towns' names, such as Latifiyah, in chilling songs equating them with hell.

On the other side of Hilla is the almost entirely Shiite south, free of the brunt of Sunni insurgent attacks but the scene of growing clashes between militias and security forces loyal to rival Shiite religious parties.

Hilla residents said Friday that local forces of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr especially disliked Mamuri, more than ever after the Scorpions raided a Sadr office in mid-September. Sadr's militia, known as the Mahdi Army, is one of the most powerful forces in Iraq.

Shiite politicians and officials from the Shiite-run Interior Ministry frequently threatened to have Mamuri replaced. Several attempts were made on his life, including a roadside bomb attack on his convoy in late April that was blamed on the Mahdi Army.

Because of its makeup and the fact that it fought al-Qaeda in Iraq and other Sunni-led insurgent groups, Hilla SWAT swiftly earned a reputation as a feared anti-Sunni force. It was heavily involved in the operations around Yusufiyah in April and May that led to the capture of several top al-Qaeda lieutenants and, the military later said, the eventual killing of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

DOJ_NMG_0081045

But the unit cracked down as fiercely on Shiite militias, which Mamuri blamed this spring for what by then amounted to at least a half-dozen attempts to assassinate him. He barred militia members from serving in his brigade, despite intense political pressure from the provincial governor, who Mamuri said repeatedly pressured him to accept more militia members into his ranks.

"The militias consider us the only thing preventing them from completely taking over the south," Mamuri said in the spring interview. "They are bad for the country."

Mamuri rejected the idea of giving up in the face of the assassination attempts. "You can get killed in Iraq even if you sit all day in your house," he said. "What should I do, sit around and wait to die, or try to stop the people who are killing?"

Finer reported from New Haven, Conn. Special correspondents Naseer Nouri in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf contributed to this report.

15 Killed In Attacks Across Iraq (AP)

By Christopher Bodeen, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

At least 15 people were killed in attacks Friday around Iraq, including the commander of a battalion of special Interior Ministry police and six women and two girls who were shot south of Baghdad.

The women and young girls were killed by unidentified gunmen on the western outskirts of Suwayrah, 25 miles south of Baghdad, police Lt. Mohammed al-Shammari said. Two other teenage girls were kidnapped, he said.

In Hillah, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, a bomb planted in the Interior Ministry police headquarters killed Col. Salam al-Maamouri, commander of the Scorpion police battalion, and his aide, while wounding seven others, police Lt. Osama Ahmed said.

Police were investigating whether the bomb could have been placed by a policeman from the brigade, Ahmed said. He added that the bomb appeared to have been planted under the commander's chair or desk.

In downtown Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, a father and his two sons were killed by gunmen, provincial police said. Another two people were killed and one was wounded when unknown assailants opened fire on them on the eastern outskirts of Baqouba, police said.

The bodies of two guards assigned to protect a sewage handling facility were found in a market in Suwayrah, said Hadi al-Itabi, an official at the morgue in Kut.

8 Females, 2 Teenagers Kidnapped In Iraq (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Gunmen attacked Shiite women picking vegetables in a field outside the capital Friday, killing six adults and two young girls and kidnapping two teenagers. It was one of the deadliest assaults specifically targeting women in Iraq's monthslong wave of sectarian violence.

Police said they suspected the gunmen were Sunnis seeking to intimidate Shiites into fleeing the area south of Baghdad. Previous major attacks in Iraq have killed many women and men together, and at times individual women have been shot or kidnapped. But rarely have large groups of women been attacked.

In another sign of sectarian bloodshed, police in Duluiyah north of Baghdad found 14 beheaded bodies thought to be from a group of 17 workers kidnapped by gunmen Thursday while traveling home to the mostly Shiite town of Balad. There was no word on the other abductees.

The attack on the farm field took place outside Saifiya, an ethnically mixed village south of Baghdad. Most residents already fled to escape violence, Sunnis going to the nearby town of Madain, Shiites to neighboring Suwayrah.

The women were gathering vegetables when gunmen pulled up in two cars around 8 a.m. and surrounded the field. They opened fire, killing six women and two girls about 4 or 5 years old, Lt. Mohammed al-Shammari said. The attackers forced two teenage girls into the cars and escaped, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0081046

Al-Shammari said the gunmen may have come from the nearby Baghdad district of Dora, a mixed neighborhood long torn by bloodshed inflicted by both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen.

Baghdad has been the epicenter of violence for months. The city has averaged 36 attacks a day the past three weeks, an increase of nearly 30 percent over the preceding seven weeks and 60 percent higher than from mid-March to mid-June, according to U.S. military figures.

The U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, attributed the rise to the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, when he said attacks "historically" have increased. Some Islamic militants believe that dying in combat during Ramadan brings extra blessings in paradise.

U.S. officials warned weeks ago that killings by Shiite and Sunni death squads have become the greatest threat in Iraq, although the Sunni-dominated insurgency continues bombing and shooting attacks on U.S. and Iraqi troops as well as civilians.

Besides the attack on the women, at least 10 other Iraqi civilians died in violence Friday. A U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in northern Iraq, the 45th American death this month.

Bloodshed in Baghdad itself was tamped down by a curfew — imposed every Friday, banning vehicle traffic to prevent car bomb attacks on weekly Muslim prayers.

The northern city of Mosul was also under curfew after U.S. and Iraqi troops fought with gunmen Thursday night. The fight was sparked by a mortar barrage on a U.S. base that wounded 12 American soldiers. At least 12 suspected insurgents were reported killed in ensuing gunbattles.

The head of Iraq's most feared Shiite militia, the Mahdi Army, issued a statement late Thursday disavowing violence committed against Iraqis in the name of his group. But it was unclear whether he referred to slayings of Sunnis or minor clashes with other Shiite militias.

In pamphlets distributed in his hometown of Najaf, 100 miles south of Baghdad, radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr — whose party is also a powerful member of the government — said members of his militia had not been involved in any "unlawful attacks" on Iraqis.

"This has not been proven, but if it is shown to be true I will publicize their names and disavow them," al-Sadr said.

"They should make use of the holy month of Ramadan and repent," he added.

Meanwhile, a new video on the Internet hinted at possible splits between Iraqi Sunni insurgents and al-Qaida in Iraq, the group behind many of the country's worst bombings and whose fighters are thought to be mostly foreign Arabs.

A man claiming to be an Iraqi Sunni insurgent appears on the video urging Osama bin Laden to replace the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq because of its attacks on Sunni clerics.

"They planted explosives in the houses, the hospitals and the schools and even the electric transformers," the man, who called himself Abu Osama al-Iraq, said in the video.

He warned that if insurgents lose Sunni support, "we will be an easy hunt for the crusaders, the occupiers and their agents the Shiites." He asked bin Laden to name an Iraqi to replace Abu Ayyub al-Masri as leader of al-Qaida in Iraq.

Al-Masri — whose pseudonym means "the Egyptian" — took over the leadership after Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed by a U.S. airstrike in June. Other Sunni insurgents had criticized al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian, for turning Sunni Iraqis against the movement by killing civilians.

The authenticity of the video, posted on a Web forum often used by Islamic militants, could not be confirmed. But it was the first report of dissent toward al-Masri.

SEAL Falls On Grenade To Save Comrades (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

Associated Press, October 14, 2006

CORONADO, Calif. (AP) -- A Navy SEAL sacrificed his life to save his comrades by throwing himself on top of a grenade Iraqi insurgents tossed into their sniper hideout, fellow members of the elite force said.

DOJ_NMG_0081047

Petty Officer 2nd Class Michael A. Monsoor had been near the only door to the rooftop structure Sept. 29 when the grenade hit him in the chest and bounced to the floor, said four SEALs who spoke to The Associated Press this week on condition of anonymity because their work requires their identities to remain secret.

"He never took his eye off the grenade, his only movement was down toward it," said a 28-year-old lieutenant who sustained shrapnel wounds to both legs that day. "He undoubtedly saved mine and the other SEALs' lives, and we owe him."

Monsoor, a 25-year-old gunner, was killed in the explosion in Ramadi, west of Baghdad. He was only the second SEAL to die in Iraq since the war began.

Two SEALs next to Monsoor were injured; another who was 10 to 15 feet from the blast was unhurt. The four had been working with Iraqi soldiers providing sniper security while U.S. and Iraqi forces conducted missions in the area.

In an interview at the SEALs' West Coast headquarters in Coronado, four members of the special force remembered "Mikey" as a loyal friend and a quiet, dedicated professional.

"He was just a fun-loving guy," said a 26-year-old petty officer 2nd class who went through the grueling 29-week SEAL training with Monsoor. "Always got something funny to say, always got a little mischievous look on his face."

Other SEALS described the Garden Grove, Calif., native as a modest and humble man who drew strength from his family and his faith. His father and brother are former Marines, said a 31-year-old petty officer 2nd class.

Buy AP Photo Reprints

Prior to his death, Monsoor had already demonstrated courage under fire. He has been posthumously awarded the Silver Star for his actions May 9 in Ramadi, when he and another SEAL pulled a team member shot in the leg to safety while bullets pinged off the ground around them.

Monsoor's funeral was held Thursday at Fort Rosecrans National Cemetery in San Diego. He has also been submitted for an award for his actions the day he died.

The first Navy SEAL to die in Iraq was Petty Officer 2nd Class Marc A. Lee, 28, who was killed Aug. 2 in a firefight while on patrol against insurgents in Ramadi. Navy spokesman Lt. Taylor Clark said the low number of deaths among SEALs in Iraq is a testament to their training.

Sixteen SEALs have been killed in Afghanistan. Eleven of them died in June 2005 when a helicopter was shot down near the Pakistan border while ferrying reinforcements for troops pursuing al-Qaida militants.

There are about 2,300 of the elite fighters, based in Coronado and Little Creek, Va.

The Navy is trying to boost that number by 500 - a challenge considering more than 75 percent of candidates drop out of training, notorious for "Hell Week," a five-day stint of continual drills by the ocean broken by only four hours sleep total. Monsoor made it through training on his second attempt.

Coroner Says U.S. Forces Unlawfully Shot Reporter (WP)

By Karla Adam And Kevin Sullivan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Briton to Seek Prosecution in 2003 Iraq Killing

OXFORD, England, Oct. 13 -- A British coroner ruled Friday that U.S. troops unlawfully killed a British television journalist during the invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

Coroner Andrew Walker, after an eight-day inquest, also said he would seek prosecution of the U.S. troops responsible for the death of Terry Lloyd, a veteran reporter for British television network ITN. Walker said he would ask Britain's attorney general and director of public prosecutions "whether any steps can be taken to bring the perpetrators responsible for this to justice."

The U.S. Defense Department said in a statement that U.S. military authorities had investigated the incident and determined that the American troops "followed the applicable rules of engagement."

Although it has been "an unfortunate reality that journalists have died in Iraq," U.S. troops have "never deliberately targeted" them or other noncombatants, the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0081048

According to a videotape provided by the U.S. military and testimony from witnesses, including an ITN cameraman who was at the scene, Lloyd, 50, was killed after being caught in crossfire between U.S. and Iraqi forces near the southern Iraqi city of Basra on March 22, 2003.

The British coroner said Lloyd was shot in the back by Iraqi soldiers who had overtaken his four-wheel-drive vehicle. Lloyd then walked to a civilian minivan and was being driven away for medical treatment when U.S. forces opened fire on the van, killing Lloyd with a shot to the head, Walker concluded.

"There is no doubt that the minibus presented no threat to the American forces," Walker said. "There is no doubt it was an unlawful act of fire upon the minibus."

Under British law, coroner's inquests are conducted when a person dies violently or from unknown causes.

A Lebanese interpreter, Hussein Osman, was also killed in the incident, and French cameraman Fred Nerac is officially listed as missing and is presumed dead. An ITN cameraman, Daniel Demoustier, survived the incident.

"In my opinion, the U.S. forces involved should be prosecuted for war crimes," Demoustier said after the ruling.

Lloyd's widow, Lynn, in a statement read by her lawyer, called the incident a "very serious war crime" and said the troops responsible should be tried for murder.

David Mannion, ITN editor in chief, said the network supported the family's pursuit of prosecutions. "All of us want and need to know the truth," he said. "Terry Lloyd was killed in an unlawful act by a U.S. Marine who fired directly at the civilian minibus in which Terry, already badly injured, lay helpless."

No U.S. military officials testified at the inquest, although several submitted written witness statements. Walker ruled those statements inadmissible because he did not have the opportunity to question the troops who wrote them.

U.S. military officials provided a video shot by a serviceman from one of the U.S. tanks involved in the incident. The tape, which was played at the inquest Thursday, shows two burning vehicles, one of which may have been the minibus that was carrying Lloyd. A forensic video expert testified that about 15 minutes of the tape may have been erased before it was provided to the inquest.

Lloyd's daughter, Chelsey, said Friday that "many questions" remain about her father's death, including, "Why is there 15 minutes of film missing?" The family says they believe the missing video would show the attack on Lloyd's vehicle.

Maj. Kay Roberts, the Royal Military Police officer in charge of investigating Lloyd's death, testified that she raised questions with American military authorities about whether the videotape had been altered. She said they assured her that "what we were given was everything that they had."

Lloyd was a 20-year veteran of ITN who had made previous trips to Iraq and had extensive experience reporting from conflict zones, including Kosovo and Bosnia. In his ruling, Walker praised Lloyd and his crew as "that rare breed whose professionalism and dedication in the face of great personal danger is and can only be admired by those they left behind."

Sullivan reported from London.

Coroner: U.S. Forces Killed TV Reporter (AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

A coroner ruled Friday that U.S. forces in Iraq unlawfully killed a British television journalist by shooting him in the head as he lay in the back of a makeshift ambulance during the opening days of the war.

The widow of reporter Terry Lloyd called for the perpetrators to be prosecuted for the "despicable, deliberate, vengeful act." And Deputy Coroner Andrew Walker said he would ask the attorney general to take steps to bring to justice those responsible for the death.

But prosecution of U.S. service members seemed unlikely.

Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman, said an investigation into the killing of Lloyd, 50, a veteran reporter for the British TV network ITN was completed in May 2003 and "determined that U.S. forces followed the applicable rules of engagement."

DOJ_NMG_0081049

"The Department of Defense has never deliberately targeted noncombatants, including journalists," he said. "We have always gone to extreme measures to avoid civilian casualties and collateral damage."

Ballesteros said the Pentagon will continue to work with news organizations to "do everything realistically possible to reduce the risk on an inherently dangerous battlefield, but we must remember that there are inherent risks in covering a war. "

The coroner inquest was unable to determine whether the bullets that killed Lloyd in southern Iraq on March 22, 2003, were fired by U.S. ground forces or helicopters.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack later described Lloyd's death as a tragedy, but concurred with the Pentagon that an investigation had found the troops involved had not broken the law.

"(Lloyd's death) was a tragic circumstance that occurred in a war zone ... it's a tragedy. It's a tragedy for his friends and for his family," he said.

Aidan White, the head of the International Federation of Journalists, the world's largest organization of journalists, said: "If this was murder, as the court suggests, and the U.S. is responsible, it is certainly a war crime."

The London-based National Union of Journalists welcomed the coroner's decision and also called the killing "nothing short of a war crime." Jeremy Dear, the group's general secretary, said: "The killing of journalists with impunity must never, ever go unpunished. Any attempt to silence journalists in this way must never succeed."

Witnesses testified during the inquest that Lloyd — who was driving toward the southern Iraqi city of Basra with fellow ITN reporters — was shot by Iraqi troops who overtook his car, then died after U.S. fire hit a civilian minivan being used as an ambulance and struck him in the head.

"Terry Lloyd died following a gunshot wound to the head. The evidence this bullet was fired by the Americans is overwhelming," Walker said. "There is no doubt that the minibus presented no threat to the American forces. There is no doubt it was an unlawful act of fire."

ITN cameraman Daniel Demoustier, the sole survivor of the incident, told the inquest ITN's two four-wheel drive vehicles were overtaken by a truck carrying Iraqi forces and that gunfire erupted.

Demoustier, a Belgian, said he jumped from the flaming car and lay in the sand, waiting for the shooting to stop. Demoustier said he tried to stand to signal U.S. tanks in the area but they resumed firing at the clearly marked ITN vehicles.

Demoustier said he saw a makeshift ambulance arrive and pick up people. He was later taken to safety in the car of a British newspaper reporter.

The coroner said Friday that an Iraqi civilian drove up in a minivan and picked up four wounded Iraqi soldiers, then saw Lloyd with a press card around his neck and helped him into the van. Lloyd was shot in the head as the van drove toward a hospital, the coroner said.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Demoustier said after the ruling that the inquest did not make clear whether the bullet that killed Lloyd was fired by a U.S. tank or helicopter. He said the forces in a tank would have been able to see that they were firing at a civilian vehicle, but a helicopter would not.

Lloyd's widow, Lynn, in a statement read by her lawyer, said U.S. forces "allowed their soldiers to behave like trigger-happy cowboys in an area in which there were civilians traveling."

Lloyd and the three other ITN crew members were some of the few Western reporters who covered the fighting on their own, while most others were embedded with U.S. or British forces.

Lebanese interpreter Hussein Osman also was killed and cameraman Fred Nerac remains missing and presumed dead.

U.S. authorities didn't allow servicemen to testify at the inquest. Several submitted anonymous statements that the coroner ruled inadmissible.

"I should have heard all evidence from the American personnel," Walker said. "It was not satisfactory or appropriate to read these statements in place of that evidence."

The court watched a video Tuesday, filmed by a U.S. serviceman attached to one of the tanks accused of firing at the reporters' cars. The tape opens with images of Lloyd's vehicle and the Iraqi truck burning amid gunfire. The tanks drive to the cars and inspect them. A minivan — possibly the ambulance — appears and more shots are fired. At the end of the tape, a U.S. soldier shouts, "It's some media personnel! That's media down there!"

DOJ_NMG_0081050

A forensic examiner said the first 15 minutes of the tape may have been erased.

Pentagon Rejects Coroner's Verdict On Killing Of British Journalist (AFP)

AFP, October 14, 2006

US troops who killed a British journalist in Iraq in 2003 followed their rules of engagement, the Pentagon said, rejecting a British coroner's verdict that the killing was unlawful.

The Pentagon said its own investigation into the incident, in which British journalist Terry Lloyd was killed, concluded in May 2003 that "US forces followed the applicable rules of engagement."

"The Department of Defense has never deliberately targeted non-combatants, including journalists," the Pentagon said in a statement. "We have always gone to extreme measures to avoid civilian casualties and collateral damage."

Lloyd was killed, along with Lebanese interpreter Hussein Osman and French cameraman Fred Nerac, near the Shatt al-Basra Bridge outside Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, on March 22, 2003, days after the US-led invasion was launched.

The 50-year-old Lloyd, a correspondent for ITN News, was shot in the back after getting caught up in US and Iraqi crossfire, then shot in the head by US forces as he was taken away in a minibus for medical treatment, Oxfordshire Assistant Deputy Coroner Andrew Walker said.

"I have no doubt that it was an unlawful act to fire on this minibus," said the coroner in Oxford, west of London.

The Pentagon statement said its investigation was "limited to the engagement of the vehicle Mr. Lloyd was traveling in."

"It has been an unfortunate reality that journalists have died in Iraq," it said.

"Combat operations are inherently dangerous, and we do not take lightly our responsibilities in the conduct of these operations. We do not, nor would we ever, deliberately target a non-combatant civilian or journalist," it said.

U.S. Forces Blamed In Death Of British Journalist (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, October 14, 2006

LONDON — U.S. forces unlawfully fired the heavy-caliber machine-gun bullet that killed British newsman Terry Lloyd after an Iraqi civilian put him in his car and attempted to take him to the hospital when he was wounded shortly after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, a coroner ruled Friday.

After an eight-day inquest that included testimony from Lloyd's cameraman at ITN News, Oxfordshire Deputy Coroner Andrew Walker said he had "no doubt" the shooting was "an unlawful act," and concluded that Lloyd could have survived an earlier attack by Iraqi forces had U.S. soldiers not opened fire on his rescue vehicle.

Walker said he would ask senior British legal officials to hold those responsible criminally liable, but U.S. authorities denied wrongdoing and said the Marines deployed in southern Iraq during the early days of the war were following the rules of engagement.

"The Department of Defense has never deliberately targeted noncombatants, including journalists," the Pentagon said in a statement. "We have always gone to extreme measures to avoid civilian casualties and collateral damage."

U.S. officials declined to provide troops to testify at the inquest, and the coroner refused to accept what he said were anonymous "self-serving statements." No U.S. explanation was part of the inquest's official deliberations.

Lloyd's family called the shooting a "very serious war crime," and said the evidence showed that the newsman was able to stand and walk until he was shot in the head by U.S. troops while lying in the back of a minibus that had stopped to help him.

"This was not a 'friendly fire' incident or a crossfire incident. It was a despicable, deliberate, vengeful act, particularly as it came many minutes after the initial exchange" between U.S. military forces and Iraqi troops, Lloyd's widow, Lyn, said in a statement read by her lawyer.

"U.S. forces appear to have allowed their soldiers to behave like trigger-happy cowboys in an area where civilians were moving around," she said.

Unlike many journalists who were traveling with American forces at the beginning of the war, Lloyd and his crew were operating near the southern Iraqi city of Basra on their own, a strategy many journalists believed would allow them to get a more impartial view of the war.

DOJ_NMG_0081051

They had set out to survey the area when they inadvertently moved past U.S. tanks toward a line of Iraqi soldiers, who began chasing the journalists through Iraqi and American gunfire.

"All hell broke loose, absolutely," Lloyd's Belgian cameraman, Daniel Demoustier, testified at the inquest.

Moments later, he said, "I turned my head to the right and saw the passenger door was open and Terry was not in the car anymore."

Lloyd's Lebanese interpreter, Hussein Osman, was killed, and French cameraman Fred Nerac is missing.

Both were seized by Iraqis and put in a pickup, witnesses said.

Ballistics experts said Lloyd was hit first with a bullet fired by an Iraqi, but he would have survived had he not been hit by a second bullet fired from a U.S. tank that pierced the side of the minibus.

Walker, the deputy coroner, said the evidence led him to believe that U.S. tanks opened fire first on the two marked TV trucks and the Iraqi vehicle that had intercepted them.

He said U.S. troops opened fire on the minibus even though "it presented no threat to American forces."

The Pentagon said its investigation looked only at the shots fired at the minibus.

"Combat operations are inherently dangerous, and we do not take lightly our responsibilities in the conduct of these operations," the Pentagon said.

"We do not, nor would we ever, deliberately target a noncombatant civilian or journalist."

kim.murphy@latimes.com

U.S. Citizen Sentenced To Death In Iraq (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

Federal Court Asked To Block Transfer

A U.S. citizen who allegedly orchestrated the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists near Baghdad last year was sentenced to death in an Iraqi court Thursday, prompting his lawyers to ask a federal judge in Washington to block the U.S. military from transferring him to the Iraqi government.

Mohammad Munaf, 53, has been in U.S. custody since May 23, 2005, when he was arrested during a military raid to rescue the Romanian journalists nearly two months after they were snatched. Authorities have alleged that Munaf -- who had ushered the journalists into Iraq and was acting as their guide and translator -- posed as a kidnap victim but was actually involved in a conspiracy for ransom and led them into a trap.

Military officials have said in sworn statements that Munaf confessed to elements of the crime and helped arrange the kidnapping. Munaf has been held at Camp Cropper, where the U.S. military keeps high-value detainees on behalf of Multinational Force-Iraq.

Officials said yesterday that they could not recall another U.S. citizen receiving a death sentence from the Central Criminal Court of Iraq. Munaf was born in Baghdad, received U.S. citizenship in 2000, and moved to Romania in 2001 with his wife and three children, according to court papers. Munaf's attorneys and a spokesman for the Justice Department yesterday confirmed Munaf's sentence.

Lawyers representing Munaf in the United States said that his conviction in the Iraqi court is a farce and that he was not allowed to present evidence or witnesses in his defense. In an emergency motion filed yesterday in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Munaf's attorneys asked the U.S. government to intervene and argued that Munaf made incriminating statements only after "threats of violence and sexual assault against him and his family."

Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer at the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University's law school, has filed a habeas corpus petition on Munaf's behalf and said U.S. authorities have failed to properly ensure that Munaf's trial in Iraq was fair. He said handing Munaf over to the Iraqi government would mean certain execution without appropriate review of his case.

"The implications are that no matter where a U.S. citizen is taken into custody, there would be no review of their detention," Hafetz said. "If the U.S. is going to hand over a citizen, it must ensure that the trial comports to fundamental fairness."

DOJ_NMG_0081052

Justice Department lawyers have argued in court documents that the United States should not step in because the Iraqi government has a right to try people for crimes and that the U.S. military is merely holding Munaf on Iraq's behalf and acting as a multinational force. A Justice Department spokesman said there has been no change in that position.

Munaf's Iraqi attorneys reported that the Central Criminal Court judge was prepared to dismiss the charges at a hearing on Thursday but that two American officials -- including an unnamed general -- stepped into the courtroom and requested a private meeting. The judge returned 15 minutes later and sentenced Munaf and four other defendants to death without hearing additional evidence, according to a sworn statement by Sean Riordan, a legal intern at the Brennan Center who spoke with Munaf's attorney in Baghdad.

"In 36 years practicing law in Iraq, [the lawyer] had never before seen or heard of a death sentence being handed down without deliberation or consideration of the merits," Riordan said in the statement filed in Washington yesterday.

Romanian officials had indicated previously that they did not want to push ahead with charges, according to Munaf's attorneys. They said no Romanian representatives were present at Thursday's hearing.

"The unfairness of Mohammad's trial in Iraq is horrifying, but I am thankful an American court has the ability to protect an American citizen like him," said one of Munaf's family members, who asked not to be identified because of safety concerns. "I have hope and faith that the court will do something to end this nightmare."

Shays: Abu Ghraib Abuses Were Sex Ring (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, October 14, 2006

Republican Rep. Christopher Shays, who is in a tough re-election fight, said Friday the Abu Ghraib prison abuses were more about pornography than torture.

The veteran Connecticut congressman said a National Guard unit was primarily responsible for the abuses although it was actually the 372nd Military Police Company from Cresaptown, Md., an Army Reserve unit.

"It was a National Guard unit run amok," Shays said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. "It was torture because sex abuse is torture. It was gross and despicable ... This is more about pornography than torture."

Shays sought to defuse controversy over his previous comments suggesting the Abu Ghraib abuses weren't torture but instead involved a sex ring of troops.

"Now I've seen what happened in Abu Ghraib, and Abu Ghraib was not torture," Shays said at a debate Wednesday.

"It was outrageous, outrageous involvement of National Guard troops from (Maryland) who were involved in a sex ring and they took pictures of soldiers who were naked," added Shays. "And they did other things that were just outrageous. But it wasn't torture."

The lawmaker's comments were in a transcript of the debate provided by his opponent, Diane Farrell. Shays' campaign, contacted Friday, did not dispute the comments.

Abu Ghraib is the Baghdad prison where abuse of prisoners by U.S. soldiers led to an international scandal. Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib were brutalized and sexually humiliated by military police and intelligence agents in the fall of 2003. At least 11 U.S. soldiers have been convicted in the scandal.

Elected in 1987, Shays has distinguished himself as a moderate Republican who often breaks with his party, especially on his signature issue of campaign finance reform. But in the last week, his comments have echoed conservative talk radio.

Shays defended House Speaker Dennis Hastert's handling of a congressional page scandal, saying no one died like at Chappaquiddick in 1969 when Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy was involved.

"I know the speaker didn't go over a bridge and leave a young person in the water, and then have a press conference the next day," the embattled Connecticut congressman told The Hartford Courant in remarks published Wednesday.

"Dennis Hastert didn't kill anybody," he added.

In the debate, the congressman had been asked what the government should do to restore the nation's moral image in the wake of torture accusations at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison and Guantanamo Bay.

Shays said Friday he wished he had more fully explained his views at the debate.

DOJ_NMG_0081053

"I was maybe not as expansive as I needed to be," he said. "Of course, the degrading of anyone is torture. We need to deal with it."

Shays said his debate comments reflected the disturbing photos he has seen of Abu Ghraib abuses: "Naked Iraqis, naked Americans, Americans having sex ... gross and despicable pictures."

Shays is waging a bruising re-election fight against Farrell.

"Once again, Chris is trying to back away from an earlier statement because it's politically expedient," Farrell said Friday. "It's typical Chris."

Democratic Sen. Christopher Dodd, who appeared at a news conference with Farrell on Friday, said people are going to jail because of torture at Abu Ghraib.

"It's not because it was some pornography ring. I'm surprised anyone would make that suggestion," Dodd said. "The suggestion that somehow this was something less than that is, again, almost bordering on the bizarre."

During the campaign stop, Dodd criticized a direct-mail flier from the National Republican Congressional Committee titled, "Diane Farrell: Coffee Talk with the Taliban," that had been sent to voters in the southwestern Connecticut district.

"This is absolutely the worst kind of politics in America," Dodd said. "The people who associate themselves with that party and these things must be held accountable."

Farrell has received money and an endorsement from the Council for a Livable World, a 44-year-old Washington, D.C., organization that works to reduce nuclear weapons. In the mailer, Republicans said the Council has a "leader who wanted someone to sit down and talk with the Taliban instead of just forcibly removing them from power."

In a statement Friday, Shays said the NRCC had crossed the line with the mailing and called on the Republican organization to "put an end to sending this type of garbage."

On its Web site, the council calls the NRCC claim bogus and says board member Roger Fisher, an expert on conflict resolution who teaches at Harvard University, "recommended combining carrots and sticks to persuade the government of Afghanistan to turn over Osama bin Laden."

Recently, Senate Republican Leader Bill Frist said during a trip to Afghanistan that the Afghan war against Taliban guerrillas can never be won militarily and he favored bringing "people who call themselves Taliban" into the government.

___

Associated Press Writers Stephen Singer in Westport, Conn., and Susan Haigh in Hartford, Conn., contributed to this report.

In Tight Race, Republican Shays Takes A Less Measured Tone (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 14, 2006

During his 19 years in Congress, Rep. Christopher Shays (Conn.) has been widely known as a moderate Republican who rarely engages in firebrand politics. But that image has been challenged in recent days with remarks that a supporter called "unusual" and his opponent said were a sign of "desperation."

In a debate this week with Democratic challenger Diane Farrell, Shays said the Abu Ghraib prison abuse did not constitute torture. "It was outrageous, outrageous involvement of National Guard troops from [Maryland] who were involved in a sex ring, and they took pictures of soldiers who were naked," he said. "And they did other things that were just outrageous. But it wasn't torture."

Shays also recently defended House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) for his handling of the Mark Foley page scandal, contrasting it with the 1969 Chappaquiddick bridge incident, in which a young woman drowned in a car accident involving Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). "Hastert didn't kill anybody," Shays told the Hartford Courant.

Several analysts attributed the comments to Shays's frustration with what has become the toughest reelection campaign of his career. Shays has been under attack by Farrell for his support of the Iraq war, which is unpopular with many Democrats and independents in Connecticut.

Shays has tried to distance himself from the war in recent months, endorsing a timetable for withdrawal and calling for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. But polls suggest that Shays is still in serious danger of losing his seat.

"He seems to be coming undone," said Kevin F. Rennie, a former Republican state senator and Courant columnist. "I think he's having this conversation with himself in public that would better be held in private."

Gary Rose, an expert on Connecticut politics at Sacred Heart University in Shays's district, said the congressman is responding more forcefully than ever.

"Since 1987, Congressman Shays has routinely campaigned on the premise he is a man of principle and integrity who puts principle above politics," Rose said. "He really got aggravated when not only his opponent, but the press, suggested he was changing his position on the war due to political considerations. . . . He really feels like his core -- what makes him a special type of congressman -- has been questioned."

Yesterday, Shays backed away from his comments on Abu Ghraib. He told the Associated Press that the abuse was "torture because sex abuse is torture." But he also said, "This is more about pornography than torture."

"To appear to minimize Abu Ghraib as a sex ring doesn't characterize Abu Ghraib as what it was," Farrell said in an interview. "For him not to recognize that and be sensitive to it is deeply disappointing."

